On the 4th of September, Commodore Preble, in order to try new experiments of annoyance, determined to send a fireship into the enemy's harbour. The Intrepid was fitted out for this service, being filled with powder, shells, and other combustible materials. Captain Somers, who had often been the emulous rival of Decatur in the career of glory, was appointed to conduct her in, having for his associates in the hazardous enterprise Lieutenants Wadsworth and Israel, all volunteers. The Argus, Vixen, and Nautilus, were to convoy the Intrepid as far as the mouth of the harbour. Captain Somers and Lieutenant Wadsworth made choice of two of the fleetest boats in the squadron, manned with picked crews, to bring them out. At eight o'clock in the evening she stood into the harbour with a moderate breeze. Several shot were fired at her from the batteries. She had nearly gained her place of destination when she exploded, without having made any of the signals previously concerted to show that the crew was safe. Night hung over the dreadful catastrophe, and left the whole squadron a prey to the most painful anxiety. The convoy hovered about the harbour until sunrise, when no remains could be discovered either of the Intrepid or her boats. Doubt was turned into certainty, that she had prematurely blown up, as one of the enemy's gunboats was observed to be missing, and several others much shattered and damaged. Commodore Preble, in his account, says, that he was led to believe "that those boats were detached from the enemy's flotilla to intercept the ketch, and without suspecting her to be a fireship, the missing boats had suddenly boarded her, when the gallant Somers and the heroes of his party observing the other three boats surrounding them, and no prospect of escape, determined at once to prefer death, and the destruction of the enemy, to captivity and torturing slavery, put a match to the train leading directly to the magazine, which at once blew the whole into the air, and terminated their existence;" and he adds, that his "conjectures respecting this affair are founded on a resolution which Captain Somers and Lieutenants Wadsworth and Israel had formed, neither to be taken by the enemy, nor suffer him to get possession of the powder on board the Intrepid." Soon after these events, Commodore Preble gave up the command in the Mediterranean to Commodore Barron, and returned to the United States. His eminent services were enthusiastically acknowledged by his admiring fellow-citizens, as well as those of his associates in arms, "whose names," in the expressive language of congress on the occasion, "ought to live in the recollection and affection of a grateful country, and whose conduct ought to be regarded as an example to future generations."†

* Goldsborough's Naval Chronicle, p. 237.

† In 1794, a proposition was brought forward for creating a navy, and after a sharp debate, a bill was passed by a majority of two only, in the house of representatives, for building four forty-four's and two thirty-six's. The most experienced and skilful ship-builders in the country were sought for, and employed, and the work began in earnest. Humphries and Hacket, master builders and modellers, did themselves great credit by the specimens they produced. In 1798 and 1799, this country had built up a considerable navy; six forty-four's, three thirty-six's, seven thirty-two's, and from fifteen to twenty, or more, smaller vessels of war. This sudden creation of a naval force showed the maritime world, what the resources and energies of our nation were, whenever they should be pushed to develop them. In 1798, the nation were in a state of agitation, and the secretary of war, who was then charged with superintending the concerns of the navy, addressed a letter to the Hon. Samuel Sewall, chairman of the committee of the house of representatives for the protection of commerce, and the defence of the country, containing his views of the necessary preparation for the exigencies of the times, to protect our territory, property, and sovereignty. All our naval forces were soon put in requisition. An act was passed in May, 1798, which authorized "the president to direct our cruisers to seize, take, and bring into any port of the United States, any vessel sailing under the authority of the French republic, hovering on our coast for the purpose of committing depredations on vessels belonging to our citizens," &c. In conformity to this act, Captain Dale, in the Ganges, who had been fitted out with limited instructions, received those of a broader nature, but still limited to come strictly within the act of the 28th of May. During the summer, others were ordered out, and our commerce in the West India seas was well protected. Until this period, we had no regular and systematic arrangement in this department; but at this period the cost of building and equipping the navies of other nations were examined, and rules for our own were readily to be found in them, if, in many items, they were considerably different. The strongest arguments were used to show the propriety of efficient measures, and were generally convincing and satisfactory. In this quasi war, as it was called by Mr. Adams at that time, the American navy took from the French republic, from 1798 to 1801, between eighty and ninety armed vessels, and re-captured many American vessels, which the French cruisers had taken from the citizens of the United States. The most conspicuous of the engagements in this naval contest, was that of the Constellation, Captain Truxton, and the Insurgente, of forty guns, and four hundred and nine men, in which the latter was taken; and that of the same American ship and commander, with the Vengeance, a fifty-four gun ship, which escaped after she had several times struck her flag. The next in point of size was the Berceau, of twenty-four guns, and two hundred and twenty men, taken by the Boston, Captain Little. Captain John Shaw, in the Enterprise, of twelve guns, captured six armed French vessels, and re-captured eleven American vessels, in a cruise of eight months. In these engagements, in one of which he contended with superior force, he took forty-seven guns and three hundred and seventy-nine men, and in all of them together, the enemy had thirty-one killed and sixty-six wounded. Although there were a few mistakes in the naval affairs of that period, yet, the whole course together, reflected the highest honour on our country, and gave evidence not only to France, but to the other nations, that we were fitted for a naval power, and should soon take our rank with the nations of Europe, on the high seas. Many young officers distinguished themselves, and gave early promise of the high character which they have since sustained. The whole cost of the creation and support of this navy was short of ten millions of dollars; not equal to the revenue of our nation for one year of this war.

Under the act of the third of March, 1801, all the ships and vessels belonging to the navy of the United States, were sold, excepting thirteen, and these, mostly frigates; they brought in the market but a small proportion of their original cost. This sacrifice was a matter of no importance, in comparison with the glory we had gained; aye, something more than fame was gained. The success of our naval forces taught, not only others, but ourselves, that it did not require the pressure of a revolutionary struggle, to make us a maritime nation, in the true naval sense of the word; a nation who could make the greatest exertions to protect and extend a lawful commerce, upon the broadest basis. Avarice might have wished us to have risked nothing, and to have purchased our mercantile privileges by debasement and sycophancy to other nations; and timidity preached to us a long homily upon the mighty powers of these nations, and entered into deep calculations upon the folly of risking any thing, when we were so weak and defenceless; but, thanks to heaven, the proud spirit of our fathers prevailed, and the honour of the nation was not compromised by parsimony or cowardice. It seemed a dream to all the world, that a navy could rise upon the bosom of the ocean, by the power of an infant nation, in so sudden a manner. The fabled pines of Mount Ida were not formed into ships, for the fugitive Trojans, more rapidly than the oaks of our pasture-grounds and forests were thrown into naval batteries, for the protection of commerce, and our national dignity. Scarcely had it been published in the English and continental gazettes, that our navy was sold off, and that we were destitute of a ship of war, before the seas were whitened with the canvass of a navy from our ports, that fled from no equal, and were caught by no superior force.

Scarcely had our differences with France been adjusted, before we were called to contend with a new foe; and then the diminution of our naval force was sorely felt. During our existence as colonies, our trade had been protected in the Mediterranean, by the naval power of the mother country; but after the peace of 1783, the protection of course ceased, and we were obliged to purchase an immunity from capture and slavery, from the sovereignties of Morocco and Algiers. This tribute was galling to a free people, but nothing else could be done to save a valuable commerce, and we consoled ourselves that the most powerful christian nations had done the same, and some of them were still doing the same; and, in fact, all of them, in some way or other, were still tributaries. In the year 1800, an indignity was offered our flag by the dey of Algiers. The ship which was sent to carry our tribute was forcibly sent on a mission from the dey to his master, the Grand Seignior, and although it was managed in such a manner as to produce in the mind of the master, of the petty tyrant, a respect for the people of the new world, by the address of the American commander, still the insult was deeply felt in every part of our country. These powers on the coast of Africa were a terror to every mariner; for he, who feared no storms, dreaded captivity in these countries more than death itself. The Barbary powers, Algiers, Tunis, Morocco, and Tripoli, had been the scourge of christendom for ages. They had been pirates for a thousand years; from the time the Greeks had been driven from these shores to the present day, they had plundered the merchants trafficking in the Mediterranean, and made all persons they could get into their possession slaves; and these unfortunate beings they either ransomed at a great price, or cruelly devoted to labour and insults of the worst character. Spain, France, England, Portugal, Denmark, and Sweden, had suffered deeds of heroism were performed. William Eaton, who had been a captain in the American army, was, at the commencement of this war, consul at Tunis.

immeasurably from the corsairs of these piratical governments, whenever they refused to pay a tribute for their safety. These corsairs were adventurous and skilful seamen, and lived and thrived on the depredations made on all "christian dogs," as they insultingly called their foe. They often swept the Adriatic, depredated on the coast of Spain, and Italy, and France, and infested all the seas of that region; and sometimes ventured on the Atlantic in search of prey. At different periods of history immense efforts had been made to subdue them. In the time of Ferdinand of Spain, he drove them from the seaboard, and for several years kept them in fear and dread of him; but in 1615, Barbarossa, a Turk, and one who had been a corsair, got possession of Algiers, and by every species of cruelty and intrigue, extended his influence and power along the coast for some distance. He fell, as most tyrants have done, in violence and blood, and his brother became, for the security of himself and friends, a tributary to the Grand Seignior. The formidable works erected by the Spaniards while they had possession of the country, were destroyed; and with thirty thousand christian slaves, then unransomed, he built the wall and other works which now defend the city. Spain and Italy, and all true christians, were in tortures at the treatment of their countrymen and fellow christians; and Charles V. of Spain, in 1641, made a bold effort to extirpate this nest of pirates at once. With one hundred and twenty ships, twenty galleys, and thirty thousand men and gentlemen, who had entered into it from religious views, as it was considered a holy war, he commenced his campaign. In this fickle climate the elements warred against him, and all this tremendous host were either destroyed by tempests, or killed by the foe, or returned disheartened, notwithstanding the bull of the pope, and the blessing of the cardinals and priests upon the holy expedition. France once in later years, in a fit of resentment, made a spirited attack upon them, but did not follow it up with any permanent efforts. It seems mysterious, but so it was, that the United States should be the first power in modern times who could, or who did, keep in check the corsairs of those seas; and who dared to blow the castles round the heads of those who sought protection in them.

In 1800, the bashaw of Tripoli was anxious to have tribute paid him also, and made his demand in a bold insulting manner. The Bey of Tunis also raised his voice for tribute. On the 15th of May, 1801, the bashaw of Tripoli declared war against the United States. This was precisely the act our naval commanders were desirous of; but the horrors of slavery made a great impression upon the minds of some of our citizens, who clamoured to have every sacrifice made, that we might be kept in security; fortunately this was not the general feeling. Before this declaration of war had been made, the president of the United States had sent Commodore Dale with a squadron of observation, consisting of three frigates and a schooner. His instructions were full of caution, yet not wanting in decision. On the 6th of August, 1801, Lieutenant Sterret, in the Enterprise, of twelve guns, took the first Tripolitan ship of war, or the first of any of these Barbary powers which ever struck to our flag. The prize mounted fourteen guns; she had twenty killed and thirty wounded in the action, but there was not an American injured.

This fight fully showed our superiority in naval tactics and gunnery over any thing these pirates could produce. Early in 1802, a relief squadron was sent out to the Mediterranean; Captain R. V. Morris was in command of it. The squadron was one of more efficiency than that of Commodore Dale's. It was well appointed, and provision made for ample supplies. In May, 1803, the bashaw of Tripoli proposed a peace; his sine qua non was two hundred thousand dollars, and the expenses of the war. The negotiation was instantly given up, and these terms considered inadmissible. He had become, however, quite tired of being blockaded in his own port. In June, Captain Morris was suspended, for it became apparent that he did not act with sufficient energy; nothing brilliant had been done under his command. The trade it is true had been protected, and probably he thought this the chief end of his duties. The secretary of the navy was not satisfied with this, and he ap-

He there became acquainted with Hamet Caramauly, whom a younger brother had excluded from the throne of Tripoli. With him he concerted an ex-pointed Commodore Preble to take the command of the squadron. This was a fortunate appointment; Preble was a man of sterling talents, and well acquainted with his duty; of the most cool and determined bravery, and was panting for some occasion for distinction. He had with him some noble spirits, Bainbridge, Decatur, and others, cast in the same mould, and animated by the same soul with himself. The squadron had not only to blockade Tripoli, but to watch the movements of Algiers, Morocco, and Tunis; but on the dey of Algiers seeming in better nature than usual, and the emperor of Morocco coming to terms, Preble made up his mind to attack Tripoli with what force he had, and a few gun-boats he had hired at Naples. On the 3d of August, 1804, he made the first attack. These gun-boats gave our men an opportunity of showing their personal strength, science, and bravery, in attack and defence; for the combatants came, as in ancient times, hand to hand and breast to breast. The minute details of this and the other attacks on this city, would furnish a story of as much prowess and chivalrous gallantry as any of the wars in the Holy Land. The deeds of the lover-knights were then sung by the minstrel, and for ages after were breathed in bower and hall, and are not yet forgotten, but still enamour the brave and the fair in this cool age of philosophy;—shall our heroes want an historian? After the second attack, which was made on the 5th of the same month, the bashaw lowered his terms for peace, offering to take five hundred dollars for each prisoner, and require no stipulation for peace hereafter. This also was not admissible. On the 28th, another attack was made; and the next on the 3d of September. The fickleness of the seas in winter would not admit of any further attacks this season. The next summer they were to be renewed with a vigorous determination to carry fire and sword into the palace of the bashaw. On the 10th of September, Preble surrendered his command to Commodore Barron. The secretary said that this was a matter of necessity. The secretary was an honourable man. Enough was done to induce the bashaw to make peace on the 3d of June, 1805, on favourable terms, or rather on just terms. Thus ended a war which surprised the nations of Europe. They had often smiled to think the United States, a new-born nation, should be so presumptuous as to suppose that she could put down these predatory hordes, which had exacted tribute from all the commercial world, from time immemorial; but it was done, and the lookers on were astonished at the events as they transpired. The Pope, who had ever been deeply interested in all these pagan wars, or rather, all these wars against pagan powers, declared that this infant nation had done more in a few years, in checking the insolence of these infidels, than all the nations of Europe for ages. The thunders of the Vatican had passed harmlessly over these pirates' heads, through more than ten successors of St. Peter, until the United States had brought these infidels to terms by the absolute force of naval power. The head of the church saw that the people of a free nation had felt the degradation of paying tribute, and were determined to do so no longer than they could concentrate their energies, and direct them to bear upon the general foe of christendom. The whole was indeed a wonder, that a nation that scarcely had risen into the great family of independent powers, should be able to grapple with, and in a measure subdue, these barbarians, who had been for so long a time the scourge of mankind. We had not taken one power alone, but all from the Atlantic to the Red Sea. The Doge, who had been wedded to the Adriatic, and promised for the dower of his bride, the dominion of the seas from the Delta of Egypt to the straits of Gibraltar, had never in the pride of aristocratic strength, claimed the honour of humbling the "insolent Turk" to the extent that the United States had done in a few years. The arm of liberty, when properly directed, was always deadly to despotism. These exertions gave our flag a rank among the nations of Europe, in these classical seas, in which so great a proportion of all the sea-fights in the annals of man had taken place, from the early ages of fable and romance to modern times. The corsair, who had been the terror of the world, was now found a furious, but not unconquerable foe; and the barbarians, whose tremendous fierceness had been the tale of wonder pedition against the reigning sovereign, and repaired to the United States to obtain permission and the means to undertake it. Permission was granted, the co-operation of the squadron recommended, and such pecuniary assistance as could be spared was afforded. To raise an army in Egypt, and lead it to attack the usurper in his dominions, was the project which had been concerted. In the beginning of 1805, Eaton met Hamet at Alexandria, and was in every age, seemed, in our mode of warfare, less dangerous than the aborigines we had been contending with from the cradle of our nation. We have sworn to pay no tribute in this region, but this were vain; shall not the mighty dead demand the tribute of a tear? And shall this be denied? Shall not the lover of his country shed one sacred dew drop of nature to the memory of Somers, Wadsworth, and Israel? Shall we repeat the glories of Salamis and of the Nile, and forget our own heroes who devoted themselves to destruction for our honour? Oh! no; such actions are rare on the page of history, and shall not be forgotten; the dullest of the sons of men shall acknowledge that there does exist, in the soul of the brave, a romantic love of country and of fame, when reminded of the deeds and fate of these victims; and shall we be wanting in these reminiscences? No; generous spirits! you shall be brought forth on all proper occasions, and your country's historians charged with handing down to the latest posterity your noble sacrifice—that of self-immolation on your country's altar. Your business was to die, and you have finished it up; be it ours to take in charge your fame, and transmit it to future times.

Here I shall stop as to the history of our navy, for all the incidents on which future history is to be founded, are fully blazoned in the newspapers of the day, and so generally spread upon the pages of our literary and historical journals, that it would be premature, perhaps, to attempt to condense, connect, and correct them for history; the laurels of our navy are too green and dewy at this hour to be fit to garner up for preservation; but suffice it now to say, that we are contented with the present size of our navy, and are proud of its fame in every stage of its growth. A navy should always be in proportion to the number, the wealth, the commerce, and the spirit of a people. It should grow no faster than its duties are required, and never over represent the strength of a nation. Its growth should be so gradual that no ignorance of nautical subjects should ever be seen in the crew of a ship, and still new sailors should be instructed in every cruise. The greatest possible science and efficiency in the smallest possible compass, should be the standing maxim of those who love a navy. It is not the creation of a navy, that we are now, as a nation, to think of; it is only the management and increase of that navy, that should be brought forward as subjects of consideration; and for this increase we can have no particular anxiety. Skilful artificers to build a navy have never been wanting in this country since its earliest days; they abound now, and are possessed of all the improvements in the art of ship-building; and these are not a few. On our part of this continent we have timber enough for all the navies of the world; our forests and pastures produce it faster than it can be used; and science has taught us to make as much again as we used to, of what we have. In addition to these great stores, the providence of a late secretary of the navy, with the assistance of congress, has secured an abundance of the best of live oak, by reserving for the use of the government, an immense forest of this growth in Florida. This cost the nation but little more than the sagacious efforts of a man of political forecast; the worth of a statesman is seldom known until he passes away; and those who do the most good, often share the fate that the ignorant and time-serving deserve, or a worse one. We can never want for sailors, as long as our cod and whale fishery are pursued, and our foreign commerce is protected.

Our mariners have amounted to one hundred and eight thousand, and over; a fourth part of these can, on an emergency, be spared for the navy, and these, with a small proportion of fresh recruits, appointed general of his forces. On the 6th of March, at the head of a respectable body of mounted Arabs, and about seventy Christians, he set out for Tripoli. His route lay across a desert one thousand miles in extent. On his march, he encountered peril, fatigue, and suffering, the description of which would resemble the exaggerations of romance. On the 25th of April, having been fifty days on the march, he arrived before Derne, a Tripolitan city on would instantly make up a most formidable force for naval operations. The iron and hemp, or its substitute, cotton, can easily be found here, and will be supplied as fast as wanted. The only materiel we were ever charged to be wanting in, was scientific navigators, not hardy seamen, and these we are every day schooling for our requisitions. The two hundred and fifty lieutenants, and the four hundred and sixteen midshipmen, will supply the place of those who, in the course of nature, pass away, and the list of our veteran naval officers is rapidly diminishing. Those who come up will not naturally be greater men than their predecessors; but it will not be denied that their advantages for obtaining knowledge will be much greater. Bravery remains as it has been—and how could it be exceeded?—nautical science is advancing with us as in other countries. There is not a discovery in agriculture, the arts, or in manufacturing, that has not a bearing upon our navy, directly or indirectly. The cost of building, supporting, and educating a navy, is now nearly reduced to a standing certainty. The people can at once make calculations for themselves; there is no mystery about the matter; for they can at a glance estimate the expenses of this branch of power. One man from every hundred persons, in our community, and two days labour every year for those persons in our country capable of labour, will support a navy far superior to whatever the most ambitious statesman will ever ask of the country. And to whom is this paid? All to ourselves: millions for defence, but not a cent for tribute, was the maxim of our infancy as a nation. This will be perpetual; but a wiser one will be, never to ask, or seek for that power, that will make other nations tributary to us, except through the medium of a liberal reciprocity in commerce. That nation is hated, however much it may be feared, who domineers over another from the mere consciousness of power; and that nation despised, that succumbs, while it can maintain its existence and independence by any sacrifices whatever. We must not be too impatient for greatness; we are indeed apt to be so, for we have witnessed what no other nation has before seen, a people grow as rapidly into wealth and power as an enterprising individual ever did. Other nations have waited for centuries, for what we have experienced in the course of half a human life, a fourfold increase. The growth of the navy of our mother country, has been slow, compared with ours; but in truth no comparison exists. They made their navy for self-existence, and for an extension of power; ours grew out of a spirit of independence, and will, we trust, be maintained for the same glorious principle. But if all the ships we now own, were sunk in the ocean, and every navy officer with them, gallant, skilful, and intelligent as they are, the American navy would not be destroyed. The navy exists in the hearts and wills of the people; and in the event of its destruction, it would be re-created as certain as the existence of the nation; all prejudices against a navy have been overcome and destroyed for ever; and this is sufficient. The permanence of our navy depends on public opinion, and this is made up irrevocably. The decree of this republic has gone forth; and none but the God of battles can reverse it, and that decree is, the United States must and shall be a naval power, and her flag shall be respected in every quarter of the globe. This decree rests on no contingency, no change of party, no particular administration of government; it is incorporated with our habits, it is a good share of our feelings, and it is, also, a part of our fame. A mighty, a growing people, whose impulses are "thought-executing fires," and whose settled determination is fate, have lifted their voice, and it must be obeyed. —American Editor.

the Mediterranean, and found in the harbour a part of the American squadron destined to assist him. He learnt also that the usurper, having received notice of his approach, had raised a considerable army, and was then within a day's march of the city. No time was therefore to be lost. The next morning he summoned the governor to surrender, who returned for answer, "My head or yours." The city was assaulted, and after a contest of two hours and a half, possession was gained. The Christians suffered severely, and the general was slightly wounded. Great exertions were immediately made to fortify the city. On the 8th of May it was attacked by the Tripolitan army. Although ten times more numerous than Eaton's band, the assailants, after persisting four hours in the attempt, were compelled to retire. On the 10th of June another battle was fought, in

* Every country has its own chivalrous characters, and our own, young as it is, abounds in them. A volume would not contain the names of those who have passed the ordinary bounds of duty, in the high callings of patriotic display. From John Smith and Miles Standish, down to Wadsworth and his gallant friends, who made themselves a sacrifice on the altar of their country's glory, there have not been wanting men who emulated the heroes of antiquity. Among these may be ranked William Eaton, who was born at Woodstock, in Connecticut, on the 20th of February, 1764. His father was a small farmer, and William was one of thirteen children. He was considered a bright boy, and distinguished himself in the common school in his native town, the good people of which thought him destined to make a superior man; but nothing offering to suit him in the way of traffic, or as a profession, he, at sixteen years of age, enlisted as a common soldier. In this situation he remained until 1783, when he was discharged with the rank of corporal. He was now determined on the study of the languages, and by dint of application, yet with very little assistance, he prepared himself to enter Dartmouth college. On leaving college, in order to earn a subsistence, he commenced a school, which he continued for three years; but he was not satisfied with his employment, and panted for something of a more active nature. The house of representatives in the state of Vermont, made him, for a time, their clerk, after which, by the recommendations of individuals of that state, he obtained a captain's commission in the army of the United States. He proceeded to the frontiers with his company, where he served under General Wayne, and gained the reputation of a gallant officer. In 1797, he was appointed consul at Tunis. In the discharge of his duties in this office, he was frequently embroiled with the Bey, and his life endangered by the daring and independent course he pursued. He may be said to have beard the barbarian in his castle. The course of his conduct in this situation was such as no representative of any christian power had ever set an example, and he escaped death by a miracle. About this time, the bashaw of Tripoli declared war against the United States. The reigning bashaw was a usurper, and the lawful one, his brother, was at Tunis, in exile. Eaton concerted a plan with the exile, to attack Tripoli by land, while our squadron should co-operate with them, on the sea shore. Eaton returned to the United States, and laid his plan before our government; but they, thinking the scheme altogether too romantic, yet not wishing wholly to discourage it, made him agent for the government; and he sailed with the fleet for the Mediterranean. He proceeded to Alexandria, and by address and management, prevailed on the viceroy of Egypt to suffer him to have an interview with the exiled Bey, who was now among the Mamalukes, in a most distressed situation. They met near Grand Cairo, and entered into a convention for the purpose of attacking Tripoli. Eaton was to be commander in chief of the land forces. Their army consisted of a which the enemy were defeated. The next day the American frigate Constitution arrived in the harbour, which so terrified the Tripolitans that they fled precipitately to the desert. The frigate came, however, to arrest the operations of Eaton in the midst of his brilliant and successful career. Alarmed at his progress, the reigning bashaw had offered terms of peace, which, being much more favourable than had before been offered, were accepted by Mr. Lear, the authorized agent of the government. Sixty thousand dollars were given as a ransom for the unfortunate American prisoners, and an engagement was made to withdraw all support from Hamet. The nation, proud of the exploits of Eaton,* regretted this diplomatic interference, but the treaty was subsequently ratified by the president and senate.

During the year 1804 the Delaware Indians re-few American sailors, a small company of artillery, a few straggling Greeks, the servants of Hamet Bashaw, and some camel drivers. With this motley band, he dashed across the desert, in the most noble style, fearless of all difficulties. They were joined by a few Arabian cavalry, and after suffering every hardship, arising from hunger, thirst, and a scorching sun, they reached Bomba, where they found the Argus and Hornet, under the command of Captain Hull, who supplied him and his men with provisions. The army of near four hundred, continued their march to Derne. On the 25th of April, 1804, they encamped near the city, on an eminence which commanded the place, and forthwith sent in a flag to demand a surrender. The inhabitants of Derne thought the exiled Bey was demented, and treated the summons with contempt. A furious assault was made by this strange army, and the place was carried after a short, but desperate action. Sixteen days afterwards, several thousand troops of the bashaw's army attacked the victors, but were repulsed with great loss. Shortly after this, another attack was made upon Eaton's forces, and again the Tripolitans were defeated. Eight days after this engagement, another battle was fought, in which Eaton contended with ten times his force. In this he would have been successful, but at the precise moment when victory was about to perch on his adventurous standard, he received the appalling intelligence, that the American commissioners in the fleet, had made a peace with the bashaw then in power. It was stipulated, that Eaton should evacuate Derne, and repair to the fleet. This was a death-blow to his hopes. He felt himself insulted and disgraced, to be obliged, after all his exertions and sacrifices, to leave his friends like a recreant or a coward; but there was no other course for him to pursue. Hamet Bashaw came to the United States, with a few of his followers, and the remainder of the army fled to the mountains. The commissioners acknowledged that his success paved the way to the treaty of peace. The president of the United States, in a message to congress, spoke highly of General Eaton's services; and the citizens every where hailed him as worthy of a place in the lists of chivalry.

Something more substantial than praise was awarded him by the state of Massachusetts, the legislature of which granted him 10,000 acres of land, as a reward for his heroism and services. Yet, notwithstanding all the honours bestowed on him, his feelings were wounded beyond a cure. He could not forget that the laurel was within his grasp, and that it had been snatched from him, as he thought, by envious feelings at his prospect of brilliant success. The people of the town in which he resided, elected him as their representative to the legislature of Massachusetts, and he was received in Boston with every mark of attention. There he entered deeply into public business, and seemed anxious to become an orator. He had a good voice, a fine command of expressive language, and at first made a strong impression upon the public; but he talked when he had not examined the subject, and often involved himself linquished to the United States their title to an extensive tract east of the Mississippi, between the Wabash and Ohio, for which they were to receive annuities in animals and implements for agriculture, and in other necessities. This was an important acquisition, not only for its extent and fertility, but because, by its commanding the Ohio for three hundred miles, and nearly half that distance the Wabash, the produce of the settled country could be safely conveyed down those rivers, and, with the cession recently made by the Kaskaskias, it nearly consolidated the possessions of the United States north of the Ohio, from Lake Erie to the Mississippi.

Early in the following year Mr. Jefferson was re-elected to fill the president's chair by the decided majority of sixty-two votes against sixteen, a circumstance which he viewed as an indication of a great decay in the strength of the federal party.* George Clinton was also elected vice-president.

The American government at this period began to be seriously affected by the contest which was raging in Europe. Under the guidance of the splendid talents of Napoleon the military prowess of France had brought most of the European nations to her feet. England, however, still retained almost undisputed command of the ocean, expelling every hostile navy from the seas. America profited from the destruction of the ships and commerce of other nations; being neutral, her vessels carried from port to port the productions of France and the dependant kingdoms; and also to the ports of those kingdoms the manufactures of England: indeed, few ships were found on the ocean except those of the United States and Great Britain. These advantages were, however, too great to be long enjoyed unmolested. American ships carrying to Europe the produce of French colonies were, in the early stage of the war, captured by British cruisers, and condemned by their courts as lawful prizes; and now several European ports under the control of France were, by British orders in council, dated in May, 1806, declared in a state of blockade, although not invested with a British fleet; and American vessels attempting to enter those ports were also captured and condemned. France and her allies suffered, as well as the United States, from these proceedings; but her vengeance fell not so much upon the belligerent as upon the neutral party. By a decree, issued at Berlin in November, 1806, the French emperor declared the British Islands in a state of blockade, and of course authorized the capture of all neutral vessels attempting to trade with those islands. From these measures of both nations the commerce of the United States severely suffered, and their merchants loudly demanded of the government redress and protection.

This was not the only grievance to which the contest between the European powers gave rise. Great Britain claimed a right to search for and seize English sailors, even on board neutral vessels while traversing the ocean. In the exercise of this pretended right, citizens of the United States were seized, dragged from their friends, transported to distant parts of the world, compelled to perform the duty of British sailors, and to fight with nations at peace with their own. Against this outrage upon personal liberty and the rights of American citizens, Washington, Adams, and Jefferson had remonstrated in vain. The abuse continued, and every year added to its aggravation. In June, 1807, a circumstance occurred which highly and justly incensed the Americans. The frigate Chesapeake, being ordered on a cruise in the Mediterranean sea, under the command of Commodore Barron, sailing from Hampton Roads, was come up with by the British ship of war Leopard, one of a squadron then at anchor within the limits of the United States. An officer was sent from the Leopard to the Chesapeake, with a note from the captain respecting some deserters from some of his Britannic majesty's ships, supposed to be serving as part of the crew of the Chesapeake, and enclosing a copy of an order from Vice-Admiral Berkeley, requiring and directing the commanders of ships and vessels under his command, in case of meeting with the American frigate at sea, and without the limits of the United States, to show the order to her captain, and to require to search his ship for the deserters from certain ships therein named, and to proceed and search for them; and if a similar demand should be made by the American, he was permitted to search for deserters from their service, according to the customs and usage of civilized nations on terms of amity with each other. Commodore Barron gave an answer, purporting that he knew of in blunders, from which he had no art to get free; and at length lost his influence in debate. He was chafed by the slightest opposition, and such irritability will never do for one who enters upon the arena of debate. He became irregular in his habits, and sought to drown his sorrows in the wine cup; but he forgot that miseries are sadly multiplied by drink, as images are in the vision of the inebriated. He died in 1811. In some of his compositions, there is a depth and force that is impressive. His mind was of an epic cast, and had he lived in the days of the crusades, his name would have been numbered with the Dunois of song.--Knapp's American Biography.

no such men as were described; that the recruiting officers for the Chesapeake had been particularly instructed by the government, through him, not to enter any deserters from his Britannic Majesty's ships; that he knew of none such being in her; that he was instructed never to permit the crew of any ship under his command to be mustered by any officers but her own; that he was disposed to preserve harmony, and hoped his answer would prove satisfactory. The Leopard, shortly after this answer was received by her commander, ranged along side of the Chesapeake, and commenced a heavy fire upon her. The Chesapeake, unprepared for action, made no resistance, but having suffered much damage, and lost three men killed, and eighteen wounded, Commodore Barron ordered his colours to be struck, and sent a lieutenant on board the Leopard, to inform her commander that he considered the Chesapeake her prize. The commander of the Leopard sent an officer on board, who took possession of the Chesapeake, mustered her crew, and, carrying off four of her men, abandoned the ship. Commodore Barron, finding that the Chesapeake was very much injured, returned, with the advice of his officers, to Hampton Roads. On receiving information of this outrage, the president, by proclamation, interdicted the harbours and waters of the United States to all armed British vessels, forbade intercourse with them, and ordered a sufficient force for the protection of Norfolk, and such other preparations as the occasion appeared to require. An armed vessel of the United States was despatched with instructions to the American minister at London to call on the British government for the satisfaction and security which this outrage required.

Bonaparte having declared his purpose of enforcing with rigour the Berlin decree; the British government having solemnly asserted the right of search and impressment, and having intimated their intention to adopt measures in retaliation of the French decree, the president recommended to congress that the seamen, ships, and merchandise of the United States should be detained in port to preserve them from the dangers which threatened them on the ocean; and a law laying an indefinite embargo was in consequence enacted. A few days only had elapsed when information was received that Great Britain had prohibited neutrals, except upon most injurious conditions, from trading with France or her allies, comprising nearly every maritime nation of Europe. This was followed in a few weeks by a decree issued by Bonaparte, at Milan, declaring that every neutral vessel which should submit to be visited by a British ship, or comply with the terms demanded, should be confiscated, if afterwards found in his ports, or taken by his cruisers. Thus, at the date of the embargo, were orders and decrees in existence rendering liable to capture almost every American vessel sailing on the ocean. In the New England states, the embargo, withholding the merchant from a career in which he had been highly prosperous, and in which he imagined that he might still be favoured by fortune, occasioned discontent and clamour. The federalists, more numerous there than in any other part of the union, pronounced it a measure unwise and oppressive. These representations, and the distress which the people endured, induced a zealous opposition to the measures of the government.

The president, in his message on the opening of the tenth congress, stated the continued disregard shown by the belligerent nations to neutral rights, so destructive to the American commerce; and referred it to the wisdom of congress to decide on the course best adapted to such a state of things. "With the Barbary powers," he said, "we continue in harmony, with the exception of an unjustifiable proceeding of the dey of Algiers towards our consul to that regency," the character and circumstances of which he laid before congress. "With our Indian neighbours the public peace has been steadily maintained. From a conviction that we consider them as a part of ourselves, and cherish with sincerity their rights and interests, the attachment of the Indian tribes is gaining strength daily, is extending from the nearer to the more remote, and will amply requite us for the justice and friendship practised towards them. Husbandry and household manufacture are advancing among them, more rapidly with the southern than northern tribes, from circumstances of soil and climate; and one of the two great divisions of the Cherokee nation has now under consideration to solicit the friendship of the United States, and to be identified with us in laws and government in such progressive manner as we shall think best."

Mr. Jefferson, following and confirming the example of Washington, determined not to continue in office for a longer term than eight years. "Never did a prisoner," says the president of the American republic, "released from his chains, feel such relief as I shall on shaking off the shackles of power. Nature intended me for the tranquil pursuits of science, by rendering them my supreme delight. But the enormities of the times in which I have lived have forced me to take a part in resisting them, and to commit myself on the boisterous ocean of political passions. I thank God for the opportunity of retiring from them without censure, and carrying with me the most consoling proofs of public approbation. I leave every thing in the hands of men so able to take care of them, that if we are destined to meet misfortunes it will be because no human wisdom could avert them.”*

CHAPTER V.

ADMINISTRATION OF MR. MADISON.

MR. JEFFERSON was succeeded in the presidency by Mr. Madison. He stated in his inaugural address, that, “Unwilling to depart from examples of the most revered authority, I avail myself of the occasion, now presented, to express the profound impression made on me by the call of my country to the station, to the duties of which I am about to pledge myself, by the most solemn of sanctions. So distinguished a mark of confidence, proceeding from the deliberate and tranquil suffrage of a free and virtuous nation, would, under any circumstances, have commanded my gratitude and devotion, as well as filled me with an awful sense of the trust to be assumed. Under the various circumstances which give peculiar solemnity to the existing period, I feel, that both the honour and the responsibility, allotted to me, are inexpressibly enhanced.

“The present situation of the world is indeed without a parallel; and that of our country full of difficulties. The pressure of these too is the more severely felt, because they have fallen upon us at a moment, when national prosperity being at a height not before attained, the contrast resulting from this change has been rendered the more striking. Under the benign influence of our republican institutions, and the maintenance of peace with all nations, whilst so many of them were engaged in bloody and wasteful wars, the fruits of a just policy were enjoyed in an unrivalled growth of our faculties and resources. Proofs of this were seen in the improvements of agriculture; in the successful enterprises of commerce; in the progress of manufactures and useful arts; in the increase of the public revenue, and the use made of it in reducing the public debt; and in the valuable works and establishments every where multiplying over the face of our land.

“It is a precious reflection, that the transition from this prosperous condition of our country to the scene, which has for some time been distressing us, is not chargeable on any unwarrantable views, nor, as I trust, on any involuntary errors in the public councils. Indulging no passions which trespass on the rights or the repose of other nations, it has been the true glory of the United States to cultivate peace, by observing justice, and to entitle themselves to the respect of the nations at war by fulfilling their neutral obligations with the most scrupulous impartiality. If there be candour in the world, the truth of these assertions will not be questioned. Posterity at least will do justice to them.

“This unexceptionable course could not avail against the injustice and violence of the belligerent powers. In their rage against each other, or impelled by more direct motives, principles of retaliation have been introduced, equally contrary to universal reason and acknowledged law. How long their arbitrary edicts will be continued in spite of the demonstrations, that not even a pretext for them has been given by the United States, and of the fair and liberal attempts to induce a revocation of them, cannot be anticipated. Assuring myself, that under every vicissitude, the determined spirit and united councils of the nation will be safeguards to its honour, and its essential interests, I repair to the post assigned me with no other discouragement than what springs from my own inadequacy to its high duties. If I do not sink under the weight of this deep conviction, it is because I find some support in a consciousness of the purposes, and a confidence in the principles which I bring with me into this arduous service.

“To cherish peace and friendly intercourse with all nations having correspondent dispositions; to maintain sincere neutrality towards belligerent nations; to prefer, in all cases, amicable discussions and reasonable accommodation of differences, to a decision of them by an appeal to arms; to exclude foreign intrigues and foreign partialities, so degrading to all countries and so baneful to free ones; to foster a spirit of independence, too just to invade the rights of others, too proud to surrender our own, too liberal to indulge unworthy prejudices ourselves, and too elevated not to look down upon them in others; to hold the union of the states as the basis of their peace and happiness; to support the constitution, which is the cement of the union, as well in its limitations as in its authorities; to respect the rights and authorities reserved to the states and to the people, as equally incorporated with and essential to the success of the general system; to avoid the slightest interference with the rights of conscience or the functions of religion, so wisely exempted from civil jurisdiction; to preserve, in their full energy, the other salutary provisions in behalf of private and personal rights, and of the freedom of the press; to observe economy in public expenditures; to liberate the public resources by an honourable discharge of the public debts; to keep within the requisite limits a standing military force, always remembering, that an armed and trained militia is the firmest bulwark of republics, that without standing armies their liberty can never be in danger, nor, with large ones, safe; to promote, by authorized means, improvements friendly to agriculture, to manufactures, and to external as well as internal commerce; to favour, in like manner, the advancement of science and the diffusion of information, as the best aliment to true liberty; to carry on the benevolent plans which have been so meritoriously applied to the conversion of our aboriginal neighbours, from the degradation and wretchedness of savage life, to a participation of the improvements of which the human mind and manners are susceptible in a civilized state:—as far as sentiments and intentions such as these can aid the fulfilment of my duty, they will be a resource which cannot fail me.

“It is my good fortune, moreover, to have the path in which I am to tread, lighted by examples of illustrious services, successfully-rendered in the most trying difficulties, by those who have marched before me. Of those of my immediate predecessor, it might least become me here to speak; I may, however, be pardoned for not suppressing the sympathy, with which my heart is full, in the rich reward he enjoys in the benedictions of a beloved country, gratefully bestowed for exalted talents, zealously devoted, through a long career, to the advancement of its highest interest and happiness. But the source to which I look for the aids, which alone can supply my deficiencies, is in the well tried intelligence and virtue of my fellow-citizens, and in the councils of those representing them in the other departments associated in the care of the national interests. In these, my confidence will, under every difficulty, be best placed; next to that, we have all been encouraged to feel in the guardianship and guidance of that Almighty Being, whose power regulates the destiny of nations, whose blessings have been so conspicuously dispensed to this rising republic, and to whom we are bound to address our devout gratitude for the past, as well as our fervent supplications and best hopes for the future.”

One of the first acts of congress under the new president was to repeal the embargo; but at the same time to prohibit all intercourse with France and England.

In the non-intercourse law a provision was inserted, that if either nation should revoke her hostile edicts, and the president should announce that fact by proclamation, then the law should cease to be in force in regard to the nation so revoking. On the 23d of April, Mr. Erskine, minister plenipotentiary from his Britannic majesty to the United States, pledged his court to repeal its anti-neutral decrees by the 10th of June; and, in consequence of an arrangement now made with the British minister, the president proclaimed that commercial intercourse would be renewed on that day; but this arrangement was disavowed by the ministry; and, in October, Mr. Erskine was replaced by Mr. Jackson, who soon giving offence to the American government, all further intercourse with him was refused, and he was recalled.

The Rambouillet decree, alleged to be designed to retaliate the act of congress, which forbade French vessels to enter the ports of the United States, was issued by Bonaparte on the 23d of March. By this decree, all American vessels and cargoes, arriving in any of the ports of France, or of countries occupied by French troops, were ordered to be seized and condemned.

On the 1st of May congress passed an act, excluding British and French armed vessels from the waters of the United States; but providing, that if either of the above nations should modify its edicts before the 3d of March, 1811, so that they should cease to violate neutral commerce, of which fact the president was to give notice by proclamation, and the other nation should not, within three months after, pursue a similar course, commercial intercourse with the first might be renewed, but not with the other.

In August the French government assured Mr. Armstrong, the American envoy at Paris, that the Berlin and Milan decrees were revoked, the revocation to take effect on the first day of November ensuing. Confiding in this assurance, the president, on the second day of November, issued his proclamation, declaring that unrestrained commerce with France was allowed, but that all intercourse with Great Britain was prohibited.*

Great Britain having previously expressed a willingness to repeal her orders, whenever France should repeal her decrees, was now called upon by the American envoy to fulfil that engagement. The British ministry objected, however, that the French decrees could not be considered as repealed, a letter from the minister of state not being, for that purpose, a document of sufficient authority; and still persisted to enforce the orders in council. For this purpose British ships of war were stationed before the principal harbours of the United States. All American merchantmen, departing or returning, were boarded, searched, and many of them sent to British ports as legal prizes. The contempt in which the British officers held the Republican navy, in one instance, led to an action. Commodore Rogers, in the President frigate, met in the evening a vessel on the coast of Virginia: he hailed; but, instead of receiving an answer, was hailed in turn, and a shot was fired, which struck the mainmast of the President. The fire was instantly returned by the commodore, and continued for a few minutes, when, finding his antagonist was of inferior force, and that her guns were almost silenced, he desisted. On hailing again, an answer was given, that the ship was the British sloop of war, Little Belt, of eighteen guns. Thirty-two of her men were killed and wounded, and the ship was much disabled.

For several years the Indian tribes, residing near the sources of the Mississippi, had occupied themselves in murdering and robbing the white settlers in their vicinity. At length the frontier inhabitants, being seriously alarmed by their hostile indications, in the autumn of 1811 Governor Harrison resolved to move towards the Prophet's town, on the Wabash, with a body of Kentucky and Indiana militia, and the fourth United States regiment, under Colonel Boyd, to demand satisfaction of the Indians, and to put a stop to their threatened hostilities. His expedition was made early in November. On his approach within a few miles of the Prophet's town, the principal chiefs came out with offers of peace and submission, and requested the governor to encamp for the night; but this was only a treacherous artifice. At four in the morning the camp was furiously assailed, and a bloody contest ensued; the Indians were however repulsed. The loss on the part of the Americans was sixty-two killed, and one hundred and twenty-six wounded, and a still greater number on the side of the Indians. Governor Harrison, having destroyed the Prophet's town, and established forts, returned to Vincennes.

In November reparation was made by the British for the attack on the Chesapeake. Mr. Foster, the British envoy, informed the secretary of the United States, that he was instructed to repeat to the American government the prompt disavowal made by his majesty, on being apprized of the unauthorized act of the officer in command of his naval forces on the coast of America, whose recall from a highly important and honourable command immediately ensued, as a mark of his majesty's disapprobation; that he was authorized to offer, in addition to that disavowal on the part of his royal highness, the immediate restoration, as far as circumstances would admit, of the men who, in consequence of Admiral Berkeley's orders, were forcibly taken out of the Chesapeake, to the vessels from which they were taken; or, if that ship were no longer in commission, to such seaport of the United States as the American government may name for the purpose; and that he was also authorized to offer to the American government a suitable pecuniary provision for the sufferers, in consequence of the attack on the Chesapeake, including the families of those seamen who fell in the action, and of the wounded survivors. The president acceded to these propositions; and the officer commanding the Chesapeake, then lying in the harbour of Boston, was instructed to receive the men who were to be restored to that ship. The British envoy, however, could give no assurance that his government was disposed to make a satisfactory arrangement of the subject of impressment, or to repeal the orders in council. These orders, on the contrary, continued to be enforced with rigour; and, on the restoration of a free commerce with France, a large number of American vessels, laden with rich cargoes, and destined to her ports, fell into the power of British cruisers, which, since 1803, had captured nine hundred American vessels.

Early in November, 1811, President Madison summoned the congress. His message indicating an apprehension of hostilities with Great Britain, the committee of foreign relations in the house of representatives reported resolutions for filling up the ranks of the army; for raising an additional force of ten thousand men; for authorizing the president to accept the services of fifty thousand volunteers, and for ordering out the militia when he should judge it necessary; for repairing the navy; and for authorizing the arming of merchantmen in self-defence. A bill from the senate, for raising twenty-five thousand men, after much discussion, was also agreed to by the house.

The American congress, although continuing the preparations for war, still cherished the hope that a change of policy in Europe would render unnecessary an appeal to arms till May in the following year. Towards the close of that season, the Hornet arrived from London, bringing information that no prospect existed of a favourable change. On the 1st of June, the president sent a message to congress, recounting the wrongs received from Great Britain, and submitting the question, whether the United States should continue to endure them, or resort to war? The message was considered with closed doors. On the 18th, an act was passed, declaring war against Great Britain; and the next day a proclamation was issued. Against this declaration, however, the representatives, belonging to the federal party, presented a solemn protest, which was written with great ability.

At the time of the declaration of war, General Hull was also governor of the Michigan territory, of which Detroit is the capital. On the 12th of July, with two thousand regulars and volunteers, he crossed the river dividing the United States from Canada, apparently intending to attack Malden, and thence to proceed to Montreal. Information was, however, received, that Mackinaw, an American post above Detroit, had surrendered to a large body of British and Indians, who were rushing down the river in numbers sufficient to overwhelm the American forces. Panic-struck, General Hull hastened back to Detroit. General Brock, the commander at Malden, pursued him, and erected batteries opposite Detroit. The next day, meeting with no resistance, General Brock resolved to march directly forward and assault the fort. The American troops awaited the approach of the enemy, and anticipated victory; but, to their dismay, General Hull opened a correspondence, which ended in the surrender of the army, and of the territory of Michigan. An event so disgraceful, occurring in a quarter where success was confidently anticipated, caused the greatest mortification and amazement throughout the union.

General Van Rensselaer, of the New York militia, had the command of the troops which were called the army of the centre. His head-quarters were at Lewistown on the river Niagara, and on the opposite side was Queenstown, a fortified British post. The militia displaying great eagerness to be led against the enemy, the general determined to cross the river at the head of about one thousand men: though successful at first, he was compelled, after a long and obstinate engagement, to surrender. General Brock, the British commander, fell in rallying his troops.

The army of the north, which was under the immediate command of General Dearborn, was stationed at Greenbush, near Albany, and at Plattsburgh, on Lake Champlain. From the latter post, a detachment marched a short distance into Canada, surprised a small body of British and Indians, and destroyed a considerable quantity of public stores. Other movements were anxiously expected by the people; but, after the misfortunes of Detroit and Niagara, the general deemed it inexpedient to engage in any important enterprise.

While, on land, defeat and disgrace attended the arms of the republic, on the ocean they gained victories, which compensated their loss, and relieved their wounded pride. On the 19th of August, Captain Hull, commanding the Constitution, of forty-four guns, fell in with the British frigate, Le Guerriere. She advanced towards the Constitution, firing broadsides at intervals; the American reserved her fire till she had approached within half pistol shot, when a tremendous cannonade was directed upon her, and in thirty minutes, every mast and nearly every spar being shot away, Captain Dacres struck his flag. Of the crew, fifty were killed and sixty-four wounded; while the Constitution had only seven killed and seven wounded. The Guerriere received so much injury, that it was thought to be impossible to get her into port, and she was burned. Captain Hull, on his return to the United States, was welcomed with enthusiasm by his grateful and admiring countrymen. The vast difference in the number of killed and wounded certainly evinced great skill, as well as bravery, on the part of the American seamen. But this was the first only of a series of naval victories. On the 18th of October, Captain Jones, in the Wasp, of eighteen guns, captured the Frolic, of twenty-two, after a bloody conflict of three-quarters of an hour. In this action the Americans obtained a victory over a superior force; and, on their part, but eight were killed and wounded, while on that of the enemy about eighty. The Wasp was unfortunately captured, soon after her victory, by a British ship of the line. On the 25th, the frigate United States, commanded by Captain Decatur, captured the British frigate Macedonian. In this instance, also, the disparity of loss was astonishingly great: on the part of the enemy, a hundred and four were killed and wounded; on that of the Americans but eleven. The United States brought her prize safely to New York. A most desperate action was fought, on the 29th of December, between the Constitution, of forty-four guns, then commanded by Captain Bainbridge, and the British frigate Java, of thirty-eight. The combat continued more than three hours; nor did the Java strike till she was reduced to a mere wreck. Of her crew, a hundred and sixty one were killed and wounded, while of that of the Constitution there were only thirty-four.

These naval victories were peculiarly gratifying to the feelings of the Americans; they were gained in the midst of disasters on land, and by that class of citizens whose rights had been violated; they were gained over a nation whom long-continued success had taught to consider themselves lords of the sea, and who had confidently affirmed that the whole American navy would soon be swept from the ocean. Many British merchantmen were also captured, both by the American navy and by privateers, which issued from almost every port, and were remarkably successful. The number of prizes made during the first seven months of the war exceeded five hundred.

At the commencement of the session of congress, held in the autumn of 1812, the president, in his message, stated that immediately after the declaration of war, he communicated to the British government the terms on which its progress might be arrested; that these terms were, the repeal of the orders in council, the discharge of American seamen, and the abandonment of the practice of impressment; and that the ministry had declined to accede to his offers. He also stated that, at an early period of the war, he had received official information of the repeal of the orders in council; that two propositions for an armistice had been made to him, both of which he had rejected, as they could not have been accepted without conceding to Great Britain the right of impressment. The rejection of these propositions was approved by the national representatives, who, far from abandoning the ground they had taken, adopted more vigorous measures for the prosecution of the war.

While the war was proceeding in America, a friendly power abroad interposed for its termination. Soon after the spring session of congress, an offer was communicated from the emperor of Russia of his mediation, as the common friend of the United States and Great Britain, for the purpose of facilitating a peace between them. The offer was immediately accepted by the American government, and provision made for the contemplated negotiation. Albert Gallatin, James A. Bayard, and John Quincy Adams, were appointed commissioners, and invested with the requisite powers to conclude a treaty of peace with persons clothed with like powers on the part of Great Britain. They were also authorized to enter into such conventional regulations of the commerce between the two countries as might be mutually advantageous. The two first named envoys preceded to join their colleague at St. Petersburg, where he then was as resident minister from the United States. A commission was also given to the envoys, authorizing them to conclude a treaty of commerce with Russia, with a view to strengthen the amicable relations, and improve the beneficial intercourse, between the two countries.

On the 24th of May, congress was convened by proclamation of the president. Laws were enacted, imposing a direct tax of three millions of dollars; authorizing the collection of various internal duties; providing for a loan of seven and a half millions of dollars; and prohibiting the merchant vessels of the United States from sailing under British licenses.

Near the close of the session, a committee appointed to inquire into the subject made a long report upon the spirit and manner in which the war had been conducted by the British.

The scene of the campaign of 1813 was principally in the north, towards Canada. Brigadier-General Winchester, of the United States army, and nearly five hundred men, officers and soldiers, were made prisoners at Frenchtown, by a division of the British army from Detroit, with their Indian allies, under Colonel Procter. Colonel Procter leaving the Americans without a guard, the Indians returned, and deeds of horror followed. The wounded officers were dragged from the houses, killed, and scalped in the streets. The buildings were set on fire. Some who attempted to escape were forced back into the flames, while others were put to death by the tomahawk, and left shockingly mangled in the highway. The infamy of this butchery does not fall upon the perpetrators alone, but extends to those who were able, and were bound by a solemn engagement, to restrain them. The battle and massacre at Frenchtown clothed Kentucky and Ohio in mourning. Other volunteers, indignant at the treachery and cruelty of their foes, hastened to the aid of Harrison. He marched to the rapids of the Miami, where he erected a fort, which he called Forts Meigs, in honour of the governor of Ohio. On the 1st of May it was invested by a large number of Indians, and by a party of British troops from Malden, the whole commanded by Colonel Procter. An unsuccessful attempt to raise the siege was made by General Clay, at the head of twelve hundred Kentuckians; but the fort continued to be defended with bravery and skill. The Indians, unaccustomed to sieges, became weary and discontented; and, on the 8th of May, they deserted their allies. The British, despairing of success, then made a precipitate retreat.

On the northern frontier a body of troops had been assembled, under the command of General Dearborn, at Sackett's Harbour, and great exertions were made by Commodore Chauncey to build and equip a squadron on Lake Ontario, sufficiently powerful to contend with that of the British. By the 25th of April the naval preparations were so far completed, that the general and seventeen thousand troops were conveyed across the lake to the attack of York, the capital of Upper Canada. On the 27th, an advanced party, commanded by Brigadier-General Pike, who was born in a camp, and bred a soldier from his birth, landed, although opposed at the water's edge by a superior force. After a short but severe conflict, the British were driven to their fortifications. The rest of the troops having landed, the whole party pressed forward, carried the first battery by assault, and were moving towards the main works, when the English magazine blew up, with a tremendous explosion, hurling upon the advancing troops immense quantities of stone and timber. Numbers were killed; the gallant Pike received a mortal wound; the troops halted for a moment, but, recovering from the shock, again pressed forward, and soon gained possession of the town. Of the British troops, one hundred were killed, nearly three hundred were wounded, and the same number made prisoners.

The object of the expedition attained, the squadron and troops returned to Sackett's Harbour, and subsequently sailed to Fort George, situated at the head of the lake. After a warm engagement, the British abandoned the fort and retired to the heights, at the head of Burlington Bay.

While the greater part of the American army was thus employed, the British made an attack upon the important post of Sackett's Harbour. On the 27th of May, their squadron appeared before the town. Alarm guns instantly assembled the citizens of the neighbourhood. General Brown's force amounted to about one thousand men; a slight breastwork was hastily thrown up at the only place where the British could land, and behind this he placed the militia, the regulars, under Colonel Backus, forming a second line. On the morning of the 29th, one thousand British troops landed from the squadron, and advanced towards the breastwork; the militia gave way, but by the bravery of the regulars, under the skilful arrangement of General Brown, the British were repulsed, and re-embarked so hastily as to leave behind most of their wounded.

The sea coast was harassed by predatory warfare, carried on by large detachments from the powerful navy of Great Britain. One squadron, stationed in Delaware Bay, captured and burnt every merchant vessel which came within its reach, while a more powerful squadron, commanded by Admiral Cockburn, destroyed the farm-houses and gentlemen's seats along the shore of Chesapeake Bay. Frenchtown, Havre-de-Grace, Fredricktown, and Georgetown were sacked and burnt. Norfolk was saved from a similar fate by the determined bravery of a small force stationed on Craney Island, in the harbour. A furious attack was made upon Hampton, which, notwithstanding the gallant resistance of its small garrison, was captured.

The ocean was the theatre of sanguinary conflicts. Captain Lawrence, in the sloop of war Hornet, on the 23d of February, met the British brig Peacock, and a fierce combat ensued. In less than fifteen minutes the Peacock struck her colours, displaying at the same time a signal of distress. The victors hastened to the relief of the vanquished; the same strength which had been exerted to conquer was equally ready to save; but the Peacock sank before all her crew could be removed, carrying down nine British seamen, and three brave and generous Americans. On his return to the United States, Captain Lawrence was promoted to the command of the frigate Chesapeake, then in the harbour of Boston. For several weeks the British frigate Shannon, of equal force, had been cruising before the port; and Captain Broke, her commander, had announced his wish to meet, in single combat, an American frigate. Inflamed by this challenge, Captain Lawrence, although his crew was just enlisted, set sail on the 1st of June to seek the Shannon. Towards evening of the same day they met, and instantly engaged, with unexampled fury. In a very few minutes, and in quick succession, the sailing master of the Chesapeake was killed, Captain Lawrence and three lieutenants were severely wounded, her rigging was so cut to pieces that she fell on board the Shannon, Captain Lawrence received a second and mortal wound, and was carried below; at this instant, Captain Broke, at the head of his marines, gallantly boarded the Chesapeake, when resistance ceased, and the American flag was struck by the British. Of the crew of the Shannon twenty-four were killed and fifty-six wounded. Of that of the Chesapeake, forty-eight were killed and nearly one hundred wounded. This unexpected defeat impelled the Americans to seek for circumstances consoling to their pride, and in the journals of the day many such were stated to have preceded and attended the action. The youthful and intrepid Lawrence was lamented, with sorrow deep, sincere, and lasting. When carried below, he was asked if the colours should be struck. "No," he replied, "they shall wave while I live." Delirious from excess of suffering, he continued to exclaim, "Don't give up the ship!"—an expression consecrated by his countrymen. He uttered but few other words during the four days that he survived his defeat.

The next encounter at sea was between the American brig Argus and the British brig Pelican, in which the latter was victorious. Soon after, the American brig Enterprise, commanded by Lieutenant Burrows, captured the British brig Boxer, commanded by Captain Blyth. Both commanders were killed in the action, and were buried, each by the other's side, in Portland.

While each nation was busily employed in equipping a squadron on Lake Erie, General Clay remained inactive at Fort Meigs. About the last of July, a large number of British and Indians appeared before the fort, hoping to entice the garrison to a general action in the field. After waiting a few days without succeeding, they decamped, and proceeded to Fort Stephenson, on the river Sandusky. This fort was little more than a picketing, surrounded by a ditch, and the garrison consisted of but one hundred and sixty men, who were commanded by Major Croghan, a youth of twenty-one. The force of the assailants was estimated at about four hundred in uniform, and as many Indians; they were repulsed, and their loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners, is supposed to have exceeded one hundred and fifty, those of the remainder, who were not able to escape were taken off during the night by the Indians. The whole loss of Major Croghan during the siege was one killed and seven slightly wounded. About three the next morning the British sailed down the river, leaving behind them a boat containing clothing and considerable military stores.

By the exertions of Commodore Perry, an American squadron had been fitted out on Lake Erie early in September. It consisted of nine small vessels, in all carrying fifty-four guns. A British squadron had also been built and equipped, under the superintendence of Commodore Barclay. It consisted of six vessels, mounting sixty-three guns. Commodore Perry, immediately sailing, offered battle to his adversary, and on the 10th of September, the British commander left the harbour of Malden to accept the offer. In a few hours the wind shifted, giving the Americans the advantage. Perry, forming the line of battle, hoisted his flag, on which were inscribed the words of the dying Lawrence, "Don't give up the ship." Loud huzzas from all the vessels proclaimed the animation which this motto inspired. About noon the firing commenced; and after a short action two of the British vessels surrendered, and the rest of the American squadron now joining in the battle, the victory was rendered decisive and complete. The British loss was forty-one killed, and ninety-four wounded. The American loss was twenty-seven killed, and ninety-six wounded, of which number twenty-one were killed and sixty-two wounded on board the flag-ship Lawrence, whose whole complement of able bodied men before the action was about one hundred. The commodore gave intelligence of the victory to General Harrison in these words: "We have met the enemy, and they are ours. Two ships, two brigs, one schooner, and one sloop." The Americans were now masters of the lake; but the territory of Michigan was still in the possession of Colonel Procter. The next movements were against the British and Indians at Detroit and Malden. General Harrison had previously assembled a portion of the Ohio militia on the Sandusky river; and on the 7th of September four thousand from Kentucky, the flower of the state, with Governor Shelby at their head, arrived at his camp. With the co-operation of the fleet, it was determined to proceed at once to Malden. On the 27th the troops were received on board, and reached Malden on the same day; but the British had, in the mean time, destroyed the fort and public stores, and had retreated along the Thames towards the Moravian villages, together with Tecumseh's Indians, amounting to twelve or fifteen hundred. It was now resolved to proceed in pursuit of Procter. On the 5th of October a severe battle was fought between the two armies at the river Thames, and the British army was taken by the Americans. In this battle Tecumseh was killed, and the Indians fled. The British loss was nineteen regulars killed, and fifty wounded, and about six hundred prisoners. The American loss, in killed and wounded, amounted to upwards of fifty. Procter made his escape down the Thames. On the 29th of September the Americans took possession of Detroit, which, on the approach of Harrison's army, had been abandoned by the British. Preparations were now made for subduing Upper Canada, and taking Montreal; but owing to the difficulties attending the concentration of the troops, and perhaps also to the want of vigour in the commanders, that project was abandoned, and the army under Wilkinson, marching to French Mills, there encamped for the winter. This abortive issue of the campaign occasioned murmurs throughout the nation, and the causes which led to it have never been fully developed. The severest censure fell upon General Armstrong, who was secretary of war, and upon General Hampton. The latter soon after resigned his commission in the army, and General Izard was selected to command the post at Plattsburgh.

Major-General Harrison, commander in chief of the eighth military district in the United States, issued a proclamation, stating, that the enemy having been driven from the territory of Michigan, and a part of the army under his command having taken possession of it, it became necessary that the civil government of the territory should be re-established, and the former officers resume the exercise of their authority. He therefore proclaimed, that all appointments and commissions which have been derived from British officers were at an end ; that the citizens were restored to all the rights and privileges which they enjoyed previously to the capitulation made by General Hull on the 15th of August, 1812 ; and, until the will of the government should be known, directed that all persons having civil offices in the territory of Michigan, at the period of the capitulation of Detroit, should resume the exercise of the powers appertaining to their offices respectively.

The United States squadron, chased by Commodore Hardy with a superior naval force, had taken refuge in the harbour of New London, where the decayed and feeble state of the fortifications afforded a precarious defence. The menacing appearance of the British squadron at the entrance of the harbour, and the strong probability that the town would be destroyed in the conflict, which had been long expected, produced among the inhabitants the greatest consternation. In this moment of alarm, the major-general of the third division, and the brigadier-general of the third brigade, considered themselves justified, at the earnest entreaty of the citizens, in summoning the militia to their assistance. Governor Smith, of Connecticut, approved this proceeding, and immediately forwarded supplies, and adopted measures of defence. "On this occasion," said the governor to the legislature, "I could not hesitate as to the course which it became my duty to pursue. The government of Connecticut, the last to invite hostilities, should be the first to repel aggression."

The Indians at the southern extremity of the union had imbibed the same hostile spirit as those at the north-western. They had been visited by Tecumseh, and by his eloquence had been persuaded that the great spirit required them to unite and attempt the extirpation of the whites. In the fall of 1812, a cruel war was carried on by the Creeks and Seminoles against the frontier inhabitants of Georgia. General Jackson, at the head of two thousand five hundred volunteers from Tennessee, marched into the country of the Indians. Overawed by his presence, they desisted for a time from hostility ; but, after his return, their animosity burst forth with increased and fatal violence. Dreading their cruelty, about three hundred men, women, and children, sought safety in Fort Mimms, in the Tensaw settlement. Although frequent warnings of an intended attack had been given them, yet, at noon day, on the 30th of August, they were surprised by a party of six hundred Indians, who, with axes, cut their way into the fort, and drove the people into the houses which it enclosed. To these they set fire. Many persons were burnt, and many killed by the toma-hawk. Only seventeen escaped to carry the horrid tidings to the neighbouring stations. The whites resolved on vengeance. Again General Jackson, at the head of three thousand five hundred militia of Tennessee, marched into the southern wilderness. A detachment under General Coffee encountering at Tallushatchie a body of Indians, a sanguinary conflict ensued. The latter fought with desperation, neither giving nor receiving quarter, until nearly every warrior had perished. Yet still was the spirit of the Creeks unsubdued, and their faith in victory unshaken. With no little sagacity and skill they selected and fortified another position on the Tallapoosa, called by themselves Tohopeka, and by the whites Horse-shoe Bend. Here nearly a thousand warriors, animated with a fierce and determined resolution, were collected. Three thousand men, commanded by General Jackson, marched to attack this post. To prevent escape, a detachment under General Coffee encircled the Bend. The main body advanced to the fortress ; and for a few minutes the opposing forces were engaged muzzle to muzzle at the port-holes ; but at length the troops, leaping over the walls, mingled in furious combat with the savages. When the Indians, fleeing to the river, beheld the troops on the opposite bank, they returned and fought with increased fury and desperation. Six hundred warriors were killed ; four only yielded themselves prisoners ; the remaining three hundred escaped. Of the whites, fifty-five were killed, and one hundred and forty-six wounded. It was deemed probable that further resistance would be made by the Indians at a place called the Hickory-ground ; but on General Jackson's arriving thither in April, 1814, the principal chiefs came out to meet him, and among them was Wetherford, a half-blood, distinguished equally for his talents and cruelty. "I am in your power," said he, "do with me what you please. I have done the white people all the harm I could. I have fought them, and fought them bravely. There was a time when I had a choice ; I have none now, even hope is ended. Once I could animate my warriors ; but I cannot animate the dead. They can no longer hear my voice ; their bones are at Tallushatchie, Talladega, Emuckfaw, and Tohopeka. While there was a chance of success I never supplicated peace ; but my people are gone, and I now ask it for my nation and myself." Peace was concluded, and General Jackson and his troops enjoyed an honourable but short repose.

It was the declared intention of the British to lay waste the whole American coast, from Maine to Georgia. Of this intention demonstration was made by their descent upon Pettipauge, and the destruction which followed in that harbour. Early in April, a number of British barges, supposed to contain about two hundred and twenty men, entered the mouth of Connecticut River, passed up seven or eight miles, and came on shore at a part of Saybrook called Pettipauge, where they destroyed about twenty-five vessels. Guards of militia were placed without delay at nearly all the vulnerable points on the seaboard, and where troops could not be stationed, patrols of videttes were constantly maintained.

On the 25th of April, Admiral Cochrane declared, in addition to the ports and places blockaded by Admiral Warren, all the remaining ports, harbours, bays, creeks, rivers, inlets, outlets, islands, and sea coasts of the United States, from Black Point, on Long Island Sound, to the northern and eastern boundaries between the United States and the British province of New Brunswick, to be in a state of strict and rigorous blockade. On the other hand, the president of the United States issued a proclamation, declaring that the blockade proclaimed by the British of the whole Atlantic coast of the United States, nearly two thousand miles in extent, being incapable of execution by any adequate force actually stationed for the purpose, formed no awful prohibition or obstacle to such neutral and friendly vessels as may choose to visit and trade with the United States; and strictly ordered and instructed all the public armed vessels of the United States, and all private armed vessels commissioned as privateers, or with letters of marque and reprisal, not to interrupt, detain, or molest any vessels belonging to neutral powers, bound to any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States; but, on the contrary, to render all such vessels all the aid and kind offices which they might need or require.

The pacification in Europe offered to the British a large disposable force, both naval and military, and with it the means of giving to the war in America a character of new and increased activity and extent. The friends of the administration anticipated a severer conflict, and prepared for greater sacrifices and greater sufferings. Its opposers, where difficulties thickened and danger pressed, were encouraged to make more vigorous efforts to wrest the reins of authority from men who, they asserted, had shown themselves incompetent to hold them. The president deemed it advisable to strengthen the line of the Atlantic, and therefore called on the executive of several states to organize and hold in readiness for immediate service a corps of ninety-three thousand five hundred men.

The hostile movements on the northern frontier were now becoming vigorous and interesting. In the beginning of July, General Brown, who had been assiduously employed in disciplining his troops, crossed the Niagara with about three thousand men, and took possession, without opposition, of Fort Erie. In a strong position at Chippewa, a few miles distant, was intrenched an equal number of British troops, commanded by General Riall. On the 4th, General Brown approached their works; and the next day, on the plains of Chippewa, an obstinate and sanguinary battle was fought, which compelled the British to retire to their intrenchments. In this action, which was fought with great judgment and coolness on both sides, the loss of the Americans was about four hundred men, that of the British was upwards of five hundred. Soon afterwards, General Riall, abandoning his works, retired to the heights of Burlington. Here Lieutenant-General Drummond, with a large re-enforcement, joined him, and assuming the command, led back the army towards the American camp. On the 25th was fought the battle of Bridgewater, which began at four in the afternoon, and continued until midnight. After a desperate conflict, the British troops were withdrawn, and the Americans left in possession of the field. The loss on both sides was severe, and nearly equal. Generals Brown and Scott having both been severely wounded, the command devolved upon General Ripley. He remained a few hours upon the hill, collected the wounded, and then returned unmolested to the camp. This battle was fought near the cataract of Niagara, whose roar was silenced by the thunder of cannon and the din of arms, but was distinctly heard during the pauses of the fight. The American general found his force so much weakened, that he deemed it prudent again to occupy Fort Erie. On the 4th of August it was invested by General Drummond with five thousand troops. In the night between the 14th and 15th, the besiegers made a daring assault upon the fort, which was repelled with conspicuous gallantry by the garrison, the former losing more than nine hundred men, the latter but eighty-four. The siege was still continued. On the 2d of September, General Brown, having recovered from his wounds, threw himself into the fort, and took command of the garrison. For their fate great anxiety was felt by the nation, which was, however, in some degree removed, by the march from Plattsburgh of five thousand men to their relief. After an hour of close fighting they entered the fort, having killed, wounded, and taken one thousand of the British. The loss of the Americans was also considerable, amounting to more than five hundred. On the 21st of September, the forty-ninth day of the siege, General Drummond withdrew his forces.

The march of the troops from Plattsburgh having left that post almost defenceless, the enemy determined to attack it by land, and, at the same time, to attempt the destruction of the American flotilla on Lake Champlain. On the 3d of September, Sir George Prevost, the governor-general of Canada, at the head of fourteen thousand men, entered the territories of the United States. On the 6th they arrived at Plattsburgh. It is situated near Lake Champlain, on the northern bank of the small river Saranac. On their approach, the American troops, who were posted on the opposite bank, tore up the planks of the bridges, with which they formed slight breastworks, and prepared to dispute the passage of the stream. The British employed themselves for several days in erecting batteries, while the American forces were daily augmented by the arrival of volunteers and militia. Early in the morning of the 11th, the British squadron, commanded by Commodore Downie, appeared off the harbour of Plattsburgh, where that of the United States, commanded by Commodore Macdonough, lay at anchor prepared for battle. At nine o'clock the action commenced. Seldom has there been a more furious encounter than the bosom of this transparent and peaceful lake was now called to witness. During the naval conflict, the British on land began a heavy cannonade upon the American lines, and attempted at different places to cross the Saranac; but as often as the British advanced into the water they were repelled by a destructive fire from the militia. At half past eleven the shout of victory heard along the American lines announced the result of the battle on the lake. Thus deprived of naval aid, in the afternoon the British withdrew to their intrenchments, and in the night they commenced a precipitate retreat. Upon the lake the American loss was one hundred and ten; the British one hundred and ninety-four, besides prisoners. On land, the American loss was one hundred and nineteen; that of the British has been estimated as high as two thousand five hundred.

The inhabitants of the middle and southern states, anticipating a great augmentation of the English force, and uncertain where the blow would fall, made exertions to place every exposed position in a posture of defence. About the middle of August, a British squadron of between fifty and sixty sail arrived in the Chesapeake, with troops destined for the attack of Washington, the capital of the United States. A body of five thousand of them having landed, an action was fought at Bladensburg, six miles from Washington. General Winder commanded the whole American force; Commodore Barney the flotilla. The British were commanded by Major-General Ross and Rear-Admiral Cockburn. The Americans were repulsed, and the British advanced towards the capital. A body of militia had been assembled in this emergency; but the president and heads of departments, on reviewing the force brought out for defence, despaired of success, and dispersed. General Ross, at the head of about seven hundred men, took possession of Washington, and burned the capitol, or senate-house, the President's house, and public offices, the arsenal, the navy yard, and the bridge over the Potomac. The loss of the British in this expedition was nearly a thousand men, in killed, wounded, and missing; the loss of the Americans was ten or twelve killed, and thirty or forty wounded. Commodore Barney's horse was killed under him, and himself wounded in the thigh and taken prisoner; but he was paroled on the field of battle for his bravery. The capture of Washington reflected no credit upon those by whom it ought to have been defended; but the destruction of the national edifices was still more disgraceful to the character of the invaders. The whole civilized world exclaimed against the act, as a violation of the rules of modern warfare. The capitals of most of the European kingdoms had lately been in the power of an enemy; but in no instance had the conqueror been guilty of similar conduct. The act was also as impolitic as it was barbarous; it naturally excited an indignant spirit throughout the republic, and led its inhabitants to vie with each other in exerting all their faculties to overcome the ravagers of their country.

After the capture of Washington, the British army re-embarked on board the fleet in the Patuxent, and Admiral Cockburn moved down that river, and proceeded up the Chesapeake. On the 29th of August, the corporation of Alexandria submitted to articles of capitulation, and the city was delivered up to the British. On the 11th of September, the British admiral appeared at the mouth of the Patapsco, fourteen miles from Baltimore, with a fleet of ships of war and transports amounting to fifty sail. The next day six thousand troops were landed at North Point, and commenced their march towards the city. In this march, when the foremost ranks were harassed by a brisk fire from a wood, Major-General Ross was mortally wounded. A battle was fought on this day. The American forces, the militia, and the inhabitants of Baltimore, made a gallant defence, but were compelled to retreat ; the British, however, abandoning the attempt to get possession of the city, retired to their shipping during the night of the 13th of September.

On the ocean, the Essex, commanded by Captain Porter, after a bloody combat, struck to a British frigate and sloop of war, whose united force was much superior. The American sloop Peacock captured the Epervier of equal force. The sloop Wasp, commanded by Captain Blakely, captured the Reindeer, and afterwards, in the same cruise, sank the Avon, both of superior force. She made several other prizes, but never returned into port ; she probably foundered at sea.

The closing scene of this unnecessary and disgraceful war, the more detestable when contemplated as a series of human sacrifices for the preservation of a commercial system, was creditable to the genius and bravery of the American republic. The operations of the British in Louisiana were commenced by a small expedition, the naval part under the command of Captain Percy, and the troops under Colonel Nicholls. They landed and took forcible possession of Pensacola, and were aided by the Spaniards in all their proceedings ; they collected all the Indians that would resort to their standard ; and Colonel Nicholls then sent an officer to the piratical establishment at Barrataria to enlist the chief, Lafitte, and his followers, in their cause ; the most liberal and tempting offers were made them. These people, however, showed a decided preference for the American cause ; they deceived the English by delay ; conveyed intelligence of their designs to the Governor at New Orleans, and offered their services to defend the country. Disappointed in securing their aid, the expedition proceeded to the attack of Fort Bowyer, on Mobile point, commanded by Major Lawrence, with one hundred and thirty men. The result, however, was a loss to the besiegers of more than two hundred men ; the commodore's ship was so disabled that they set fire to her, and she blew up, and the remaining three vessels, shattered and filled with wounded men, returned to Pensacola. While the British thus sheltered in this place, where they were busily occupied in bringing over the Indians to join them, General Jackson formed an expedition of about four thousand men, regulars and militia, to dislodge them. He summoned the town, was refused entrance by the Spanish governor, and his flag of truce was fired upon ; the British soldiers being in the forts, where their flag had been hoisted, in conjunction with the Spanish, the day before the American forces appeared. Preparations were immediately made to carry the place ; one battery having been taken by storm, with slight loss on either side, the governor surrendered, the English having previously retired on board their ships. The forts below, which commanded the passage, were blown up, and this enabled the English fleet to put to sea.

General Jackson then evacuated the Spanish territory, and marched his troops back to Mobile and New Orleans, which he reached on the second day of December. Having reviewed a corps of volunteers the day of his arrival, he immediately proceeded to visit every post in the neighbourhood, to give orders for adding fortifications, and establishing defensive works and outposts in every spot where the enemy might be expected, as there was the greatest uncertainty where a landing would be made ; he mingled with the citizens, and infused into the greater part his own spirit and energy. By his presence and exhortations they were animated to exertions of which before they were not supposed to be capable. All who could wield a spade, or carry a musket, were either put to work upon the fortifications, or trained in the art of defending them. The Mississippi, upon the eastern bank of which New Orleans stands, flows to the ocean in several channels ; one leaving the main stream above the city, runs east of it, and forms in its course Lake Ponchartrain and Lake Borgne. Early in December, the British entered this channel, with a force of about eight thousand men, a part of whom had just left the shores of the Chesapeake, the remainder having arrived direct from England. A small squadron of gunboats, under Lieutenant Jones, was despatched to oppose their passage into the lake. These were met by a superior force, and after a spirited conflict, in which the killed and wounded of the British exceeded the whole number of the Americans, they were compelled to surrender. The loss of the gunboats left no means of watching the movements of the enemy, or of ascertaining where the landing would be made. Orders were given for increased vigilance at every post ; the people of colour were formed into a battalion ; the offer of the Barratarians to volunteer, on condition of a pardon for previous offences, if they conducted themselves with bravery and fidelity, was accepted. General Jackson, after applying to the legislature to suspend the act of habeas corpus, and finding that they were consuming these extreme moments in discussion, proclaimed martial law, and from that moment his means became more commensurate with the weight of responsibility he had to sustain.

On the 22d, the British, having landed, took a position near the main channel of the river, about eight miles below the city. In the evening of the 23d, General Jackson made a sudden and furious attack upon their camp. They were thrown into disorder; but they soon rallied, and fought with a bravery at least equal to that of the assailants. Satisfied with the advantage first gained, he withdrew his troops, fortified a strong position four miles below New Orleans, and supported it by batteries erected on the west bank of the river. On the 28th of December, and the 1st of January, vigorous but unsuccessful attacks were made upon these fortifications by the English. In the mean time, both armies had received re-enforcements; and General Sir E. Pakenham, the British commander, resolved to exert all his strength in a combined attack upon the American positions on both sides of the river. With almost incredible industry, he caused a canal, leading from a creek emptying itself into Lake Borgne to the main channel of the Mississippi, to be dug, that he might remove a part of his boats and artillery to that river. On the 7th of January, from the movements observed in the British camp, a speedy attack was anticipated. This was made early on the 8th. The British troops, formed in a close column of about sixty men in front, the men shouldering their muskets, all carrying fascines, and some with ladders, advanced towards the American fortifications, from whence an incessant fire was kept up on the column, which continued to advance, until the musketry of the troops of Tennessee and Kentucky, joined with the fire of the artillery, began to make an impression on it which soon threw it into confusion. For some time the British officers succeeded in animating the courage of their troops, making them advance obliquely to the left, to avoid the fire of a battery, every discharge from which opened the column, and mowed down whole files, which were almost instantaneously replaced by new troops coming up close after the first: but these also shared the same fate, until at last, after twenty-five minutes continual firing, through which a few platoons advanced to the edge of the ditch, the column entirely broke, and part of the troops dispersed, and ran to take shelter among the bushes on the right. The rest retired to the ditch where they had been when first perceived, four hundred yards from the American lines. There the officers with some difficulty rallied their troops, and again drew them up for a second attack, the soldiers having laid down their knapsacks at the edge of the ditch, that they might be less encumbered. And now, for the second time, the column, recruited with the troops that formed the rear, advanced. Again it was received with the same galling fire of musketry and artillery, till it at last broke again, and retired in the utmost confusion. In vain did the officers now endeavour, as before, to revive the courage of their men; to no purpose did they strike them with the flat of their swords, to force them to advance: they were insensible of every thing but danger, and saw nothing but death, which had struck so many of their comrades. The attack had hardly begun, when the British commander-in-chief, Sir Edward Pakenham, fell a victim to his own intrepidity, while endeavouring to animate his troops with ardour for the assault. Soon after his fall, two other generals, Keane and Gibbs, were carried off the field of battle, dangerously wounded. A great number of officers of rank had fallen: the ground over which the column had marched was strewn with the dead and wounded. Such slaughter on their side, with scarcely any loss on the American, spread consternation through the British ranks, as they were now convinced of the impossibility of carrying the lines, and saw that even to advance was certain death. Some of the British troops had penetrated into the wood towards the extremity of the American line, to make a false attack, or to ascertain whether a real one were practicable. These the troops under General Coffee no sooner perceived, than they opened on them a brisk fire with their rifles, which made them retire. The greater part of those who, on the column's being repulsed, had taken shelter in the thickets, only escaped the batteries to be killed by the musketry. During the whole hour that the attack lasted, the American fire did not slacken for a single moment. By half after eight in the morning, the fire of the musketry had ceased. The whole plain on the left, as also the side of the river, from the road to the edge of the water, was covered with the British soldiers who had fallen. About four hundred wounded prisoners were taken, and at least double that number of wounded men escaped into the British camp; and a space of ground, extending from the ditch of the American lines to that on which the enemy drew up his troops, two hundred and fifty yards in length, by about two hundred in breadth, was literally covered with men, either dead or severely wounded.* Perhaps a greater disparity of loss never occurred; that of the British in killed, wounded, and prisoners, in this attack, which was not made with sufficient judgment, and which, besides, was embarrassed by unforeseen circumstances, was upwards of two thousand men; the killed and wounded of the Americans was only thirteen.

The events of the day on the west side of the river present a striking instance of the uncertainty of military operations. There the Americans were thrice the number of their brave assailants, and were protected by intrenchments; but they ingloriously fled. They were closely pursued, until the British party, receiving intelligence of the defeat of the main army, withdrew from pursuit, and recrossed the river. They then returned and resumed possession of their intrenchments. General Lambert, upon whom the command of the British army had devolved, having lost all hopes of success, prepared to return to his shipping. In his retreat he was not molested: General Jackson wisely resolving to hazard nothing that he had gained, in attempting to gain still more.

The Americans naturally indulged in ecstasies of joy for this signal victory. Te Deum was sung at New Orleans, and every demonstration of gratitude manifested by the inhabitants of the Union generally. In speaking of gratitude on this occasion, however, we must not omit a ludicrous instance of the meanness which party-spirit will sometimes exhibit. The state of Louisiana passed votes of thanks to several of the officers concerned in the defence, and omitted General Jackson.*

Although the results of the war had been honourable to the American arms, a large portion of the inhabitants of the New England states were unceasingly opposed to the measures of the administration. The governor of Massachusetts convoked the general court of that state; the legislature of Connecticut was about to hold its usual semi-annual session; and the legislature of Rhode Island also assembled. When these several bodies met, what should be done in this unexampled state of affairs became a subject of most solemn deliberation. To insure unity of views and concert in action, the legislature of Massachusetts proposed a 'Conference' by delegates from the legislatures of the New England states, and of any other states that might accede to the measure. Their resolution for this purpose, and the circular letter accompanying it, show, that the duty proposed to be assigned to these delegates was merely to devise and recommend to the states, measures for their security and defence, and such measures as were "not repugnant to their federal obligations as members of the Union." The proposition was readily assented to by several states, and the delegates appointed in pursuance of it met at Hartford, on the 15th of December following. The convention recommended, 1. That the states they represent take measures to protect their citizens from "forcible draughts, conscriptions, or impressments, not authorized by the constitution of the United States." 2. That an earnest application be made to the government of the United States, requesting their consent to some arrangement, whereby the states separately, or in concert, may take upon themselves the defence of their territory against the enemy, and that a reasonable portion of the taxes collected within the states be appropriated to this object. 3. That the several governors be authorized by law to employ the military force under their command in assisting any state requesting it, to repel the invasions of the public enemy. 4. That several amendments of the constitution of the United States, calculated in their view to prevent a recurrence of

* The reason for this omission was, that, while they were wrangling and delaying to suspend the habeas corpus in a moment of the most imperious necessity, the general, to save the country, proclaimed martial law. In consequence of the omission of thanks by the legislature, some of the citizens of New Orleans presented an address to the general; the answer to which is highly characteristic of the gallant officer, now president of the United States:—"Although born and bred in the land of freedom," says the general, "popular favour has always been with me a secondary object. My first wish in political life has been, to be useful to my country. Yet I am not insensible to the good opinion of my fellow-citizens; I would do much to obtain it; but I can not, for this purpose, sacrifice my own conscience, or what I conceive to be the interests of my country. These principles have prepared me to receive with just satisfaction the address you have presented. The first wish of my heart, the safety of our country, has been accomplished; and it affords me the greatest happiness to know, that the means taken to secure this object, have met the approbation of those who have had the best opportunities of judging of their propriety, and who, from their various relations, might be supposed the most ready to censure any which had been improperly resorted to. The distinction you draw, gentlemen, between those who only declaim about civil rights, and those who fight to maintain them, shows how just and practical a knowledge you have of the true principles of liberty—without such knowledge all theory is useless or mischievous. It is matter of surprise, that they who boast themselves the champions of those rights and privileges, should not, when they were first put in danger by the proclamation of martial law, have manifested that lively sensibility of which they have since made so ostentatious a display. So far, however, was this from being the case, that this measure not only met, then, the open support of those who, when their country was invaded, thought resistance a virtue, and the silent approbation of all, but even received the particular recommendation and encouragement of many who now inveigh the most bitterly against it. It was not until a victory, secured by that very measure, had lessened the danger which occasioned the resort to it, that the present feeling guardians of our rights discovered that the commanding general ought to have suffered his posts to be abandoned through the interference of a foreign agent—his ranks to be thinned by desertion, and his whole army to be broken to pieces by mutiny; while yet a powerful force of the enemy remained on our coast, and within a few hours sail of your city. Under these circumstances, fellow-soldiers, your resolution to let others declaim about privileges and constitutional rights, will never draw upon you the charge of being indifferent to those inestimable blessings; your attachment to them has been proved by a stronger title—that of having nobly fought to preserve them. You, who have thus supported them against the open pretensions of a powerful enemy, will never, I trust, surrender them to the underhand machinations of men who stand aloof in the hour of peril, and who, when the danger is gone, claim to be the 'defenders of your constitution.'" the evils of which they complain, be proposed by the states they represent for adoption either by the state legislatures, or by a convention chosen by the people of each state. Lastly, That if the application of these states to the government of the United States should be unsuccessful, and peace should not be concluded, and the defence of these states be still neglected, it would, in their opinion, be expedient for the legislatures of the several states to appoint delegates to another convention, to meet at Boston, in June, with such powers and instructions as the exigency of a crisis so momentous may require. The effect of these proceedings upon the public mind in the aggrieved states, was alike seasonable and salutary. The very proposal to call a convention, and the confidence reposed in the men delegated to that trust, served greatly to allay the passions, and to inspire confidence and hope. Nor was the influence of this body upon the national councils less percepti-

* It could hardly be expected that a writer not residing in this country, could, if he wished to, be an impartial historian in all things, and give his readers a precise account of the effects of the war of 1812 on the United States. It was, in many respects, an expensive contest, every thing having been done by the government to great disadvantage, from the fact, that no preparations had been made for the crisis; but the national debt was nothing, in comparison with the advantageous change the war produced in the reasoning and habits of the people. This event brought the work shops from Europe to our own shores, and we were taught how to acquire and to maintain a true state of independence. Perhaps in the zeal of a new pursuit, the manufacturing interest was too far extended, but this evil will, in the end, cure itself. The maxim of political economy, that was once broached by the Edinburgh Review, that "the Americans should not be allowed to make a hob-nail," will no longer be repeated. The empire of the arts and manufactures is now divided between the two countries. We have as much of it as we desire, and can extend it to our wants. As the learned author of this history, Mr. Hinton, has said but little of political economy, the American editor may be pardoned for an otherwise prolix note.

As our country now presents herself to our view, we feel a self-congratulation and patriotic pride, that is at once just and useful. National pride is always found with pure patriotism. Twenty-four states, independent in all their civil polity and domestic relations, confederated to form one great people, is a novelty under the sun. These states, stretching through so many degrees of latitude, give a great variety of climate and of productions. The agricultural capacity of the country, as a whole, is not only equal to all our own wants, but to the wants of all others, if they should make us their granary. Most of the states are fitted for manufacturing; nature supplying water power to an incalculable extent. This country is also wonderfully fitted for commerce, from its extended seaboard, and numerous safe harbours, and great navigable rivers. It is well calculated for a great naval power, as our ship-timber is abundant, and may be cultivated to any extent required; and our river navigation and fisheries are nurseries for seamen. It is as yet so thinly settled, compared to its territory, that we can have no anxiety of a crowded population. The institutions of law, medicine, and divinity, are in a most flourishing condition, and we count more than half a hundred colleges, with an immense number of minor schools. It is a country full of inventive power, which puts every particle of mind into action. It is also remarkable for enterprise, and the people seize upon all the improvements of other nations. It has a mass of population, which have, more than any other people, sound minds in sound bodies, arising more from its moral and political character. Within three weeks after the adjournment of the Convention and the publication of their report, an act passed both houses of the national legislature, and received the signature of the president, authorizing and requiring him to "receive into the service of the United States any corps of troops which may have been or may be raised, organized, and officered, under the authority of any of the states," to be "employed in the state raising the same, or an adjoining state, and not elsewhere, except with the consent of the executive of the state raising the same." Before the commissioners who were sent to confer with the government could reach Washington, a bill passed the senate, providing for the payment of the troops and militia already called into service under the authority of the states. The arrival of the treaty of peace at this juncture, rendered all farther proceedings unnecessary.*

During the preceding year, the British government character, than from any other causes. It is a country that has no national religion, but within her borders every one worships God in his own way, if he do not disturb his neighbour; a country without grades in society fixed by law, and where primogeniture and entailment do not exist. It is a country where every one has a right to bear arms for protection and defence, and which could muster two millions of soldiers, if they were necessary, for self-defence. It is a country increasing in population, arts, sciences, letters, and wealth, with the comforts and enjoyments of social life, faster than any other in the world. In short, it is a country that "knows her rights, and knowing, dares maintain" them.

Should we be content to take this heritage of ours, without being mindful what it cost our ancestors to present it to us, as it is? Or should we examine the subject most minutely, as we have time or leisure?

Ours is the first nation in the annals of history, that became masters of themselves at once. Freedom has, in general, been gained slowly, and lost rapidly. The magna charta of British liberties, although the foundation of our free institutions, was nothing more than a string of concessions from a tyrant to barons and bishops, who were too strong for him. The great mass of the people had, after this, to gain their rights by slow degrees from the feudal lords of the country. This was done by the yeomanry, artisans, merchants, lawyers, and judges, by determination and perseverance. It is much more difficult to wrest power from aristocrats than from kings; and in the hands of the former it has been more dangerous and cruel than in the latter. The Alexanders, Cæsars, and Charlemagnes, had clemency and generosity in their nature; while the five hundred magnates of Venice, wrapt in the petty consequence of aristocratic pride, breathed their cruel edicts with malignity. Our government emanated from ourselves, and was formed with wholesome jealousies and cautious reservations, and has since been watched with the utmost scrupulosity. But we are in no danger: the staff is in our own hands; we can change the rulers often, if we do not like them, and they can do us but little harm, even at the worst that we can imagine.

It would require a volume to touch upon all the prominent features of our history. We will therefore leave the broad-cast view of our country, to make a few observations on the origin and the progress of the arts; their necessary connexion with the happiness of a great portion of our community; their uses in national defence; for the advancement of national prosperity; for the support of national independence and national pride and glory; and their influence in forming the social, intellectual, moral, and political character of man.

The arts undoubtedly made great progress in early times, for had declined to treat under the mediation of Russia, and a direct negotiation had been agreed on. Ghent they had their origin in necessity, and she is the mother of invention. Every new and useful invention was not only hailed as a blessing to mankind, but its author was at once raised to a divinity, and worshipped with the gods. The Scriptures, the oldest of all histories extant, give the invention of dress to Deity, but man himself soon sought out many inventions, for he was made, but little lower than the angels, in all the capacities of acquiring knowledge. He must have improved rapidly, for it is said, "Cain builded a city;" certain it is, that the monuments of primitive architecture remain in the East, for the astonishment of the traveller of the present day. Time has not been able to destroy them, nor has the much-learned antiquary satisfied us of the precise time when these temples and pyramids were erected.

In early Greece, the arts, both useful and polite, were held in high estimation. The acute and tasteful Athenians were artists and connoisseurs from childhood. Some of their greatest men came out of their workshops. Socrates was a sculptor, and Demosthenes, the master orator of that and every other age, spent a good portion of his boyhood in his father's manufactory of swords and common cutlery. And such was his knowledge of the business, that he impeached the integrity of his guardians, when only seventeen years of age, and won his cause by an argument from his own mouth. The Parthenon alone is a sufficient proof of the successful attention paid the arts in Athens, in her happiest days.

In Rome, the arts, though often patronized by individuals, did not hold the same rank as in Athens; the nation was too fierce and warlike for their successful cultivation. The passion for conquest swallowed up a taste for the arts. The spoils of conquered provinces made them forget the honest earnings of industry, and with them, the fame of skilful artists. The early Roman emperors became the patrons of letters and the arts; in truth, the arts and letters were inseparable, if not equally cherished at the same time. Religious zeal uniting with the skill and science of the architect, in the first centuries of christianity, was turned to the erection of monasteries and churches, and some of them remain to this day, as the highest specimens of talent and taste.

The arts were then almost exclusively confined to architecture; at least, the higher efforts of the artists were certainly to be found in public edifices. Naval architecture was still in its infancy; very little improvement had been made in ship-building, until the use of cannon on board of the large vessels, and this was not until 1444. In 1485, the Great Harry, as she was called, was built by Henry VII. Wonder as she was to the nations, her tonnage was but little more than one of our sloops of war.

Printing came in use about the time cannon were brought into naval warfare. These two inventions changed the character of Europe in less than half a century, and by the time our fathers came to settle this country, science, the arts, and particularly letters, had made great advances. They brought with them all the elementary learning of the age, and sufficient of practical skill for their purposes; but the cultivation of the soil soon offered more inducements than the workshops, and the mechanics were nearly lost in the farmers, visiting their shops only in the winter season. Domestic manufacturing was however carried on, as far as they could find flax and wool, and hides for leather; and for the first century, there can be no doubt, that more than half of the ordinary wants of the population were supplied within doors. Domestic industry was every where encouraged, and every house was a busy workshop, particularly in female industry. The hum of the spinning-wheel, and the sound of the shuttle, were heard in all our borders, and before the close of the first century, some parts of our country exported shoes and hats to the West Indies, somewhat clandestinely, for fear of the mother country; but their great traffic was in vessels built here, and sold to the colonists of Spain. It was not uncommon to get off in them some of these articles of home manufacture. Our manufacturing interests had a great accession of intelligence and industry in the host of Huguenots who fled to this country, after the revocation of the edict of Nantz, in 1686. Their descendants are among the most respectable of our countrymen at this day. Prosperity, and a new order of manufacturing, was every was ultimately determined as the place of meeting; and in the autumn of 1814 the commissioners prose-

where found with them. At that period the French were much in advance of the English in the excellence of their goods. Before the close of the first century, foundries were erected in several of our colonies, and a considerable supply of iron was had from them.

The arts are necessary for the advancement of national prosperity. It has been said by some politicians, that the United States should, for centuries to come, keep her workshops in Europe. This maxim, perhaps, was well enough to a certain extent, so far as it related to the finest goods, when we were building up a government, and had the carrying-trade of the world, and when the wars in Europe increased the value of our exports, by very high prices paid for all articles of provision; but now the scene is changed, and the balance of trade is against us, and as we have less to buy with, we must trust, in a good measure, to our own resources, and reflect upon what is best for this country in general.

Putting out of the computation the two millions of slaves in our country, we have more than ten millions of free white inhabitants, and most of them live well. The demand for articles of necessity, comfort, and luxury, together with the elegancies of taste, is immense. If these can be had among ourselves easier than by commerce, why should they not be produced?

The arts are necessary for national defence. No country can be safe, happy, great, or glorious, without every means for self-defence within herself. Our seaboard is as yet but partially fortified, and even where strong works have been erected, they are not as yet entirely supplied with cannon, nor can they be for years to come, unless the government quicken its hand in supplying them.

To preserve peace we must be prepared for war. I long for the "Salutarian rule" as well as the most ardent member of the peace society can do, but my belief is, that a golden age must be preserved by the implements of war—those sharp instruments forged in an iron age. In twenty years, with judicious appropriations, our sea-coast and frontiers will be amply fortified in a substantial and permanent manner. The army is growing up in the best of all possible forms, in the expanded intelligence of the officers, and not in useless numbers of soldiers, that can be raised in a day, and disciplined in a few weeks. Our navy is gradually increasing, and there is no danger that discipline and nautical skill will be retrograde with them. The day has passed, when men can be covered with glory, without being fraught with knowledge, and adorned with virtue. There is no danger of our becoming a martial people, and running into a love of conquest. The danger is on the other hand, that commerce, agriculture, and the peaceful arts, the sciences, and letters, will engross our attention, and leave us too little of martial or naval spirit. It was ordained or suffered by the Almighty, that our nation should grow up through great and protracted struggles. Every step of our national progress, up to our independence, has been of painful exertion, and loss of blood. This country has, in its various portions, and in different ages of its existence, been engaged in more than fifty wars, and fought more than a hundred battles, by land and sea, before the war of the revolution commenced. We have not been a nation of peace from our birth, nor can we exist, if we at once beat our swords into ploughshares, and our spears into pruning hooks. In such a state, the Philistines would be upon us. This is the decree of the God of battles, that freedom can be preserved only by brave hearts and muscular arms; and it is equally true, that the most powerful, when enlightened, are the most generous.

The arts are necessary for the strength, the honour, pride, and glory of a nation. The strength of a nation consists of high-souled men, but also in battlement, wall, and tower; in a word, in their possessions; such wealth as is real, and will go down to posterity improved and increased. Save the soil on which we live, most of our wealth and strength has been the growth of about half a century.

The fact is, that every attempt made by England to retard the progress of the arts in this country, has, in the end, been one of the sources of their advancement.

The first attack upon the arts and commerce of this country, was the famous Navigation Act, passed in 1651, two years after the death of Charles I., by the parliament of the commonwealth, and cutted their labours, but at first with very doubtful success. By the 24th of December, a treaty was confirmed and enlarged by Charles II., in 1660. By this act the whole commerce of the colonies would have been nearly destroyed, if it had been regarded, but it was evaded in many ways.

In 1761, the British government began to draw closer the cords of commercial restrictions. In 1765, the sugar act was passed. And the same year the stamp act. The effect of this throughout the colonies was electrical. The irritation continued until the war broke out.

The effects of the non-importation agreement gave great impulse to domestic manufactures. The class which graduated at Harvard College in 1770, appeared in clothes of domestic manufacture. An impulse was given to spinning and weaving, in all parts of the country; but it was hard to cut off the people from the use of British goods at once. The manufacturing of leather had, from the early settlement, been considerably attended to by the colonists.

The arts, at the commencement of the struggle, were in a low state. There was but a small supply of powder, and only four cannon, to begin the fight with. There was a scarcity of mechanics; but many of the mechanics from the enemy deserted to us after the defeat of the Hessians at Trenton.

The effects of the peace of 1783 were a sad blow to the arts for many years. The manufactures of England were poured in upon us, and the importer could undersell the artist. The prosperity of the carrying trade, from the peace of 1783 until 1806, enriched the United States beyond calculation. The decline of commerce, after 1806, brought on some attention to the arts, but their progress was slow.

The war of 1812 had a beneficial effect on the arts; it transplanted the work-shops from England to the United States. Now we can be said to be independent; before we were not. The attention to our manufacturing interests will in the end benefit the merchant, the farmer, and the whole mass of society, in a pecuniary point of view. Lyceums have been established; lectures given; knowledge generally diffused, and political economy studied.

There is no danger of the number of mechanics increasing too rapidly in this country, for their proportion has not yet reached but a small part of the maximum that the nation will bear. In England, one hundred agricultural families will support sixty-six other families. These are calculated in the following manner: 1 priest, 2 lawyers, 4 medical men, 4 schoolmasters, 6 tailors, 8 carpenters, 5 smiths, 3 braziers, 2 cabinet-makers, 14 manufacturers, 10 traders, or clerks, or accountants. Now we do not average any thing like this, while Great Britain nearly doubles it, in some portions of the calculation. Her land is better cultivated than ours, but we are not limited or confined.

Some mechanics are apprehensive of labour-saving machines; but we have no just reason to fear any thing from this quarter yet. In the year 1776, Hargrave, in England, invented the first spinning-jenny, an invention which has saved countless millions to the kingdom, and I believe the wages of the workers in cotton is as great, in proportion to articles of living, as they were before this invention. In England, it is calculated that there are 15,000 steam-engines at work, which will average twenty-five horse power; but we can never want but a small portion of this number, as our country abounds with the best of all power—the water-power, which was but little known when our ancestors came to this country.

Among the mechanics of a former age, many distinguished men have arisen to adorn every walk of life. They have passed from the work-shop to the battle field, and from thence to the hall of legislation, and to the bench of justice. It was not alone the mental culture of these men that made them great; it was their moral education that gave them the high stand they took in society. They were educated in the doctrines of strict obedience, and were not indulged in any romantic ideas of self-government; but were content with their time of service that the wisdom of the law had directed. This was one cause of their superiority; they waited patiently to become free, and masters of themselves; and when they had reached the proper age, they were equal to their business, and set up with the confidence of their fellow-citizens. These men had acquired habits of industry and firmness of purpose, and start-agreed upon and signed by the plenipotentiaries of the respective powers at Ghent; and in February of ed in life with a moral weight of character. Society opened its arms to receive them, and they came fairly into the ranks of men, having been thoroughly initiated into the art, craft, and mystery they professed, as far as it was taught in their day. They had received parental, as well as professional education. They were directed by men whose hearts were right, who laboured for their children, that they might be good, leaving it to Providence to direct them in future life. Honesty and integrity are the basis of every character, and this their fathers knew.

"Though they, each tome of human lore unknown,
The brilliant path of science never trod,
The sacred volume claim'd their hearts alone,
Which taught the way to glory and to God.

"Here they from Truth's eternal fountain drew
The pure and gladdening water day by day;
Learnt, since our days are evil, fleet, and few
To walk in Wisdom's bright and peaceful way."

When the moral character is found to be correct and substantial, every particle of intelligence tells. The great man, who conducted our revolution as chief in arms, owed his success to the weight of his moral character, more than to his genius and military skill, however great they might have been. Honesty and integrity is credit every where, and in all stations. Themistocles was a greater man than Aristides; but the advice of the latter was followed, when he agreed that what Themistocles counselled would be beneficial to his country, but would at the same time take from the honesty and good faith of the nation.

It is my sincere belief, that the artists, mechanics, and manufacturers, at the present day, are as elevated in the scale of morals, as the agriculturists and the professional men of the country. The fear of corruption was the foundation of the opinion of our statesmen, that our work-shops should be long kept in Europe. Those who have introduced them here, were willing to be responsible for the result, and time has proved that they knew what they were doing. Some of the best schools in our country are connected with the manufacturing interests. The great proportion of those children connected with the establishments at Lowell, Chelmsford, and other places, are better educated than the great mass of the yeomanry throughout our country. I speak from an acquaintance with the fact.

The education of all classes should be watched with a hundred eyes; the philanthropist of the present age should never forget, that no plans of benefiting mankind are worth a single thought, unless they are connected with education. Not that education which gives a smattering of all things to every one, but that which teaches every one to think wisely and to act well. We are privileged in this respect above all other nations who have preceded us, for they began the arts when mental and moral cultivation were low; we came to regard them when we had considered and reasoned upon other matters of vital importance. We had agreed on forms of governments, adopted constitutions, erected tribunals of justice, and passed wise laws for the protection of property, and life, and public peace, and security, before the arts began to be cherished to any considerable extent. But we should not be satisfied by thinking that we began right; we must keep constantly in the right, to do justice to ourselves as a nation. There is no difficulty in this; it is only to see that every successive age has the proper degree of education offered them; not only offered, but attended to. But few can become learned by the simple love of intelligence. The recompense of reward must be set before the eyes of the young, to stimulate them to exertion. We must not only tell them that knowledge is power, but demonstrate it.

We often reason erroneously upon nations, and the happiness they enjoy; we draw upon our imaginations instead of our judgments. We consider an age of successful war as one of happiness, as well as of glory. Nothing is more common than to hear lamentations over Greece. The days of her worthies are called the following year it received the ratification of the president.*

While the people of the United States were rejoicing at the return of peace, their attention was called to a new scene of war. By a message from the president to the house of representatives, with a report of the secretary of state, it appeared that the dey of Algiers had violently, and without just cause, obliged the consul of the United States, and all the American citizens in Algiers, to leave that place, in violation of the treaty then subsisting between the two nations; that he had exacted from the consul, back; her great men conjured up; the political wisdom of Solon, the military prowess of Miltiades, and the eloquence of Demosthenes, are set before us. Here Sappho sung, and Lais danced. Here Ilissus flowed on and fell in lovely cascades,* and Hymettus was covered with flowers and honey; then the Muses haunted every grove, and the reign of Apollo was unquestioned. In all this we forget that Athens was cursed with slaves; that at times she had 200,000 slaves to 30,000 freemen; and that, like some of our southern states, the freemen lived in constant dread of them. Sparta also, with all her freedom, had her Helots, a race she was obliged to keep from increasing too fast, by repeated assassinations. The young reader revels in the descriptions of ancient Greece, and thinks that nothing can ever be made of her now. It is perhaps cruel to dissolve a charm so refreshing to the classical mind, but it is our duty to look at these things with the eye of reason. Athens is now without slaves. All her citizens are free; she has sent to this country some of her learned men, to learn the nature of our improvements, and they are engaged in their duties; they will carry back numerous models from our patent office and our manufacturing towns. They will build mills on the sacred streams; perforate Pindus and Hymettus for ores, and becoming a manufacturing, commercial, and naval people, will resume a new station; if not one of as much glory, yet one of more true happiness. Former ages have been called after the metals in use among mankind—an age of gold, of silver, of brass, or iron. Political economists have discarded these terms, leaving them to the poet only, and have assumed new names, such as an age of invention, of industry, of productiveness, all centering in utility. It is true, the natural world does not now furnish the hero with monsters to overcome, or prodigies to describe, such as the age of chivalry produced, yet there is still enough of things unknown to demand the utmost exertions of the human mind. Genius and taste may be occupied, if the days of romance are past.

The useful arts, in their regular course, cherish the fine arts. The great quantities of paper manufactured in this country facilitates the multiplication of books. Competition among publishers leads to good editions, ornamented with engravings. Twenty-five years ago, when Delaplaine began his Repository, there was hardly an engraver in this country, and now there are hundreds fully employed. As the engraver finds employment, the painter sees his art becoming more in fashion. And the sculptor has now some chance of fame with the painters and engravers. From the consumption of the single article of paper in the United States, the folly of keeping our work-shops in Europe may be seen. There is not enough of the precious metals in our banks, from Louisiana to Maine, to purchase paper sufficient to supply the market for three years. Many other articles would illustrate our position, that we must be a manufacturing people to be a prosperous people.

The use of the article of iron is great almost beyond calculation. Two hundred and ten thousand tons of iron are used in this country every year, about one half of which we make ourselves, and ours is the best that can be found. In the article of shoes, forty millions of pairs of shoes and boots are made in a year, for home consumption, and for foreign markets. For harnesses and saddles, also, a large amount of capital is paid yearly; and a great portion of these was formerly imported. Does not every ridge, every plain, in fact, every tree and every blade of grass, feel the influence of the domestic industry? Every village throughout the manufacturing districts, feels the effects of this labour; and do not the seaports flourish as much, or more, than they did when we had to depend entirely on England and on France for all our manufactures? Every thing done for the manufacturing interests assists every other class in the community. The greater consumption of domestic goods, the better price the farmer will get for his produce.

There is a common chain that binds all interests together in this country, when a sound judgment is exercised in our national councils. The harmony of the whole is the safety of the whole. This must teach us how wise it is to select the best and most discerning men for rulers, and not to trust our dearest interests to those who wish to ride into power on their talents as demagogues or sycophants.

We think that we are now living in peace. The echo of the last groan of the Indian has passed over his smouldering wigwam, and the children of Black Hawk are no more. The border-trooper has cleft them down, and thrown the fire-brand into their dwellings. This no doubt was policy, but the philanthropist weeps at the necessity of it.

We think that having achieved our independence by a long and painful struggle, and having a second time tried our strength with England, that we are, and shall long remain, in peace with her. If, in the mind of the warrior, all is peace, because the sword is not red with blood; if all is peace, because no vessel of war is proudly carrying her thunders along our coast, to destroy our commerce, and no din of martial preparation is heard; the political economist and thinking statesman sees that England, as a giant with a hundred hands and as many eyes, is waging an honest war upon our industry, invention, and prosperity. She has a right to take care of her own industry, by every fair policy. This is a war which we must see and feel may be wasting to us; but the sword can not, by international law, and should not, by any excitement, leap from its scabbard, to decide the rivalry of mind and industry. We must meet policy by policy, until we find the effect of our unity, strength, and wisdom. Such a contest will be a preservative of peace between the two nations, and a lasting blessing to the world.—American Editor.

* By the first article of this treaty it was agreed, that there shall be a firm and universal peace between his Britannic Majesty and the United States, and between their respective countries, territories, cities, towns, and people, of every degree, without exception of places or persons; and that all hostilities, both by sea and land, shall cease as soon as this treaty shall have been ratified by both parties. By the third article, all prisoners of war taken on either side, as well by land as by sea, shall be restored as soon as practicable after the ratifications of this treaty. By the fourth article, the decision of the conflicting claims of the United States and of Great Britain to several islands in the bay of Passamaquoddy, was referred to two commissioners, one to be appointed by his Britannic Majesty, and one by the president of the United States, with the advice and consent of the senate; and it was agreed, in the event of the two commissioners differing upon all or any of the matters referred to them, or of their not acting, they shall make report or reports to their respective governments, which report or reports they agreed to refer to some friendly sovereign or state, to be then named for that purpose, and engaged to consider such decision to be final and conclusive. By the ninth article, the United States engaged to put an end, immediately after the ratification of the present treaty, to hostilities with all the tribes or nations of Indians, with whom they may be at war at the time of such ratification, provided they shall agree to desist from all hostilities against the United States; and his Britannic Majesty, on his part, entered into a correspondent engagement on the like condition of their desisting from all hostilities against him and his subjects. The tenth article has respect to the abolition of the slave trade: "Whereas the traffic in slaves is irreconcilable with the principles of humanity and justice; and whereas both his majesty and the United States are desirous of continuing their efforts to promote its entire abolition; it is hereby agreed that both the contracting parties shall use their best endeavours to accomplish so desirable an object."

under pain of immediate imprisonment, a large sum of money, to which he had no just claim; and that these acts of violence and outrage had been followed by the capture of at least one American vessel, and by the seizure of an American citizen on board of a neutral vessel; that the captured persons were yet held in captivity, with the exception of two of them, who had been ransomed; that every effort to obtain the release of the others had proved abortive; and that there was some reason to believe they were held by the dey as means by which he calculated to extort from the United States a degrading treaty. The president observed, that the considerations which rendered it unnecessary and unimportant to commence hostile operations on the part of the United States, were now terminated by the peace with Great Britain, which opened the prospect of an active and valuable trade of their citizens within the range of the Algerine cruisers; and recommended to congress the consideration of an act declaring the existence of a state of war between the United States and the dey of Algiers, and of such provisions as might be requisite for the prosecution of it to a successful issue. A committee of congress, to whom was referred a bill "for the protection of the commerce of the United States against the Algerine cruisers," after a statement of facts, concluded their report by expressing their united opinion, "that the dey of Algiers considers his treaty with the United States as at an end, and is waging war with them;" and in March war was declared against the Algerines.

An expedition was immediately ordered to the Mediterranean, under the command of Commodore Bainbridge. The squadron in advance on that service, under Commodore Decatur, lost not a moment after its arrival in the Mediterranean, in seeking the naval force of the enemy, then cruising in that sea, and succeeded in capturing two of his ships, one of them commanded by the Algerine admiral. The American commander, after this demonstration of skill and prowess, hastened to the port of Algiers, where he readily obtained peace, in the stipulated terms of which the rights and honour of the United States were particularly consulted, by a perpetual relinquishment, on the part of the dey, of all pretensions to tribute from them. The impressions thus made, strengthened by subsequent transactions with the regencies of Tunis and Tripoli, by the appearance of the larger force which followed under Commodore Bainbridge, and by the judicious precautionary arrangements left by him in that quarter, afforded a reasonable prospect of future security for the valuable

President Madison, in his message to the congress of 1816, having adverted to the peace of Europe and to that of the United States with Great Britain, said, he had the "satisfaction to state, generally, that they remained in amity with foreign powers." He proceeded to say, that the posture of affairs with Algiers at that moment was not known; but that the dey had found a pretext for complaining of a violation of the last treaty, and presenting as the alternative, war or a renewal of the former treaty, which stipulated, among other things, an annual tribute. "The answer," says the president, "with an explicit declaration that the United States preferred war to tribute, required his recognition and observance of the treaty last made, which abolishes tribute, and the slavery of our captured citizens. The result of the answer has not been received. Should he renew his warfare on our commerce, we rely on the protection it will find in our naval force actually in the Mediterranean. With the other Barbary states our affairs have undergone no change. With reference to the aborigines of our own country," he continues, "the Indian tribes within our limits appear also disposed to remain in peace. From several of them purchases of lands have been made, particularly favourable to the wishes and security of our frontier settlements as well as to the general interests of the nation. In some instances, the titles, though not supported by due proof, and clashing those of one tribe with the claims of another, have been extinguished by double purchases, the benevolent policy of the United States preferring the augmented expense to the hazard of doing injustice, or to the enforcement of justice against a feeble and untutored people, by means involving or threatening an effusion of blood. I am happy to add, that the tranquillity which has been restored among the tribes themselves, as well as between them and our own population, will favour the resumption of the work of civilization, which had made an encouraging progress among some tribes; and that the facility is increasing for extending that divided and individual ownership, which exists now in moveable property only, to the soil itself; and of thus establishing, in the culture and improvement of it, the true foundation for a transit from the habits of a savage to the arts and comforts of social life."

The doubtful state of the relations between the United States and the dey of Algiers, to which the president alluded in his message, arose either from a strong impulse of the love of extortion in the dey, or from the influence of some foreign personages ;* the rising differences were, however, settled by the prudent management of the American consul, Mr. Shaler, and peace has not since been broken on the part of the Algerines.

Among the incidents of domestic interest which indicate the rapid growth and increasing prosperity of the republic, we may notice the formation of the territory of Indiana into a state, and its admission into the union ; the progress of canals in various states ; the institution of a national bank ; and the arrival of many thousand emigrants, chiefly from Great Britain.† Treaties were, during this year, negotiated with the Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Cherokee Indians, ceding large portions of their respective territories to the United States, and acknowledging their tribes to be under the protection of the republic.

CHAPTER VI.

ADMINISTRATIONS OF JAMES MONROE, JOHN QUINCY ADAMS, AND PART OF THAT OF ANDREW JACKSON.

THE events of the existing generation can never be considered fully ripe for the historian ; we have therefore been concise in our narrative of recent transactions. The closing chapter of this narrative, although comprising a period of eighteen years, will exhibit still more strikingly a happy brevity, through the absence of events which constitute the chief materials of history ; and our earnest hope is, that every succeeding decade will possess an equally diminished claim on the historic pen—an indication that an interchange of benevolent acts constitutes an increasing proportion of national proceedings, giving little to record, but much to enjoy. Ambition and the love of glory, the brilliant but delusive offspring of disordered minds, may excite to deeds which engage the admiration of the unreflecting mass of mankind ; but they are deeds which, while they gratify the pride of a few, blast the happiness of multitudes ; and, like family feuds, spread their baneful influence through distant generations. Under the heated and deadly glare of military glory, the arts and sciences which contribute to the enjoyment of life wither, and give place to the luxurious growth of rancorous weeds, whose blossoms are decked, indeed, with gorgeous colours, but whose fruit is the dust of bitterness and despair.

A circumstance peculiar to the constitution of the United States, also tends to abridge our present labours ;—the history of the United States during the remainder of the period we propose to include relating chiefly to measures of internal improvement, which are, for the most part, conducted by the respective states, and not by the general government, the arrangements of the work necessarily transfer our notice of these transactions to a subsequent section, which will treat of them in connexion with the statistics and topography of the states in which they have occurred.

The term of Mr. Madison's administration having expired in the year 1817, James Monroe was inaugurated president, and Daniel D. Tompkins vice-president. On his inauguration, Mr. Monroe delivered the following address to both houses of congress :—

"I should be destitute of feeling, if I was not deeply affected by the strong proof which my fellow-citizens have given me of their confidence, in calling me to the high office, whose functions I am about to assume. As the expression of their good opinion of my conduct in the public service, I derive from it a gratification, which those who are conscious of having done all that they could to merit it, can alone feel. My sensibility is increased by a just estimate of the importance of the trust, and of the nature and extent of its duties ; with the proper discharge of which, the highest interests of a great and free people are intimately connected. Conscious of my own deficiency, I cannot enter on these duties without great anxiety for the result. From a just responsibility I will never shrink ; calculating with confidence, that in my best efforts to promote the public welfare, my motives will always be duly appreciated, and my conduct be viewed with that candour and indulgence which I have experienced in other stations.

"In commencing the duties of the chief executive office, it has been the practice of the distinguished men who have gone before me, to explain the principles which would govern them in their respective administrations. In following their venerated example, my attention is naturally drawn to the great causes which have contributed, in a principal degree, to produce the present happy condition of the United States. They will best explain the nature of our duties, and shed much light on the policy which ought to be pursued in future.

"From the commencement of our revolution to the present day, almost forty years have elapsed, and from the establishment of this constitution, twenty-eight. Through this whole term the government has been what may emphatically be called, self-government; and what has been the effect? To whatever object we turn our attention, whether it relates to our foreign or domestic concerns, we find abundant cause to felicitate ourselves in the excellence of our institutions. During a period fraught with difficulties, and marked by very extraordinary events, the United States have flourished beyond example. Their citizens, individually, have been happy, and the nation prosperous.

"Under this constitution, our commerce has been wisely regulated with foreign nations, and between the states; new states have been admitted into our union; our territory has been enlarged, by fair and honourable treaty, and with great advantage to the original states; the states respectively, protected by the national government, under a mild parental system, against foreign dangers, and enjoying within their separate spheres, by a wise partition of power, a just proportion of the sovereignty, have improved their police, extended their settlements, and attained a strength and maturity, which are the best proofs of wholesome laws, well administered. And if we look to the condition of individuals, what a proud spectacle does it exhibit? On whom has oppression fallen in any quarter of our union? Who has been deprived of any right of person or property? Who restrained in offering his vows in the mode in which he prefers, to the Divine Author of his being? It is well known, that all these blessings have been enjoyed in their fullest extent; and I add with peculiar satisfaction, that there has been no example of a capital punishment being inflicted on any one for the crime of high treason.

"Some, who might admit the competency of our government to these beneficent duties, might doubt it in trials which put to the test its strength and efficiency, as a member of the great community of nations. Here, too, experience has afforded us the most satisfactory proof in its favour. Just as this constitution was put into action, several of the principal states of Europe had become much agitated, and some of them seriously convulsed. Destructive wars ensued, which have, of late only, been terminated. In the course of these conflicts, the United States received great injury from several of the parties. It was their interest to stand aloof from the contest; to demand justice from the party committing the injury; and to cultivate, by a fair and honourable conduct, the friendship of all. War became, at length, inevitable, and the result has shown, that our government is equal to that, the greatest of trials, under the most unfavour-

"Such, then, is the happy government under which we live: a government adequate to every purpose for which the social compact is formed; a government elective in all its branches, under which every citizen may, by his merit, obtain the highest trust recognised by the constitution; which contains within it no cause of discord; none to put at variance one portion of the community with another; a government which protects every citizen in the full enjoyment of his rights, and is able to protect the nation against injustice from foreign powers.

"Other considerations of the highest importance admonish us to cherish our union, and cling to the government which supports it. Fortunate as we are in our political institutions, we have not been less so in other circumstances, on which our prosperity and happiness essentially depend. Situated within the temperate zone, and extending through many degrees of latitude along the Atlantic, the United States enjoy all the varieties of climate, and every production incident to that portion of the globe. Penetrating, internally, to the great lakes, and beyond the source of the great rivers which communicate through our whole interior, no country was ever happier with respect to its domain. Blessed too with a fertile soil, our produce has always been very abundant, leaving, even in years the least favourable, a surplus for the wants of our fellow men in other countries. Such is our peculiar felicity, that there is not a part of our union that is not particularly interested in preserving it. The great agricultural interest of the nation prospers under its protection. Local interests are not less fostered by it. Our fellow-citizens of the north, engaged in navigation, find great encouragement in being made the favoured carriers of the vast productions of the other portions of the United States, while the inhabitants of these are amply recompensed, in their turn, by the nursery for seamen and naval force, thus formed and reared up for the support of our common rights. Our manufactures find a generous encouragement by the policy which patronizes domestic industry; and the surplus of our produce, a steady and profitable market by local wants, in less favoured parts at home.

"Such, then, being the highly favoured condition of our country, it is the interest of every citizen to maintain it. What are the dangers which menace us? If any exist, they ought to be ascertained and guarded against.

"In explaining my sentiments on this subject, it may be asked, what raised us to the present happy state? How did we accomplish the revolution? How remedy the defects of the first instrument of our union, by infusing into the national government sufficient power for national purposes, without impairing the just rights of the states, or affecting those of individuals? How sustain, and pass with glory through the late war? The government has been in the hands of the people. To the people, therefore, and to the faithful and able depositories of their trust, is the credit due. Had the people of the United States been educated in different principles; had they been less intelligent, less independent, or less virtuous, can it be believed that we should have maintained the same steady and consistent career, or been blessed with the same success? While then the constituent body retains its present sound and healthful state, every thing will be safe. They will choose competent and faithful representatives of every department. It is only when the people become ignorant and corrupt, when they degenerate into a populace, that they are incapable of exercising the sovereignty. Usurpation is then an easy attainment, and a usurper soon found. The people themselves become the willing instruments of their own debasement and ruin. Let us then look to the great cause, and endeavour to preserve it in full force. Let us, by all wise and constitutional measures, promote intelligence among the people, as the best means of preserving our liberties.

"Dangers from abroad are not less deserving of attention. Experiencing the fortune of other nations, the United States may be again involved in war, and it may, in that event, be the object of the adverse party to overset our government, to break our union, and demolish us as a nation. Our distance from Europe, and the just, moderate, and pacific policy of our government, may form some security against these dangers, but they ought to be anticipated and guarded against. Many of our citizens are engaged in commerce and navigation, and all of them are in a certain degree dependent on their prosperous state. Many are engaged in the fisheries. These interests are exposed to invasion in the wars between other powers, and we should disregard the faithful admonition of experience if we did not expect it. We must support our rights or lose our character, and with it perhaps our liberties. A people who fail to do it, can scarcely be said to hold a place among independent nations. National honour is national property of the highest value. The sentiment in the mind of every citizen, is national strength. It ought therefore to be cherished.

"To secure us against these dangers, our coast and inland frontiers should be fortified, our army and navy regulated upon just principles as to the force of each, be kept in perfect order, and our militia be placed on the best practicable footing. To put our extensive coast in such a state of defence, as to secure our cities and interior from invasion, will be attended with expense, but the work when finished will be permanent, and it is fair to presume that a single campaign of invasion, by a naval force superior to our own, aided by a few thousand land troops, would expose us to greater expense, without taking into the estimate the loss of property, and distress of our citizens, than would be sufficient for this great work. Our land and naval forces should be moderate, but adequate to the necessary purposes. The former to garrison and preserve our fortifications and to meet the first invasions of a foreign foe; and, while constituting the elements of a greater force, to preserve the science, as well as all the necessary implements of war, in a state to be brought into activity in the event of war. The latter, retained within the limits proper in a state of peace, might aid in maintaining the neutrality of the United States with dignity in the wars of other powers, and in saving the property of their citizens from spoliation. In time of war, with the enlargement of which the great naval resources of the country render it susceptible, and which should be duly fostered in time of peace, it would contribute essentially both as an auxiliary of defence, and as a powerful engine of annoyance, to diminish the calamities of war, and to bring the war to a speedy and honourable termination.

"But it always ought to be held prominently in view, that the safety of these states, and of every thing dear to a free people, must depend in an eminent degree on the militia. Invasions may be made, too formidable to be resisted by any land and naval force, which it would comport either with the principles of our government, or the circumstances of the United States, to maintain. In such cases, recourse must be had to the great body of the people, and in a manner to produce the best effect. It is of the highest importance, therefore, that they be so organized and trained, as to be prepared for any emergency. The arrangement should be such, as to put at the command of the government the ardent patriotism and youthful vigour of the country. If formed on equal and just principles, it cannot be oppressive. It is the crisis which makes the pressure, and not the laws which provide a remedy for it. This arrangement should be formed too in time of peace, to be better prepared for war. With such an organization of such a people, the United States have nothing to dread from foreign invasion. At its approach, an overwhelming force of gallant men might always be put in motion.

"Other interests of high importance will claim attention, among which the improvement of our country by roads and canals, proceeding always with a constitutional sanction, holds a distinguished place. By thus facilitating the intercourse between the states, we shall add much to the convenience and comfort of our fellow-citizens ; much to the ornament of the country ; and, what is of a greater importance, we shall shorten distances, and by making each part more accessible to, and dependent on the other, we shall bind the union more closely together. Nature has done so much for us by intersecting the country with so many great rivers, bays, and lakes, approaching from distant points so near to each other, that the inducement to complete the work seems to be peculiarly strong. A more interesting spectacle was perhaps never seen than is exhibited within the United States ; a territory so vast, and advantageously situated, containing objects so grand, so useful, so happily connected in all their parts.

"Our manufactures will likewise require the systematic and fostering care of the government. Possessing, as we do, all the raw materials, the fruit of our own soil and industry, we ought not to depend in the degree we have done on the supplies from other countries. While we are thus dependent, the sudden event of war unsought and unexpected, can not fail to plunge us into the most serious difficulties. It is important, too, that the capital which nourishes our manufactures should be domestic, as its influence in that case, instead of exhausting, as it may do in foreign hands, would be felt advantageously on agriculture, and every other branch of industry. Equally important is it to provide at home a market for our raw materials, as by extending the competition, it will enhance the price, and protect the cultivator against the casualties incident to foreign markets.

"With the Indian tribes it is our duty to cultivate friendly relations, and to act with kindness and liberality in all our transactions. Equally proper is it to persevere in our efforts to extend to them the advantages of civilization.

"The great amount of our revenue, and the flourishing state of the treasury, are a full proof of the competency of the national resources for any emergency, as they are, of the willingness of our fellow-citizens to bear the burdens which the public necessities require. The vast amount of vacant lands, the value of which daily augments, forms an additional resource of great extent and duration. These resources, besides accomplishing every other necessary purpose, put it completely in the power of the United States to discharge the national debt at an early period. Peace is the best time for improvement and preparation of every kind ; it is in peace that our commerce flourishes most, that taxes are most easily paid, and that the revenue is most productive.

"The executive is charged officially, in the departments under it, with the disbursement of the public money, and is responsible for the faithful application of it to the purposes for which it is raised. The legislature is the watchful guard over the public purse. It is its duty to see that the disbursement has been honestly made. To meet the requisite responsibility, every facility should be afforded to the executive to enable it to bring the public agents, intrusted with the public money, strictly and promptly to account. Nothing should be presumed against them ; but if, with the requisite faculties, the public money is suffered to lie, long and uselessly, in their hands, they will not be the only defaulters, nor will the demoralizing effect be confined to them. It will evince a relaxation, and want of tone in the administration, which will be felt by the whole community. I shall do all that I can, to secure economy and fidelity in this important branch of the administration, and I doubt not, that the legislature will perform its duty with equal zeal. A thorough examination should be regularly made, and I will promote it.

"It is particularly gratifying to me, to enter on the discharge of these duties, at a time when the United States are blessed with peace. It is a state most consistent with their prosperity and happiness. It will be my sincere desire to preserve it so far as depends on the executive, on just principles with all nations, claiming nothing unreasonable of any, and rendering to each what is its due.

"Equally gratifying is it, to witness the increased harmony of opinion which pervades our union. Discord does not belong to our system. Union is recommended, as well by the free and benign principles of our government, extending its blessings to every individual, as by the other eminent advantages attending it. The American people have encountered together great dangers, and sustained severe trials with success. They constitute one great family with a common interest. Experience has enlightened us on some questions of essential importance to the country. The progress has been slow, dictated by a just reflection, and faithful regard to every interest connected with it. To promote this harmony, in accord with the principles of our republican government, and in a manner to give them the most complete effect, and to advance in all other respects the best interests of our union, will be the object of my constant and zealous exertions.

"Never did a government commence under auspices so favourable, nor ever was success so complete. If we look to the history of other nations, ancient and modern, we find no example of a growth so rapid, so gigantic; of a people so prosperous and happy. In contemplating what we have still to perform, the heart of every citizen must expand with joy when he reflects how near our government has approached to perfection; that in respect to it, we have no essential improvement to make; that the great object is to preserve it in the essential principles and features which characterize it, and, that is to be done, by preserving the virtue and enlightening the minds of the people; and as a security against foreign dangers, to adopt such arrangements as are indispensable to the support of our independence, our rights, and liberties. If we persevere in the career in which we have advanced so far, and in the path already traced, we cannot fail, by the favour of a gracious Providence, to attain the high destiny which seems to await us.

"In the administration of the illustrious men who have preceded me in this high station, with some of whom I have been connected by the closest ties from early life, examples are presented, which will always be found highly instructive, and useful to their successors. From these I shall endeavour to derive all the advantages which they may afford. Of my immediate predecessor, under whom so important a portion of this great and successful experiment has been made, I shall be pardoned for expressing my earnest wishes that he may long enjoy, in his retirement, the affections of a grateful country, the best reward of exalted talents, and the most faithful and meritorious services. Relying on the aid to be derived from the other departments of the government, I enter on the trust to which I have been called by the suffrages of my fellow-citizens, with my fervent prayers to the Almighty, that He will be graciously pleased to continue to us that protection, which He has already so conspicuously displayed in our favour."

During this year the republic received another accession by the erection of the territory of Mississippi into a state, and its admission into the union. By the act of admission it is provided, that the public lands, while belonging to the United States, and for five years from the day of sale, shall be exempted from all taxes; that lands belonging to the citizens of the United States residing without the state, shall never be taxed higher than lands belonging to persons residing within the state; and that the river Mississippi, and the navigable rivers and waters leading into it, or into the gulf of Mexico, shall be common highways, and for ever free of toll or duty to all the citizens of the United States. In return for this concession, congress provided, that, after paying a debt to Georgia and indemnifying certain claimants, five per cent. of the net proceeds of the public lands, lying within the state, shall be devoted to the making of roads and canals for the benefit of the state.

In the summer of this year an expedition was undertaken against East Florida by persons claiming to act under the authority of some of the revolted Spanish colonies. The leader of this expedition styled himself "Citizen Gregor M'Gregor, brigadier-general of the armies of the united provinces of New Grenada and Venezuela, and general in chief, employed to liberate the provinces of both the Floridas, commissioned by the supreme governments of Mexico and South America." The persons that combined for this purpose took possession of Amelia Island, at the mouth of St. Mary's River, near the boundary of the state of Georgia. The president, apprised of this transaction, ordered an expedition, consisting of naval and land forces, to repel the invaders, and to occupy the island. A squadron, under the command of J. D. Henley, with troops under the command of James Banhead, arrived off Amelia Island on the 22d of December, and the next day took possession of it, hoisting the American flag at Fernandina. The president, in a message to congress relative to the capture, observed, "In expelling these adventurers from these posts, it was not intended to make any conquest from Spain, or to injure, in any degree, the cause of the colonies." The real reason of the measure seems to have been, that the invasion interfered with endeavours which were then making on the part of the United States to obtain the cession of the Floridas from the Spaniards.

In the following year the union received the accession of another state, that of Illinois. At the time of its admission, the government of the United States granted to the state one section or thirty-sixth part of every township for the support of schools, and three per cent. of the net proceeds of the United States lands lying within the state for the encouragement of learning, of which one sixth part must be exclusively bestowed on a college or university. The constitution happily provides, that no more slaves shall be introduced into the state. In 1819 the Alabama territory was admitted as a state into the union; and the Arkansaw territory was, by an act of congress, erected into a territorial government. In the following year the district of Maine was separated from Massachusetts, formed into a distinct state, and admitted into the union.

During this year the American congress did themselves honour by providing more effectually against carrying on the slave trade. The enactment declared, that if any citizen of the United States, being of the ship's company of any foreign ship or vessel engaged in the slave trade, or any person whatever being of the crew or ship's company of any ship or vessel owned by, or navigated for, any citizens of the United States, shall on foreign shore seize any negro or mulatto, not held to service or labour by the laws either of the states or territories of the United States, with intent to make him a slave, or shall decoy or forcibly bring or receive him on board with such intent, he shall be adjudged a pirate, and on conviction shall suffer death.

A treaty for the cession of the Floridas was concluded at Washington, February 22, 1819, between Spain and the United States. In the year 1821 it was reluctantly ratified by the king of Spain, and possession was taken of those provinces according to the terms of the treaty. On the 1st of July, General Jackson, who had been appointed governor of the Floridas, issued a proclamation, declaring "that the government heretofore exercised over the said provinces under the authority of Spain has ceased, and that that of the United States of America is established over the same; that the inhabitants thereof will be incorporated in the union of the United States, as soon as may be consistent with the principles of the federal constitution, and admitted to the enjoyment of all the privileges, rights, and immunities of the citizens of the United States; that in the mean time they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion they profess; that all laws and municipal regulations which were in existence at the cessation of the late government remain in full force, and all civil officers charged with their execution," with certain exceptions and limitations, "are continued in their functions." On the 7th of July, the colonel commandant, Don Jose Gallava, commissioner on the part of his Catholic majesty, made to Major-General Jackson, the commissioner of the United States, a delivery of the keys of the town of Pensacola, of the archives, documents, and other articles, mentioned in the inventories, declaring that he releases from their oath of allegiance to Spain the citizens and inhabitants of West Florida who may choose to remain under the dominion of the United States. On the same day, Colonel Joseph Cop-pinger, governor of East Florida, issued a proclamation to the inhabitants, announcing that, on the 10th day of this month, "possession will be given to Colonel Robert Butler, the commissioner legally authorized by the United States." The American authorities were accordingly put in possession of the Floridas.

During this year Missouri was admitted as a state into the union, forming the eleventh state added to the thirteen confederated states which signed the declaration of independence, making the present number of the United States twenty-four. The proposition for the admission of this state, which was brought forward in the session of 1819, produced vehement discussion in the congress, and excited an intense interest throughout the whole union. The inhabitants of Missouri, the territory having been considered as a part of Louisiana, had derived from their connexion with the Spaniards and French the custom, which they deemed equivalent to the right, of possessing slaves; it was proposed, however, in admitting the territory to the privileges of a state, to prevent the increase and to insure the ultimate abolition of slavery, by the insertion of the following clause:—"Provided, that the further introduction of slavery or involuntary servitude be prohibited, except for the punishment of crimes whereof the party shall have been duly convicted; and that all the children born within the said state after the admission thereof into the Union shall be free at the age of twenty-five years." Judging from the previous views and measures of the general government, in similar and analogous cases, it could hardly have been conjectured, that the result of proposing such a limited and qualified restriction would be doubtful. The house of representatives, after a short but animated debate, refused to pass the bill without the restriction; but the senate refused to pass the bill with it; consequently the bill itself was lost, and Missouri still continued under her former territorial government. Such was the rapidity with which the several proceedings passed in the two houses of congress, that it was scarcely known beyond its walls that such a question was agitated, before it was decided. When, however, it came to be generally known what principles had been advanced, what votes had been given, with what ardour and vehemence the advocates of slavery had urged their demands, not merely upon the justice, the reason, and good sense of congress, but upon their interests, their prejudices, and their fears, by how slender a majority a measure had been checked, which, in the estimation of many of the best friends of American liberty, would have been productive of incalculable and interminable mischiefs, it excited a feeling of universal surprise and alarm. It is instructive to observe that many of the staunch advocates of liberal ideas, who delighted in appropriating to themselves exclusively the name of republicans, suffered their jealousy of the interference of the congress in the internal government of an individual state, to engage them on the side of the perpetuators of slavery. Jefferson, who prided himself in being the devoted friend of liberty, thus expresses himself: "The real question, as seen in the states afflicted with this unfortunate population, is, are our slaves to be presented with freedom and a dagger? For, if congress has the power to regulate the conditions of the inhabitants of the states within the states, it will be but another exercise of that power to declare that all shall be free. Are we then to see again Athenian and Lacedemonian confederacies?—to wage another Peloponnesian war to settle the ascendancy between them? Or is this the tocsin of merely a servile war? That remains to be seen; but not, I hope, by you or me. Surely they will parley awhile, and give us time to get out of the way."* The consequence of this combination of the advocates of the sovereignty of individual states with those who make a traffic of the bodies of their fellow men, was the passing of the bill for the admission of Missouri in the next session of the congress, without the restricting clause; a circumstance which occasioned the deep regret and mortification of most of the inhabitants of the northern states, and excited feelings which it has been feared by many may ultimately lead to a dissolution of the union.†

No circumstances of particular interest in the transactions of the general government occurred till the year 1824, when articles of a convention between the United States of America and Great Britain for the suppression of the African slave trade, were subscribed at London by plenipotentiaries appointed for that purpose. By the first article, the commanders and commissioned officers of each of the two high contracting parties, duly authorized by their respective governments to cruise on the coast of Africa, America, and the West Indies, for the suppression of the slave trade, are empowered, under certain restrictions, to detain, examine, capture, and deliver over for trial and adjudication by some competent tribunal, any ship or vessel concerned in the illicit traffic of slaves; and carrying the flag of the other.

In the spring of this year a convention was also concluded between the United States of America and the emperor of Russia. By the third article of this convention it was agreed, "that, hereafter, there shall not be formed by the citizens of the United States, or under the authority of the said States, any establishment upon the northern [north-west] coast of America, nor in any of the islands adjacent, to the north of fifty-four degrees and forty minutes of north latitude; and that, in the same manner, there shall be none formed by Russian subjects, or under the authority of Russia, south of the same parallel."

This year is signalized in American history by the visit of the venerable La Fayette, on the express invitation of congress. He arrived in the harbour of New York on the 13th of August, and proceeded to the residence of the vice-president at Staten Island. A committee of the corporation of the city of New York, and a great number of distinguished citizens, proceeded to Staten Island to welcome him to their capital. A splendid escort of steamboats, decorated with the flags of every nation, and bearing thousands of citizens, brought him to the view of assembled multitudes at New York, who manifested their joy at beholding him, by acclamations, and by tears. At the city hall the officers of the city and many citizens were presented to him; and he was welcomed by an address from the mayor. While he was at New York, deputations from Philadelphia, Baltimore, New Haven, and from many other cities, arrived with invitations for him to visit them. After remaining a few days at New York, he proceeded to Boston, where he met with the same cordial reception. The general soon after returned to New York, visited Albany and the town's on Hudson River, and afterwards passed through the intermediate states to Virginia. He returned to Washington during the session of congress, and remained there several weeks. Congress voted him the sum of two hundred thousand dollars, and a township of land, as a remuneration, in part, of his services during the war of the revolution, and as a testimony of their gratitude.

General Lafayette was present at the imposing ceremony of laying the corner stone of the Bunker Hill Monument, on the 17th of June, 1825, to which † "The coincidence of a marked principle, moral and political, with a geographical line, once conceived, I feared would never more be obliterated from the mind; that it would be recurring on every occasion, and renewing irritations, until it would kindle such mutual and mortal hatred, as to render separation preferable to eternal discord. I have been among the most sanguine in believing that our union would be of long duration. I now doubt it much, and see the event at no great distance, and the direct consequence of this question; not by the line which has been so confidently counted on; the laws of nature control this; but by the Potomac, Ohio, and Missouri, or, more probably, the Mississippi upwards to our northern boundary."—Jefferson's Memoirs, vol. iv. p. 331.

he had been invited by the Association formed for the purpose of erecting a memorial to those which fell in the battle of June 17, 1775.*

* The sun rose clear, on the fiftieth anniversary of Bunker's Hill; and thousands of voices, joined with the cheerful sound of bells and the roar of artillery, saluted him with their patriotic shouts. At seven A. M. passing through this crowd, which was excited by glorious recollections of the 17th of June, 1775, General Lafayette proceeded to the grand lodge of Massachusetts, where deputations from the grand lodges of Maine, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Connecticut, Vermont, and New Jersey, were assembled, with the officers of the chapter of the Knights Templars, to receive and compliment him.

At ten o'clock, 2,000 Free-masons, sixteen companies of volunteer infantry, a corps of mounted militia, with the different corporations, and the civil and military authorities, proceeded to the state-house, where the procession was formed under the inspection of Gen. Lyman; while the Grand Masters of the Masonic order went for Gen. Lafayette, who had returned to the house of Mr. Lloyd, on leaving the lodge.

At half past ten the procession began to move: it consisted of about 7,000 persons; two hundred officers and soldiers of the revolution marched in front, and forty veterans, glorious relics of the battle of Bunker's Hill, followed them in eight open carriages. They were decorated with a broad ribbon, on which was this inscription:—"17th June, 1775." Some of them had on their shoulders the cartridge-belts they had worn on that memorable day; and one of them, who had been a drummer, still bore the drum with which he had several times rallied the American battalions, when broken by the English columns. Behind them marched a long line of persons formed of the numerous subscribers to the monument, six abreast; and 2,000 Masons, clad in rich ornaments, and bearing the instruments and symbols of their order. Last came Gen. Lafayette, in an elegant carriage, drawn by six beautiful white horses. Next behind him followed a long line of coaches, in which were his son, his secretary, the governor of Massachusetts and his staff; finally, a great number of persons of distinction, natives and strangers. This column proceeded, with the sound of music and ringing of bells, through the midst of 200,000 citizens, who had assembled from all the states of the union; while the general was at intervals saluted by artillery and general acclamations. He arrived at Bunker's Hill at half past twelve, and the whole crowd was soon ranged in regular order on the hill, where the monument was to be erected, to witness the national gratitude expressed to the first heroes of the revolution.

The humble pyramid erected in former times, over the remains of Warren and his companions, which we had seen on our first visit to Bunker's Hill, had disappeared. From the largest piece of wood it contained, a cane had been formed, which was mounted with gold, and bore an inscription referring to its origin, and stating, that it had been presented by the Masons of Charlestown to Gen. Lafayette, who accepted it as a precious relic of the American revolution. A large excavation which had been made at that place, showed that the new monument was to be raised on the same spot.

A few moments after we had taken our places around that excavation, and silence had been obtained throughout the numerous crowd that surrounded, awaiting the ceremony in solemn silence, the Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts, accompanied by the principal dignitaries of the order, Brother Lafayette, Mr. Webster, and the principal architect, proceeded to lay the first stone of the monument, with the forms prescribed by the Masonic order. In an iron chest were placed medals, pieces of money, and a silver plate, on which was engraved the order of ceremonies. This box was placed under the stone, on which the Grand Master poured wheat, oil, and wine; while the Rev. Mr. Allen, the chaplain of the day, pronounced the benediction. The Masonic command to finish the monument was then given, and a salute of artillery announced that this part of the ceremony was accomplished.

The procession then moved to a vast amphitheatre, formed on the northeastern declivity of the hill. At the centre of its base was raised a covered platform, from which the orator of the day was to raise his voice, and address an audience of 15,000 persons, assembled in the amphitheatre. All the revolutionary officers and soldiers, several of whom had come from great distances to witness this solemnity, were seated opposite the stage, the survivors of Bunker's Hill forming a little group in their front. At the head of that party was placed, in a large chair, the only surviving general of the revolution, Lafayette. Immediately behind were 2,000 ladies, brilliantly dressed, who seemed to form a guard of honour for those venerable old men, and to protect them from the tumultuous throng of the crowd. Beyond the ladies, more than 10,000 persons were seated on the numerous benches which were placed on the side of the hill, the top of which was crowned by upwards of 30,000 spectators, who, although beyond the reach of the orator's voice, stood motionless, and in the most profound silence. After the agitation which necessarily accompanies the movements of so large a crowd, had been tranquillized, the melodious sound of a large choir of singers was heard, who were concealed behind the stage, and raised a patriotic and religious song, the deep melody of which agreeably prepared the minds of all for the impressions of eloquence. This music was succeeded by a prayer from Dr. Thaxter; and when the venerable pastor, who had had the honour of fighting at Bunker's Hill, presented himself before the assembly, with his white locks falling in long silver curls on his shoulders; when he raised towards heaven his hands enfeebled by age, and with a voice still strong, implored the benedictions of the Almighty on the proceedings of that day, the whole audience seemed penetrated with inexpressible emotions. At length the orator of the day, Mr. Webster, presented himself in his turn; his tall stature, his athletic form, the noble expression of his countenance, and the fire of his eye, perfectly harmonized with the solemnity of the scene. Mr. Webster, who had been for a long time rendered popular by the charms of his eloquence, was welcomed by the assembly with every expression of pleasure. The murmur of satisfaction with which he was saluted, ascended from the base of the hill to the summit, and prevented him for a few instants from beginning his discourse.

During his discourse, the orator was sometimes interrupted by bursts of applause from the audience, who could not repress the expression of their sympathetic feelings, when Mr. Webster addressed the revolutionary veterans, and Gen. Lafayette; and while they, uncovering their venerable heads, arose to receive the thanks which were offered them in the name of the people. A hymn, sung in choir by the whole assembly, succeeded this speech, and terminated the second part of the ceremony.

At the signal given by a field piece, the procession formed anew, mounted the hill, and went to seat themselves at a banquet prepared on the summit. There, under an immense wooden covering, 4,000 persons took their places without confusion. The tables were spread with so much art, that the voice of the president, and all those who offered toasts, or made speeches, were easily heard, not only by the company, but also by a great number of spectators stationed without. The names of Warren, the orator of the day, and the guest of the nation, were proposed by turns during the repast. Before leaving the table, the general rose to return thanks to the members of the monument association, and expressed himself in these terms:

"I will now ask your attention, only to thank you in the name of my revolutionary companions in arms, as well as in my own name, gentlemen, for the testimonies of esteem and affection, I may say filial affection, with which we have been this day loaded. We offer you our best wishes for the preservation of republican liberty and equality, self-government, and happy union between the states of the confederation: objects for which we fought and bled,—for it is on them that the hopes of mankind now rest. Permit me to give you the following toast: 'Bunker's Hill, and the Holy Resistance to oppression, which has freed the American hemisphere;—the anniversary toast at the jubilee of the next half century shall be:—Europe Disenthralled.' This toast was received with transport; and immediately after the company returned to the city.—Levasseur's Journal.

Mr. Adams delivered the following address to both houses of congress :

"In compliance with a usage, coeval with the existence of our federal constitution, and sanctioned by the example of my predecessors, in the career upon which I am about to enter, I appear, my fellow-citizens, in your presence, and in that of heaven, to bind myself by the solemnity of religious obligation, to the faithful performance of the duties allotted to me in the station to which I have been called.

"In unfolding to my countrymen the principles by which I shall be governed, in the fulfilment of those duties, my first resort will be to that constitution, which I shall swear, to the best of my ability, to preserve, protect, and defend. That revered instrument enumerates the powers and prescribes the duties of the executive magistrate; and, in its first words, declares the purposes to which these, and the whole action of the government, instituted by it, should be invariably and sacredly devoted: to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to the people of this union, in their successive generations. Since the adoption of this social compact, one of these generations has passed away. It is the work of our forefathers. Administered by some of its most eminent men, who contributed to its formation, through a most eventful period in the annals of the world, and through all the vicissitudes of peace and war, incidental to the condition of associated man, it has not disappointed the hopes and aspirations of those illustrious benefactors of their age and nation. It has promoted the lasting welfare of that country so dear to us all; it has, to an extent far beyond the ordinary lot of humanity, secured the freedom and happiness of this people. We now receive it as a precious inheritance from those to whom we are indebted for its establishment, doubly bound by the examples which they have left us, and by the blessings which we have enjoyed, as the fruits of their labours, to transmit the same, unimpaired, to the succeeding generation.

"In the compass of thirty-six years since this great national covenant was instituted, a body of laws, enacted under its authority, and in conformity with its provisions, has unfolded its powers, and carried into practical operation its effective energies. Subordinate departments have distributed the executive functions in their various relations to foreign affairs, to the revenue and expenditures, and to the military force of the union, by land and sea. A co-ordinate department of the judiciary has expounded the constitution and the laws; settling, in harmonious coincidence with the legislative will, numerous weighty questions of construction, which the imperfection of human language had rendered unavoidable. The year of jubilee, since the first formation of our union, has just elapsed; that of the declaration of our independence, is at hand. The consummation of both was effected by this constitution.

"Since that period, a population of four millions has multiplied to twelve; a territory bounded by the Mississippi, has been extended from sea to sea; new states have been admitted to the union, in numbers equal to those of the first confederation; treaties of peace, amity, and commerce, have been concluded with the principal dominions of the earth; the people of other nations, inhabitants of regions acquired, not by conquest, but by compact, have been united with us in the participation of our rights and duties, of our burdens and blessings; the forest has fallen by the axe of our woodsmen; the soil has been made to teem by the tillage of our farmers; our commerce has whitened every ocean; the dominion of every man over physical nature has been extended by the invention of our artists; liberty and law have marched hand in hand; all the purposes of human association have been accomplished as effectively as under any other government on the globe; and at a cost little exceeding, in a whole generation, the expenditure of other nations in a single year.

"Such is the unexaggerated picture of our condition, under a constitution founded upon the republican principle of equal rights. To admit that this picture has its shades, is but to say, that it is still the condition of men upon earth. From evil, physical, moral and political, it is not our claim to be exempt. We have suffered, sometimes by the visitation of heaven, through disease; often, by the wrongs and injustice of other nations, even to the extremities of war; and lastly, by dissensions among ourselves—dissensions, perhaps, inseparable from the enjoyment of freedom, but which have, more than once, appeared to threaten the dissolution of the union, and, with it, the overthrow of all the enjoyments of our present lot, and all our earthly hopes of the future. The causes of these dissensions have been various; founded upon differences of speculation in the theory of republican government; upon conflicting views of policy, in our relations with foreign nations; upon jealousies of partial and sectional interests, aggravated by prejudices and prepossessions which strangers to each other are ever apt to entertain.

"It is a source of gratification and of encouragement to me, to observe that the great result of this experiment, upon the theory of human rights, has, at the close of that generation by which it was formed, been crowned with success, equal to the most sanguine expectations of its founders. Union, justice, tranquillity, the common defence, the general welfare, and the blessings of liberty, all have been promoted by the government under which we have lived. Standing at this point of time; looking back to that generation which has gone by, and forward to that which is advancing, we may, at once, indulge in grateful exultation, and in cheering hope. From the experience of the past, we derive instructive lessons for the future. Of the two great political parties which have divided the opinions and feelings of our country, the candid and the just will now admit, that both have contributed splendid talents, spotless integrity, ardent patriotism, and disinterested sacrifices, to the formation and administration of this government; and that both have required a liberal indulgence for a portion of human infirmity and error. The revolutionary wars of Europe, commencing precisely at the moment when the government of the United States first went into operation under this constitution, excited a collision of sentiments and of sympathies which kindled all the passions, and embittered the conflict of parties, till the nation was involved in war, and the union was shaken to its centre.

"This time of trial embraced a period of five and twenty years, during which, the policy of the union in its relations with Europe, constituted the principal basis of our political divisions, and the most arduous part of the action of our federal government. With the catastrophe in which the wars of the French revolution terminated, and our own subsequent peace with Great Britain, this baneful weed of party strife was uprooted. From that time, no difference of principle, connected either with the theory of government, or with our intercourse with foreign nations, has existed or been called forth, in force sufficient to sustain a continued combination of parties, or to give more than wholesome animation to the public sentiment or legislative debate. Our political creed is, without a dissenting voice that can be heard, that the will of the people is the source, and the happiness of the people the end, of all legitimate government upon earth—that the best security for the beneficence and the best guarantee against the abuse of power, consists in the freedom, the purity, and the frequency of popular elections—that the general government of the union, and the separate governments of the states, are all sovereignties of limited powers; fellow-servants of the same masters; uncontrolled within their respective spheres; uncontrollable but by encroachments upon each other—that the firmest security of peace is the preparation, during peace, of the defences of war—that a rigorous economy and accountability of public expenditures, should guard against the aggravation, and alleviate, when possible, the burden of taxation—that the military should be kept in strict subordination to the civil power—that the freedom of the press and of religious opinion should be inviolate—that the policy of our country is peace, and the ark of our salvation, union, are articles of faith upon which we are all now agreed. If there have been those who doubted whether a confederated representative democracy were a government competent to the wise and orderly management of the common concerns of a mighty nation, those doubts have been dispelled. If there have been projects of partial confederacies to be erected on the ruins of the union, they have been scattered to the winds: if there have been dangerous attachments to one foreign nation and antipathies against another, they have been extinguished. Ten years of peace, at home and abroad, have assuaged the animosities of political contention, and blended into harmony the most discordant elements of public opinion. There still remains one effort of magnanimity, one sacrifice of prejudice and passion, to be made by the individuals throughout the nation, who have heretofore followed the standards of political party. It is that of discarding every remnant of rancour against each other; of embracing, as countrymen and friends, and of yielding to talents and virtue alone, that confidence which, in times of contention for principle, was bestowed only upon those who wore the badge of party communion.

"The collisions of party spirit, which originated in speculative opinions, or in different views of administrative policy, are, in their nature, transitory. Those which are founded on geographical divisions, adverse interests of soil, climate, and modes of domestic life, are more permanent, and therefore perhaps more dangerous. It is this which gives inestimable value to the character of our government, at once federal and national. It holds out to us a perpetual admonition to preserve alike, and with equal anxiety, the rights of each individual state in its own government, and the rights of the whole nation in that of the union. Whatsoever is of domestic concernment, unconnected with the other members of the union, or with foreign lands, belongs exclusively to the administration of the state governments. Whatsoever directly involves the rights and interests of the federative fraternity, or of foreign powers, is of the resort of this general government. The duties of both are obvious in the general principle, though sometimes perplexed with difficulties in the detail. To respect the rights of the state governments, is the inviolable duty of that of the union; the government of every state will feel its own obligation to respect and preserve the rights of the whole. The prejudices, every where too commonly entertained against distant strangers, are worn away, and the jealousies of jarring interests are allayed by the composition and functions of the great national councils, annually assembled from all quarters of the union at this place. Here the distinguished men from every section of our country, while meeting to deliberate upon the great interests of those by whom they are deputed, learn to estimate the talents, and do justice to the virtues of each other. The harmony of the nation is promoted, and the whole union is knit together, by the sentiments of mutual respect, the habits of social intercourse, and the ties of personal friendship, formed between the representatives of its several parts, in the performance of their service at this metropolis.

"Passing from this general review of the purpose and injunctions of the federal constitution and their results, as indicating the first traces of the path of duty in the discharge of my public trust, I turn to the administration of my immediate predecessor, as the second. It has passed away in a period of profound peace; how much to the satisfaction of our country, and to the honour of our country's name, is known to you all. The great features of its policy, in general concurrence with the will of the legislature, have been—to cherish peace, while preparing for defensive war; to yield exact justice to other nations, and maintain the rights of our own; to cherish the principles of freedom and of equal rights, wherever they were proclaimed; to discharge, with all possible promptitude, the national debt; to reduce, within the narrowest limits of efficiency, the military force; to improve the organization and discipline of the army; to provide and sustain a school of military science; to extend equal protection to all the great interests of the nation; to promote the civilization of the Indian tribes; and to proceed in the great system of internal improvements, within the limits of the constitutional power of the union. Under the pledge of these promises, made by that eminent citizen, at the time of his first induction into this office, in his career of eight years, the internal taxes have been repealed; sixty millions of the public debt have been discharged; provision has been made for the comfort and relief of the aged and indigent among the surviving warriors of the revolution; the regular armed force has been reduced, and its constitution revised and perfected; the accountability for the expenditure of public moneys has been made more effective; the Floridas have been peaceably acquired, and our boundary has been extended to the Pacific ocean; the independence of the southern nations of this hemisphere has been recognised and recommended by example and by counsel, to the potentates of Europe; progress has been made in the defence of the country, by fortifications, and the increase of the navy towards the effectual suppression of the African traffic in slaves; in alluring the aboriginal hunters of our land to the cultivation of the soil and of the mind; in exploring the interior regions of the union: and in preparing, by scientific researches and surveys, for the further application of our national resources to the internal improvement of our country.

"In this brief outline of the promise and performance of my immediate predecessor, the line of duty, for his successor, is clearly delineated. To pursue, to their consummation, those purposes of improvement in our common condition, instituted or recommended by him, will embrace the whole sphere of my obligations. To the topic of internal improvement, emphatically urged by him at his inauguration, I recur with peculiar satisfaction. It is that from which I am convinced that the unborn millions of our posterity, who are, in future ages, to people this continent, will derive their most fervent gratitude to the founders of the union; that, in which the beneficent action of its government will be most deeply felt and acknowledged. The magnificence and splendour of their public works are among the imperishable glories of the ancient republics. The roads and aqueducts of Rome have been the admiration of all after ages, and have survived thousands of years, after all her conquests have been swallowed up in despotism, or become the spoil of barbarians. Some diversity of opinion has prevailed with regard to the powers of congress for legislation upon objects of this nature. The most respectful deference is due to doubts originating in pure patriotism, and sustained by venerated authority. But nearly twenty years have passed since the construction of the first national road was commenced. The authority for its construction was then unquestioned. To how many thousands of our countrymen has it proved a benefit? To what single individual has it ever proved an injury? Repeated liberal and candid discussions in the legislature have conciliated the sentiments, and proximated the opinions of enlightened minds, upon the question of constitutional power. I cannot but hope, that by the same process of friendly, patient, and persevering deliberation, all constitutional objections will ultimately be removed. The extent and limitation of the powers of the general government, in relation to this transcendently important interest, will be settled and acknowledged, to the common satisfaction of all, and every speculative scruple will be solved by a practical public blessing.

"Fellow-citizens, you are acquainted with the peculiar circumstances of the recent election, which have resulted in affording me the opportunity of addressing you, at this time. You have heard the exposition of the principles which will direct me in the fulfilment of the high and solemn trust imposed upon me in this station. Less possessed of your confidence in advance, than any of my predecessors, I am deeply conscious of the prospect that I shall stand, more and oftener, in need of your indulgence. Intentions, upright and pure; a heart devoted to the welfare of our country, and the unceasing application of all the faculties allotted to me, to her service, are all the pledges that I can give, for the faithful performance of the arduous duties I am to undertake. To the guidance of the legislative councils; to the assistance of the executive and subordinate departments; to the friendly co-operation of the respective state governments; to the candid and liberal support of the people, so far as it may be deserved by honest industry and zeal, I shall look for whatever success may attend my public service: and knowing, that, except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain; with fervent supplications for his favour, to his overruling Providence I commit, with humble but fearless confidence, my own fate, and the future destinies of my country."

In August, 1826, Lafayette repaired to Washington, to take leave of the president, and his last look of the land through which he had passed as a laurelled victor, receiving the homage of nations. His was the homage of the heart; the offerings he received was the gratitude of an enlightened people. "The last three weeks which he spent in the United States, was exceedingly well appropriated; and, no doubt, after much reflection, by him—for he is a man not more remarkable for the purity of his motives, than an observance of every right rule of conduct, a deviation from which might lead to a suspicion of any of them. This induced him, after witnessing the magnificent ceremony at Boston, on the anniversary of the battle of Bunker's Hill, leisurely to return to the city of Washington, (visiting many of his personal friends in the way, and reviewing the battle field at Brandywine,) that his last moments might be given up to a brief residence in what must be metaphorically regarded as the heart of the nation, being the seat of its government, where the chief agents of millions of their fellow-citizens are gathered together, to execute the laws, and distribute that moral force, for the preservation of harmony, which rightfully belongs to institutions based upon the self competency of a free people for the self-management of their own affairs; and it was here that Lafayette mentally looked over the whole republic—the twenty-four sovereignties which he had visited—and, with feelings which no honest man will envy, but such as every honourable one would desire to possess for himself, reflected on what he had seen, and indulged the fond hopes of what this nation, of which he was a distinguished builder, would attain, before the expiration of that period of time usually allotted to men now living; and his tender heart must have seemed to melt within him, at the remembrance of the scenes through which he had passed in the dark days of the revolution, contrasted with the triumphs of his journey through the 'land of the free.' Not the triumphs of the conqueror, before whom the enslaved bow to the dust, and by their own debasement endeavour to win the favour of the oppressor; but growing out of the best affections of the human mind, for kindnesses rendered, when a weak people most needed them, that they might become strong, and laugh the oppressor to the scorn and contempt that tyranny merits.

"From the city of Washington, the political heart of the nation, he made delightful excursions into Virginia, in which it happened that three out of all the presidents which we have had, yet reside as citizens—distinguished over their fellows only by the right of franking their letters, except in their private virtues—and this is all the distinction that the constitution allows!—no pension, no precedent, no other privilege than that of being enabled to correspond through the post-offices with their old friends and acquaintances, free of expense! He had before visited one of the lion-hearted of the revolution, the resolute and devoted president Adams; and the other ex-presidents were, the author of the declaration of independence; a soldier who spilled his blood in supporting it; and he to whom, perhaps, more than any man living, we are indebted for the present happy constitution of the United States. And in one of those excursions, he was accompanied by the present president of the republic, and met by the venerable chief justice of the United States, a fellow-soldier also. What meetings were these of the great and the good! We can entertain some idea of the sensations which they produced, but language would fail to give utterance to it, and we shall not attempt an impossibility.

"The last days of his visit were properly spent by Lafayette in the nation's house, on the invitation of its present possessor, the chief magistrate of the United States. Mr. Adams was, in his early youth, a favourite with the general, having much personal communication with him; and of his disposition and ability to represent the hospitality and feeling of the millions of free people over whose affairs he presides, there could not be a doubt. Lafayette was at home, in the national house, in the city of Washington, and in the heart of a family which had every inducement that can operate on the human mind to make him comfortable; this was his abode till the moment of his departure, to embark in the Brandywine, named in compliment to him, and peculiarly fitted for his accommodation—her 'giddy mast' bearing the stripes and the stars, her bosom to contain the person of our guest: a man of whom it may be said, 'take him all in all, we ne'er shall look upon his like again,' unless he shall again visit our shores: one that was the same, great and good, in prosperity and adversity—grateful for kind offices, forgiving of injuries, zealous to confer benefits—modest when as on the pinnacle of human glory, dignified and collected in the proud presence of kings. But I must not proceed—if, after Mr. Adams' display of eloquence and power, he, who commands words and they obey him, honestly confessed 'a want of language to give utterance to his feelings'—who among us may attempt it? I shall, therefore, proceed to notice some of the things which happened at the departure of Lafayette, with this simple remark, that if there is any American who can read, unmoved, Mr. Adams' valedictory address to him, or the reply of the general to that address, I would not possess that man's heart for his fortune, though he were a Cræsus.

"The 7th inst. was the day appointed for his departure. The civil and military authorities, and the whole people of Washington, had prepared to honour it. The banks were closed, and all business suspended; and nothing else engaged attention, except the ceremonies prescribed for the occasion.

"At about 12 o'clock, the authorities of Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria, the principal officers of the general government, civil, military, and naval, some members of congress, and other respected strangers, were assembled in the president's house to take leave of Lafayette. He entered the great hall in silence, leaning on the marshal of the district, and on the arm of one of the president's sons. Mr. Adams then, with much dignity, but with evident emotion, addressed him in the following terms:—

"General Lafayette: It has been the good fortune of many of my distinguished fellow-citizens, during the course of the year now elapsed, upon your arrival at their respective places of abode, to greet you with the welcome of the nation. The less pleasing task now devolves upon me, of bidding you, in the name of the nation, adieu.

"It were no longer seasonable, and would be superfluous, to recapitulate the remarkable incidents of your early life—incidents which associated your name, fortunes, and reputation, in imperishable connexion with the independence and history of the North American union.

"The part which you performed at that important juncture was marked with characters so peculiar, that, realizing the fairest fable of antiquity, its parallel could scarcely be found in the authentic records of human history.

"You deliberately and perseveringly preferred toil, danger, the endurance of every hardship, and the privation of every comfort, in defence of a holy cause, to inglorious ease, and the allurements of rank, affluence, and unrestrained youth, at the most splendid and fascinating court of Europe.

"That this choice was not less wise than magnanimous, the sanction of half a century, and the gratulations of unnumbered voices, all unable to express the gratitude of the heart with which your visit to this hemisphere has been welcomed, afford ample demonstration.

"When the contest of freedom, to which you had repaired as a voluntary champion, had closed, by the complete triumph of her cause in this country of your adoption, you returned to fulfil the duties of the philanthropist and patriot in the land of your nativity. There, in a consistent and undeviating career of forty years, you have maintained, through every vicissitude of alternate success and disappointment, the same glorious cause to which the first years of your active life had been devoted, the improvement of the moral and political condition of man.

"Throughout that long succession of time, the people of the United States, for whom, and with whom, you had fought the battles of liberty, have been living in the full possession of its fruits; one of the happiest among the family of nations. Spreading in population; enlarging in territory; acting and suffering according to the condition of their nature; and laying the foundations of the greatest, and we humbly hope, the most beneficent power that ever regulated the concerns of man upon earth.

"In that lapse of forty years, the generation of men with whom you co-operated in the conflict of arms, has nearly passed away. Of the general officers of the American army in that war, you alone survive. Of the sages who guided our councils ; of the warriors who met the foe in the field or upon the wave, with the exception of a few, to whom unusual length of days has been allotted by Heaven, all now sleep with their fathers. A succeeding, and even a third generation, have arisen to take their places ; and their children's children, while rising up to call them blessed, have been taught by them, as well as admonished by their own constant enjoyment of freedom, to include in every benison upon their fathers, the name of him who came from afar, with them, and in their cause, to conquer or to fall.

“The universal prevalence of these sentiments was signally manifested by a resolution of congress, representing the whole people, and all the states of this union, requesting the president of the United States to communicate to you assurances of the grateful and affectionate attachment of this government and people, and desiring that a national ship might be employed, at your convenience, for your passage to the borders of our country.

“The invitation was transmitted to you by my venerable predecessor : himself bound to you by the strongest ties of personal friendship, himself one of those whom the highest honours of his country had rewarded for blood early shed in her cause, and for a long life of devotion to her welfare. By him the services of a national ship were placed at your disposal. Your delicacy preferred a more private conveyance, and a full year has elapsed since you landed upon our shores. It were scarcely an exaggeration to say, that it has been, to the people of the union, a year of uninterrupted festivity and enjoyment, inspired by your presence. You have traversed the twenty-four states of this great confederacy : You have been received with rapture by the survivors of your earliest companions in arms : You have been hailed as a long absent parent by their children, the men and women of the present age : And a rising generation, the hope of future time, in numbers surpassing the whole population of that day when you fought at the head and by the side of their forefathers, have vied with the scanty remnants of that hour of trial, in acclamations of joy at beholding the face of him whom they feel to be the common benefactor of all. You have heard the mingled voices of the past, the present, and the future age, joining in one universal chorus of delight at your approach : and the shouts of unbidden thousands, which greeted your landing on the soil of freedom, have followed every step of your way, and still resound, like the rushing of many waters, from every corner of our land.

“You are now about to return to the country of your birth, of your ancestors, of your posterity. The executive government of the union, stimulated by the same feeling which had prompted the congress to the designation of a national ship for your accommodation in coming hither, has destined the first service of a frigate, recently launched at this metropolis, to the less welcome, but equally distinguished trust, of conveying you home. The name of the ship has added one more memorial to distant regions and to future ages, of a stream already memorable, at once in the story of your sufferings and of our independence.

“The ship is now prepared for your reception, and equipped for sea. From the moment of her departure, the prayers of millions will ascend to Heaven that her passage may be prosperous, and your return to the bosom of your family as propitious to your happiness, as your visit to this scene of your youthful glory has been to that of the American people.

“Go, then, our beloved friend—return to the land of brilliant genius, of generous sentiment, of heroic valour ; to that beautiful France, the nursing mother of the twelfth Louis, and the fourth Henry ; to the native soil of Bayard and Coligni, of Turenne and Catinat, of Fenelon and D'Aguesseau. In that illustrious catalogue of names which she claims as of her children, and with honest pride holds up to the admiration of other nations, the name of Lafayette has already for centuries been enrolled. And it shall henceforth burnish into brighter fame ; for if, in after days, a Frenchman shall be called to indicate the character of his nation by that of one individual, during the age in which we live, the blood of lofty patriotism shall mantle in his cheek, the fire of conscious virtue shall sparkle in his eye, and he shall pronounce the name of Lafayette. Yet we, too, and our children, in life and after death, shall claim you for your own. You are ours by that more than patriotic self-devotion with which you flew to the aid of our fathers at the crisis of their fate. Ours by that long series of years in which you have cherished us in your regard. Ours by that unshaken sentiment of gratitude for your services which is a precious portion of our inheritance. Ours by that tie of love, stronger than death, which has linked your name, for the endless ages of time, with the name of Washington.

“At the painful moment of parting from you, we take comfort in the thought, that wherever you may be, to the last pulsation of your heart, our country will be ever present to your affections; and a cheering consolation assures us, that we are not called to sorrow most of all, that we shall see your face no more. We shall indulge the pleasing anticipation of beholding our friend again. In the meantime, speaking in the name of the whole people of the United States, and at a loss only for language to give utterance to that feeling of attachment with which the heart of the nation beats, as the heart of one man—I bid you a reluctant and affectionate farewell.”

“Amidst all my obligations to the general government, and particularly to you, sir, its respected chief magistrate, I have most thankfully to acknowledge the opportunity given me, at this solemn and painful moment, to present the people of the United States with a parting tribute of profound, inexpressible gratitude.

“To have been, in the infant and critical days of these states, adopted by them as a favourite son, to have participated in the toils and perils of our unspotted struggle for independence, freedom, and equal rights, and in the foundation of the American era of a new social order, which has already pervaded this, and must, for the dignity and happiness of mankind, successively pervade every part of the other hemisphere, to have received at every stage of the revolution, and during forty years after that period, from the people of the United States, and their representatives at home and abroad, continual marks of their confidence and kindness, has been the pride, the encouragement, the support of a long and eventful life.

“But how could I find words to acknowledge that series of welcomes, those unbounded and universal displays of public affection, which have marked each step, each hour, of a twelve-months, progress through the twenty-four states, and which, while they overwhelm my heart with grateful delight, have most satisfactorily evinced the concurrence of the people in the kind testimonies, in the immense favours bestowed on me by the several branches of their representatives, in every part and at the central seat of the confederacy.

“Yet, gratification still higher awaited me; in the wonders of creation and improvement that have met my enchanted eye, in the unparalleled and self-felt happiness of the people, in their rapid prosperity and insured security, public and private, in a practice of good order, the appendage of true freedom, and a national good sense, the final arbiter of all difficulties, I have had proudly to recognise a result of the republican principles for which we have fought, and a glorious demonstration to the most timid and prejudiced minds, of the superiority, over degrading aristocracy or despotism, of popular institutions founded on the plain rights of man, and where the local rights of every section are preserved under a constitutional bond of union. The cherishing of that union between the states, as it has been the farewell entreaty of our great paternal Washington, and will ever have the dying prayer of every American patriot, so it has become the sacred pledge of the emancipation of the world, an object in which I am happy to observe that the American people, while they give the animating example of successful free institutions, in return for an evil entailed upon them by Europe, and of which a liberal and enlightened sense is every where more and more generally felt, show themselves every day more anxiously interested.

“And now, sir, how can I do justice to my deep and lively feelings for the assurances, most peculiarly valued, of your esteem and friendship, for your so very kind references to old times, to my beloved associates, to the vicissitudes of my life, for your affecting picture of the blessings poured by the several generations of the American people on the remaining days of a delighted veteran, for your affectionate remarks on this sad hour of separation, on the country of my birth, full, I can say, of American sympathies, on the hope so necessary to me of my seeing again the country that has deigned, near half a century ago, to call me hers? I shall content myself, refraining from superfluous repetitions, at once, before you, sir, and this respected circle, to proclaim my cordial confirmation of every one of the sentiments which I have had daily opportunities publicly to utter, from the time when your venerable predecessor, my old brother in arms and friend, transmitted to me the honourable invitation of congress, to this day, when you, my dear sir, whose friendly connexion with me dates from your earliest youth, are going to consign me to the protection, across the Atlantic, of the heroic national flag, on board the splendid ship, the name of which has been not the least flattering and kind among the numberless favours conferred upon me.

“God bless you, sir, and all who surround us. God bless the American people, each of their states, and the federal government. Accept this patriotic farewell of an overflowing heart; such will be its last throb when it ceases to beat.”

"As the last sentence was pronounced, the general advanced, and, while the tears poured over his venerable cheek, again took the President in his arms—he retired a few paces, but overcome by his feelings again returned, and uttering in broken accents, 'God bless you!' fell once more on the neck of Mr. Adams. It was a scene, at once solemn and moving, as the sighs and stealing tears of many, who witnessed it, bore testimony. Having recovered his self-possession, the general stretched out his hands, and was, in a moment, surrounded by the greetings of the whole assembly, who pressed upon him, each eager to seize, perhaps for the last time, that beloved hand which was opened so freely for our aid, when aid was so precious, and which grasped, with firm and undeviating hold, the steel which so bravely helped to achieve our deliverance. The expression which now beamed from the face of this exalted man was of the finest and most touching kind. The hero was lost in the father and the friend: dignity melted into subdued affection, and the friend of Washington seemed to linger with a mournful delight among the sons of his adopted country. A considerable period was then occupied in conversing with various individuals, while refreshments were presented to the company. The moment of departure at length arrived, and, having once more pressed the hand of Mr. Adams, he entered the barouche, accompanied by the secretaries of state, of the treasury, and of the navy.

"The parting being over, the carriage of the general, preceded by the cavalry, the marine corps, and Captain Edwards' rifle corps, and followed by the carriages containing the corporate authorities of the cities of the district, and numerous military and high civil officers of the government, moved forward, followed by the remaining military companies. In taking up the escort, the whole column moved through the court, in front of the president's mansion, and paid him the passing salute, as he stood in front to receive it. The whole scene—the peals of artillery, the animating sounds of numerous military bands, the presence of the vast concourse of people, and the occasion that assembled them, altogether produced emotions, not easily described, but which every American will readily conceive.

"On reaching the bank of the Potomac, near where the Mount Vernon steam vessel was in waiting, all the carriages in the procession, except the general's, wheeled off, and the citizens in them assembled on foot around that of the general. The whole military body then passed him in review, as he stood in the barouche of the president, attended by the secretaries of state, of the treasury, and of the navy. After the review, the general proceeded to the steam vessel under a salute of artillery, surrounded by as many citizens, all eager to catch the last look, as could press on the large wharf; and, at four o'clock, this great, and good, and extraordinary man, trod, for the last time, the soil of America, followed by the blessings of every patriotic heart that lives on it.

"As the vessel moved off, and for a short time after, the deepest silence was observed by the whole of the vast multitude that lined the shore. The feelings that pervaded them was that of children bidding a final farewell to a venerated parent. The whole remained gazing after the retiring vessel, until she had passed Greenleaf's Point, where another salute repeated the valedictory sounds of respect, and these again were, not long after, echoed by the heavy guns of Fort Washington, and reminded us of the rapidity with which this benefactor and friend of our country was borne from it.

"The general was accompanied to the Brandywine by the secretary of the navy, the mayors of the three cities of the district, the commander-in-chief of the army, the generals of the militia of the district, Commodore Bainbridge, and several other gentlemen."

The transactions between the United States and the Indian tribes have occasioned considerable discussion among the philanthropists of both the new and the old world; we shall, therefore, notice the treaties which were formed somewhat particularly. In February, a treaty was concluded with the Creek nation of Indians. The commissioners on the part of the United States represented to the Creeks, that it is the policy and wish of the general government, that the several Indian tribes within the limits of any of the states of the union, should remove to territory to be designated on the west side of the Mississippi river, as well for the better protection and security of the said tribes, and their improvement in civilization, as for the purpose of enabling the United States, in this instance, to comply with a compact entered into with the state of Georgia, on the 24th of April, 1802. The chiefs of the Creek towns assented to the reasonableness of the proposition, and expressed a willingness to migrate beyond the Mississippi, those of Tokaubatchee excepted. The Creeks accordingly, by the first article of the treaty, ceded to the United States all the lands within the boundaries of the state of Georgia now occupied by them, or to which they have title or claim, lying within certain described boundaries; and by the second it was agreed, that the United States will give in exchange for the lands hereby acquired the like quantity, acre for acre, westward of the Mississippi, on the Arkansas river. . . Other stipulations favourable to the equitable claims of the emigrating parties were made; particularly that a deputation may be sent to explore the territory herein offered them in exchange; and if the same be not acceptable to them, then they may select any other territory west of the Mississippi, on Red, Canadian, Arkansas, or Missouri rivers, the territory occupied by the Cherokees and Choctaws excepted; and if the territory to be selected shall be in the occupancy of other Indian tribes, then the United States will extinguish the title of such occupants for the benefit of the said emigrants.

The Kansas Indians, by treaty, ceded to the United States all their lands both within and without the limits of Missouri, excepting a reservation beyond that state on the Kansas river, about thirty miles square, including their villages. In consideration of this cession, the United States agreed to pay three thousand five hundred dollars a year for twenty years; to furnish the Kansas immediately with three hundred head of cattle, three hundred hogs, five hundred fowls, three yoke of oxen, and two carts, and with such farming utensils as the Indian superintendent may deem necessary; to provide and support a blacksmith for them; and to employ persons to aid and instruct them in their agricultural pursuits, as the president may deem expedient. Of the ceded lands, thirty-six sections on the Big Blue river were to be laid out under the direction of the president, and sold for the support of schools among the Kansas. Reservations were also made for the benefit of certain half-breeds; and other stipulations mutually satisfactory. It was also agreed, that no private revenge shall be taken by the Indians for the violation of their rights; but that they shall make their complaint to the superintendent or other agent, and receive justice in a due course of law; and it was lastly agreed, that the Kansas nation shall never dispose of their lands without the consent of the United States, and that the United States shall always have the free right of navigation in the waters of the Kansas.

A treaty was also concluded with the Great and Little Osages, at St. Louis, Missouri. The general principles of this treaty are the same as those of the treaty with the Kansas. The Indians cede all their lands in Arkansas and elsewhere, and then reserve a defined territory, west of the Missouri line, fifty miles square; an agent to be permitted to reside on the reservation, and the United States to have the right of free navigation in all the waters on the tract. The United States pay an annuity of seven thousand dollars for twenty years; furnish forthwith six hundred head of cattle, six hundred hogs, one thousand fowls, ten yoke of oxen, six carts, with farming utensils, persons to teach the Indians agriculture, and a blacksmith, and build a commodious dwelling-house for each of the four principal chiefs, at his own village. Reservations were made for the establishment of a fund for the support of schools for the benefit of the Osage children; and provision was made for the benefit of the Harmony missionary establishment. The United States also assume certain debts due from certain chiefs of the tribes; and agree to deliver at the Osage villages, as soon as may be, four thousand dollars in merchandise, and two thousand six hundred in horses and their equipments.

In May, a general convention of peace, amity, navigation, and commerce, between the United States of America and the republic of Colombia, was signed by the president, at Washington.

The fiftieth anniversary, the jubilee, as it was termed, of American independence, was observed throughout the states with great enthusiasm, and was rendered additionally interesting by the remarkable circumstance that both Adams and Jefferson, eminent men among the fathers of their country, died on that day.*

Mr. Adams, in a message to congress, recommend-

* John Adams was born at Quincy, then part of the ancient town of Braintree, on the 19th day of October, (Old Style,) 1735. He was a descendant of the Puritans, his ancestors having early emigrated from England, and settled in Massachusetts. Discovering early a strong love of reading and of knowledge, together with marks of great strength and activity of mind, proper care was taken by his worthy father, to provide for his education. He pursued his youthful studies in Braintree, under Mr. Marsh, a teacher whose fortune it was that Josiah Quincy, Jr., as well as the subject of these remarks, should receive from him his instruction in the rudiments of classical literature. Having been admitted, in 1751, a member of Harvard College, Mr. Adams was graduated, in course, in 1755; and on the catalogue of that institution, his name, at the time of his death, was second among the living Alumni, being preceded only by that of the venerable Holyoke. With what degree of reputation he left the university, is not now precisely known. We know only that he was distinguished in a class which numbered Locke and Hemenway among its members. Choosing the law for his profession, he commenced and prosecuted his studies at Worcester, under the direction of Samuel Putnam, a gentleman whom he has himself described as an acute man, an able and learned lawyer, and as in large professional practice at that time. In 1758, he was admitted to the bar, and commenced business in Braintree. He is understood to have made his first considerable effort, or to have attained his first signal success, at Plymouth, on one of those occasions which furnish the earliest opportunity for distinction to many young men of the profession, a jury trial, and a criminal cause. His business naturally grew with his reputation, and his residence in the vicinity afforded the opportunity, as his growing eminence gave the power, of entering on the larger field of practice

ed a naval academy, and urged the appropriation of money for such an establishment; but congress did not move far in the business. He also recommended which the capital presented. In 1766, he removed his residence to Boston, still continuing his attendance on the neighbouring circuits, and not unfrequently called to remote parts of the province. In 1770, his professional firmness was brought to a test of some severity, on the application of the British officers and soldiers to undertake their defence, on the trial of the indictments found against them on account of the transactions of the memorable 5th of March. He seems to have thought, on this occasion, that a man can no more abandon the proper duties of his profession, than he can abandon other duties. The event proved, that as he judged well for his own reputation, so he judged well, also, for the interest and permanent fame of his country. The result of that trial proved, that notwithstanding the high degree of excitement then existing, in consequence of the measures of the British government, a jury of Massachusetts would not deprive the most reckless enemies, even the officers of that standing army, quartered among them, which they so perfectly abhorred, of any part of that protection which the law, in its mildest and most indulgent interpretation, afforded to persons accused of crimes.

Without pursuing Mr. Adams' professional course further, suffice it to say, that on the first establishment of the judicial tribunals under the authority of the state, in 1776, he received an offer of the high and responsible station of chief justice of the supreme court. But he was destined for another and a different career. From early life the bent of his mind was toward politics; a propensity which the state of the times, if it did not create, doubtless very much strengthened. Public subjects must have occupied the thoughts and filled up the conversation in the circles in which he then moved; and the interesting questions, at that time just arising, could not but seize on a mind, like his, ardent, sanguine, and patriotic. The letter, fortunately preserved, written by him at Worcester, so early as the 12th of October, 1755, is a proof of very comprehensive views, and uncommon depth of reflection, in a young man not yet quite twenty. In this letter he predicted the transfer of power, and the establishment of a new seat of empire in America; he predicted, also, the increase of population in the colonies; and anticipated their naval distinction, and foretold that all Europe, combined, could not subdue them. All this is said, not on a public occasion, or for effect, but in the style of sober and friendly correspondence, as the result of his own thoughts. "I sometimes retire," said he, at the close of the letter, "and laying things together, form some reflections pleasing to myself. The produce of one of these reveries you have read above." This prognostication, so early in his own life, so early in the history of the country, of independence, of vast increase of numbers, of naval force, of such augmented power as might defy all Europe, is remarkable. It is more remarkable, that its author should live to see fulfilled to the letter, what could have seemed to others, at the time, but the extravagance of youthful fancy. His earliest political feelings were thus strongly American; and from this ardent attachment to his native soil he never departed.

While still living at Quincy, and at the age of twenty-four, Mr. Adams was present, in this town, on the argument before the supreme court respecting Writs of Assistance, and heard the celebrated and patriotic speech of James Otis. Unquestionably, that was a masterly performance. No flighty declamation about liberty, no superficial discussion of popular topics, it was a learned, penetrating, convincing, constitutional argument, expressed in a strain of high and resolute patriotism. He grasped the question, then pending between England and her colonies, with the strength of a lion; and if he sometimes sported, it was only because the lion himself is sometimes playful. Its success appears to have been as great as its merits, and its impression was widely felt. Mr. Adams himself seems never to have lost the feeling it produced, and to have entertained constantly the fullest conviction of its important effects. "I do say," he observes, "in the most solemn manner, that Mr. Otis' Oration against Writs of Assistance, breathed into this nation the breath of life."

In 1765, Mr. Adams laid before the public what I suppose to be the erection of an observatory, that the United States might not be behind the nations of Europe in their astronomical knowledge. This was also neglected.

his first printed performance, except essays for the periodical press, a Dissertation on the Canon and Feudal Law. The object of this work was to show that our New England ancestors, in consenting to exile themselves from their native land, were actuated, mainly, by the desire of delivering themselves from the power of the hierarchy, and from the monarchical and aristocratical political systems of the other continent; and to make this truth bear, with effect, on the politics of the times. Its tone is uncommonly bold and animated, for that period. He calls on the people, not only to defend, but to study and understand their rights and privileges; urges earnestly the necessity of diffusing general knowledge, invokes the clergy and the bar, the colleges and academies, and all others who have the ability and the means, to expose the insidious designs of arbitrary power, to resist its approaches, and to be persuaded that there is a settled design on foot to enslave all America. "Be it remembered," says the author, "that liberty must, at all hazards, be supported. We have a right to it, derived from our Maker. But if we had not, our fathers have earned it, and bought it for us, at the expense of their ease, their estate, their pleasure, and their blood. And liberty can not be preserved without a general knowledge among the people, who have a right, from the frame of their nature, to knowledge, as their great Creator, who does nothing in vain, has given them understandings, and a desire to know; but, besides this, they have a right, an indisputable, unalienable, indefeasible right, to that most dreaded and envied kind of knowledge, I mean of the character and conduct of their rulers. Rulers are no more than attorneys, agents, and trustees of the people; and if the cause, the interest, and trust, is insidiously betrayed, or wantonly trifled away, the people have a right to revoke the authority that they themselves have deputed, and to constitute other and better agents, attorneys, and trustees."

The citizens of this town conferred on Mr. Adams his first political distinction, and clothed him with his first political trust, by electing him one of their representatives, in 1770. Before this time he had become extensively known throughout the province, as well by the part he had acted in relation to public affairs, as by the exercise of his professional ability. He was among those who took the deepest interest in the controversy with England, and whether in or out of the legislature, his time and talents were alike devoted to the cause. In the years 1773 and 1774, he was chosen a counsellor, by the members of the general court, but rejected by Governor Hutchinson, in the former of those years, and by Governor Gage in the latter.

The time was now at hand, however, when the affairs of the colonies urgently demanded united councils. An open rupture with the parent state appeared inevitable, and it was but the dictate of prudence, that those who were united by a common interest and a common danger, should protect that interest and guard against that danger, by united efforts. A general congress of delegates from all the colonies, having been proposed and agreed to, the house of representatives, on the 17th of June, 1774, elected James Bowdoin, Thomas Cushing, Samuel Adams, John Adams, and Robert Treat Paine, delegates from Massachusetts. This appointment was made at Salem, where the general court had been convened by Governor Gage, in the last hour of the existence of a house of representatives under the provincial charter. While engaged in this important business, the governor having been informed of what was passing, sent his secretary with a message dissolving the general court. The secretary finding the door locked, directed the messenger to go in and inform the speaker that the secretary was at the door with a message from the governor. The messenger returned, and informed the secretary that the orders of the house were, that the doors should be kept fast; whereupon the secretary soon after read a proclamation, dissolving the general court upon the stairs. Thus terminated, for ever, the actual exercise of the political power of England in or over Massachusetts. The four last named delegates accepted their appointments, and took their seats in congress, the first day of its meeting, September 5, 1774, in Philadelphia.

The next election was the all engrossing subject of the politicians, in every quarter of the country, and forbade any improvements in science or letters. To-

The proceedings of the first congress are well known, and have been universally admired. It is in vain that we would look for superior proofs of wisdom, talent, and patriotism. Lord Chatham said, that, for himself, he must declare, that he had studied and admired the free states of antiquity, the master states of the world, but that for solidity of reasoning, force of sagacity, and wisdom of conclusion, no body of men could stand in preference to this congress. It is hardly inferior praise to say, that no production of that great man himself, can be pronounced superior to several of the papers published as the proceedings of this most able, most firm, most patriotic assembly. There is, indeed, nothing superior to them in the range of political disquisition. They not only embrace, illustrate, and enforce every thing which political philosophy, the love of liberty, and the spirit of free inquiry, had antecedently produced, but they add new and striking views of their own, and apply the whole, with irresistible force, in support of the cause which had drawn them together.

Mr. Adams was a constant attendant on the deliberations of this body, and bore an active part in its important measures. He was of the committee to state the rights of the colonies, and of that also which reported the address to the king.

As it was in the continental congress, fellow-citizens, that those whose deaths have given rise to this occasion, were first brought together, and called on to unite their industry and their ability, in the service of the country, let us now turn to the other of these distinguished men, and take a brief notice of his life, up to the period when he appeared within the walls of congress.

Thomas Jefferson, descended from ancestors who had been settled in Virginia for some generations, was born near the spot on which he died, in the county of Albemarle, on the 2d of April, (Old Style,) 1743. His youthful studies were pursued in the neighbourhood of his father's residence, until he was removed to the college of William and Mary, the highest honours of which he in due time received. Having left the college with reputation, he applied himself to the study of the law, under the tuition of George Wythe, one of the highest judicial names of which that state can boast. At an early age he was elected a member of the legislature, in which he had no sooner appeared, than he distinguished himself, by knowledge, capacity, and promptitude.

Mr. Jefferson appears to have been imbued with an early love of letters and science, and to have cherished a strong disposition to pursue these objects. To the physical sciences, especially, and to ancient classic literature, he is understood to have had a warm attachment, and never entirely to have lost sight of them, in the midst of the busiest occupations. But the times were times for action, rather than for contemplation. The country was to be defended, and to be saved, before it could be enjoyed. Philosophic leisure and literary pursuits, and even the objects of professional attention, were all necessarily postponed to the urgent calls of the public service. The exigency of the country made the same demand on Mr. Jefferson that it made on others who had the ability and the disposition to serve it; and he obeyed the call; thinking and feeling, in this respect, with the great Roman orator: Quis enim est tam cupidus in perspicenda cognoscendaque rerum natura, ut, si ei tractanti contemplantique res cognitione dignissimas subito sit allatum periculum discrimenque patriæ, cui subvenire opitulatique possit, non illa omnia relinquat atque abjiciat, etiam si dinumerare se stellas, aut metiri mundi magnitudinem posse arbitretur?

Entering, with all his heart, into the cause of liberty, his ability, patriotism, and power with the pen, naturally drew upon him a large participation in the most important concerns. Wherever he was, there was found a soul devoted to the cause, power to defend and maintain it, and willingness to incur all its hazards. In 1774, he published a Summary View of the Rights of British America, a valuable production among those intended to show the dangers which threatened the liberties of the country, and to encourage the people in their defence. In June, 1775, he was elected a member of the continental congress, as successor to Peyton Randolph, who had retired on account of ill health, and took his seat in that body on the 21st of the same month.

And now, fellow-citizens, without pursuing the biography of these illustrious men further, for the present, let us turn our attention to the most prominent act of their lives, their participation in the declaration of independence.

Preparatory to the introduction of that important measure, a committee, at the head of which was Mr. Adams, had reported a resolution, which congress adopted the 10th of May, recommending, in substance, to all the colonies which had not already established governments suited to the exigencies of their affairs, to adopt such government as would, in the opinion of the representatives of the people, best conduce to the happiness and safety of their constituents in particular, and America in general.

This significant vote was soon followed by the direct proposition, which Richard Henry Lee had the honour to submit to congress, by resolution, on the 7th day of June. The published journal does not expressly state it, but there is no doubt, I suppose, that this resolution was in the same words, when originally submitted by Mr. Lee, as when finally passed. Having been discussed on Saturday, the 8th, and Monday, the 10th of June, this resolution was on the last mentioned day postponed, for further consideration, to the first day of July; and, at the same time, it was voted, that a committee be appointed to prepare a declaration, to the effect of the resolution. This committee was elected by ballot, on the following day, and consisted of Thomas Jefferson, John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, Roger Sherman, and Robert R. Livingston.

It is usual, when committees are elected by ballot, that their members are arranged in order, according to the number of votes which each has received; Mr. Jefferson, therefore, had received the highest, and Mr. Adams the next highest number of votes. The difference is said to have been but of a single vote. Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Adams, standing thus at the head of the committee, were requested by the other members to act as a sub-committee, to prepare the draft; and Mr. Jefferson drew up the paper. The original draft, as brought by him from his study, and submitted to the other members of the committee, with interlinations in the hand-writing of Dr. Franklin, and others in that of Mr. Adams, was in Mr. Jefferson's possession at the time of his death. The merit of this paper is Mr. Jefferson's. Some changes were made in it, on the suggestion of other members of the committee, and others by congress, while it was under discussion. But none of them altered the tone, the frame, the arrangement, or the general character of the instrument. As a composition the declaration is Mr. Jefferson's. It is the production of his mind, and the high honour of it belongs to him, clearly and absolutely.

It has sometimes been said, as if it were a derogation from the merits of this paper, that it contains nothing new; that it only states grounds of proceeding, and presses topics of argument, which had often been stated and pressed before. But it was not the object of the declaration to produce any thing new. It was not to invent reasons for independence, but to state those which governed the congress. For great and sufficient causes, it was proposed to declare independence; and the proper business of the paper to be drawn, was to set forth those causes, and justify the authors of the measure, in any event of fortune, to the country, and to posterity. The cause of American independence, moreover, was now to be presented to the world, in such manner, if it might so be, as to engage its sympathy, to command its respect, to attract its admiration; and in an assembly of most able and distinguished men, Thomas Jefferson had the high honour of being the selected advocate of this cause. To say that he performed his great work well, would be doing him injustice. To say that he did excellently well, admirably well, would be inadequate and halting praise. Let us rather say, that he so discharged the duty assigned him, that all Americans may well rejoice, that the work of drawing the title deed of their liberties devolved on his hands.

With all its merits, there are those who have thought that there was one thing in the declaration to be regretted; and that is, the front of the capitol, and a suitable artist engaged to repair to Italy, to commence his labours. He received his instructions from Mr. Adams, who had deasperity and apparent anger with which it speaks of the person of the king; the industrious ability with which it accumulates and charges upon him, all the injuries which the colonies had suffered from the mother country. Possibly some degree of injustice, now or hereafter, at home or abroad, may be done to the character of Mr. Jefferson, if this part of the declaration be not placed in its proper light. Anger or resentment, certainly, much less personal reproach and invective, could not properly find place, in a composition of such high dignity, and of such lofty and permanent character.

A single reflection on the original ground of dispute, between England and the colonies, is sufficient to remove any unfavourable impression, in this respect.

The inhabitants of all the colonies, while colonies, admitted themselves bound by their allegiance to the king; but they disclaimed altogether, the authority of parliament; holding themselves, in this respect, to resemble the condition of Scotland and Ireland, before the respective unions of those kingdoms with England, when they acknowledged allegiance to the same king, but each had its separate legislature. The tie, therefore, which our revolution was to break, did not subsist between us and the British parliament, or between us and the British government, in the aggregate; but directly between us and the king himself. The colonies had never admitted themselves subject to parliament. That was precisely the point of the original controversy. They had uniformly denied that parliament had authority to make laws for them. There was, therefore, no subjection to parliament to be thrown off. But allegiance to the king did exist, and had been uniformly acknowledged; and down to 1775 the most solemn assurances had been given that it was not intended to break that allegiance, or to throw it off. Therefore, as the direct object, and only effect of the declaration, according to the principles on which the controversy had been maintained, on our part, was to sever the tie of allegiance which bound us to the king, it was properly and necessarily founded on acts of the crown itself, as its justifying causes. Parliament is not so much as mentioned, in the whole instrument. When odious and oppressive acts are referred to, it is done by charging the king with confederating, with others, "in pretended acts of legislation;" the object being, constantly, to hold the king himself directly responsible for those measures which were the grounds of separation. Even the precedent of the English revolution was not overlooked, and, in this case, as well as in that, occasion was found to say that the king had abdicated the government. Consistency with the principles upon which resistance began, and with all the previous state papers issued by congress, required that the declaration should be bottomed on the misgovernment of the king; and therefore it was properly framed with that aim and to that end. The king was known, indeed, to have acted, as in other cases, by his ministers, and with his parliament; but as our ancestors had never admitted themselves subject either to ministers or to parliament, there were no reasons to be given for now refusing obedience to their authority. This clear and obvious necessity of founding the declaration on the misconduct of the king himself, gives to that instrument its personal application, and its character of direct and pointed accusation.

The declaration having been reported to congress, by the committee, the resolution itself was taken up and debated on the first day of July, and again on the second, on which last day it was agreed to and adopted in these words:

Resolved, That these united colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent states; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown, and that all political connexion between them and the state of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved.

Having thus passed the main resolution, congress proceeded to consider the reported draft of the declaration. It was discussed on the second, and third, and fourth days of the month, in committee of the whole; and on the last of those days, being reported from that committee it received the final approbation and sanction of signed the ornaments of the pediment on the front of the same building.

Mr. Adams lived in harmony with his cabinet, al-

congress. It was ordered, at the same time, that copies be sent to the several states, and that it be proclaimed at the head of the army. The declaration, thus published, did not bear the names of the members, for as yet it had not been signed by them. It was authenticated, like other papers of the congress, by the signatures of the president and secretary. On the 19th of July, as appears by the secret journal, congress, "Resolved, that the declaration, passed on the fourth, be fairly engrossed on parchment, with the title and style of 'The unanimous declaration of the thirteen United States of America;' and that the same, when engrossed, be signed by every member of congress." And on the second day of August, following, "the declaration, being engrossed and compared at the table, was signed by the members." So that it happens, fellow-citizens, that we pay these honours to their memory, on the anniversary of that day, on which these great men actually signed their names to the declaration. The declaration was thus made, that is, it passed, and was adopted as an act of congress, on the fourth of July; it was then signed and certified by the president and secretary, like other acts. The fourth of July, therefore, is the anniversary of the declaration. But the signatures of the members present were made to it, being then engrossed on parchment, on the second day of August. Absent members afterwards signed, as they came in; and indeed it bears the names of some who were not chosen members of congress until after the fourth of July. The interest belonging to the subject will be sufficient, I hope, to justify these details.

The congress of the revolution, fellow-citizens, sat with closed doors, and no report of its debates was ever taken. The discussion, therefore, which accompanied this great measure, has never been preserved, except in memory, and by tradition. But it is, I believe, doing no injustice to others, to say, that the general opinion was, and uniformly has been, that in debate, on the side of independence, John Adams had no equal. The great author of the declaration himself has expressed that opinion uniformly and strongly. "John Adams," said he, in the hearing of him who has now the honour to address you, "John Adams was our Colossus on the floor. Not graceful, not eloquent, not always fluent, in his public addresses, he yet came out with a power, both of thought and of expression, which moved us from our seats."

For the part which he was here to perform, Mr. Adams doubtless was eminently fitted. He possessed a bold spirit, which disregarded danger, and a sanguine reliance on the goodness of the cause, and the virtues of the people, which led him to overlook all obstacles. His character, too, had been formed in troubled times. He had been rocked in the early storms of the controversy, and had acquired a decision and a hardihood, proportioned to the severity of the discipline which he had undergone.

He not only loved the American cause devoutly, but had studied and understood it. It was all familiar to him. He had tried his powers, on the questions which it involved, often, and in various ways; and had brought to their consideration whatever of argument or illustration the history of his own country, the history of England, or the stores of ancient or of legal learning, could furnish. Every grievance, enumerated in the long catalogue of the declaration, had been the subject of his discussion, and the object of his remonstrance and reprobation. From 1760, the colonies, the rights of the colonies, the liberties of the colonies, and the wrongs inflicted on the colonies, had engaged his constant attention; and it has surprised those, who have had the opportunity of observing, with what full remembrance, and with what prompt recollection, he could refer, in his extreme old age, to every act of parliament affecting the colonies, distinguishing and stating their respective titles, sections, and provisions; and to all the colonial memorials, remonstrances, and petitions, with whatever else belonged to the intimate and exact history of the times from that year to 1775. It was in his own judgment, between these years, that the American people came to a full understanding and thorough knowledge of their rights, and to a fixed resolution of maintaining them; and bearing himself an active part in all important transactions, the though they were made of different materials from himself. He struggled hard to prove that a president could act without party; but his success did not controversy with England being then, in effect, the business of his life, facts, dates, and particulars, made an impression which was never effaced. He was prepared, therefore, by education and discipline, as well as by natural talent and natural temperament, for the part which he was now to act.

The eloquence of Mr. Adams resembled his general character, and formed, indeed, a part of it. It was bold, manly, and energetic; and such the crisis required. When public bodies are to be addressed on momentous occasions, when great interests are at stake, and strong passions excited, nothing is valuable, in speech, further than it is connected with high intellectual and moral endowments. Clearness, force, and earnestness, are the qualities which produce conviction. True eloquence, indeed, does not consist in speech. It can not be brought from far. Labour and learning may toil for it, but they will toil in vain. Words and phrases may be marshalled in every way, but they can not compass it. It must exist in the man, in the subject, and in the occasion. Affected passion, intense expression, the pomp of declamation, all may aspire after it—they can not reach it. It comes, if it come at all, like the out-breaking of a fountain from the earth, or the bursting forth of volcanic fires, with spontaneous, original, native force. The graces taught in the schools, the costly ornaments, and studied contrivances of speech, shock and disgust men, when their own lives, and the fate of their wives, their children, and their country, hang on the decision of the hour. Then words have lost their power, rhetoric is vain, and all elaborate oratory contemptible. Even genius itself then feels rebuked and subdued, as in the presence of higher qualities. Then, patriotism is eloquent; then, self-devotion is eloquent. The clear conception, outrunning the deductions of logic, the high purpose, the firm resolve, the dauntless spirit, speaking on the tongue, beaming from the eye, informing every feature, and urging the whole man onward, right onward to his object—this, this is eloquence; or rather, it is something greater and higher than all eloquence; it is action, noble, sublime, godlike action.

In July, 1776, the controversy had passed the stage of argument. An appeal had been made to force, and opposing armies were in the field. Congress, then, was to decide whether the tie which had so long bound us to the parent state, was to be severed at once, and severed for ever. All the colonies had signified their resolution to abide by this decision, and the people looked for it with the most intense anxiety. And surely, fellow-citizens, never, never were men called to a more important political deliberation. If we contemplate it from the point where they then stood, no question could be more full of interest; if we look at it now, and judge of its importance by its effects, it appears in still greater magnitude.

Let us, then, bring before us the assembly, which was about to decide a question thus big with the fate of empire. Let us open their doors, and look in upon their deliberations. Let us survey the anxious and care-worn countenances, let us hear the firm-toned voices, of this band of patriots.

Hancock presides over the solemn sitting; and one of those not yet prepared to pronounce for absolute independence, is on the floor, and is urging his reasons for dissenting from the declaration.

"Let us pause! This step, once taken, can not be retraced. This resolution, once passed, will cut off all hope of reconciliation. If success attend the arms of England, we shall then be no longer colonies, with charters, and with privileges; these will all be forfeited by this act; and we shall be in the condition of other conquered people, at the mercy of the conquerors. For ourselves, we may be ready to run the hazard; but are we ready to carry the country to that length? Is success so probable as to justify it? Where is the military, where the naval power, by which we are to resist the whole strength of the arm of England, for she will exert that strength to the utmost? Can we rely on the constancy and perseverance of the people? or will they not act, as the people of other countries have acted, and wearied with a long war, submit, in the end, to a worse oppression? While we stand on our old ground, and insist on redress of grievances, we know we are right, warrant the conclusion that such a course could ever be wisely pursued. Many were mortified, and not a few disappointed, to see those who had made no effort and are not answerable for consequences. Nothing, then, can be imputable to us. But if we now change our object, carry our pretensions further, and set up for absolute independence, we shall loose the sympathy of mankind. We shall no longer be defending what we possess, but struggling for something which we never did possess, and which we have solemnly and uniformly disclaimed all intention of pursuing, from the very outset of the troubles. Abandoning thus our old ground, of resistance only to arbitrary acts of oppression, the nations will believe the whole to have been mere pretence, and they will look on us, not as injured, but as ambitious, subjects. I shudder, before this responsibility. It will be on us, if relinquishing the ground we have stood on so long, and stood on so safely, we now proclaim independence, and carry on the war for that object while these cities burn, these pleasant fields whiten and bleach with the bones of their owners, and these streams run blood. It will be upon us, it will be upon us, if failing to maintain this unseasonable and ill-judged declaration, a sterner despotism, maintained by military power, shall be established over our posterity, when we ourselves, given up by an exhausted, a harassed, a misled people, shall have expiated our rashness, and atoned for our presumption, on the scaffold."

It was for Mr. Adams to reply to arguments like these. We know his opinions, and we know his character. He would commence with his accustomed directness and earnestness.

"Sink or swim, live or die, survive or perish, I give my hand, and my heart, to this vote. It is true, indeed, that in the beginning, we aimed not at independence. But there's a Divinity which shapes our ends. The injustice of England has driven us to arms; and, blinded to her own interest for our good, she has obstinately persisted, till independence is now within our grasp. We have but to reach forth to it, and it is ours. Why then should we defer the declaration? Is any man so weak as now to hope for a reconciliation with England, which shall leave either safety to the country and its liberties, or safety to his own life, and his own honour? Are not you, sir, who sit in that chair, is not he, our venerable colleague near you, are you not both already the proscribed and predestined objects of punishment and of vengeance? Cut off from all hope of royal clemency, what are you, what can you be, while the power of England remains, but outlaws? If we postpone independence, do we mean to carry on, or to give up, the war? Do we mean to submit to the measures of parliament, Boston port-hill, and all? Do we mean to submit, and consent that we ourselves shall be ground to powder, and our country and its rights trodden down in the dust? I know we do not mean to submit. We never shall submit. Do we intend to violate that most solemn obligation ever entered into by men, that plighting, before God, of our sacred honour to Washington, when putting him forth to incur the dangers of war, as well as the political hazards of the times, we promised to adhere to him, in every extremity, with our fortunes and our lives? I know there is not a man here, who would not rather see a general conflagration sweep over the land, or an earthquake sink it, than one jot or tittle of that plighted faith fall to the ground. For myself, having, twelve months ago, in this place, moved you, that George Washington be appointed commander of the forces, raised or to be raised, for defence of American liberty, may my right hand forget her cunning, and my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth, if I hesitate or waver in the support I give him. The war, then, must go on. We must fight it through. And if the war must go on, why put off longer the declaration of independence? That measure will strengthen us. It will give us character abroad. The nations will then treat with us, which they never can do while we acknowledge ourselves subjects, in arms against our sovereign. Nay, I maintain that England herself, will sooner treat for peace with us on the footing of independence, than consent, by repealing her acts, to acknowledge that her whole conduct towards us has been a course of injustice and oppression. Her pride will be less wounded, by submitting to that course of things which now predestinates our independence, than by yielding the points in controversy to her rebellious subjects. The former

to bring in the administration, receive the rewards which belonged to his political friends. Mr. Adams was unquestionably the most learned of all the chief

she would regard as the result of fortune; the latter she would feel as her own deep disgrace. Why then, why then, sir, do we not, as soon as possible, change this from a civil to a national war? And since we must fight it through, why not put ourselves in a state to enjoy all the benefits of victory, if we gain the victory?

"If we fail, it can be no worse for us. But we shall not fail. The cause will raise up armies; the cause will create navies. The people, the people, if we are true to them, will carry us, and will carry themselves, gloriously, through this struggle. I care not how fickle other people have been found. I know the people of these colonies, and I know that resistance to British aggression is deep and settled in their hearts, and can not be eradicated. Every colony, indeed, has expressed its willingness to follow, if we but take the lead. Sir, the declaration will inspire the people with increased courage. Instead of a long and bloody war for restoration of privileges, for redress of grievances, for chartered immunities, held under a British king, set before them the glorious object of entire independence, and it will breathe into them anew the breath of life. Read this declaration at the head of the army; every sword will be drawn from its scabbard, and the solemn vow uttered, to maintain it, or to perish on the bed of honour. Publish it from the pulpit; religion will approve it, and the love of religious liberty will cling round it, resolved to stand with it, or fall with it. Send it to the public halls; proclaim it there; let them hear it, who heard the first roar of the enemy's cannon; let them see it, who saw their brothers and their sons fall on the field of Bunker Hill, and in the streets of Lexington and Concord; and the very walls will cry out in its support.

"Sir, I know the uncertainty of human affairs, but I see, I see clearly, through this day's business. You and I, indeed, may rue it. We may not live to the time, when this declaration shall be made good. We may die; die, colonists; die, slaves; die, it may be, ignominiously and on the scaffold. Be it so. Be it so. If it be the pleasure of Heaven that my country shall require the poor offering of my life, the victim shall be ready, at the appointed hour of sacrifice, come when that hour may. But while I do live, let me have a country, or at least the hope of a country, and that a free country.

"But whatever may be our fate, be assured, be assured, that this declaration will stand. It may cost treasure, and it may cost blood; but it will stand, and it will richly compensate for both. Through the thick gloom of the present, I see the brightness of the future, as the sun in heaven. We shall make this a glorious, an immortal day. When we are in our graves, our children will honour it. They will celebrate it with thanksgiving, with festivity, with bonfires and illuminations. On its annual return they will shed tears, copious, gushing tears, not of subjection and slavery, not of agony and distress, but of exultation, of gratitude, and of joy. Sir, before God, I believe the hour has come. My judgment approves this measure, and my whole heart is in it. All that I have, and all that I am, and all that I hope, in this life, I am now ready here to stake upon it; and I leave off, as I begun, that live or die, survive or perish, I am for the declaration. It is my living sentiment, and, by the blessing of God, it shall be my dying sentiment; independence now; and independence for ever."

And so that day shall be honoured, illustrious prophet and patriot! so that day shall be honoured, and as often as it returns, thy renown shall come along with it, and the glory of thy life, like the day of thy death, shall not fail from the remembrance of men.

It would be unjust, fellow-citizens, on this occasion, while we express our veneration for him who is the immediate subject of these remarks, were we to omit a most respectful, affectionate, and grateful mention of those other great men, his colleagues, who stood with him, and with the same spirit, the same devotion, took part in the interesting transaction. Hancock, the proscribed Hancock, exiled from his home by a military governor, cut off, by proclamation, from the mercy of the crown, heaven reserved for him the distinguished honour of putting this great question to the vote, and of writing his own name first, and most conspicuously, on that magistrates the nation has had. He received all foreign ambassadors without an interpreter, and satisfied all that he was acquainted with their mother parchment which spoke defiance to the power of the crown of England. There, too, is the name of that other proscribed patriot, Samuel Adams; a man who hungered and thirsted for the independence of his country; who thought the declaration halted and lingered, being himself not only ready, but eager for it, long before it was proposed; a man of the deepest sagacity, the clearest foresight, and the profoundest judgment in men. And there is Gerry, himself among the earliest and the foremost of the patriots, found, when the battle of Lexington summoned them to common councils, by the side of Warren; a man who lived to serve his country at home and abroad, and to die in the second place in the government. There, too, is the inflexible, the upright, the Spartan character, Robert Treat Paine. He, also, lived to serve his country through the struggle, and then withdrew from her councils, only that he might give his labours and his life to his native state, in another relation. These names, fellow-citizens, are the treasures of the commonwealth; and they are treasures which grow brighter by time.

It is now necessary to resume, and to finish with great brevity, the notice of the lives of those, whose virtues and services we have met to commemorate.

Mr. Adams remained in congress from its first meeting, till November, 1777, when he was appointed minister to France. He proceeded on that service, in the February following, embarking in the Boston frigate, on the shore of his native town, at the foot of Mount Wollaston. The year following, he was appointed commissioner to treat of peace with England. Returning to the United States, he was a delegate from Braintree in the convention for framing the constitution of this commonwealth, in 1780. At the latter end of the same year, he again went abroad, in the diplomatic service of the country, and was employed at various courts, and occupied with various negotiations, until 1788. The particulars of these interesting and important services this occasion does not allow time to relate. In 1782, he concluded our first treaty with Holland. His negotiations with that republic, his efforts to persuade the states-general to recognize our independence, his incessant and indefatigable exertions to represent the American cause favourably, on the continent, and to counteract the designs of its enemies, open and secret; and his successful undertaking to obtain loans, on the credit of a nation yet new and unknown, are among his most arduous, most useful, most honourable services. It was his fortune to bear a part in the negotiation for peace with England; and in something more than six years from the declaration which he had so strenuously supported, he had the satisfaction to see the minister plenipotentiary of the crown subscribe to the instrument which declared, that his "Britannic Majesty acknowledged the United States to be free, sovereign, and independent." In these important transactions, Mr. Adams' conduct received the marked approbation of congress, and of the country.

While abroad, in 1787, he published his Defence of the American Constitutions; a work of merit and ability, though composed with haste, on the spur of a particular occasion, in the midst of other occupations, and under circumstances not admitting of careful revision. The immediate object of the work was to counteract the weight of opinions advanced by several popular European writers of that day, M. Turgot, the Abbe de Mably, and Dr. Price, at a time when the people of the United States were employed in forming and revising their systems of government.

Returning to the United States in 1788, he found the new government about going into operation, and was himself elected the first vice-president, a situation which he filled with reputation for eight years, at the expiration of which he was raised to the presidential chair, as immediate successor to the immortal Washington. In this high station he was succeeded by Mr. Jefferson, after a memorable controversy, between their respective friends, in 1801; and from that period his manner of life has been known to all who hear me. He has lived, for five and twenty years, with every enjoyment that could render old age happy. Not inattentive to the occurrences of the times, political cares have yet not materially, or tongue. His learning and his openness of disposition did nothing to ensure his second election. The tide of party was not to be stemmed by learning and for any long time, disturbed his repose. In 1820, he acted as elector of president and vice-president, and in the same year we saw him, then at the age of eighty-five, a member of the convention of this commonwealth, called to revise the constitution. Forty years before, he had been one of those who formed that constitution; and he had now the pleasure of witnessing that there was little which the people desired to change. Possessing all his faculties to the end of his long life, with an unabated love of reading and contemplation, in the centre of interesting circles of friendship and affection, he was blessed, in his retirement, with whatever of repose and felicity the condition of man allows. He had, also, other enjoyments. He saw around him that prosperity and general happiness, which had been the object of his public cares and labours. No man ever beheld more clearly, and for a longer time, the great and beneficial effects of the services rendered by himself to his country. That liberty which he so early defended, that independence of which he was so able an advocate and supporter, he saw, we trust, firmly and securely established. The population of the country thickened around him faster, and extended wider, than his own sanguine predictions had anticipated; and the wealth, respectability, and power of the nation, sprang up to a magnitude, which it is quite impossible he could have expected to witness, in his day. He lived, also, to behold those principles of civil freedom, which had been developed, established, and practically applied in America, attract attention, command respect, and awaken imitation, in other regions of the globe: and well might, and well did he, exclaim, "Where will the consequences of the American revolution end!"

If any thing yet remain to fill this cup of happiness, let it be added, that he lived to see a great and intelligent people bestow the highest honour in their gift, where he had bestowed his own kindest parental affections, and lodged his fondest hopes. Thus honoured in life, thus happy at death, he saw the jubilee, and he died; and with the last prayers which trembled on his lips, was the fervent supplication for his country, "independence for ever."

Mr. Jefferson, having been occupied in the years 1778 and 1779, in the important service of revising the laws of Virginia, was elected governor of that state, as successor to Patrick Henry, and held the situation when the state was invaded by the British arms. In 1781, he published his Notes on Virginia, a work which attracted attention in Europe as well as America, dispelled many misconceptions respecting this continent, and gave its author a place among men distinguished for science. In November, 1783, he again took his seat in the continental congress, but in the May following was appointed minister plenipotentiary, to act abroad, in the negotiation of commercial treaties, with Dr. Franklin and Mr. Adams. He proceeded to France, in execution of this mission, embarking at Boston; and that was the only occasion on which he ever visited this place. In 1785, he was appointed minister to France, the duties of which situation he continued to perform, until October, 1789, when he obtained leave to retire, just on the eve of that tremendous revolution which has so much agitated the world, in our times. Mr. Jefferson's discharge of his diplomatic duties was marked by great ability, diligence, and patriotism; and while he resided at Paris, in one of the most interesting periods, his character for intelligence, his love of knowledge, and of the society of learned men, distinguished him in the highest circles of the French capital. No court in Europe had, at that time, in Paris, a representative commanding or enjoying higher regard for political knowledge or for general attainment, than the minister of this then infant republic. Immediately on his return to his native country, at the organization of the government under the present constitution, his talents and experience recommended him to President Washington, for the first office in his gift. He was placed at the head of the department of state. In this situation, also, he manifested conspicuous ability. His correspondence with the ministers of other powers residing here, and his instructions to our own diplomatic agents abroad, are among our ablest state papers. A thorough knowledge of the laws and usages of nations, perfect acquaintance with the immediate subject before him, great felicity, enlarged views. General Jackson was elected by a large majority.

In the year 1828, congress made provision, by law and still greater facility, in writing, show themselves in whatever effort his official situation called on him to make. It is believed by competent judges, that the diplomatic intercourse of the government of the United States, from the first meeting of the continental congress, in 1774, to the present time, taken together, would not suffer, in respect to the talent with which it has been conducted, by comparison with any thing which other and older states can produce; and to the attainment of this respectability and distinction, Mr. Jefferson has contributed his full part.

On the retirement of General Washington from the presidency, and the election of Mr. Adams to that office, in 1797, he was chosen vice-president. While presiding, in this capacity, over the deliberations of the senate, he compiled and published a Manual of Parliamentary Practice, a work of more labour and more merit, than is indicated by its size. It is now received as the general standard by which proceedings are regulated, not only in both houses of congress, but in most of the other legislative bodies in the country. In 1801, he was elected president, in opposition to Mr. Adams, and re-elected in 1805, by a vote approaching towards unanimity.

From the time of his final retirement from public life, in 1807, Mr. Jefferson lived as became a wise man. Surrounded by affectionate friends, his ardour in the pursuit of knowledge undiminished, with uncommon health, and unbroken spirits, he was able to enjoy largely the rational pleasures of life, and to partake in that public prosperity, which he had so much contributed to produce. His kindness and hospitality, the charm of his conversation, the ease of his manners, the extent of his acquirements, and especially the full store of revolutionary incidents, which he possessed, and which he knew when and how to dispense, rendered his abode in a high degree attractive to his admiring countrymen, while his high public and scientific character drew towards him every intelligent and educated traveller from abroad. Both Mr. Adams and Mr. Jefferson had the pleasure of knowing that the respect, which they so largely received, was not paid to their official stations. They were not men made great by office; but great men, on whom the country, for its own benefit, had conferred office. There was that in them, which office did not give, and which the relinquishment of office did not, and could not take away. In their retirement, in the midst of their fellow-citizens, themselves private citizens, they enjoyed as high regard and esteem, as when filling the most important places of public trust.

There remained to Mr. Jefferson yet one other work of patriotism and beneficence, the establishment of a university in his native state. To this object he devoted years of incessant and anxious attention, and by the enlightened liberality of the legislature of Virginia, and the co-operation of other able and zealous friends, he lived to see it accomplished. May all success attend this infant seminary; and may those who enjoy its advantages, as often as their eyes shall rest on the neighbouring height, recollect what they owe to their disinterested and indefatigable benefactor; and may letters honour him who thus laboured in the cause of letters.

Thus useful, and thus respected, passed the old age of Thomas Jefferson. But time was on its ever-ceaseless wing, and was now bringing the last hour of this illustrious man. He saw its approach, with undisturbed serenity. He counted the moments, as they passed, and beheld that his last sands were falling. That day, too, was at hand, which he had helped to make immortal. One wish, one hope—if it were not presumptuous—beat in his fainting breast. Could it be so—might it please God—he would desire, once more, to see the sun—once more to look abroad on the scene around him, on the great day of liberty. Heaven, in its mercy, fulfilled that prayer. He saw that sun—he enjoyed its sacred light—he thanked God for this mercy, and bowed his aged head to the grave. "Felix, non vito tantum claritate, sed etiam opportunitate mortis."

The last public labour of Mr. Jefferson naturally suggests the expression of the high praise which is due, both to him and to Mr. Adams, for their uniform and zealous attachment to learning, and to the cause of general knowledge. Of the advantages of learning, indeed, and of literary accomplishments, their own characters were for certain officers of the revolutionary army. The debt of justice had been long delayed. Thousands had descended to the grave in poverty, with com-striking recommendations and illustrations. They were scholars, ripe and good scholars; widely acquainted with ancient, as well as modern literature, and not altogether uninstructed in the deeper sciences. Their acquirements, doubtless, were different, and so were the particular objects of their literary pursuits; as their tastes and characters, in these respects, differed like those of other men. Being, also, men of busy lives, with great objects, requiring action, constantly before them, their attainments in letters did not become showy, or obtrusive. Yet, I would hazard the opinion, that if we could now ascertain all the causes which gave them eminence and distinction, in the midst of the great men with whom they acted, we should find, not among the least, their early acquisition in literature, the resources which it furnished, the promptitude and facility which it communicated, and the wide field it opened, for analogy and illustration; giving them, thus, on every subject, a larger view, and a broader range, as well for discussion as for the government of their own conduct.

Literature sometimes, and pretensions to it much oftener, disgusts, by appearing to hang loosely on the character, like something foreign or extraneous, not a part, but an ill-adjusted appendage; or by seeming to overload and weigh it down, by its unsightly bulk, like the productions of bad taste in architecture, where there is massy and cumbrous ornament, without strength or solidity of column. This has exposed learning, and especially classical learning, to reproach. Men have seen that it might exist, without mental superiority, without vigour, without good taste, and without utility. But, in such cases, classical learning has only not inspired natural talent; or, at most, it has but made original feebleness of intellect, and natural bluntness of perception, something more conspicuous. The question, after all, if it be a question, is, whether literature, ancient as well as modern, does not assist a good understanding, improve natural good taste, add polished armour to native strength, and render its possessor not only more capable of deriving private happiness from contemplation and reflection, but more accomplished, also, for action, in the affairs of life, and especially for public action? Those whose memories we now honour, were learned men; but their learning was kept in its proper place, and made subservient to the uses and objects of life. They were scholars not common, nor superficial; but their scholarship was so in keeping with their character, so blended and inwrought, that careless observers, or bad judges, not seeing an ostentatious display of it, might infer that it did not exist; forgetting, or not knowing, that classical learning, in men who act in conspicuous public stations, perform duties which exercise the faculty of writing, or address popular, deliberative, or judicial bodies, is often felt, where it is little seen, and sometimes felt more effectually, because it is not seen at all.

But the cause of knowledge, in a more enlarged sense, the cause of general knowledge and of popular education, had no warmer friends, nor more powerful advocates, than Mr. Adams and Mr. Jefferson. On this foundation, they knew, the whole republican system rested; and this great and all-important truth they strove to impress, by all the means in their power. In the early publication, already referred to, Mr. Adams expresses the strong and just sentiment, that the education of the poor is more important, even to the rich themselves, than all their own riches. On this great truth, indeed, is founded that unrivalled, that invaluable political and moral institution, our own blessing, and the glory of our fathers, the New England system of free schools.

As the promotion of knowledge had been the object of their regard through life, so these great men made it the subject of their testamentary bounty. Mr. Jefferson is understood to have bequeathed his library to the university, and that of Mr. Adams is bestowed on the inhabitants of Quincy.

Mr. Adams and Mr. Jefferson, fellow-citizens, were successively presidents of the United States. The comparative merits of their respective administrations for a long time agitated and divided public opinion. They were rivals, each supported by numerous and powerful portions of the people, for the highest office. This plaints on their lips against the rulers of the land. All the wise, patriotic, and eloquent of both houses of congress, were on the side of the veteran soldiers contest, partly the cause, and partly the consequence, of the long existence of two great political parties in the country, is now part of the history of our government. We may naturally regret, that any thing should have occurred to create difference and discord, between those who had acted harmoniously and efficiently in the great concerns of the revolution. But this is not the time, nor this the occasion, for entering into the grounds of that difference, or for attempting to discuss the merits of the questions which it involves. As practical questions, they were canvassed, when the measures which they regarded were acted on and adopted; and as belonging to history, the time has not come for their consideration.

It is, perhaps, not wonderful, that when the constitution of the United States went first into operation, different opinions should be entertained, as to the extent of the powers conferred by it. Here was a natural source of diversity of sentiment. It is still less wonderful, that that event, about contemporary with our government, under the present constitution, which so entirely shocked all Europe, and disturbed our relations with her leading powers, should be thought, by different men, to have different bearings on our own prosperity; and that the early measures adopted by our government, in consequence of this new state of things, should be seen in opposite lights. It is for the future historian, when what now remains of prejudice and misconception shall have passed away, to state these different opinions, and pronounce impartial judgment. In the meantime, all good men rejoice, and well may rejoice, that the sharpest differences sprung out of measures, which, whether right or wrong, have ceased with the exigencies that gave them birth, and have left no permanent effect, either on the constitution, or on the general prosperity of the country. This remark, I am aware, may be supposed to have its exception, in one measure, the alteration of the constitution as to the mode of choosing president; but it is true, in its general application. Thus the course of policy pursued towards France, in 1798, on the one hand, and the measures of commercial restriction, commenced in 1867, on the other, both subjects of warm and severe opposition, have passed away, and left nothing behind them. They were temporary, and whether wise or unwise, their consequences were limited to their respective occasions. It is equally clear, at the same time, and it is equally gratifying, that those measures of both administrations, which were of durable importance, and which drew after them interesting and long remaining consequences, have received general approbation. Such was the organization, or rather the creation, of the navy, in the administration of Mr. Adams; such the acquisition of Louisiana, in that of Mr. Jefferson. The country, it may safely be added, is not likely to be willing either to approve, or to reprobate, indiscriminately, and in the aggregate, all the measures of either, or of any administration. The dictate of reason and of justice is, that, holding each one his own sentiments on the points in difference, we imitate the great men themselves, in the forbearance and moderation which they have cherished, and in the mutual respect and kindness which they have been so much inclined to feel and to reciprocate.

No men, fellow-citizens, ever served their country with more entire exemption from every imputation of selfish and mercenary motive, than those to whose memory we are paying these proofs of respect. A suspicion of any disposition to enrich themselves, or to profit by their public employments, never rested on either. No sordid motive approached them. The inheritance which they have left to their children, is of their character and their fame. Fellow-citizens, I will detain you no longer by this faint and feeble tribute to the memory of the illustrious dead. Even in other hands, adequate justice could not be performed, within the limits of this occasion. Their highest, their best praise, is your deep conviction of their merits, your affectionate gratitude for their labours and services. It is not my voice, it is this cessation of ordinary pursuits, this arresting of all attention, these solemn ceremonies, and this crowded house, which speak their eulogy. Their fame, indeed, is safe. That is now treasured up, beyond the reach of accident. Although no sculptured marble should rise to their memory, nor

"Mr. President, (said he,) it has become my duty, sir, as Chairman of the Committee who reported this bill, to explain the origin and character of it. I regret that this duty has not devolved upon some abler representative of the interests of the petitioners; but I regret it the less as my colleagues on the committee possess every quality of both the head and heart to advance those interests, and will no doubt, hereafter, be seconded by an indulgent attention on the part of the senate.

"Who, then, sir, are the venerable men that knock at your door? and for what do they ask? They are not suppliants for mere favour or charity, though we all know that nothing but the proud spirit which helped to sustain them through the distresses of our revolution, has withheld most of them from reliance for daily bread on the alms provided by the present pension act. No, sir, they come as petitioners for their rights. They come as the remnant of that gallant band, who enlisted your continental army, who disciplined its ranks, who planned its enterprises, and led the way to victory and independence. Confiding in the plighted faith of Congress, given in the form of a solemn compact, they adhered to your cause through evil report and good report, till the great drama closed; and they now ask only that the faith so plighted may be redeemed. Amid the wrecks from time and disease, during almost half a century, short of two hundred and fifty now survive, out of two thousand four hundred and eighty, who existed at the close of the war. Even this small number is falling fast around us, as the leaves of autumn; and this very morning a gentleman before me has communicated the information, that another of the most faithful among them has just passed 'that bourne whence no traveller returns.' It behooves us, then, if we now conclude, in our prosperity and greatness, to extend relief, either from charity, gratitude, or justice, to do it quickly.

"My great anxiety is, in the outset, to prevent any misapprehension of the true grounds on which the appropriation is founded. Throughout the whole inquiry, there is no disposition to censure the motives or policy of the old Congress. They adopted such measures as the exigencies and necessities of the times forced upon them; and now, when those exigencies have ceased, it is just, as well as generous, to give such relief as the nature of the case may demand.

engraved stone bear record of their deeds, yet will their remembrance be as lasting as the land they honoured. Marble columns may, indeed, moulder into dust, time may erase all impress from the crumbling stone, but their fame remains; for with AMERICAN LIBERTY it rose, and with AMERICAN LIBERTY ONLY can it perish. It was the last swelling peal of yonder choir, "THEIR BODIES ARE BURIED IN PEACE, BUT THEIR NAME LIVETH EVERMORE." I catch that solemn song, I echo that lofty strain of funeral triumph, "THEIR NAME LIVETH EVERMORE."

And now, fellow-citizens, let us not retire from this occasion, without a deep and solemn conviction of the duties which have devolved upon us. This lovely land, this glorious liberty, these benign institutions, the dear purchase of our fathers, are ours; ours to enjoy, ours to preserve, ours to transmit. Generations past, and generations to come, hold us responsible for this sacred trust. Our fathers, from behind, admonish us, with their anxious paternal voices, posterity calls out to us, from the bosom of the future, the world turns hither its solicitous eyes—all, all conjure us to act wisely, and faithfully, in the relation which we sustain. We can never, indeed, pay the debt which is upon us; but by virtue, by morality, by religion, by the cultivation of every good principle and every good habit, we may hope to enjoy the blessing, through our day, and to leave it unimpaired to our children. Let us feel deeply how much of what we are and of what we possess, we owe to this liberty, and these institutions of government. Nature has, indeed, given us a soil, which yields bounteously to the hands of industry; the mighty and fruitful ocean is before us, and the skies over our heads shed health and vigour. But what are lands, and seas, and skies, to civilized man, without society, without knowledge, without morals, without religious culture; and how can these be enjoyed, in all their extent, and all their excellence, but under the protection of wise institutions and a free government? Fellow-citizens, there is not one of us, there is not one of us here present, who does not, at this moment, and at every moment, experience, in his own condition, and in the condition of those most near and dear to him, the influence and the benefits of this liberty, and these institutions. Let us then acknowledge the blessing, let us feel it deeply and powerfully, let us cherish a strong affection for it, and resolve to maintain and perpetuate it. The blood of our fathers, let it not have been shed in vain; the great hope of posterity, let it not be blasted.

The striking attitude, too, in which we stand to the world around us, a topic to which, I fear, I advert too often, and dwell on too long, can not be altogether omitted here. Neither individuals nor nations can perform their part well, until they understand and feel its importance, and comprehend and justly appreciate all the duties belonging to it. It is not to inflate national vanity, nor to swell a light and empty feeling of self-importance; but it is that we may judge justly of our situation, and of our own duties, that I earnestly urge this consideration of our position, and our character, among the nations of the earth. It can not be denied, but by those who would dispute against the sun, that with America, and in America, a new era commences in human affairs. This era is distinguished by free representative governments, by entire religious liberty, by improved systems of national intercourse, by a newly awakened and an unconquerable spirit of free inquiry, and by a diffusion of knowledge through the community, such as has been before altogether unknown and unheard of. America, America, our country, fellow-citizens, our own dear and native land, is inseparably connected, fast bound up, in fortune and by fate, with these great interests. If they fall, we fall with them; if they stand, it will be because we have upholden them. Let us contemplate, then, this connexion, which binds the prosperity of others to our own; and let us manfully discharge all the duties which it imposes. If we cherish the virtues and the principles of our fathers, Heaven will assist us to carry on the work of human liberty and human happiness. Auspicious omens cheer us. Great examples are before us. Our own firmament now shines brightly upon our path. Washington is in the clear upper sky. Those other stars have now joined the American constellation; they circle round their centre, and the heavens beam with new light. Beneath this illumination, let us walk the course of life, and at its close devoutly commend our beloved country, the common parent of us all, to the Divine Benignity.—Webster's Eulogy on Adams and Jefferson, delivered at Boston, August 2, 1826.

"A very great obstacle to the success of this measure heretofore, has been a prevalent opinion, that these petitioners are seeking compensation merely for losses sustained on the depreciation of continental money and certificates received for their monthly wages; whereas, from their first memorial in A. D. 1810, to the present session, they have invariably rested on the non-performance, by Congress, of a distinct and independent contract. All the losses on their monthly wages, they bore in common, and are willing to forego in common with many in the walks of civil life, and with the brave soldiers under their command. This is the plain and decisive reason why none but officers are embraced in the present bill. The contract on which they rely, was made with the officers alone; and gallant and unfortunate as were the soldiers, the officers have endured, and will continue to endure, without repining, still severer sufferings from the worthless money and certificates received for their wages; because those losses were perhaps too large, and too general in all departments of life, ever to warrant the expectation, or practicability, of complete remuneration. I have said severer sufferings on this account by the officers; because the money received for wages before A. D. 1780, worth only one dollar in the hundred, was, to the officers, the only means to purchase camp equipage and clothing, that were furnished to the soldiers out of the public arsenals; and because the soldier often received besides liberal bounties both at home and from Congress.

"Let it then be distinctly understood, that notwithstanding this disparity against the officers, no such losses or depreciations form any part of the foundation for this bill. A moment's attention to the history of that period, will show the true ground of the appropriation. After this unequal pressure had continued nearly three years—after the officers had sustained their spirits during that trying period under such disadvantages, by the force of those principles that led them at first to join in the pledge to the cause, of 'their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honour;' after their private resources had become nearly exhausted in supplying those wants their country was unable rather than unwilling to satisfy, there arose a state of things which led to certain proceedings by congress in relation to half pay.

"The prospect had nearly vanished, that any honourable accommodation could be effected with the parent country. The contest seemed likely to become more severe, and to be protracted for many years; and it was obvious that many of the officers, thus impoverished and disheartened, must actually resign in order to provide themselves with decent clothing, and to maintain their families, and secure any subsistence for advanced life, or that they must receive some assurance of future indemnity, if they continued in service, and abandoned every thing else to sink or swim with the military destinies of their country.

"It was then that the resolve of May 15th, 1778, granting half-pay, for only seven years, to all who continued in service till the close of the war, was passed.

"This short period of half-pay was dictated, rather by the wants of congress to provide a longer one, than from an impression that it was, in truth, sufficient, or in accordance with any similar system in the armies of Europe. Hence, a committee, May 24th, 1779, reported a resolution, allowing half-pay for life to the same class of officers, and justly grounded it on the great risks they were called to encounter, on their great sufferings and sacrifices of youth, ease, health, and fortune, in the cause of their country. But the want of resources in congress, induced them to postpone this subject, and on the 17th of August, 1779, to urge upon the respective states the expediency of adopting such a resolution, and of pledging for its fulfilment their state resources. The power of the states over those resources, was much more effective than that of the confederation over the states. But such were the general gloom and despondency of the times, that not a single state, except Pennsylvania, complied with the recommendation. The currency continued to depreciate more and more, daily; the officers, in many instances, were utterly unable, by their whole pay, to procure decent apparel: treason had penetrated the camp in the person of Arnold: Charleston had been surrendered: Lincoln captured: Gates defeated at Camden: the Southern states overrun by Cornwallis: our soldiery had become discouraged; and the great military leader of the revolution had become convinced, and had urged, with his usual energy, upon congress, that the adoption of this resolution was almost the only possible method of retaining the army together. Under such appalling circumstances, congress passed, on the 24th of October, A. D. 1780, the resolution, which I will now take the liberty to read:

"Resolved, That the officers who shall continue in the service to the end of the war, shall also be entitled to half-pay during life; to commence from the time of their reduction.' (1 U. S. Laws, 688.)

"This, with one or two subsequent resolutions, explaining and modifying its provisions as to particular persons, constitutes the great foundation of the bill under consideration. The promise was most solemnly and deliberately made: the consideration for it was ample, and most honourably performed by the officers: and yet, on the part of congress, its stipulations have, in my opinion, never, to this day, been equitably fulfilled. As to the binding effect of the compact on congress, nobody can pretend to doubt. I shall, therefore, not waste a single moment in the discussion of that point. But I admit that the officers were first bound to perform the condition faithfully, of serving to the close of the war, however long or disastrous. Did they do it? History and tradition must convince all, that through defeat as well as victory, they clung to our fortunes to the uttermost moment of the struggle. They were actuated by a spirit and intelligence, the surest guarantees of such fidelity. Most of them had investigated, and well understood, the principles in dispute, and to defend them, had flown to the field of battle on the first alarm of war, with all the ardour of a Scottish gathering, at the summons of the fiery cross. And it is not poetry, that one of my own relatives, an officer, long since no more, when the alarm was given at Lexington, left for the tented field, the corpse of his father unburied;

‘One look he cast upon the bier, Dashed from his eye the gathering tear,’

and hastened to devote his own life to the salvation of his country. In the same duty—in performing their part of the compact, to serve faithfully to the close of the war, these petitioners endured the frosts of winter, often half sheltered, badly fed, badly clothed, and badly paid. God forbid that I should exaggerate. The naked truth is stronger than any colouring of fancy. We have the authority of their commander, that they were, at times, in such a condition as to be unable and ashamed to receive their friends; but never, I believe, loath to face their enemies. Their paths were sometimes marked by their blood—their courage and constancy tried by frequent alarms, by ambuscade, and the pitched battle; but they never faltered: and when, towards the close of the war, neglect on the part of congress, as to their monthly wages, might have justified, under most circumstances, disquiet and distrust; and when at Newburg they were tempted with the insidious taunt, that if, relinquishing their arms and retiring home with the promises made to them unfulfilled, they would ‘go, starve, and be forgotten;’ yet they disbanded in peace, and expressed their ‘unshaken confidence in the justice of congress.’

“Washington, himself, declared in substance, that by means of this resolve the officers were inspired to make renewed exertions; to feel a security for themselves and families, which enabled them to devote every faculty to the common cause; and that thus was an army kept together, which otherwise must have dissolved, and we probably have been compelled to pass again under the yoke of colonial servitude.

“For all this fidelity to the performance of their part of the compact, the officers have been duly thanked by many congresses, and applauded by the world. They have occupied a conspicuous niche in toasts, odes, and orations, and some of them have animated the canvass and breathed in marble.

“But has the promise to them of half-pay ever been either literally or substantially fulfilled? That, sir, is the important question. I answer not literally, by any pretence, from any quarter. No half-pay, as such, has ever, for any length of time, been either paid or provided for one of the petitioners. Almost as little, sir, can there be a pretence that it has been substantially fulfilled. No kind of fulfilment has been attempted, except in the commutation act, passed March 22d, 1783.

“That act grew out of objections, in some of the states, to the system of half-pay as a system, because not strictly republican in theory, and because every thing of a pension character had become odious by its abuse in some governments, in the maintenance of hirelings who had performed secret and disreputable service.

“Some of the officers being anxious to remove any formal objection, petitioned congress for a commutation or change in the mode of indemnifying and rewarding them. No opposition had been made to the amount or value of the half-pay, and therefore, as appears in the commutation act itself, the officers expected, if a change took place, a full ‘equivalent’ in value to the half-pay for life.

“But instead of such an equivalent, congress gave, by that act, what was far short of an equivalent, whether we regard the particular ages at that time of these petitioners, or their average age with the other officers, or the period they have actually since lived. Congress gave only five years’ full pay to the youngest in the line, and just as much to the eldest; treating the officer of twenty-five, as not likely to live any longer than him of seventy; and subjecting the former to take for his half-pay, which he was entitled to for his whole life, of probably thirty-five years, the same small sum bestowed on him not likely to live ten or fourteen years.

“If we look to the average age of all the officers at that time, the commutation was still inadequate. That age was probably not over thirty; none have pretended to consider it over thirty-five ; and on all observations, in similar climates, and all calculations of annuity tables, such persons' lives would be likely to extend beyond thirty years, and thus their half-pay for life be, on an average, worth the gross sum, in presenti, of at least seven years' full pay. Any gentleman can test the general accuracy of these results, by a reference to Price's Annuity Tables, and to Milne on Annuities. In England, Sweden, and France, it will be seen that a person of thirty years of age is ascertained to be likely to live thirty-four more ; and of thirty-five years of age, to live about twenty-eight more. An annuity for thirty-four years is worth a fraction more than fourteen times its annual amount, if paid in a gross sum in advance ; and one, for twenty-eight years, only a fraction less than fourteen times its annual amount. So that seven years' full pay is as near a fair commutation for the half-pay for life, taking their average ages, as can well be calculated, or as is necessary for the present inquiry.

"Again : If we advert to the real facts, as since developed, these petitioners, had the commutation act not passed, or not been at all binding, would now receive twenty-two, instead of five years' full pay, as they have survived, since the close of the war, over forty-four years.

"Congress, as if conscious that the pressure of the times had driven them to propose a substitute for the half-pay for life, not, in any view, sufficient or equivalent, as regarded the younger officers, who alone now survive and ask for redress, provided in the commutation act, not that each officer might accept or reject it at pleasure, but that it should take effect, if accepted within certain periods, not exceeding six months, by majorities in the several lines of the army. The most influential officers in any line, are of course the elder and superior ones. To these, as a general rule, five years full-pay was a fair equivalent ; and by their exertions the commutation was accepted by majorities in most of the lines, and no provision ever afterwards made for such officers, as were either absent or present, and dissenting.

"No evidence can now be found, however, of any acceptance, even by majorities, in any of the lines, till after the expiration of the six months prescribed. But a report of the secretary of war, dated October 31, 1783, (8 Journals of Congress, 478,) enumerates certain lines and individuals, that had then signified their acceptance. It would be difficult, as might be expected, to find among the individuals named, one who still survives. Those, then, the youngest and now surviving, must have felt deeply the inequality proposed ; and if most of them had not been absent on furlough, by a resolve of congress, after peace was expected, probably even majorities in the lines would never have been obtained. The certificates were made out for all, without application, and left with the agents ; no other provision was made for those entitled to half-pay, and it remained with the younger officers to receive those certificates or nothing.

"But it is most manifest, that congress had no legal right to take away from a single officer his vested half-pay for life, without giving him a full equivalent ; or, to say the least, what the officer should freely and distinctly assent to, as a full equivalent. It would be contrary to the elementary principles of legislation and jurisprudence : and a majority of the lines could no more bind the minority on this subject of private rights of property, than they could bind congress, or the states, on questions of politics. This point need not be argued to men, who, like those around me, have watched the discussions and decisions in this country the last quarter of a century. But no such individual assent was asked here : it was indeed declared to be useless for any minority of individuals to dissent ; the commutation not having been, in any view, a full equivalent, individual assent cannot fairly be presumed. The subsequent taking of the certificates was merely taking all that was provided, and all they could get, without any pretence that they took it as a full and fair equivalent. And hence it follows, that, on the lowest computation, two years more full pay are necessary to make any thing like a substantial fulfilment of the compact on the part of congress. In truth, twenty years more would be less than the petitioners could rightfully claim now, if the commutation act had never passed ; or if the position was clearly established that the commutation act, as to them, was, under the circumstances, entirely null and void. To say that such a transaction, resorted to under the pressure of the times, and finding no apology except in the security and necessities of that pressure, should not be relieved against when the pressure is over, and our means have become ample, is to make a mockery of justice, and to profane every principle of good faith.

"But consider a little farther the history of these proceedings, on the supposition that the five years full-pay was an ample equivalent to all. Was it either paid or secured to them in such manner as to become any thing like a substantial fulfilment of the promise ? Though the act allowed congress to give the officers money or securities, and though these last might be in the form prescribed for other creditors, yet the act contemplated giving them money or money's worth, else it doubly violated the former engagement to give them half-pay for life. The very nature of half-pay, or of any commutation for it, implies that it should be actually paid, or so secured as to raise the money whenever it becomes due. They were here intended as means for immediate maintenance or business to those who, by peace, would be thrown out of their accustomed employment and support. This is too plain for further illustration; and, in conformity with these views, congress forthwith effected a loan in Europe, and paid in money all the foreign officers entitled to the commutation. But how were the petitioners treated? They did not obtain a dollar in money, and even their certificates were not delivered till six or nine months after their right to half-pay accrued; and when received, so far from being secured by pledges or requisitions rendering them valuable as money, the officers could not obtain for them in the market over one fifth of their nominal amount. The receipts given for these certificates truly omitted to state that they were in full payment, of either the commutation or the half-pay. By such means these petitioners, to supply the then existing wants of themselves and families, which was the legitimate object of both the half-pay and its commutation, in fact realized only one, instead of five years' full-pay; or only two years' half-pay instead of half-pay for life.

"If this was a substantial fulfilment of the promise to them, I think it would be difficult to define what would have been a defective, delusive, and unsubstantial fulfilment. But it has been suggested, that the petitioners might all have retained their certificates till afterwards funded, and in that event have escaped loss. Can gentlemen, however, forget that the very design of half-pay was to furnish food and raiment, and not a fund to be deposited in bank for posterity? And that, though the use of a portion of it, if all had been paid at once, might have been postponed to a future period, yet their necessities utterly forbade most of them from not resorting, forthwith, to a single year's pay, which was the entire value of the whole certificate. It is another part of the distressing history of this case, that if, on the contrary, every officer had retained his certificate till funded, his loss on it would have been very near one third of its amount. But on this point I shall not dwell, as its particulars are more recent and familiar. It will suffice to call to your minds, that the provision made for the payment of these certificates in A. D. 1790, was not by money, nor virtually to their full amount, but by opening a loan, payable in those certificates, and a scrip of stock given for them on these terms: one third of the principal was to draw no interest whatever, for ten years; and all the interest then due, was to draw thereafter only three per cent. Without going into any calculations of the value of different kinds of stock, under different circumstances, it is obvious that such a payment or security was not worth so much by nearly a third, as the money would have been worth, or as scrip would have been worth for the whole then due on six per cent. interest.

"It is true that this loan was, in form, voluntary; but it is equally true, that, as no other provision was made for payment, no alternative remained but to accept the terms. Hence, if the officer sold his certificate from necessity, he obtained only one fifth of the amount therein promised: or, if he retained it, he obtained only about two thirds of that amount.

"What renders this circumstance still more striking, we ourselves have in this way saved, and reduced our national debt below what it would have been, many millions of dollars—from eighteen to fifteen, I believe; and yet, now, in our prosperity, hesitate to restore what was taken in part from these very men, and when not from them, taken from others on account of their speculations on these very men, and their associates in arms. It was at the time of the funding thought just, and attempted by some of our ablest statesmen, to provide some retribution to the original holders of certificates for the losses that had been sustained on them—to provide in some way a partial restoration. But the inherent difficulty of the subject, and the low state of our resources, prevented us from completing any such arrangement, though we were not prevented from saving to the government, out of these very certificates, and similar ones, ten times the amount now proposed for these petitioners.

"On this state of facts, then, I hold these conclusions: that what is honest, and moral, and honourable, between debtor and creditor in private life, is so in public life. That a creditor of the public should be treated with at least equal, if not greater kindness, than the creditor of an individual. That when the embarrassments of a debtor give rise to a mode of payment altogether inadequate to what is justly due, and this kind of payment is forced upon the creditor, by the necessities of either party, the debtor ought, when relieved from his embarrassments or necessities, to make ample restitution. That it is the dictate of every moral and honourable feeling to supply the deficiency; and especially, should the debtor do this where the inadequacy was more than four fifths of the whole debt; where the debtor, by a part of the arrangement, saved millions to contribute to his present prosperity, and where the debt itself was, as in the present case, the price of blood lavished for the creditor, the wages of those sufferings and toils which secured our present liberties, and fill the brightest page of glory in our country's history. The great military leader of the revolution has given his sanction to this measure, in the strongest terms, when calling to mind the lion hearts, and eagle eyes, that had surrounded and sustained him in all his arduous trials, and reflecting that they, not soldiers by profession, nor adventurers, but citizens, with tender ties of kindred and friendship, and with cheering prospects in civil life, had abandoned all to follow him, and to sink or swim with the sacred cause in which he had enlisted, he invoked towards them the justice of his country, and expressed the fullest confidence, that 'a country rescued by their arms, will never leave unpaid the debt of gratitude.'

"It is not to be forgotten, that a measure like this would remove a stain from our history. Its moral influence on our population, in future wars, for wars we must expect, again and again: its consonance with those religious, as well as moral principles of perfect justice, which, in a republic, are the anchor and salvation of all that is valuable; its freedom, I trust, from political prejudice and party feeling, all strengthen the other reasons for its speedy adoption.

"Nor have the imputations against it as a local measure, been at all well founded. What is right or just in regard to contracts, is right without regard to the residence of individuals, whether in the east, the west, or the south. But independent of that consideration, these venerable worthies, though once much more numerous at the north than elsewhere, have since followed the enterprises of their children, and pushed their own broken fortunes to every section of the union. It is impossible to obtain perfect accuracy as to their numbers and residence. But by correspondence and verbal inquiries it is ascertained, that four or five survive in New Hampshire; from thirty to thirty-five in Massachusetts and Maine; five or six in Rhode Island; five in Vermont; sixteen in Connecticut; twenty in New York; twelve in New Jersey; eighteen in Pennsylvania; three in Delaware; twelve in Maryland; thirty-three to thirty-eight in Virginia and Kentucky; ten to twelve in Ohio; twelve or fifteen in the Carolinas; and five or six in Georgia. As by the annuity tables, something like two hundred and fifty ought now to be alive, the computations have been made on a medium of two hundred and thirty, between the number ascertained and the conjectural number.

"The question, then, is of a general public nature, and presents the single point, whether, in the late language of an eloquent statesman of New York, these veterans shall any longer remain 'living monuments of the neglect of their country.'

"All the foreign officers, whose claims rested on the same resolve, were, as I have before stated, promptly paid in specie; and their illustrious leader, Lafayette, by whose side these petitioners faced equal toils and dangers, has been since loaded with both money and applause. Even the Tories, who deserted the American cause, and adhered to one so much less holy and pure, have been fully and faithfully rewarded by England: and it now remains with the senate to decide, not whether the sum proposed shall be bestowed in mere charity—however charity may bless both him that gives and him that takes; nor in mere gratitude—however sensible the petitioners may be to the influence of either; but whether, let these considerations operate as they may, the officers should be remunerated for their losses, on those broad principles of eternal justice which are the cement of society, and which, without a wound to their delicacy and honest pride, will, in that event, prove the solace and staff of their declining years.

"I shall detain the senate no longer, except to offer a few remarks on the computations, on which the sum of one million one hundred thousand dollars is proposed as the proper one for filling the blank. Various estimates, on various hypotheses, are annexed to the report in this case, and others will doubtless occur to different gentlemen. But if any just one amounts to about the sum proposed, no captious objection will, I trust, be offered on account of any trifling difference. It is impossible, in such cases, to attain perfect accuracy; but the estimates are correct enough, probably, for the present purpose.

"The committee have proposed a sum in gross rather than a half-pay or annuity, because more appropriate to the circumstances of the case, and because more acceptable, for the reasons that originally gave rise to the commutation.

"On the ground that these officers were, in 1783, justly entitled to two years more full-pay, as a fair equivalent for half-pay during life; and there being two hundred and thirty of them of the rank supposed in the report, their monthly pay would be about thirty dollars each. This, for two years, would be seven hundred and twenty dollars each; or one hundred and sixty-five thousand six hundred dollars due to these petitioners at the close of the war, over and above what they then received certificates for. The interest on that, for forty-four years, would be four hundred and thirty-seven thousand one hundred and eighty-four dollars, which, added to the principal, make six hundred and two thousand seven hundred and eighty-four dollars.

"If to that be added what they lost on their certificates by depreciation, which at four fifths was three hundred and thirty-one thousand two hundred dollars, and the sum without any interest, on the depreciation, amounts to nine hundred and thirty-three thousand nine hundred and eighty-four dollars; or, with interest, to more than a million and a half; or, if the depreciation be considered seven eighths, as it really was, the sum would be still larger. On the other hand, if nothing be allowed for depreciation on the certificates, but one third be considered as lost in funding, that one third, in A. D. 1791, would be about two hundred and four thousand two hundred and forty dollars, and interest since would swell it to six hundred and forty-five thousand four hundred and thirty-four dollars, which added to the two years' pay not received, and interest on that pay, makes the whole one million two hundred and forty-eight thousand two hundred and eighteen dollars.

"Another view of the case, which seems to me the most technical, and which steers clear of any difficulty about the loss, either by depreciation or funding, will lead to about the same result as to the amount. It is this. On the ground that seven years' full-pay was the smallest sum which, in A. D. 1783, could be deemed a fair equivalent for the half-pay for life, then the petitioners got certificates for only five sevenths of their half-pay. Or, in other words, five sevenths of their half-pay was extinguished and paid. The other two sevenths, then, has annually accrued since, and will continue to accrue while the petitioners survive. This two sevenths being fifty-one dollars and forty-two cents per year, to each officer, or eleven thousand eight hundred and twenty-six dollars to these officers, would amount at this time to five hundred and twenty thousand three hundred and forty-four dollars; and the interest accruing on it during only thirty-five years, would make it exceed the one million one hundred thousand dollars proposed. The amount is fairly reached by this view of the case, without a single cent for either depreciation or loss in funding, and thus does not indirectly touch a single fact or principle upon which a similar allowance could be made to any body besides these officers. Gallant, and meritorious, and suffering, as were the soldiers, and none could be more so; worthy and affectionate as may have been the surviving widows, and distinguished as may have been many of the officers' heirs, for filial and generous devotion to smooth their declining years; they all stand on their own cases and merits. None of them have been referred to the committee who reported this bill, and they can all be provided for otherwise, this session, or hereafter, if thought proper. Let the present appropriation be tried first on its own grounds, and then by subsequent amendments of this bill, or by new bills, let an appropriation for other classes of persons be also tried on its own grounds. All I ask and entreat is, that if, either in strict law or in justice, whether grounded upon the original defective commutation, the depreciation of the certificates, or the loss in funding, any member is convinced that the sum proposed to these officers is a fair one, that he will first consider the case of the officers, and support this motion. If any think a different sum more proper, I hope they will propose that sum in due time; and thus let the sense of the senate be fully expressed upon one case at a time, and upon the only case now duly before us. In this manner, only, can any thing ever be accomplished.

"The amount of the sum now proposed, cannot be objected to on the grounds that doubtless caused the losses and sufferings which we are now seeking to redress. The country during the revolution, and at its close, would hardly have been unwilling to bestow twice the amount, had its resources permitted. But, now, such have been our rapid advances in wealth and greatness, by means of the rights and liberties the valour of these men contributed so largely to secure; that the very public land they defended, if not won, yields every year to our treasury more than the whole appropriation. One twentieth of our present annual revenue exceeds it. A fraction of the cost of the public buildings—the expense of two or three ships of the line—one tenth of what has been saved to our national debt in the funding system—a tax of ten cents per head on our population, only a single twelvemonth,—either of them would remove all this reproach.

"But, whatever might be the cost, I would say, in all practicable cases, be just and fear not. Let no illiberal or evasive feeling blast the hopes of these venerable patriots. Much longer delay will do this as effectually as a hard hearted refusal; since the remains of them are almost daily going down to the city of silence. Either drive them, then, at once from your doors, with taunts, and in despair,—or sanction the claim. So far as regards my single self, before I would another year endure the stigma, of either injustice or ingratitude to men like these, I would vote to stop every species of splendid missions: I would cease to talk of Alleghany canals: I would let the capitol crumble to atoms for want of appropriations, and introduce retrenchment from the palace to the humblest door-keeper.

"It has formerly been said, that if these officers are relieved, so must be those of the late war. But, deserving as were these last, the cause in which they fought required much inferior sacrifices—they were not contending under the stigma of traitors, liable to the halter—they were liberally and promptly paid; and whatever small depreciation may have existed in the treasury notes taken for their monthly pay, it was infinitely less than the losses sustained by these petitioners on their monthly pay, and for which they neither ask nor expect relief.

"One other consideration, and I will at this time trouble the senate no longer. The long lapse of time since the claim originated has been objected formerly to its success. But what honest individual shelters himself under a statute of limitation, if conscious that his promise has not been substantially fulfilled? Under such circumstances, it is no defence, either in the court of conscience or in a court of honour; and congress have often shown their liberality in waiving it, where expressly provided to bar an application.

"Here no express bar has ever been provided. Before their first application, the officers waited till A. D. 1810, when old age and infirmity rendered them more needy, and when many years of prosperity had rendered their country more able. However numerous, and technical, and evasive, may have been the objections since interposed, let it not be forgotten, that in performing their portion of the compact, however neglected as to food or wages, they never were heard to plead excuses or evasions, however appalling the danger, whether roused by a midnight alarm or invited to join a forlorn hope.

"Like others, too, it may be imputed to them in derogation, that they were 'military chieftains.' But if, as such for a time, they did, like others, nobly help 'to fill the measure of their country's glory;' so, like others of that class, they have often distinguished themselves in forums, cabinets, and halls of legislation.

"Whatever 'honour and gratitude' they have yet received, is deeply engraven on their hearts; but they now also need—and they ask, only because they need, the additional rewards of substantial justice.

"It remains, sir, for us, whose rights they defended and saved, to say whether they shall longer ask that justice in vain."

On the 4th of March, 1829, General Andrew Jackson took the oath of office. His course as a military commander had been wonderfully successful, and in all republics, the military chieftain has been held in the highest consideration. He was not bred a statesman, nor had he been considered as a leader in senates; but he was energetic, prompt, and fearless. He was initiated in war on the borders with the Indian tribes, and his name was a terror throughout the nations then hostile or friendly to the United States. His successful defence of New Orleans had excited the admiration and awakened the gratitude of the American people. His inaugural speech was short, and full of promises in the way of reform. "Fellow-citizens, (said he,) about to undertake the arduous duties that I have been appointed to perform, by the choice of a free people, I avail myself of this customary and solemn occasion, to express the gratitude which their confidence inspires, and to acknowledge the accountability which my situation enjoins. While the magnitude of their interests convinces me that no thanks can be adequate to the honour they have conferred, it admonishes me that the best return I can make, is the zealous dedication of my humble abilities to their service and their good.

"As the instrument of the federal constitution, it will devolve on me, for a stated period, to execute the laws of the United States; to superintend their foreign and their confederate relations; to manage their revenue; to command their forces; and, by communications to the legislature, to watch over and to promote their interests generally. And the principles of action by which I shall endeavour to accomplish this circle of duties, it is now proper for me briefly to explain.

In administering the laws of congress, I shall keep steadily in view the limitations as well as the extent of the executive power, trusting thereby to discharge the functions of my office without transcending its authority. With foreign nations it will be my study to preserve peace, and to cultivate friendship on fair and honourable terms; and in the adjustment of any difference that may exist or arise, to exhibit the forbearance becoming a powerful nation, rather than the sensibility belonging to a gallant people.

"In such measures as I may be called on to pursue, in regard to the rights of the separate states, I hope to be animated by a proper respect for those sovereign members of our union; taking care not to confound the powers they have reserved to themselves, with those they have granted to the confederacy.

"The management of the public revenue—that searching operation in all governments—is among the most delicate and important trusts in ours; and it will, of course, demand no inconsiderable share of my official solicitude. Under every aspect in which it can be considered, it would appear that advantage must result from the observance of a strict and faithful economy. This I shall aim at the more anxiously, both because it will facilitate the extinguishment of the national debt—the unnecessary duration of which is incompatible with real independence—and because it will counteract that tendency to public and private profligacy which a profuse expenditure of money by the government, is but too apt to engender. Powerful auxiliaries to the attainment of this desirable end, are to be found in the regulations provided by the wisdom of congress, for the specific appropriation of public money, and the prompt accountability of public officers.

With regard to a proper selection of the subjects of impost, with a view to revenue, it would seem to me, that the spirit of equity, caution, and compromise, in which the constitution was formed, requires that the great interests of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, should be equally favoured; and that, perhaps, the only exception to this rule should consist in the peculiar encouragement of any products of either of them that may be found essential to our national independence.

“Internal improvement, and the diffusion of knowledge, so far as they can be promoted by the constitutional acts of the federal government, are of high importance.

“Considering standing armies as dangerous to free governments, in time of peace, I shall not seek to enlarge our present establishment, nor disregard that salutary lesson of political experience, which teaches that the military should be held subordinate to the civil power. The gradual increase of our navy, whose flag has displayed, in distant climes, our skill in navigation and our fame in arms; the preservation of our forts, arsenals, and dock yards; and the introduction of progressive improvements in the discipline and science of both branches of our military service, are so plainly prescribed by prudence, that I should be excused for omitting their mention sooner than for enlarging on their importance. But the bulwark of our defence is the national militia, which, in the present state of our intelligence and population, must render us invincible. As long as our government is administered for the good of the people, and is regulated by their will; as long as it secures to us the rights of person and of property, liberty of conscience and of the press, it will be worth defending: and so long as it is worth defending, a patriotic militia will cover it with an impenetrable ægis. Partial injuries and occasional mortifications we may be subjected to, but a million of armed freemen, possessed of the means of war, can never be conquered by a foreign foe. To any just system, therefore, calculated to strengthen this natural safe-guard of the country, I shall cheerfully lend all the aid in my power.

“It will be my sincere and constant desire to observe towards the Indian tribes within our limits, a just and liberal policy; and to give that humane and considerate attention to their rights and their wants which are consistent with the habits of our government, and the feelings of our people.

“The recent demonstration of public sentiment inscribes, on the list of executive duties, in characters too legible to be overlooked, the task of reform; which will require, particularly, the correction of those abuses, that have brought the patronage of the federal government into conflict with the freedom of elections, and the counteraction of those causes which have disturbed the rightful course of appointment, and have placed, or continued, power in unfaithful or incompetent hands.

“In the performance of a task thus generally delineated, I shall endeavour to select men whose diligence and talents will ensure, in their respective stations, able and faithful co-operation—depending, for the advancement of the public service, more on the integrity and zeal of the public officers, than on their numbers.

“A diffidence, perhaps too just, in my own qualifications, will teach me to look with reverence to the examples of public virtue left by my illustrious predecessors, and with veneration to the lights that flow from the mind that founded, and the mind that reformed, our system. The same diffidence induces me to hope for instruction and aid from the co-ordinate branches of the government, and for the indulgence and support of my fellow-citizens generally. And a firm reliance on the goodness of that Power whose providence mercifully protected our national infancy, and has since upheld our liberties in various vicissitudes, encourages me to offer up my ardent supplications that He will continue to make our beloved country the object of his divine care and gracious benediction.”

General Jackson at once filled up his cabinet with men devoted to his cause. Martin Van Buren, of the state of New York, was appointed secretary of state. He was a self-made man, and had secured the votes of his native state for governor, which office he held when he received his appointment. Samuel D. Ingham, of Pennsylvania, was appointed secretary of the treasury. He had been a member of the house of representatives in the national legislature, and was thought a straight-forward, plain man. John H. Eaton was made secretary of war. He had been a senator from Tennessee, and was the personal friend of General Jackson. John Branch was appointed to fill the office of secretary of the navy. The qualifications he had for this office were not known to the nation at large, but they presumed the executive was fully aware of them, before he had elevated him to that office. John M'Pherson Berrien was made attorney-general. This appointment gave general satisfaction. He was at the time of his appointment a senator from Georgia, and celebrated for his acquirements, eloquence, and discrimination. He had shown his talents as well in the high judicial councils of the nation, as in the senate of the United States. John M'Lean, who had held the office of post-master general, was transferred to the bench on the supreme court of the United States, and William T. Barry, of Kentucky, was put into the office which Mr. M'Lean had filled with so much reputation, that not a man of note in the country wished him removed. A general sweep was made of men in office not favourable to the administration. This was justified upon political grounds, as a course of true policy, and in full accordance with the genius of the government.

The relations of the United States with foreign countries, were in a prosperous situation. Some little misunderstanding existed with the British government, in regard to the West India trade, which was arranged by the plenipotentiary to the court of London, Mr. Louis M'Lane; but this was of no great importance, although thought so at the time.

In 1832, the cholera* raged in the United States,

* The year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, will be memorable in the annals of North America, from the prevalence of a terrible epidemic. The disease which prevailed at this period was called the Asiatic Cholera, or Cholera Asphyxia. It commenced its ravages in the year 1817, in Asia, and after having spread death and desolation over that portion of the globe for nearly fourteen years, it invaded Europe, traversed a portion of that continent, and, without any signs of contagious transition, it eventually appeared on our own continent.

This dreadful scourge of humanity has, from its origin to the present period, mocked all scientific research, all medical philosophy, and all remedial treatment. It has stalked through the land like a destroying angel, regardless of all impediments, and literally gone forth, "conquering and to conquer."

The history of its origin, progress, and treatment, in Asia, has been the theme of many learned physicians. It would be tedious and unprofitable for our present purpose, to enter the wide field of investigation, relative to the various and inconsistent accounts which have appeared on the subject.

We are indebted to "a discourse" of Professor J. M. Smith, of New York, for the best digest of its history and progress in India, and to Dr. Edward Warren, of Boston, for its history and progress in America, in the first year of its visitation.

From the Indian physicians we learn, that the disease first suddenly appeared in the beginning of August, 1817, in Zilla-Jessore, a town about one hundred miles northeast of Calcutta. The disease soon spread to the adjacent villages, and thence extended in various directions through the country of Bengal. It continued in that city for several months, raging with violence from January till the end of May, 1818. The deaths during this period were rarely under 200 a week. The epidemic had now extended from Silhet to Cuttack, and from the mouth of the Ganges to the confluence of this river with the Jumna.

Retiring, for the most part, from Bengal, the disease concentrated its force in the interior provinces, and chiefly in the districts bordering on the Ganges and Jumna.

In Benares, the famous seat of Brahminical learning, 15,000 were destroyed in two months; and at Alahabad, 40 or 50 perished daily. Pursuing its march, it soon reached Goorackpoor, in which district it numbered 30,000 victims in a month. It then proceeded successively to Lucknow, Cawnpore, Delhi, Agra, and other districts along the course of the Ganges.

From the northern parts of Hindostan Proper, the disease took a direction through the Decan, committing the most frightful ravages in Husseinabad, Aurungabad, Poornah, and other districts. On the 6th of August, it appeared in Bombay, having consumed about one year in traversing the Indian Delta, from Calcutta. In this journey, it advanced about fifteen or eighteen miles a day, and tarried from two to six weeks in a place.

The peculiarities of the disease had now been fully developed. Its mode of falling upon a place, and its career in different districts, were singularly capricious. "Sometimes," says the report of the Calcutta medical board, "the disease would make a complete circle round a village, and, leaving it untouched, pass on, as if it were wholly to depart from the district. Then, after a lapse of weeks, or even months, it would suddenly return, and, scarcely reappearing in the parts which had already undergone its ravages, would nearly depopulate the spot that had so recently congratulated itself on its escape. Sometimes, after running a long course on one side of the Ganges, it would, as if arrested by some unknown agent, at once stop, and taking a rapid sweep across the river, lay all waste on the opposite bank."

As yet the cholera had been, for the most part, confined to continental India. In the following year, 1819, it took a wider range, encircling the islands of the Indian Ocean. In Mauritius, it broke out on the 15th of September, and in Bourbon early in December. About the same time it invaded Siam and the adjacent regions. Forty thousand perished in Bankoe. Cochin-China and Tonquin suffered in 1820.

At the close of the year 1820, it commenced its ravages in China, became terrible in Canton, and thence arrived in Peking, in 1821. In this last city, the mortality was so great, that it required the assistance of government for the sepulture of the dead. In China, Mongolia, and other quarters of Central and Southern Asia, and the Philippine islands, it continued to recur for several successive years. In 1822, it reappeared in Java, destroying 100,000 persons. In its northern progress, it reached the confines of Siberia in 1826.

The most westerly point to which the cholera had extended in 1818, was Bombay. In July, 1821, it appeared in Muscat, and other parts of Arabia. The number that sunk under the disease in this new theatre of its action, was not less than 60,000. Death frequently followed in a few minutes after the attack.

Among the many places in the countries bordering on the Persian Gulf, which severely suffered, were Shiraz and Bassora; in the former, 16,000 perished, and in the latter, 18,000, of whom, we are told, upwards of 14,000 died in two weeks.

Pursuing the course of the large rivers, it advanced up the Tigris to Bagdad and Mosul, and up the Euphrates to Syria, reaching Aleppo in 1822. In the Persian empire, few places of note escaped the disease.

In June, 1823, it attacked Antioch; at the same time it ravaged Diaberkur. In August, it invaded Bakus, on the Caspian Sea, and arrived, in September, in the Russian city of Astrachan. At this and gave great alarm to the whole population; but the number of deaths was not great.

point of approach to Europe, the cholera made a pause of several years. It preserved its existence, however, in the countries it had overrun; and especially lingered in Persia, where it recovered its original force in 1829, and in the following year continued to spread through various provinces around the Caspian Sea.

While the cholera was thus raging in the Persian provinces, it again appeared at Astrachan, at the mouth of the Volga. Seven years had elapsed since its first visitation; the second was in the beginning of July; and in the course of its prevalence, 17,000 perished in eight days. It has been estimated, that at this period, 1830, 6,000,000 of people had fallen victims to the cholera in Asia.

It now urged its way along the banks of the Volga, crossed the Asiatic frontier, and spread itself over the greater part of Russia, in Europe; and after following the Don, the Dnieper, and the southern tributaries of the Volga, it arrived at Moscow on the 15th of September, 1830, about two months and a half after its second appearance in Astrachan. On the 26th of June, it entered the imperial city of St. Petersburg, where, at one period, between 500 and 600 new cases occurred daily, and by the 15th of August, 4,000 persons fell victims, out of about 8,000 cases. During the career of this summer, the cholera had passed over most of the countries of Northern and Central Europe. From Archangel, on the White Sea, and St. Petersburg, Cronstadt, Riga, and Dantzic, on the Baltic, it had reached south to Odessa, on the Black Sea.

From its appearance in Jassore, in 1817, down to the year 1830, when it first showed itself in the Russian province of Ouenburgh, it must be observed, that its ravages were not continued in one unbroken course; but, in those places where its occurrence was not simultaneous, years often intervened between its decline in one district, and its reappearance in another.

Since the year 1830, this singular epidemic has traversed Europe in one line, inclining to a northwesterly course; and in spite of quarantine regulations, cordons of troops, and the most assiduous vigilance, it has devastated all those nations lying in its route, has found its way to England and to France, and, at length, reached even the shores of the American continent.

The month of June, 1832, witnessed the first appearance of cholera in North America. This was at Quebec, in Canada; and it appeared almost simultaneously at Montreal. The first place in which the disease manifested itself in Quebec, was a boarding-house in Champlain street, a low, filthy, unventilated portion of the town. The first patient was an emigrant, landed from the steam boat Voyageur, which plied between Montreal and Quebec. It appears, that on the third of June, the brig Carrieks arrived at Grosse Island, the quarantine ground, thirty-nine miles below Quebec, having on board one hundred and thirty-three passengers. Thirty-nine died during the passage, of a disease, the symptoms of which, it was said, corresponded with those of malignant cholera. This arrival produced considerable excitement both at Quebec and Montreal. Medical commissioners were directed to visit Grosse Island, on the 7th of June, who examined the passengers, all of whom had been detained at quarantine. They reported, as the result of their examination, that the passengers were all in perfect health; that the disease had occurred soon after the vessel sailed; and that the last death had been on the 9th of May, twenty-five days before her arrival at Grosse Island; since which time, the surviving passengers had enjoyed good health. The Carrieks had been thoroughly cleansed, and set sail on the 7th of June, all on board being well.

At this moment, whilst the board of health were issuing their proclamation to prove the impossibility of the importation of the disease by the Carrieks, the cholera had already broken out in Quebec.

The steam boat Voyageur left Quebec on the evening of the 7th of June, received passengers, it is said, from different emigrant vessels on the river; and the weather becoming stormy, was obliged to return to Quebec, where she landed about two hundred passengers, most of whom found lodgings in the neighbourhood of Champlain street. She then proceeded to Montreal; but one emigrant passenger died on board, before her arrival at that city. On the

The boundary line, a subject of dispute, has not lately been agitated.

9th, in the afternoon, a second case occurred. On the same evening, four others were seized with the malady, and sent to the hospital, where these died. The disease spread in almost every direction, and there were seventy deaths between the evening of the 8th, and eleven o'clock in the morning of the 11th. The cases continued to increase till about the 18th, when they began to diminish. At one period, the number was estimated at from 250 to 300 in twenty-four hours.

The population of Quebec, in the summer of 1831, was 27,562. The number of deaths from cholera, from the 9th of June till the 2d of September, is estimated at 2,218. The greatest number during one day, was 143, on the 15th of June.

At Montreal, on the 10th of June, an emigrant from the steam boat Voyageur was seized with the disease after an evening of dissipation, and died the next day. The same night, several natives, who held no intercourse with the port, or with each other, were taken ill.

As late as the 12th of June, the existence of the disease was denied; and was not recognised by the board of health until the 13th, when was made their first report. They stated the number of cases for the last twenty-four hours, at 94, and the deaths at 23. On the 15th, they reported 1,204 cases, and 230 deaths, as being, as nearly as could be ascertained, the whole number from the commencement of the disease. The next report estimates the cases for the twenty-four hours at 431, and the deaths at 82; and for the next succeeding twenty-four hours, 475 new cases, and 102 deaths.

There occurred at Montreal, from the 9th of June till the 1st of September, 4,835 cases; and the deaths, during the same period, were 1,843. The greatest number of cases reported for twenty-four hours, was 474, on the 17th of June; and the greatest number of burials, for the same period, was 149, on the 19th of June.

The cholera now extended its ravages to the large towns situated on the St. Lawrence, and the streams which flow into it. It soon appeared at Kamarouska, about 80 miles from Quebec. Previous to the 15th of June, fourteen deaths had taken place at La Prairie, which is nine miles above Montreal; and on the 17th, it showed itself at St. Johns. It soon reached Buffalo. Lachine, Caughnawaga, Coteau de Lac, Chateaugnay, Cornwall, St. Regis, Prescott, Ogdensburgh, Brookville, Kingston, York, Chambly, Plattsburgh, and Trois Rivières, were all visited in their turn. The disease followed the course of the large rivers.

Whatever may be the causes of cholera, and the laws by which its course is governed, it is certainly remarkable, that its march should be so irregular as it has been found to be; not spreading regularly over an extent of country, but occurring in towns and cities at distances from each other, without affecting intervening districts till a subsequent period. Thus, the first case reported in New York occurred on the 1st of July, some days before it appeared at Albany, 150 miles nearer to Montreal.

In the city of New York, the existence of the disease was first officially recognised by the board of health on the 4th of July; though it had, in fact, occurred sooner, namely, on the 28th or 29th of June. The greatest number of cases in this city took place on the 21st of July, when there were 311 cases, and 100 deaths. On the day following, there were 239 cases, and 115 deaths. On the 25th, 153 deaths are reported. The whole number of deaths from the 4th of July till the 1st of October, was 3,407.

In the city of Albany, the cholera made its first appearance on or about the 3d of July. It increased and extended itself very gradually, the number of cases varying from day to day, without a regular increase. The whole number of deaths from the 3d of July till the 22d of September, was 229.

At Philadelphia, which was the next place of attack, it was first recognised by the board of health on the 16th of July. No new cases, however, occurred till the 24th. On the 28th, six cases and five deaths took place. From this time the disease advanced very rapidly, and while its fury was abating in New York, it began to show itself in its most formidable shape in Philadelphia. Upon the 6th of August, the greatest number of cases occurred; there were reported 176 cases, with 71 deaths. The whole number of deaths

The people of South Carolina had, before this time, broached some doctrines in regard to state rights, not acknowledged by the great body of the union. The question was most ably argued in congress, particu-

by cholera, in that city, was 948. Taking the 28th of July as the date at which it commenced its regular course, it required only nine days for it to arrive at its height; nearly the same period as in Quebec and Montreal, and about half the period it required in New York.

At Baltimore, the disease commenced on the 22d of August, from which time, till the 24th of September, the number of deaths was about 600.

In the city of Washington, it first showed itself about the 28th of August, from which time, till the 24th of September, there were reported 177 deaths.

It prevailed also at Norfolk, in Virginia, and traversed various portions of the southern states, where it made great havoc amongst the black, or slave population, who fell ready and easy victims to its influence. Cincinnati and New Orleans suffered severely.

From the north, the disease extended itself along the borders of the great lakes. It soon reached Detroit, where it produced considerable mortality among the troops.

The six eastern states, together with the British provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, almost entirely escaped its influence. Only a few solitary cases occurred in the port towns of Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts, but not sufficient to give it the character of an epidemic; as the cases might, more or less, be traced to individuals seeking refuge from the infected cities. In a word, all these places might be pronounced as having been exempt from the epidemic cholera.

During this season, the disease broke out in Havana, and carried off an immense population, principally slaves.

We have now given an epitome of the history and progress of malignant cholera, from its first appearance in Asia till the period of its ravages in Canada and the United States, at the close of the year 1832. To this history we are induced to add some medicotopographical reflections, suggested by our own observations on this singular malady.

The prominent characteristic of this malady will not justify the name by which it is distinguished, of CHOLERA. The definition of that term implies a morbid bilious secretion, exciting irritation, and griping pains in the intestines, with their concomitant symptoms, vomiting, and purging of coloured, foetid ejections. In the disease under consideration, there is at least a deficiency, if not in all cases a total want, of bile. Its symptoms are summarily these: First, trifling diarrhœa, varying in duration from several days down to a few hours only; then nausea, vomiting, and increase of diarrhœa. Second, a slight blueness of the hands and face, sometimes accompanied by distressing sensation of the chest, followed by vomiting and diarrhœa—dejections being watery, flaky, and light coloured, having almost invariably the appearance of rice water, and unmixed with foetid excrements. Third, cramps in the limbs, blueness extending over the whole trunk, countenance cadaverous, skin and perspiration cold; as also are the breath and tongue; the voice broken to a whisper, and a burning thirst. These constituted the severer cases, which terminated in death from three to twelve hours. Numerous were the cases where there was neither vomiting, purging, nor spasms, and yet they hurried rapidly to a fatal termination.

It is remarked by all writers, foreign and domestic, on this disease, that it always appeared in cities and towns lying on, or in, the immediate vicinity of lakes or rivers; that in its progress from district to district, its course was marked over alluvial soil; and, we believe, in no instance on high ground, where the formation was either primary or secondary. Hence, whatever may be its cause, or the nature of the miasm by which it is engendered, it is only to be found in alluvial formations. In the United States, and in the British American provinces, this has been exemplified beyond a doubt. The disease has, we believe, invariably occurred on alluvial soils, and followed the course of rivers or large streams; not, as has been imagined, by transportation through infected emigrants, or by those who had been exposed in previously infected places; but because such locations only became susceptible to its infecting influence.

Without endeavouring to be minutely particular in our proofs that the disease belongs wholly to alluvial situations, we need only to remark, first, its limitations in Canada, and in the middle, southern, and western states, to lakes, rivers, and streams; and, secondly, to the almost total exemption of our six eastern states, as well as Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, because nearly all that portion of America is of primary and secondary formation. We therefore have reason to believe, that the miasm of this disease, as well as that of yellow fever and plague, can not exist or propagate in districts of primary or secondary formations.

As to the miasm, or deadly poison, which invades the system, and is the primary cause of sickness and of death in this, as well as in other infectious diseases, it has ever been, and probably ever will be, inscrutable by the ingenuity of man. We know that it exists, only from its effects on our systems; but the material constituting its ærial substance, must for ever remain a mystery.

We may theorize, hypothesize, and analogize, but we can never arrive with certainty at the goal of discovery. We would, however, by no means, discourage the inquirer, who may, by analogy, approach the truth, though unable to establish the fact. It is possible even that he may thus strike on the very cause itself; yet its proof must ever remain doubtful. Whatever it be, and however palpable to our senses, yet it would be in vain to contend against it. All that man can do, is to avoid its baleful influence, by a removal from within its atmosphere. He can not prevent or counteract the coming storm, or the dreadful sirocco; he can only seek refuge from the irresistible power of the one, or the malign influence of the other.

The most plausible, if not the most reasonable hypothesis, and the best supported by analogical arguments, is that of the learned professor, Doctor Mojon, of Italy, whose philosophic mind prompted him, at the hazard of his life, to visit Paris, and attend the hospitals during the epidemic, for the sole purpose of investigating the nature and character of the disease. This hypothesis does not embrace, distinctly, either the ærial, aquatic, or tellurian theory; but comprehends what may have an affinity with either, or may be the result of a combination of all. It is the doctrine of animalculæ. If we were to adopt for ourselves any one hypothesis as preferable to, or more rational than another, it would be the animalcular. This idea is not so novel, nor so widely speculative, as many seem to imagine. There lies now before us a catalogue of twenty-four names of both ancient and modern authors of historical reputation, quoted as advocates of the doctrine that animalculæ are productive of both contagious and infectious diseases. Amongst these are Varro, Lucretius, Columella, Vitruvius, Kircher, Fabre, Linnæus, Hautmann, Plenitz, Dessault, Acerbi, Hahnemann, La Motte, Neal, &c. Its discussion, however, would be out of place here, and we must refer the inquisitive reader to Dr. Mojon's treatise on cholera, for the rationale of his doctrine.

However remote from our research may be the first cause of the malady, we may approach at least to a consideration of its effects, as manifested by its premonitory and subsequent symptoms.

Speculations on the effects of unknown causes, are at all times but an exercise of ingenuity in our profession. However, when we can not agree upon the effects themselves, and make even these bend to adopted or preconceived systems or opinions, we are constantly exposed to dangerous inferences, and to fatal results.

To investigate the nature of this disease, and to learn the first effects the miasm has produced on the constitution, we should select, for post mortem examination, such subjects as were temperate in their habits, and apparently in good health when first attacked by the malady. The most correct and numerous of those examinations have been made in the hospitals at Paris, by physicians devoted to the sciences, and in whose accuracy there need be no doubt.

In such cases, the brain will be found sound, or little altered; the lungs sound; the heart, and first portion of the blood vessels, filled with black, liquid blood; stomach containing a quantity of gray coloured fluid; bladder empty and contracted; liver sound, and free from blood; gall bladder containing the usual quantity of bile, of a dark colour; abdominal viscera sound; no signs of inflammation, nor derangement of the internal organs, either of the abdominal viscera, of the stomach, or of the brain. The veins are, however, overloaded with a dark coloured blood, in some parts approaching ink in its appearance. In some cases, the heart, as well as the smaller arteries, are found surcharged with blood, presenting the same colour as that found in the veins.

From all that we have been able to learn, there appears to be a general, if not a unanimous conviction, that there is in this disease a torpid state of the biliary organs, which render them insufficient to furnish the common quantity or quality of bile for the purpose of assimilating the digested mass of food into its elementary portions. This fact has led us to form a hypothesis on the cause of the deterioration of the blood, so remarkably characteristic of this disease.

Our present opinion, we, frankly confess, does not, in every respect, accord with that which we adopted in the early period of the epidemic, respecting the existence of an acrid secretion from the biliary ducts, producing the phenomena consequent to an attack. But, for our hypothesis.

CHYME, we know to be the ingested mass of food which passes from the stomach into the duodenum, or first intestine, and from which the chyle is prepared in the small intestines by the admixture of the bile.

CHYLE is the milk-like liquor observable some hours after eating, in the lacteal vessels, and in the thoracic duct. It is separated, by digestion, from the chyme, and is that fluid substance from which the blood is formed. The lacteal vessels are most numerous in the duodenum, whence, after chylification, the residual mass, with the bile, is propelled into the large intestines, and become alvine.

The chyle enters into the blood in so pure and unmixed a state, that it is occasionally seen swimming on it if a vein be opened some hours after eating. In the thoracic duct it is mixed with albuminous and gelatinous lymph. Its use is to supply the matter from which the blood and other fluids of the body are prepared, and from which fluids the solid parts are formed.

From the nature and uses of chyme and of chyle, we are led to believe that that cause, which will, or does, weaken, or suspend the wonted force and secretory power of that great vascular reservoir of blood, the liver, also leads to a diminution in quantity, if not to a change in quality, of that important secretion called bile.

It must appear evident, from what we have stated above, that the presence of chyle is essential to the process of sanguification, or the formation of the blood, and consequently to the sustenance of its vitality and purity, and to the support of the animal functions. Deprive the blood of chyle but for a short time, and a change, or a want of healthy action, must necessarily ensue; but, cut off its source for a few hours, and an utter deterioration of the blood follows, and death becomes inevitable.

Among the causes that will produce this state of the biliary organs, and their consequent effects, there are some of which we are ignorant, but a few are well known. Among the former is that peculiar constitutional aptitude in the prevailing condition of the human system which has rendered it liable to this epidemic, as it does to all other epidemics. Among the latter or known causes, are fear, apprehension, anxiety. Their effects on the nervous and vascular systems, are too familiar to the common observer to require any physiological comments. The brain, the bowels, the heart, and the secretory vessels, bear daily witness to their influence, and submit to it in many instances, with startling celerity.

Paleness, or a recess of blood from the surface; a general sense of debility, almost to prostration; tremor; a languid circulation and feeble action of the heart: are all, the instantaneous results of fear. We need not carry the effects of enervating causes any farther to prove the strong analogy which such a state of the system bears to the effects of that other and unknown cause, whatever it may be, which induces the premonitory symptoms of cholera. We shall, at all events, endeavour to prove that the effects are the same in the progressive stages of the disease.

CHYME, it appears, cannot part with its chyle without the intervention of a suitable quantity of bile to aid its separation. Bile being deficient in consequence of the torpidity of the biliary organs, it results, that little or no chyle is furnished to the blood. Chyme, unmixed with bile, is naturally of a grayish or light colour, and would pass off by stool or ejection without any other change than its admixture with the common secretions of the intestinal canal, or with the watery fluids taken into the stomach. On this principle, then, we account for the colourless or rice-water discharges from the stomach and bowels.

If, therefore, it is a fact, (and we believe it is now universally admitted,) that there is a deficiency of bile in this disease, and a consequent failure of chylification, we cannot be at a loss to account for the deterioration of the blood. By abstracting chyle, you deprive it of its pabulum. It becomes diseased, dissolved, decomposed, disoxygenated, corrupted. The feeble action of the arterial system denotes its lost power over the heart, and analysis has proved its degeneracy.

It seems to be generally admitted among practitioners of medicine, that in this disease, when the discharges have assumed a dark or coloured appearance, their patient may be considered safe. We believe it; for they evince, that some natural or artificial power has roused the liver and gall bladder from their sluggish and dormant state.

The sudden and rapid progress of this malady forbids us to hope much from the "vis medicatrix naturæ," or power of nature. The frequent suddenness of its attack, the rapid disorganization and dissolution of the blood, the consequent deathlike prostration, and the livid hue of the surface and extremities, call for the most prompt and energetic means at our command. The only remedial agent that appears to us as inductive to such a result, is vomits. These not only produce a salutary revulsion throughout the whole vascular system, but, from their mechanical effect on the liver by means of the oppressive constrictions of the abdominal muscles, cause it to disgorge its contents, and relieve its congestion. Hence, as we have repeatedly observed, immediately after the operation of an emetic in the forming, or in the full state of collapse, as it is termed, a change of colour and of material is induced in the discharges from the bowels, a cessation of spontaneous vomiting, purging, and cramps, and the cure is accomplished by the exhibition of one or more doses of calomel.

* As this question was so fully discussed and explained in the speeches of these gentlemen, we are induced to insert them, it being impossible to give an abridgment that would present a clear view of the subject.

When I took occasion, (said Mr. Hayne,) two days ago, to throw out some ideas with respect to the policy of the government, in relation to the public lands, nothing certainly could have been further from my thoughts, than that I should be compelled again to throw myself upon the indulgence of the senate. Little did I expect to be called upon to meet such an argument as was yesterday urged by the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster.) Sir, I questioned no man's opinions; I impeached no man's motives; I charged no party, or state, or section of country, with hostility to any other, but ventured, I thought, in a becoming spirit, to put forth my own sentiments in relation to a great national question of public policy. Such was my course. The gentleman from Missouri, (Mr. Benton,) it is true, had charged upon the eastern states an early and continued hostility towards the west, and referred to a number of historical facts and documents in support of that charge. Now, sir, how have these different arguments been met? The honourable gentleman from Massachusetts, after deliberating a whole night upon his course, comes into this chamber to vindicate New England; and instead of making up his issue with the gentleman from Missouri, on the charges which he had preferred, chooses to consider me as the author of those charges, and losing sight entirely of that gentleman, selects me as his adversary, and pours out all the vials of his mighty wrath upon my devoted head. Nor is he willing to stop here. He goes on to assail the institutions and policy of the south, and calls in question the principles and conduct of the state which

Although the state of South Carolina assumed an attitude of defiance, President Jackson at once took a most decided course. He was supported by the great body of the people. He issued a proclamation, which we shall insert, fraught with all the sound doctrines of the old school. This manly, bold, and

I have the honour to represent. When I find a gentleman of mature age and experience—of acknowledged talents and profound sagacity—pursuing a course like this, declining the contest offered from the west, and making war upon the unoffending south, I must believe, I am bound to believe, he has some object in view that he has not ventured to disclose. Mr. President, why is this? Has the gentleman discovered, in former controversies with the gentleman from Missouri, that he is overmatched by that senator? And does he hope for an easy victory over a more feeble adversary? Has the gentleman's distempered fancy been disturbed by gloomy forebodings of "new alliances to be formed," at which he hinted? Has the ghost of the murdered coalition come back, like the ghost of Banquo, to "sear the eye-balls of the gentleman," and will it not 'down at his bidding'? Are dark visions of broken hopes, and honours lost for ever, still floating before his heated imagination? Sir, if it be his object to thrust me between the gentleman from Missouri and himself, in order to rescue the east from the contest it has provoked with the west, he shall not be gratified. Sir, I will not be dragged into the defence of my friend from Missouri. The south shall not be forced into a conflict not its own. The gentleman from Missouri is able to fight his own battles. The gallant west needs no aid from the south, to repel any attack which may be made on them from any quarter. Let the gentleman from Massachusetts controvert the facts and arguments of the gentleman from Missouri, if he can; and if he win the victory, let him wear its honours: I shall not deprive him of his laurels.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, in reply to my remarks on the injurious operation of our land system on the prosperity of the west, pronounced an extravagant eulogium on the paternal care which the government had extended towards the west, to which he attributed all that was great and excellent in the present condition of the new states. The language of the gentleman, on this topic, fell upon my ears like the almost forgotten tones of the tory leaders of the British parliament, at the commencement of the American revolution. They, too, discovered, that the colonies had grown great under the fostering care of the mother country; and I must confess, while listening to the gentleman, I thought the appropriate reply to his argument, was to be found in the remark of a celebrated orator, made on that occasion: "They had grown great in spite of your protection."

The gentleman, in commenting on the policy of the government, in relation to the new states, has introduced to our notice a certain Nathan Dane, of Massachusetts, to whom he attributes the celebrated ordinance of '87, by which he tells us, "slavery was for ever excluded from the new states north of the Ohio." After eulogizing the wisdom of this provision, in terms of the most extravagant praise, he breaks forth in admiration of the greatness of Nathan Dane; and great, indeed, he must be, if it be true, as stated by the senator from Massachusetts, that "he was greater than Solon and Lycurgus, Minos, Numa Pompilius, and all the legislators and philosophers of the world," ancient and modern. Sir, to such high authority, it is certainly my duty, in a becoming spirit of humility, to submit. And yet, the gentleman will pardon me, when I say, that it is a little unfortunate for the fame of this great legislator, that the gentleman from Missouri should have proved, that he was not the author of the ordinance of '87, on which the senator from Massachusetts has reared so glorious a monument to his name. Sir, I doubt not the senator will feel some compassion for our ignorance, when I tell him, that so little are we acquainted with the modern great men of New England, that until he informed us yesterday that we possessed a Solon and a Lycurgus, in the person of Nathan Dane, he was only known to the south as a member of a celebrated assembly, called and known by the name of "the Hartford Convention." In the proceedings of that assembly, which I hold in my hand, (at page 19,) will be found, in a few lines, the history of Nathan Dane; and a little further on, there is conclusive evidence of that ardent devotion to the interests of the new states, which it seems has given him a just claim to the title of "father of the west." By the second resolution of the "Hartford Convention," it is declared, "that it is expedient to attempt to make provision for restraining congress in the exercise of an unlimited power to make new states, and admitting them into the union." So much for Nathan Dane, of Beverly, Massachusetts.

In commenting upon my views in relation to the public lands, the gentleman insists, that it being one of the conditions of the grants that these lands should be applied to "the common benefit of all the states, they must always remain a fund for revenue;" and adds, "they must be treated as so much treasure." Sir, the gentleman could hardly find language strong enough, to convey his disapprobation of the policy which I had ventured to recommend to the favourable consideration of the country. And what, sir, was that policy, and what is the difference between that gentleman and myself, on this subject? I threw out the idea, that the public lands ought not to be reserved for ever as "a great fund for revenue;" that they ought not to be "treated as a great treasure;" but that the course of our policy should rather be directed towards the creation of new states, and building up great and flourishing communities.

Now, sir, will it be believed by those who now hear me, and who listened to the gentleman's denunciation of my doctrines yesterday, that a book then lay open before him—nay, that he held it in his hand, and read from it certain passages of his own speech, delivered to the house of representatives in 1825, in which speech he himself contended for the very doctrines I had advocated, and almost in the same terms. Here is the speech of the Hon. Daniel Webster, contained in the first volume of Gales and Seaton's Register of Debates, (p. 251,) delivered in the house of representatives on the 18th of January, 1825, in a debate on the Cumberland road—the very debate from which the senator read yesterday. I shall read from this celebrated speech two passages, from which it will appear, that, both as to the past and the future policy of the government, in relation to the public lands, the gentleman from Massachusetts maintained, in 1825, substantially the same opinions which I have advanced; but, which he now strongly reprobates. I said, sir, that the system of credit sales, by which the west had been kept constantly in debt to the United States, and by which their wealth was drained off, to be expended elsewhere, had operated injuriously on their prosperity. On this point, the gentleman from Massachusetts, in January, 1825, expressed himself thus: "There could be no doubt, if gentlemen looked at the money received into the treasury from the sale of the public lands to the west, and then looked to the whole amount expended by government, (even including the whole amount of what was laid out for the army,) the latter must be allowed to be very inconsiderable, and there must be a constant drain of money from the west to pay for the public lands. It might, indeed, be said, that this was no more than the reflux of capital which had previously gone over the mountains. Be it so. Still its practical effect was to produce inconvenience, if not distress, by absorbing the money of the people."

I contended, that the public lands ought not to be treated merely as "a fund for revenue;" that they ought not to be hoarded "as a great treasure." On this point, the senator expressed himself thus: "Government, I believe, has received eighteen or twenty millions of dollars from the public lands, and it is with the greatest satisfaction I advert to the change which has been introduced in the mode of paying for them; yet I can never think the national domain is to be regarded as any great source of revenue. The great object of the government in respect to these lands, was not so much the money derived from their sale, as it was the getting them settled. What I mean to say is, I do not think they ought to hug that domain as a great treasure, which is to enrich the exchequer."

Now, Mr. President, it will be seen that the very doctrines which the gentleman so indignantly abandons, were urged by him in 1825; and if I had actually borrowed my sentiments from those which he then avowed, I could not have followed more closely in his footsteps. Sir, it is only since the gentleman quoted this book, yesterday, that my attention has been turned to the sentiments he decided course, made him tenfold more popular than before.

"Whereas, a convention assembled in the state of expressed in 1825; and, if I had remembered them, I might possibly have been deterred from uttering sentiments here, which it might well be supposed I had borrowed from that gentleman.

In 1825, the gentleman told the world, that the public lands "ought not to be treated as a treasure." He now tells us, that "they must be treated as so much treasure." What the deliberate opinion of the gentleman on this subject may be, belongs not to me to determine; but, I do not think he can, with the shadow of justice or propriety, impugn my sentiments, while his own recorded opinions are identical with my own. When the gentleman refers to the conditions of the grants under which the United States have acquired these lands, and insists that, as they are declared to be "for the common benefit of all the states," they can only be treated as so much treasure, I think he has applied a rule of construction too narrow for the case. If, in the deeds of cession, it has been declared that the grants were intended for "the common benefit of all the states," it is clear, from other provisions, that they were not intended merely as so much property; for, it is expressly declared, that the object of the grants is the erection of new states; and the United States, in accepting the trust, bind themselves to facilitate the foundation of these states, to be admitted into the union with all the rights and privileges of the original states. This, sir, was the great end to which all parties looked, and it is by the fulfilment of this high trust, that "the common benefit of all the states" is to be best promoted. Sir, let me tell the gentleman, that in the part of the country in which I live, we do not measure political benefits by the money standard. We consider as more valuable than gold, liberty, principle, and justice. But, sir, if we are bound to act on the narrow principles contended for by the gentleman, I am wholly at a loss to conceive how he can reconcile his principles with his own practice. The lands are, it seems, to be treated "as so much treasure," and must be applied to the "common benefit of all the states." Now, if this be so, whence does he derive the right to appropriate them for partial and local objects? How can the gentleman consent to vote away immense bodies of these lands, for canals in Indiana and Illinois, to the Louisville and Portland canal, to Kenyon college, in Ohio, to schools for the deaf and dumb, and other objects of a similar description? If grants of this character can fairly be considered as made "for the common benefit of all the states," it can only be, because all the states are interested in the welfare of each—a principle which, carried to the full extent, destroys all distinction between local and national objects; and is certainly broad enough to embrace the principles for which I have ventured to contend. Sir, the true difference between us, I take to be this: the gentleman wishes to treat the public lands as a great treasure, just as so much money in the treasury, to be applied to all objects, constitutional and unconstitutional, to which the public money is now constantly applied. I consider it as a sacred trust, which we ought to fulfil, on the principles for which I have contended.

The senator from Massachusetts has thought proper to present, in strong contrast, the friendly feelings of the east towards the west, with sentiments of an opposite character displayed by the south in relation to appropriations for internal improvement. Now, sir, let it be recollected, that the south have made no professions; I have certainly made none in their behalf, of regard for the west. It has been reserved to the gentleman from Massachusetts, while he vaunts his own personal devotion to western interests, to claim for the entire section of country to which he belongs, an ardent friendship for the west, as manifested by their support of the system of internal improvement, while he casts in our teeth the reproach, that the south has manifested hostility to western interests, in opposing appropriations for such objects. That gentleman, at the same time, acknowledged that the south entertains constitutional scruples on this subject. Are we then, sir, to understand, that the gentleman considers it a just subject of reproach, that we respect our oaths, by which we are bound "to preserve, protect, and defend the constitution of the United States?" Would the gentleman have us manifest our love to the west, by trampling under foot our con-

South Carolina, have passed an ordinance, by which they declare, 'That the several acts and parts of acts of the congress of the United States, purporting to stitutional scruples? Does he not perceive, that if the south is to be reproached with unkindness to the west, in voting against appropriations, which the gentleman admits they could not vote for without doing violence to their constitutional opinions, that he exposes himself to the question, whether, if he was in our situation, he could vote for these appropriations, regardless of his scruples? No, sir, I will not do the gentleman so great injustice. He has fallen into this error from not having duly weighed the force and effect of the reproach which he was endeavouring to cast upon the south. In relation to the other point, the friendship manifested by New England towards the west, in their support of the system of internal improvement, the gentleman will pardon me for saying, that I think he is equally unfortunate in having introduced that topic. As that gentleman has forced it upon us, however, I can not suffer it to pass unnoticed. When the gentleman tell us, that the appropriations for internal improvement in the west, would, in almost every instance, have failed, but for New England votes, he has forgotten to tell us the when, the how, and the wherefore, this new-born zeal for the west sprung up in the bosom of New England. If we look back only a few years, we will find, in both houses of congress, a uniform and steady opposition, on the part of the members from the eastern states, generally, to all appropriations of this character. At the time I became a member of this house, and for some time afterwards, a decided majority of the New England senators were opposed to the very measures which the senator from Massachusetts tells us they now cordially support. Sir, the journals are before me, and an examination of them will satisfy every gentleman of that fact.

It must be well known to every one whose experience dates back as far as 1825, that up to a certain period, New England was generally opposed to appropriations for internal improvements in the west. The gentleman from Massachusetts may be himself an exception; but if he went for the system before 1825, it is certain that his colleagues did not go with him. In the session of 1824 and '25, however, (a memorable era in the history of this country,) a wonderful change took place in New England, in relation to western interests. Sir, an extraordinary union of sympathies and of interests was then effected, which brought the east and the west into close alliance. The book from which I have before read, contains the first public announcement of that happy reconciliation of conflicting interests, personal and political, which brought the east and west together, and locked in a fraternal embrace the two great orators of the east and the west. Sir, it was on the 18th of January, 1825, while the result of the presidential election, in the house of representatives, was still doubtful, while the whole country was looking with intense anxiety to that legislative hall, where the mighty drama was soon to be acted, that we saw the leaders of two great parties in the house and in the nation, "taking sweet counsel together," and in a celebrated debate on the Cumberland road, fighting side by side for western interests. It was on that memorable occasion that the senator from Massachusetts held out the white flag to the west, and uttered those liberal sentiments, which he yesterday so indignantly repudiated. Then it was, that that happy union, between the members of the celebrated coalition, was consummated, whose immediate issue was a president from one quarter of the union, with the succession (as it was supposed) secured to another. The "American system," before a rude, disjointed, and misshapen mass, now assumed form and consistency: then it was, that it became "the settled policy of the government," that this system should be so administered as to create a reciprocity of interests, and a reciprocal distribution of government favours, east and west, (the tariff and internal improvement,) while the south—yes, sir, the impracticable south—was to be "out of your protection." The gentleman may boast as much as he pleases of the friendship of New England for the west, as displayed in their support of internal improvement; but, when he next introduces that topic, I trust that he will tell us when that friendship commenced, how it was brought about, and why it was established. Before I leave this topic, I must be permitted to say, that the true character be laws for the imposing of duties and imposts on the importation of foreign commodities, and now having actual operation and effect within the United States, of the policy now pursued by the gentleman from Massachusetts and his friends, in relation to appropriations of land and money, for the benefit of the west, is, in my estimation, very similar to that pursued by Jacob of old towards his brother Esau—"it robs them of their birthright for a mess of pottage."

The gentleman from Massachusetts, in alluding to a remark of mine, that, before any disposition could be made of the public lands, the national debt (for which they stand pledged) must be first paid, took occasion to intimate, "that the extraordinary fervour which seems to exist in a certain quarter, [meaning the south, sir,] for the payment of the debt, arises from a disposition to weaken the ties which bind the people to the union." While the gentleman deals us this blow, he professes an ardent desire to see the debt speedily extinguished. He must excuse me, however, for feeling some distrust on that subject, until I find this disposition manifested by something stronger than professions. I shall look for acts, decided and unequivocal acts; for the performance of which an opportunity will very soon (if I am not greatly mistaken) be afforded. Sir, if I were at liberty to judge of the course which that gentleman would pursue, from the principles which he has laid down in relation to this matter, I should be bound to conclude, that he will be found acting with those with whom it is a darling object to prevent the payment of the public debt. He tells us he is desirous of paying the debt, "because we are under an obligation to discharge it." Now, sir, suppose it should happen that the public creditors, with whom we have contracted the obligation, should release us from it, so far as to declare their willingness to wait for payment for fifty years to come, provided only, the interest shall be punctually discharged. The gentleman from Massachusetts will then be released from the obligation which now makes him desirous of paying the debt; and, let me tell the gentleman, the holders of the stock will not only release us from this obligation, but they will implore, nay, they will even pay us not to pay them. But, adds the gentleman, "so far as the debt may have an effect in binding the creditors to the country, and thereby serving as a link to hold the states together, he would be glad that it should exist for ever." Surely, then, sir, on the gentleman's own principles, he must be opposed to the payment of the debt.

Sir, let me tell that gentleman, that the south repudiates the idea that a pecuniary dependence on the federal government is one of the legitimate means of holding the states together. A monied interest in the government is essentially a base interest; and just so far as it operates to bind the feelings of those who are subjected to it, to the government; just so far as it operates in creating sympathies and interests that would not otherwise exist, is it opposed to all the principles of free government, and at war with virtue and patriotism. Sir, the link which binds the public creditors, as such, to their country, binds them equally to all governments, whether arbitrary or free. In a free government, this principle of abject dependence, if extended through all the ramifications of society, must be fatal to liberty. Already have we made alarming strides in that direction. The entire class of manufacturers, the holders of stocks, with their hundreds of millions of capital, are held to the government by the strong link of pecuniary interests; millions of people—entire sections of country, interested, or believing themselves to be so, in the public lands, and the public treasure, are bound to the government by the expectation of pecuniary favours. If this system is carried much further, no man can fail to see, that every generous motive of attachment to the country will be destroyed, and in its place will spring up those low, grovelling, base, and selfish feelings, which bind men to the footstool of a despot, by bonds as strong and as enduring as those which attach them to free institutions. Sir, I would lay the foundation of this government in the affections of the people; I would teach them to cling to it, by dispensing equal justice, and, above all, by securing the "blessings of liberty" to "themselves, and to their posterity."

The honourable gentleman from Massachusetts has gone out of his way, to pass a high eulogium on the state of Ohio. In the most impassioned tones of eloquence, he described her majestic march and more especially' two acts for the same purposes, passed on the 29th of May, 1828, and on the 14th of July, 1832, are 'unauthorized by the Constitution of to greatness. He told us, that having already left all the other states far behind, she was now passing by Virginia and Pennsylvania, and about to take her station by the side of New York. To all this, sir, I was disposed most cordially to respond. When, however, the gentleman proceeded to contrast the state of Ohio with Kentucky, to the disadvantage of the latter, I listened to him with regret; and when he proceeded further to attribute the great, and, as he supposed, acknowledged superiority of the former in population, wealth, and general prosperity, to the policy of Nathan Dane of Massachusetts, which had secured to the people of Ohio (by the ordinance of '87) a population of freemen, I will confess, that my feelings suffered a revulsion, which I am now unable to describe, in any language sufficiently respectful towards the gentleman from Massachusetts. In contrasting the state of Ohio with Kentucky, for the purpose of pointing out the superiority of the former, and of attributing that superiority to the existence of slavery in the one state, and its absence in the other, I thought I could discern the very spirit of the Missouri question intruded into this debate, for objects best known to the gentleman himself. Did that gentleman, sir, when he formed the determination to cross the southern border, in order to invade the state of South Carolina, deem it prudent or necessary to enlist under his banners the prejudices of the world, which, like Swiss troops, may be engaged in any cause, and are prepared to serve under any leader? Did he desire to avail himself of those remorseless allies, the passions of mankind, of which it may be more truly said, than of the savage tribes of the wilderness, "that their known rule of warfare is an indiscriminate slaughter of all ages, sexes, and conditions?" Or was it supposed, sir, that in a premeditated and unprovoked attack upon the south, it was advisable to begin by a gentle admonition of our supposed weakness, in order to prevent us from making that firm and manly resistance due to our own character, and our dearest interests? Was the significant hint of the weakness of slave-holding states, when contrasted with the superior strength of free states, like the glare of the weapon half drawn from its scabbard, intended to enforce the lessons of prudence and of patriotism, which the gentleman had resolved, out of his abundant generosity, gratuitously to bestow upon us? Mr. President, the impression which has gone abroad, of the weakness of the south, as connected with the slave question, exposes us to such constant attacks, has done us so much injury, and is calculated to produce such infinite mischiefs, that I embrace the occasion presented by the remarks of the gentleman of Massachusetts, to declare, that we are ready to meet the question promptly, and fearlessly. It is one from which we are not disposed to shrink, in whatever form, or under whatever circumstances it may be pressed upon us. We are ready to make up the issue with the gentleman, as to the influence of slavery on individual and national character—on the prosperity and greatness, either of the United States, or of particular states. Sir, when arraigned before the bar of public opinion, on this charge of slavery, we can stand up with conscious rectitude, plead not guilty, and put ourselves upon God and our country. Sir, we will not consent to look at slavery in the abstract. We will not stop to inquire whether the black man, as some philosophers have contended, is of an inferior race, nor whether his colour and condition are the effects of a curse inflicted for the offences of his ancestors? We deal in no abstractions. We will not look back to inquire, whether our fathers were guiltless in introducing slaves into this country? If an inquiry should ever be instituted in these matters, however, it will be found that the profits of the slave trade were not confined to the south. Southern ships and southern sailors were not the instruments of bringing slaves to the shores of America, nor did our merchants reap the profits of that "accursed traffic." But, sir, we will pass over all this. If slavery, as it now exists in this country, be an evil, we of the present day found it ready made to our hands. Finding our lot cast among a people, whom God had manifestly committed to our care, we did not sit down to speculate on abstract questions of theoretical liberty. We met it as a practical question of obligation and duty. We resolved to make the best of the situathe United States, and violate the true meaning and intent thereof, and are null and void, and no law, nor binding on the citizens of that state or its officers :

tion in which Providence had placed us, and to fulfil the high trust which had devolved upon us as the owners of slaves, in the only way in which such a trust could be fulfilled, without spreading misery and ruin throughout the land. We found that we had to deal with a people whose physical, moral, and intellectual habits and character, totally disqualified them from the enjoyment of the blessings of freedom. We could not send them back to the shores from whence their fathers had been taken; their numbers forbade the thought, even if we did not know that their condition here is infinitely preferable to what it possibly could be among the barren sands and savage tribes of Africa; and it was wholly irreconcilable with all our notions of humanity to tear asunder the tender ties which they had formed among us, to gratify the feelings of a false philanthropy. What a commentary on the wisdom, justice, and humanity of the southern slave owner is presented by the example of certain benevolent associations and charitable individuals elsewhere. Shedding weak tears over sufferings which had existence only in their own sickly imaginations, these "friends of humanity" set themselves systematically to work to seduce the slaves of the south from their masters. By means of missionaries and political tracts, the scheme was in a great measure successful. Thousands of these deluded victims of fanaticism were seduced into the enjoyment of freedom in our northern cities. And what has been the consequence? - Go to these cities now, and ask the question. Visit the dark and narrow lanes, and obscure recesses which have been assigned by common consent as the abodes of those outcasts of the world—the free people of colour. Sir, there does not exist, on the face of the whole earth, a population so poor, so wretched, so vile, so loathsome, so utterly destitute of all the comforts, conveniences, and decencies of life, as the unfortunate blacks of Philadelphia, and New York, and Boston. Liberty has been to them the greatest of calamities, the heaviest of curses. Sir, I have had some opportunities of making comparisons between the condition of the free negroes of the north, and the slaves of the south, and the comparison has left not only an indelible impression of the superior advantages of the latter, but has gone far to reconcile me to slavery itself. Never have I felt so forcibly that touching description, "the foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the son of man hath not where to lay his head," as when I have seen this unhappy race, naked and houseless, almost starving in the streets, and abandoned by all the world. Sir, I have seen in the neighbourhood of one of the most moral, religious, and refined cities of the north, a family of free blacks, driven to the caves of the rock, and there obtaining a precarious subsistence from charity and plunder.

When the gentleman from Massachusetts adopts and reiterates the old charge of weakness as resulting from slavery, I must be permitted to call for the proof of those blighting effects which he ascribes to its influence. I suspect, that when the subject is closely examined, it will be found that there is not much force even in the plausible objection of the want of physical power in slave-holding states. The power of a country is compounded of its population and its wealth, and, in modern times, where, from the very form and structure of society, by far the greater portion of the people must, even during the continuance of the most desolating wars, be employed in the cultivation of the soil and other peaceful pursuits, it may be well doubted, whether slave-holding states, by reason of the superior value of their productions, are not able to maintain a number of troops in the field, fully equal to what could be supported by states with a larger white population, but not possessed of equal resources.

It is a popular error to suppose that in any possible state of things, the people of a country could ever be called out en masse, or that a half, or a third, or even a fifth part of the physical force of any country, could ever be brought into the field. The difficulty is not to procure men, but to provide the means of maintaining them; and in this view of the subject, it may be asked, whether the southern states are not a source of strength and power, and not of weakness to the country? whether they have not contributed, and are not now contributing, largely to the wealth and prosperity of every state and by the said Ordinance, it is further declared to be unlawful for any of the constituted authorities of the state, or of the United States, to enforce the pay-in this union? From a statement which I hold in my hand, it appears that in ten years—from 1818 to 1827, inclusive—the whole amount of the domestic exports of the United States was $521,811,045. Of which three articles, (the product of slave labour), viz. cotton, rice, and tobacco, amounted to $339,203,232—equal to about two thirds of the whole. It is not true, as has been supposed, that the advantages of this labour are confined almost exclusively to the southern states. Sir, I am thoroughly convinced, that at this time, the states north of the Potomac, actually derive greater profits from the labour of our slaves, than we do ourselves. It appears from our public documents, that in seven years, from 1821 to 1827, inclusive, the six southern states exported $190,337,281, and imported only $55,646,301. Now the difference between these two sums, (near $140,000,000,) passed through the hands of the northern merchants, and enabled them to carry on their commercial operations with all the world. Such part of these goods as found its way back to our hands, came charged with the duties, as well as the profits of the merchant, the ship owner, and a host of others, who found employment in carrying on these immense exchanges; and for such part as was consumed at the north, we received in exchange northern manufactures, charged with an increased price, to cover all the taxes which the northern consumer had been compelled to pay on the imported article. It will be seen, therefore, at a glance, how much slave labour has contributed to the wealth and prosperity of the United States, and how largely our northern brethren have participated in the profits of that labour. Sir, on this subject I will quote an authority, which will, I doubt not, be considered by the senator from Massachusetts as entitled to high respect. It is from the great father of the "American system," honest Matthew Carey—no great friend, it is true, at this time, to southern rights and southern interests, but not the worst authority on that account, on the point in question.

Speaking of the relative importance to the union of the SOUTHERN and EASTERN STATES, Matthew Carey, in the sixth edition of his Olive Branch, (page 278,) after exhibiting a number of statistical tables to show the decided superiority of the former, thus proceeds:

"But I am tired of this investigation—I sicken for the honour of the human species. What idea must the world form of the arrogance of the pretensions on the one side, [the east,] and of the folly and weakness of the rest of the union, to have so long suffered them to pass without exposure and detection. The naked fact is, that the demagogues in the eastern states, not satisfied with deriving all the benefits from the southern section of the union, that they would from so many wealthy colonies—with making princely fortunes by the carriage and exportation of its bulky and valuable productions, and supplying it with their own manufactures, and the productions of Europe and the East and West Indies, to an enormous amount, and at an immense profit, have uniformly treated it with outrage, insult, and injury. And regardless of their vital interests, the eastern states were lately courting their own destruction, by allowing a few restless, turbulent men, to lead them blindfolded to a separation which was pregnant with their certain ruin. Whenever that event takes place, they sink into insignificance. If a separation were desirable to any part of the union, it would be to the middle and southern states, particularly to the latter, who have been so long harassed with the complaints, the restlessness, the turbulence, and the ingratitude of the eastern states, that their patience has been tried almost beyond endurance. 'Jeshurun waxed fat and kicked;' and he will be severely punished for his kicking, in the event of a dissolution of the union."

Sir, I wish it to be distinctly understood, that I do not adopt these sentiments as my own. I quote them to show that very different sentiments have prevailed in former times, as to the weakness of the slave-holding states, from those which now seem to have become fashionable in certain quarters. I know it has been supposed by certain ill-informed persons, that the south exists only by the countenance and protection of the north. Sir, this is the idlest of all idle and ridiculous fancies, that ever entered into the mind of man. In every state of this union, except one, the free white population actually preponderates; while in the British West India islands, ment of the duties imposed by the said acts within the same state, and that it is the duty of the legislature to pass such laws as may be necessary to give full effect to the said ordinance.

(where the average white population is less than ten per cent. of the whole;) the slaves are kept in entire subjection; it is preposterous to suppose that the southern states could ever find the smallest difficulty in this respect. On this subject, as in all others, we ask nothing of our northern brethren but to "let us alone." Leave us to the undisturbed management of our domestic concerns, and the direction of our own industry, and we will ask no more. Sir, all our difficulties on this subject have arisen from interference from abroad, which has disturbed, and may again disturb, our domestic tranquillity, just so far as to bring down punishment upon the heads of the unfortunate victims of a fanatical and mistaken humanity.

There is a spirit, which, like the father of evil, is constantly "walking to and fro about the earth, seeking whom it may devour;" it is the spirit of FALSE PHILANTHROPY. The persons whom it possesses, do not indeed throw themselves into the flames, but they are employed in lighting up the torches of discord throughout the community. Their first principle of action is to leave their own affairs, and neglect their own duties, to regulate the affairs and the duties of others. Theirs is the task to feed the hungry, and clothe the naked, of other lands, while they thrust the naked, famished, and shivering beggar, from their own doors; to instruct the heathen, while their own children want the bread of life. When this spirit infuses itself into the bosom of a statesman, (if one so possessed can be called a statesman,) it converts him at once into a visionary enthusiast. Then it is, that he indulges in golden dreams of national greatness and prosperity. He discovers that "liberty is power;" and not content with vast schemes of improvement at home, which it would bankrupt the treasury of the world to execute, he flies to foreign lands, to fulfil obligations to "the human race," by inculcating the principles of "political and religious liberty," and promoting the "general welfare" of the whole human race. It is a spirit which has long been busy with the slaves of the south, and is even now displaying itself in vain efforts, to drive the government from its wise policy in relation to the Indians. It is this spirit which has filled the land with thousands of wild and visionary projects, which can have no effect but to waste the energies and dissipate the resources of the country. It is the spirit of which the aspiring politician dexterously avails himself, when, by inscribing on his banner the magical words, LIBERTY and PHILANTHROPY, he draws to his support that entire class of persons who are ready to bow down at the very names of their idols.

But, sir, whatever difference of opinion may exist as to the effect of slavery on national wealth and prosperity, if we may trust to experience, there can be no doubt, that it has never yet produced any injurious effect on individual or national character. Look through the whole history of the country, from the commencement of the revolution down to the present hour; where are there to be found brighter examples of intellectual and moral greatness, than have been exhibited by the sons of the south? From the FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY, down to the DISTINGUISHED CHIEFTAIN, who has been elevated by a grateful people to the highest office in their gift, the interval is filled up by a long line of orators, of statesmen, and of heroes, justly entitled to rank among the ornaments of their country, and the benefactors of mankind. Look at "the old dominion," great and magnanimous Virginia, "whose jewels are her sons." Is there any state in this union which has contributed so much to the honour and welfare of the country? Sir, I will yield the whole question—I will acknowledge the fatal effects of slavery upon character, if any one can say, that for noble disinterestedness, ardent love of country, exalted virtue, and a pure and holy devotion to liberty, the people of the southern states have ever been surpassed by any in the world. I know, sir, that this devotion to liberty has sometimes been supposed to be at war with our institutions; but it is, in some degree, the result of those very institutions. Burke, the most philosophical of statesmen, as he was the most accomplished of orators, well understood the operation of this principle, in elevating the sentiments and exalting the principles of the people in slave-

"And whereas, by the said ordinance it is further ordained, that in no case of law or equity, decided in the courts of the said state, wherein shall be drawn in question the validity of the said ordinance, holding states. I will conclude my remarks on this branch of the subject, by reading a few passages from his speech, "on moving his resolutions for conciliation with the colonies, the 22d of March, 1775."

"There is a circumstance attending the southern colonies, which makes the spirit of liberty still more high and haughty than in those to the northward. It is, that in Virginia and the Carolinas they have a vast multitude of slaves. Where this is the case, in any part of the world, those who are free are by far the most proud and jealous of their freedom. Freedom is to them not only an enjoyment, but a kind of rank and privilege. Not seeing there, as in countries where it is a common blessing, and as broad and general as the air, that it may be united with much abject toil, with great misery, with all the exterior of servitude, liberty looks among them like something more noble and liberal. I do not mean, sir, to commend the superior morality of this sentiment, which has, at least, as much of pride as virtue in it; but I can not alter the nature of man. The fact is so, and these people of the southern colonies are much more strongly, and with a higher and more stubborn spirit, attached to liberty, than those to the northward. Such were all the ancient commonwealths; such were our Gothic ancestors; such, in our days, were the Poles; and such will be all masters of slaves, who are not slaves themselves. In such a people, the haughtiness of domination combines with the spirit of freedom, fortifies it, and renders it invincible."

In the course of my former remarks, Mr. President, I took occasion to deprecate, as one of the greatest of evils, the consolidation of this government. The gentleman takes alarm at the sound. "Consolidation," like the "tariff," grates upon his ear. He tells us, "we have heard much, of late, about consolidation—that it is the rallying word for all who are endeavouring to weaken the union, by adding to the power of the states." But consolidation, says the gentleman, was the very object for which the union was formed; and in support of that opinion, he read a passage from the address of the president of the convention to congress, (which he assumes to be authority on his side of the question.) But, sir, the gentleman is mistaken. The object of the framers of the constitution, as disclosed in that address, was not the consolidation of the government, but, "the consolidation of the union." It was not to draw power from the states, in order to transfer it to a great national government, but, in the language of the constitution itself, "to form a more perfect union;" and by what means? by "establishing justice," "promoting domestic tranquillity," and "securing the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." This is the true reading of the constitution. But according to the gentleman's reading, the object of the constitution was to consolidate the government, and the means would seem to be, the promotion of injustice, causing domestic discord, and depriving the states and the people "of the blessings of liberty" for ever. The gentleman boasts of belonging to the party of NATIONAL REPUBLICANS! National republicans!—a new name, sir, for a very old thing. The national republicans of the present day were the federalists of '98, who became federal republicans during the war of 1812, and were manufactured into national republicans somewhere about the year 1825. As a party, (by whatever name distinguished,) they have always been animated by the same principles, and have kept steadily in view a common object—the consolidation of the government.

Sir, the party to which I am proud of having belonged from the very commencement of my political life to the present day, were the democrats of '98; anarchists, anti-federalists, revolutionists, I think they were sometimes called. They assumed the name of democratic republicans in 1812, and have retained their name and their principles up to the present hour. True to their political faith, they have always, as a party, been in favour of limitations of power; they have insisted that all powers not delegated to the federal government are reserved, and have been constantly struggling, as they are now struggling, to preserve the rights of the states, and to prevent them or of the acts of the legislature that may be passed to give it effect, or of the said laws of the United States, no appeal shall be allowed to the Supreme Court of the United States, nor shall any copy of the

from being drawn into the vortex, and swallowed up by one great consolidated government. Sir, any one acquainted with the history of parties in this country, will recognise in the points, now in dispute between the senator from Massachusetts and myself, the very grounds which have, from the beginning, divided the two great parties in this country, and which (call these parties by what name you will, and amalgamate them as you may) will divide them for ever. The true distinction between those parties is laid down in a celebrated manifesto issued by the convention of the federalists of Massachusetts, assembled in Boston, in February, 1824, on the occasion of organizing a party opposition to the re-election of Governor Eustis. The gentleman will recognise this as "the Canonical Book of political scripture," and it instructs us, that "when the American colonies redeemed themselves from British bondage, and became so many independent nations, they proposed to form a NATIONAL UNION," [not a federal union, sir, but a national union.] "Those who were in favour of a union of the states in this form, became known by the name of federalists; those who wanted no union of the states, or disliked the proposed form of union, became known by the name of anti-federalists. By means which need not be enumerated, the anti-federalists became, after the expiration of twelve years, our national rulers; and, for a period of sixteen years, until the close of Mr. Madison's administration of 1817, continued to exercise the exclusive direction of our public affairs." Here, sir, is the true history of the origin, rise, and progress of the party of national republicans, who date back to the very origin of the government, and who, then as now, chose to consider the constitution as having created not a federal, but a national union, who regarded "consolidation" as no evil, and who, doubtless, consider it "a consummation devoutly to be wished," to build up a great "central government,"—"one and indivisible." Sir, there have existed in every age and every country, two distinct orders of men, the lovers of freedom, and the devoted advocates of power. The same great leading principles, modified only by peculiarities of manners, habits, and institutions, divided parties in the ancient republics, animated the whigs and tories of Great Britain, distinguished in our own times, the liberals and ultras of France, and may be traced even in the bloody struggles of unhappy Spain. Sir, when the gallant Riego, who devoted himself, and all that he possessed, to the liberties of his country, was dragged to the scaffold, followed by the tears and lamentations of every lover of freedom throughout the world, he perished amidst the deafening cries of "long live the absolute king." The people whom I represent, Mr. President, are the descendants of those who brought with them, to this country, as the most precious of their possessions, "an ardent love of liberty," and while that shall be preserved, they will always be found manfully struggling against the consolidation of the government, as the worst of evils.

The senator from Massachusetts, in alluding to the tariff, becomes quite facetious. He tells us, that "he hears of nothing but tariff, tariff, tariff, and if a word could be found to rhyme with it, he presumes it would be celebrated in verse, and set to music." Sir, perhaps the gentleman, in mockery of our complaints, may be himself disposed to sing the praises of the tariff in doggerel verse, to the tune of "Old Hundred." I am not at all surprised, however, at the aversion of the gentleman to the very name of tariff. I doubt not that it must always bring up some very unpleasant recollections to his mind. If I am not greatly mistaken, the senator from Massachusetts was a leading actor at a great meeting got up in Boston, in 1820, against the tariff. It has generally been supposed, that he drew up the resolutions adopted by that meeting, denouncing the tariff system, as unequal, oppressive, and unjust, and, if I am not much mistaken, denying its constitutionality. Certain it is, that the gentleman made a speech on that occasion, in support of those resolutions, denouncing the system in no very measured terms, and, if my memory serves me, calling its constitutionality in question. I regret that I have not been able to lay my hands on those proceedings, but I have seen them, and I can not be mistaken in their character. At that time, sir, the senator from Massachusetts entertained the very sentiments, in relation to the tariff, which the south now entertains. We next find the senator from Massachusetts expressing his opinion on the tariff as a member of the house of representatives from the city of Boston, in 1824. On that occasion, sir, the gentleman assumed a position which commanded the respect and admiration of his country. He stood forth, the powerful and fearless champion of free trade. He met in that conflict the advocates of restriction and monopoly, and they "fled from before his face." With a profound sagacity, a fulness of knowledge, and a richness of illustration, that has never been surpassed, he maintained and established the principles of commercial freedom on a foundation never to be shaken. Great indeed was the victory achieved by the gentleman on that occasion; most striking the contrast between the clear, forcible, and convincing arguments by which he carried away the understandings of his hearers, and the narrow views and wretched sophistry of another distinguished orator, who may be truly said to have "held up his farthing candle to the sun." Sir, the senator from Massachusetts, on that, the proudest day of his life, like a mighty giant, bore away upon his shoulders the pillars of the temple of error and delusion, escaping himself unhurt, and leaving his adversaries overwhelmed in its ruins. Then it was that he erected to free trade a beautiful and enduring monument, and "inscribed the marble with his name." Mr. President, it is with pain and regret that I now go forward to the next great era in the political life of that gentleman, when he was found on this floor, supporting, advocating, and finally voting for the tariff of 1828—that "bill of abominations." By that act, sir, the senator from Massachusetts has destroyed the labours of his whole life, and given a wound to the cause of free trade, never to be healed. Sir, when I recollect the position which that gentleman once occupied, and that which he now holds in public estimation, in relation to this subject, it is not at all surprising that the tariff should be hateful to his ears. Sir, if I had erected to my own fame so proud a monument as that which the gentleman built up in 1824, and I could have been tempted to destroy it with my own hands, I should hate the voice that should ring "the accursed tariff" in my ears. I doubt not the gentleman feels very much in relation to the tariff as a certain knight did to "instinct," and with him would be disposed to exclaim,

"And, finally, the said ordinance declares, that

"Ah, no more of that Hal, an thou lov'st me."

But, Mr. President, to be serious, what are we, of the south, to think of what we have heard this day? The senator from Massachusetts tells us, that the tariff is not an eastern measure, and treats it as if the east had no interest in it. The senator from Missouri insists it is not a western measure, and that it has done no good to the west. The south comes in, and in the most earnest manner represents to you, that this measure, which we are told "is of no value to the east or the west," is "utterly destructive of our interests." We represent to you, that it has spread ruin and devastation through the land, and prostrated our hopes in the dust. We solemnly declare, that we believe the system to be wholly unconstitutional, and a violation of the compact between the states and the union, and our brethren turn a deaf ear to our complaints, and refuse to relieve us from a system "which not enriches them, but makes us poor indeed." Good God! Mr. President, has it come to this? Do gentlemen hold the feelings and wishes of their brethren at so cheap a rate, that they refuse to gratify them at so small a price? Do gentlemen value so lightly the peace and harmony of the country, that they will not yield a measure of this description to the affectionate entreaties and earnest remonstrances of their friends? Do gentlemen estimate the value of the union at so low a price, that they will not even make one effort to bind the states together with the cords of affection? And has it come to this? Is this the spirit in which this government is to be adminis-

the people of South Carolina will maintain the said ordinance at every hazard; and that they will consider the passage of any act by congress abolishing tered? If so, let me tell gentlemen, the seeds of dissolution are already sown, and our children will reap the bitter fruit.

The honourable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. Webster,) while he exonerates me personally from the charge, intimates that there is a party in the country who are looking to disunion. Sir, if the gentleman had stopped there, the accusation would "have passed by me as the idle wind, which I regard not." But, when he goes on to give to his accusation a local habitation and a name, by quoting the expression of a distinguished citizen of South Carolina, (Dr. Cooper,) "that it was time for the south to calculate the value of the union," and, in the language of the bitterest sarcasm, adds, "surely, then, the union can not last longer than July, 1831," it is impossible to mistake either the allusion or the object of the gentleman. Now, Mr. President, I call upon every one who hears me to bear witness, that this controversy is not of my seeking. The senate will do me the justice to remember, that at the time this unprovoked and uncalled for attack was made upon the south, not one word had been uttered by me in disparagement of New England, nor had I made the most distant allusion, either to the senator from Massachusetts, or the state he represents. But, sir, that gentleman has thought proper, for purposes best known to himself, to strike the south through me, the most unworthy of her servants. He has crossed the border, he has invaded the state of South Carolina, is making war upon her citizens, and endeavouring to overthrow her principles and her institutions. Sir, when the gentleman provokes me to such a conflict, I meet him at the threshold. I will struggle while I have life, for our altars and our fire-sides, and if God gives me strength, I will drive back the invader discomfited. Nor shall I stop there. If the gentleman provokes the war, he shall have war. Sir, I will not stop at the border, I will carry the war into the enemies' territory, and not consent to lay down my arms, until I shall have obtained "indemnity for the past, and security for the future." It is with unfeigned reluctance, Mr. President, that I enter upon the performance of this part of my duty. I shrink almost instinctively from a course, however necessary, which may have a tendency to excite sectional feelings, and sectional jealousies. But, sir, the task has been forced upon me, and I proceed right onward to the performance of my duty; be the consequences what they may, the responsibility is with those who have imposed upon me this necessity. The senator from Massachusetts has thought proper to cast the first stone, and if he shall find, according to a homely adage, "that he lives in a glass house," on his head be the consequences. The gentleman has made a great flourish about his fidelity to Massachusetts. I shall make no professions of zeal for the interests and honour of South Carolina—of that my constituents shall judge. If there be one state in this union, Mr. President, (and I say it not in a boastful spirit,) that may challenge comparison with any other, for a uniform, zealous, ardent, and uncalculating devotion to the union, that state is South Carolina. Sir, from the very commencement of the revolution, up to this hour, there is no sacrifice, however great, she has not cheerfully made; no service she has ever hesitated to perform. She has adhered to you in your prosperity, but in your adversity, she has clung to you with more than filial affection. No matter what was the condition of her domestic affairs, though deprived of her resources, divided by parties, or surrounded by difficulties, the call of the country has been to her as the voice of God. Domestic discord ceased at the sound; every man became at once reconciled to his brethren, and the sons of Carolina were all seen crowding together on the temple, bringing their gifts to the altar of their common country. What, sir, was the conduct of the south during the revolution? Sir, I honour New England for her conduct in that glorious struggle. But great as is the praise which belongs to her, I think at least equal honour is due to the south. They espoused the quarrel of their brethren, with a generous zeal, which did not suffer them to stop to calculate their interest in the dispute. Favourites of the mother country, possessed of neither ships nor seamen to create commercial rivalry, they might have found in their situation a guarantee, that their trade would be for ever fostered or closing the ports of the said state, or otherwise obstructing the free ingress or egress of vessels to and from the said ports, or any other act of the federal and protected by Great Britain. But, trampling on all considerations either of interest or of safety, they rushed into the conflict, and, fighting for principle, periled all in the sacred cause of freedom. Never was there exhibited in the history of the world, higher examples of noble daring, dreadful suffering, and heroic endurance, than by the whigs of Carolina, during the revolution. The whole state, from the mountains to the sea, was overrun by an overwhelming force of the enemy. The fruits of industry perished on the spot where they were produced, or were consumed by the foe. The "plains of Carolina" drank up the most precious blood of her citizens! Black and smoking ruins marked the places which had been the habitations of her children! Driven from their homes, into the gloomy and almost impenetrable swamps, even there the spirit of liberty survived, and South Carolina (sustained by the example of her Sumpters and her Marions) proved, by her conduct, that though her soil might be overrun, the spirit of her people was invincible.

But, sir, our country was soon called upon to engage in another revolutionary struggle, and that too was a struggle for principle. I mean the political revolution which dates back to '98, and which, if it had not been successfully achieved, would have left us none of the fruits of the revolution of '76. The revolution of '98 restored the constitution, rescued the liberty of the citizen from the grasp of those who were aiming at its life, and, in the emphatic language of Mr. Jefferson, "saved the constitution at its last gasp." And by whom was it achieved? By the south, sir, aided only by the democracy of the north and west.

I come now to the war of 1812, a war which I well remember was called, in derision, (while its event was doubtful,) the southern war, and sometimes the Carolina war; but which is now universally acknowledged to have done more for the honour and prosperity of the country, than all other events in our history put together. What, sir, were the objects of that war? "Free trade and sailors' rights!" It was for the protection of northern shipping, and New England seamen, that the country flew to arms. What interest had the south in that contest? If they had sat down coldly to calculate the value of their interests involved in it, they would have found that they had every thing to lose, and nothing to gain. But, sir, with that generous devotion to country so characteristic of the south, they only asked, if the rights of any portion of their fellow-citizens had been invaded; and when told that northern ships and New England seamen had been arrested on the common highway of nations, they felt that the honour of their country was assailed; and acting on that exalted sentiment, "which feels a stain like a wound," they resolved to seek, in open war, for a redress of those injuries, which it did not become freemen to endure. Sir, the whole south, animated as by a common impulse, cordially united in declaring and promoting that war. South Carolina sent to your councils, as the advocates and supporters of that war, the noblest of her sons. How they fulfilled that trust, let a grateful country tell. Not a measure was adopted, not a battle fought, not a victory won, which contributed, in any degree, to the success of that war, to which southern councils and southern valour did not largely contribute. Sir, since South Carolina is assailed, I must be suffered to speak it to her praise, that at the very moment when, in one quarter, we heard it solemnly proclaimed, "that it did not become a religious and moral people to rejoice at the victories of our army or our navy," her legislature unanimously

"Resolved, That we will cordially support the government in the vigorous prosecution of the war, until a peace can be obtained on honourable terms; and we will cheerfully submit to every privation that may be required of us, by our government, for the accomplishment of this object."

South Carolina redeemed that pledge. She threw open her treasury to the government. She put at the absolute disposal of the officers of the United States all that she possessed—her men, her money, and her arms. She appropriated half a million of dollars, on her own account, in defence of her maritime frontier; ordered a brigade of state troops to be raised; and, when left to pro-government to coerce the state, shut up her ports, destroy or harass her commerce, or to enforce the said acts otherwise than through the civil tribunals tect herself by her own means, never suffered the enemy to touch her soil, without being instantly driven off or captured.

Such, sir, was the conduct of the south—such the conduct of my own state, in that dark hour “which tried men’s souls.”

When I look back and contemplate the spectacle exhibited at that time, in another quarter of the union; when I think of the conduct of certain portions of New England, and remember the part which was acted on that memorable occasion by the political associates of the gentleman from Massachusetts; nay, when I follow that gentleman into the councils of the nation, and listen to his voice during the darkest period of the war, I am indeed astonished that he should venture to touch upon the topics which he has introduced into this debate. South Carolina reproached by Massachusetts! And from whom does the accusation come? Not from the democracy of New England; for they have been in times past, as they are now, the friends and allies of the south. No, sir, the accusation comes from that party whose acts, during the most trying and eventful period of our national history, were of such a character, that their own legislature, but a few years ago, actually blotted them out from their records, as a stain upon the honour of the country. But how can they ever be blotted out from the recollection of any one who had a heart to feel, a mind to comprehend, and a memory to retain, the events of that day! Sir, I shall not attempt to write the history of the party in New England, to which I have alluded—the war party in peace, and the peace party in war. That task I shall leave to some future biographer of Nathan Dane, and I doubt not it will be found quite easy to prove, that the peace party of Massachusetts were the only defenders of their country, during the war, and actually achieved all our victories, by land and sea. In the mean time, sir, and until that history shall be written, I propose, with the feeble and glimmering lights which I possess, to review the conduct of this party, in connexion with the war, and the events which immediately preceded it.

It will be recollected, sir, that our great cause of quarrel with Great Britain, were her depredations on northern commerce, and the impressment of New England seamen. From every quarter we were called upon for protection. Importunate as the west is now represented to be, on another subject, the importunity of the east, on that occasion, was far greater. I hold in my hands the evidence of the fact. Here are petitions, memorials, and remonstrances, from all parts of New England, setting forth the injustice, the oppressions, the depredations, the insults, the outrages, committed by Great Britain against the unoffending commerce and seamen of New England, and calling upon congress for redress. Sir, I can not stop to read these memorials. In that from Boston, after stating the alarming and extensive condemnation of our vessels by Great Britain, which threatened “to sweep our commerce from the face of the ocean,” and “to involve our merchants in bankruptcy,” they called upon the government “to assert our rights, and to adopt such measures as will support the dignity and honour of the United States.”

From Salem, we heard a language still more decisive; they call explicitly for “an appeal to arms,” and pledge their lives and property in support of any measures which congress might adopt. From Newburyport, an appeal was made “to the firmness and justice of the government to obtain compensation and protection.” It was here, I think, that when the war was declared, it was resolved “to resist our own government, even unto blood!” (Olive Branch, p. 101.)

In other quarters, the common language of that day was, that our commerce and our seamen were entitled to protection, and that it was the duty of the government to afford it at every hazard. The conduct of Great Britain, we were then told, was “an outrage upon our national independence.” These clamours, which commenced as early as January, 1806, were continued up to 1812. In a message from the governor of one of the New England states, as late as the 10th of October, 1811, this language is held: “a manly and decisive course has become indispensable: a course to satisfy foreign nations, that while we desire peace, we have the means and of the country, as inconsistent with the longer continuance of South Carolina in the Union; and that the people of the said state will thenceforth hold the spirit to repel aggression. We are false to ourselves, when our commerce or our territory is invaded with impunity.”

About this time, however, a remarkable change was observable in the tone and temper of those who had been endeavouring to force the country into a war. The language of complaint was changed into that of insult, and calls for protection converted into reproaches: “smoke, smoke,” (says one writer,) “my life on it, our executive has no more idea of declaring war, than my grandmother.” “The committee of ways and means,” (says another,) “have come out with their Pandora’s box of taxes, and yet nobody dreams of war.” “Congress do not mean to declare war; they dare not.” But why multiply examples? An honourable member of the other house, from the city of Boston, (Mr. Quincy, in a speech delivered on the 3d of April, 1812, says, “Neither promises, nor threats, nor asseverations, nor oaths, will make me believe that you will go to war. The navigation states are sacrificed, and the spirit and character of the country prostrated by fear and avarice.” “You can not,” said the same gentleman, on another occasion, “be kicked into a war.”

Well, sir, the war at length came, and what did we behold? The very men who had been for six years clamorous for war, and for whose protection it was waged, became at once equally clamorous against it. They had received a miraculous visitation; a new light suddenly beamed upon their minds; the scales fell from their eyes, and it was discovered that the war was declared from “subserviency to France;” and that congress and the executive “had sold themselves to Napoleon;” that Great Britain had, in fact, “done us no essential injury;” that she “was the bulwark of our religion;” that where “she took one of our ships, she protected twenty;” and that if Great Britain had impressed a few of our seamen, it was because “she could not distinguish them from her own.” And so far did this spirit extend, that a committee of the Massachusetts legislature actually fell to calculation, and discovered, to their infinite satisfaction, but to the astonishment of all the world beside, that only eleven Massachusetts sailors had ever been impressed. Never shall I forget the appeals that had been made to the sympathies of the south, in behalf of the “thousands of impressed Americans,” who had been torn from their families and friends, and “immured in the floating dungeons of Britain.” The most touching pictures were drawn of the hard condition of the American sailor, “treated like a slave,” forced to fight the battles of his enemy, “lashed to the mast to be shot at like a dog.” But, sir, the very moment we had taken up arms in their defence, it was discovered that all these were mere “fictions of the brain,” and that the whole number in the state of Massachusetts was but eleven; and that even these had been “taken by mistake.” Wonderful discovery! The secretary of state had collected authentic lists of no less than six thousand impressed Americans. Lord Castlereagh himself acknowledged sixteen hundred. Calculations on the basis of the number found on board of the Guerriere, the Macedonian, the Java, and other British ships, (captured by the skill and gallantry of those heroes, whose achievements are the treasured monuments of their country’s glory,) fixed the number at seven thousand; and yet, it seems, Massachusetts had lost but eleven! Eleven Massachusetts sailors taken by mistake! A cause of war indeed! Their ships, too, the capture of which had threatened “universal bankruptcy,” it was discovered that Great Britain was their friend and protector; “where she had taken one, she had protected twenty.” Then was the discovery made, that subserviency to France, hostility to commerce, “a determination on the part of the south and the west to break down the eastern states;” and especially, (as reported by a committee of the Massachusetts legislature,) “to force the sons of commerce to populate the wilderness,” were the true causes of the war. (Olive Branch, pages 134, 291.)

But let us look a little further into the conduct of the peace party of New England, at that important crisis. Whatever difference of opinion might have existed as to the causes of the war, the country had a right to expect, that when once involved in the contest, all America would have cordially united in its support. Sir, the war themselves absolved from all further obligation to maintain or preserve their political connexion with the people of the other states, and will forthwith effected, in its progress, a union of all parties at the south. But not so in New England; there, great efforts were made to stir up the minds of the people to oppose it. Nothing was left undone to embarrass the financial operations of the government, to prevent the enlistment of troops, to keep back the men and money of New England from the service of the union, to force the president from his seat. Yes, sir, "the island of Elba! or a halter!" were the alternatives they presented to the excellent and venerable James Madison. Sir, the war was further opposed, by openly carrying on illicit trade with the enemy; by permitting that enemy to establish herself on the very soil of Massachusetts; and by opening a free trade between Great Britain and America, with a separate custom-house. Yes, sir, those who can not endure the thought that we should insist on a free trade in time of profound peace, could, without scruple, claim and exercise the right of carrying on a free trade with the enemy in a time of war; and, finally, by getting up the renowned "Hartford convention," and preparing the way for an open resistance to the government, and a separation of the states. Sir, if I am asked for the proof of those things, I fearlessly appeal to contemporary history, to the public documents of the country, to the recorded opinion and acts of public assemblies, to the declaration and acknowledgments, since made, of the executive and legislature of Massachusetts herself.

Sir, the time has not been allowed me to trace this subject through, even if I had been disposed to do so. But I can not refrain from referring to one or two documents, which have fallen in my way since this debate began. I read, sir, from the Olive Branch of Matthew Carey, in which are collected "the actings and doings" of the peace party of New England, during the continuance of the embargo and the war. I know the senator from Massachusetts will respect the high authority of his political friend and fellow-labourer in the great cause of "domestic industry."

In page 301 of this work, is a detailed account of the measures adopted in Massachusetts during the war, for the express purpose of embarrassing the financial operations of the government, by preventing loans, and thereby driving our rulers from their seats, and forcing the country into a dishonourable peace. It appears that the Boston banks commenced an operation, by which a run was to be made upon all the banks to the south; at the same time stopping their own discounts, the effect of which was to produce a sudden and most alarming diminution of the circulating medium, and universal distress over the whole country, a distress which they failed not to attribute to the "unholy war."

To such an extent was this system carried, that it appears from a statement of the condition of the Boston banks, made up in January, 1814, that with nearly $5,000,000 of specie in their vaults, they had but $2,000,000 of bills in circulation. It is added by Carey, that at this very time an extensive trade was carried on in British government bills, for which specie was sent to Canada, for the payment of the British troops, then laying waste our northern frontier, and this too at the very moment when New England ships, sailing under British licenses, (a trade declared to be lawful by the courts both of Great Britain and Massachusetts,) were supplying with provisions those very armies destined for the invasion of our own shores. Sir, the author of the Olive Branch, with a holy indignation, denounces these acts as "treasonable!" "giving aid and comfort to the enemy." I shall not follow his example. But I will ask, with what justice or propriety can the south be accused of disloyalty from that quarter? If we had any evidence that the senator from Massachusetts had admonished his brethren then, he might, with a better grace, assume the office of admonishing us now.

When I look at the measures adopted in Boston at that day, to deprive the government of the necessary means for carrying on the war, and think of the success and the consequences of these measures, I feel my pride as an American humbled in the dust. Hear, sir, the language of that day; I read from pages 301 and 302 of the Olive Branch: "Let no man who wishes to continue the war, by active means, by vote, or lending money, dare to prostrate himself at the altar on the fast day." "Will federalists subscribe to the loan? Will they lend money to our national rulers? It is impossible. First, because of the principal; and, secondly, because of the principal and interest." "Do not prevent the abusers of their trust from becoming bankrupt. Do not prevent them from becoming odious to the public, and being replaced by better men." "Any federalist who lends money to government, must go and shake hands with James Madison, and claim fellowship with Felix Grundy. (I beg pardon of my honourable friend from Tennessee; but he is in good company. I had thought it was 'James Madison, Felix Grundy, and the devil.') Let him no more call himself a federalist, and a friend to his country—he will be called by others infamous," &c.

Sir, the spirit of the people sunk under these appeals. Such was the effect produced by them on the public mind, that the very agents of the government (as appears from their public advertisements, now before me) could not obtain loans, without a pledge that "the names of the subscribers should not be known." Here are the advertisements: "the names of all subscribers (say Gilbert and Dean, the brokers employed by government) shall be known only to the undersigned." As if those who came forward to aid their country in the hour of her utmost need, were engaged in some dark and foul conspiracy, they were assured "that their names should not be known." Can any thing show more conclusively the unhappy state of public feeling, which prevailed at that day, than this single fact? Of the same character with these measures was the conduct of Massachusetts, in withholding her militia from the service of the United States, and devising measures for withdrawing her quota of the taxes, thereby attempting, not merely to cripple the resources of the country, but actually depriving the government (as far as depended upon her) of all the means of carrying on the war—of the bone, and muscle, and sinews of war—"of man and steel—the soldier and his sword." But it seems Massachusetts was to reserve her resources for herself—she was to defend and protect her own shores. And how was that duty performed? In some places on the coast neutrality was declared, and the enemy was suffered to invade the soil of Massachusetts, and allowed to occupy her territory, until the peace, without one effort to rescue it from his grasp. Nay, more, while our own government and our rulers were considered as enemies, the troops of the enemy were treated like friends—the most intimate commercial relations were established with them, and maintained up to the peace. At this dark period of our national affairs, where was the senator from Massachusetts? How were his political associates employed? "Calculating the value of the union?" Yes, sir, that was the propitious moment, when our country stood alone, the last hope of the world, struggling for her existence against the colossal power of Great Britain, "concentrated in one mighty effort to crush us at a blow"—that was the chosen hour to revive the grand scheme of building up "a great northern confederacy"—a scheme which, it is stated in the work before me, had its origin as far back as the year 1796, and which appears never to have been entirely abandoned. In the language of the writers of that day, (1796,) "rather than have a constitution such as the anti-federalists were contending for, (such as we now are contending for,) the union ought to be dissolved;" and to prepare the way for that measure, the same methods were resorted to then, that have always been relied on for that purpose, exciting prejudice against the south. Yes, sir, our northern brethren were then told, "that if the negroes were good for food, their southern masters would claim the right to destroy them at pleasure." (Olive Branch, p. 267.) Sir, in 1814, all these topics were revived. Again we heard of "a northern confederacy;" "the slave states by themselves;" "the mountains are the natural boundary;" we want neither "the counsels nor the power of the west," &c. &c. The papers teemed with accusations against the south and the west, and the calls for a dissolution of all connexion with them, were loud and strong. I can not consent to go through the disgusting details. But to show the height to which the spirit of disaffection was carried, I will take you to the temple of the living God, and show you that sacred place (which should be devoted to the exten-

"And whereas, the said ordinance prescribes to the people of South Carolina a course of conduct in direct violation of their duty as citizens of the United sion of "peace on earth and good will towards men," where "one day's truce ought surely to be allowed to the dissensions and animosities of mankind") converted into a fiere arena of political strife, where, from the lips of the priest standing between the horns of the altar, there went forth the most terrible denunciations against all who should be true to their country, in the hour of her utmost need.

"If you do not wish," said a reverend clergyman, in a sermon preached in Boston, on the 23d of July, 1812, "to become the slaves of those who own slaves, and who are themselves the slaves of French slaves, you must either, in the language of the day, cut the connexion, or so far alter the national compact, as to ensure to yourselves a due share in the government." (Olive Branch, page 319.) "The union," says the same writer, (page 320,) "has been long since virtually dissolved, and it is full time that this part of the disunited states should take care of itself."

Another reverend gentleman, pastor of a church at Medford, (page 321,) issues his anathema—"LET HIM STAND ACCUSED"—against all who, by their "personal services," or "loans of money," "conversation," or "writing," or "influence," gives countenance or support to the unrighteous war, in the following terms: "that man is an accomplice in the wickedness—he loads his conscience with the blackest crimes—he brings the guilt of blood upon his soul, and, in the sight of God and his law, he is a MURDERER."

One or two more quotations, sir, and I shall have done. A reverend doctor of divinity, the pastor of a church at Byfield, Massachusetts, on the 7th of April, 1814, thus addresses his flock, (page 321)—"The Israelites became weary of yielding the fruit of their labour to pamper their splendid tyrants. They left their political woes. THEY SEPARATED. Where is our Moses? Where the rod of his miracles? Where is our Aaron? Alas! no voice from the burning bush has directed them here."

"We must trample on the mandates of despotism, or remain slaves for ever." (Page 322.) "You must drag the chains of Virginian despotism, unless you discover some other mode of escape." "Those western states, which have been violent for this abominable war, those states which have thirsted for blood—God has given them blood to drink." (Page 323.) Mr. President, I can go no further. The records of the day are full of such sentiments, issued from the press, spoken in public assemblies, pouring out from the sacred desk! God forbid, sir, that I should charge the people of Massachusetts with participating in these sentiments. The south and the west had there, their friends—men who stood by their country, though encompassed all around by their enemies. The senator from Massachusetts (Mr. Silsbee) was one of them; the senator from Connecticut (Mr. Foot) was another; and there are others now on this floor. The sentiments I have read were the sentiments of a party embracing the political associates of the gentleman from Massachusetts. If they could only be found in the columns of a newspaper, in a few occasional pamphlets, issued by men of intemperate feeling, I should not consider them as affording any evidence of the opinions even of the peace party of New England. But, sir, they were the common language of that day; they pervaded the whole land; they were issued from the legislative hall, from the pulpit, and the press. Our books are full of them. And there is no man who now hears me, but knows, that they were the sentiments of a party, by whose members they were promulgated. Indeed, no evidence of this would seem to be required, beyond the fact, that such sentiments found their way even into the pulpits of New England. What must be the state of public opinion, where any respectable clergyman would venture to preach, and to print sermons, containing the sentiments I have quoted? I doubt not the piety or moral worth of these gentlemen. I am told they were respectable and pious men. But they were men, and they "kindled in a common blaze." And now, sir, I must be suffered to remark, that at this awful and melancholy period of our national history, the gentleman from Massachusetts, who now manifests so great a devotion to the union, and so much anxiety lest it should be endangered from the south, was "with his brethren in Israel." He saw all these things passing before his eyes—he heard these sentiments uttered all around him. I do not charge that gentleman with any participation in these acts, or with approving of these sentiments.

But I will ask why, if he was animated by the same sentiments then, which he now professes, if he can "augur disunion at a distance, and snuff up rebellion in every tainted breeze," why he did not, at that day, exert his great talents and acknowledged influence with the political associates by whom he was surrounded, (and who then, as now, looked up to him for guidance and direction,) in allaying this general excitement; in pointing out to his deluded friends the value of the union, in instructing them, that, instead of looking "to some prophet to lead them out from the land of Egypt," they should become reconciled to their brethren, and unite with them in the support of a just and necessary war? Sir, the gentleman must excuse me for saying, that if the records of our country afforded any evidence that he had pursued such a course, then if we could find it recorded in the history of those times, that, like the immortal Dexter, he had breasted that mighty torrent, which was sweeping before it all that was great and valuable in our political institutions; if, like him, he had stood by his country in opposition to his party, sir, we would, like little children, listen to his precepts, and abide by his counsels.

As soon as the public mind was sufficiently prepared for the measure, the celebrated Hartford convention was got up; not as the act of a few unauthorized individuals, but by authority of the legislature of Massachusetts; and, as has been shown by the able historian of that convention, in accordance with the views and wishes of the party, of which it was the organ. Now, sir, I do not desire to call in question the motives of the gentlemen who composed that assembly: I knew many of them to be, in private life, accomplished and honourable men, and I doubt not there were some among them who did not perceive the dangerous tendency of their proceedings. I will even go further, and say, that if the authors of the Hartford convention believed, that "gross, deliberate, and palpable violations of the constitution" had taken place, utterly destructive of their rights and interests, I should be the last man to deny their right to resort to any constitutional measures for redress. But, sir, in any view of the case, the time when, and the circumstances under which that convention assembled, as well as the measures recommended, render their conduct, in my opinion, wholly indefensible. Let us contemplate, for a moment, the spectacle then exhibited to the view of the world. I will not go over the disasters of the war, nor describe the difficulties in which the government was involved. It will be recollected, that its credit was nearly gone, Washington had fallen, the whole coast was blockaded, and an immense force collected in the West Indies, was about to make a descent, which it was supposed we had no means of resisting. In this awful state of our public affairs, when the government seemed almost to be tottering on its base, when Great Britain, relieved from all her other enemies, had proclaimed her purpose of "reducing us to unconditional submission," we beheld the peace party of New England (in the language of the work before us) "pursuing a course calculated to do more injury to their country, and to render England more effective service, than all her armies." Those who could not find it in their hearts to rejoice at our victories, sang Te Deum at the king's chapel in Boston, for the restoration of the Bourbons. Those who could not consent to illuminate their dwellings for the capture of the Guerriere, could give visible tokens of their joy at the fall of Detroit. The "beacon fires" of their hills were lighted up, not for the encouragement of their friends, but as signals to the enemy; and, in the gloomy hours of midnight, the very lights burned blue. Such were the dark and portentous signs of the times, which ushered into being the renowned Hartford convention. That convention met, and from their proceedings it appears, that their chief object was to keep back the men and money of New England from the service of the union, and to effect radical changes in the government—changes that can never be effected without a dissolution of the union.

Let us now, sir, look at their proceedings. I read from "a short with our political existence, led our fathers, without any other ties to unite them than those of patriotism and a common cause, through a sanguinary struggle account of the Hartford convention," (written by one of its members,) a very rare book, of which I was fortunate enough, a few years ago, to obtain a copy.

It appears at page 6 of "the account," that by a vote of the house of representatives of Massachusetts, [260 to 90,] delegates to this convention were ordered to be appointed, to consult upon the subject "of their public grievances and concerns," and upon "the best means of preserving their resources," and for procuring a revision of the constitution of the United States, "more effectually to secure the support and attachment of all the people, by placing all upon the basis of fair representation."

The convention assembled at Hartford on the 15th of December, 1814. On the next day it was

"Resolved, That the most inviolable secrecy shall be observed by each member of this convention, including the secretary, as to all propositions, debates, and proceedings thereof, until this injunction shall be suspended or altered."

On the 24th of December, the committee appointed to prepare and report a general project of such measures as may be proper for the convention to adopt, reported, among other things,

"1. That it was expedient to recommend to the legislatures of the states, the adoption of the most effectual and decisive measures to protect the militia and the states from the usurpations contained in these proceedings." [The proceedings of congress and the executive, in relation to the militia and the war.]

"2. That it was expedient also to prepare a statement exhibiting the necessity which the improvidence and inability of the general government have imposed upon the states of providing for their own defence, and the impossibility of their discharging this duty, and at the same time fulfilling the requisitions of the general government; and also to recommend to the legislatures of the several states to make provision for mutual defence, and to make an earnest application to the government of the United States, with a view to some arrangement whereby the states may be enabled to retain a portion of the taxes levied by congress, for the purposes of self-defence, and for the reimbursement of expenses already incurred on account of the United States.

"3. That it is expedient to recommend to the several state legislatures certain amendments to the constitution, viz.:

"That the power to declare or make war by the congress of the United States be restricted.

"That it is expedient to attempt to make provision for restraining congress in the exercise of an unlimited power to make new states, and admit them into the union.

"That an amendment be proposed respecting slave representation and slave taxation."

On the 29th of December, 1814, it was proposed "that the capacity of naturalized citizens to hold offices of trust, honour, or profit, ought to be restrained," &c.

The subsequent proceedings are not given at large; but it seems that the report of the committee was adopted, and also a recommendation of certain measures (of the character of which we are not informed) to the states for their mutual defence; and having voted "that the injunction of secrecy, in regard to all the debates and proceedings of the convention, (except so far as relates to the report finally adopted,) be continued," the convention adjourned sine die, but (as it was supposed) to meet again when circumstances should require it.

It is unnecessary to trace the matter further, or to ask what would have been the next chapter in this history, if the measures recommended had been carried into effect; and if, with the men and money of New England withheld from the government of the United States, she had been withdrawn from the war; if New Orleans had fallen into the hands of the enemy; and if, without troops and almost destitute of money, the southern and the western states had been thrown upon their own resources for the prosecution of the war, and the recovery of New Orleans? Sir, whatever may have been the issue of the contest, the union must have been dissolved. But a wise and just Providence, which "shapes our ends, to a glorious independence—that sacred union, hitherto inviolate, which, perfected by our happy constitution, has brought us, by the favour of Heaven, rough-hew them as we will," gave us the victory, and crowned our efforts with a glorious peace. The ambassadors of Hartford were seen retracing their steps from Washington, "the bearers of the glad tidings of great joy." Courage and patriotism triumphed—the country was saved—the union was preserved. And are we, Mr. President, who stood by our country then; who threw open our coffers; who bared our bosoms; who freely periled all in that conflict, to be reproached with want of attachment to the union? If, sir, we are to have lessons of patriotism read to us, they must come from a different quarter. The senator from Massachusetts, who is now so sensitive on all subjects connected with the union, seems to have a memory forgetful of the political events that have passed away. I must, therefore, refresh his recollection a little further on these subjects. The history of disunion has been written by one whose authority stands too high with the American people to be questioned—I mean Thomas Jefferson. I know not how the gentleman may receive this authority. When that great and good man occupied the presidential chair, I believe he commanded no portion of that gentleman's respect.

I hold in my hand a celebrated pamphlet on the embargo, in which language is held in relation to Mr. Jefferson, which my respect for his memory will prevent me from reading—unless any gentleman should call for it. But the senator from Massachusetts has since joined in singing hosannas to his name—he has assisted at his apotheosis, and has fixed him as "a brilliant star in the clear upper sky." I hope, therefore, he is now prepared to receive with deference and respect the high authority of Mr. Jefferson. In the fourth volume of his memoirs, which has just issued from the press, we have the following history of disunion from the pen of that illustrious statesman: "Mr. Adams called on me pending the embargo, and while endeavours were making to obtain its repeal; he spoke of the dissatisfaction of the eastern portion of our confederacy with the restraints of the embargo then existing, and their restlessness under it; that there was nothing which might not be attempted to rid themselves of it; that he had information of the most unquestionable certainty, that certain citizens of the eastern states (I think he named Massachusetts particularly) were in negotiation with the agents of the British government, the object of which was an agreement, that the New England states should take no further part in the war [the commercial war, the "war of restrictions," as it was called] then going on; and that without formally declaring their separation from the union, they should withdraw from all aid and obedience to them, &c. From that moment, says Mr. Jefferson, I saw the necessity of abandoning it, [the embargo,] and, instead of effecting our purpose by this peaceful weapon, we must fight it out, or break the union." In another letter, Mr. Jefferson adds: "I doubt whether a single fact known to the world, will carry as clear conviction to it of the correctness of our knowledge of the treasonable views of the federal party of that day, as that disclosed by this the most nefarious and daring attempt to dis sever the union, of which the Hartford convention was a subsequent chapter; and both of these having failed, consolidation becomes the fourth chapter of the next book of their history. But this opens with a vast accession of strength from their younger recruits, who, having nothing in them of the feelings and principles of '76, now look to a single and splendid government, &c., riding and ruling over the plundered ploughman and beggared yeomanry."—(4th vol. p. 419, 422.)

The last chapter, says Mr. Jefferson, of that history, is to be found in the conduct of those who are endeavouring to bring about consolidation: aye, sir, that very consolidation for which the gentleman from Massachusetts is contending—the exercise by the federal government, of powers not delegated in relation to "internal improvements," and the "protection of manufactures." And why, sir, does Mr. Jefferson consider consolidation as leading directly to disunion? Because he knew that the exercise by the federal government of the powers contended for, would make this "a government without limitation of powers," the submission to which he considered as a greater evil than disunion itself. There is one to a state of prosperity at home, and high consideration abroad, rarely, if ever, equalled in the history of nations. To preserve this bond of our political ex-chapter in this history, however, which Mr. Jefferson has not filled up, and I must therefore supply the deficiency. It is to be found in the protests made by New England against the acquisition of Louisiana. In relation to that subject, the New England doctrine is thus laid down by one of her learned political doctors of that day, now a doctor of laws, at the head of the great literary institution of the east; I mean Josiah Quincy, president of Harvard College. I quote from the speech delivered by that gentleman on the floor of congress, on the occasion of the admission of Louisiana into the union.

"Mr. Quincy repeated and justified a remark he had made, which, to save all misapprehensions, he had committed to writing, in the following words: 'If this bill passes, it is my deliberate opinion, that it is virtually a dissolution of the union; that it will free the states from their moral obligation; and as it will be the right of all, so it will be the duty of some, to prepare for a separation, amicably if they can, violently if they must.'"

Mr. President, I wish it to be distinctly understood, that all the remarks I have made on this subject, are intended to be exclusively applied to a party, which I have described as the "peace party of New England"—embracing the political associates of the senator from Massachusetts—a party which controlled the operations of that state during the embargo and the war, and who are justly chargeable with all the measures I have reprobated. Sir, nothing has been further from my thoughts than to impeach the character or conduct of the people of New England. For their steady habits and hardy virtues, I trust I entertain a becoming respect. I fully subscribe to the truth of the description given before the revolution, by one whose praise is the highest eulogy, "that the perseverance of Holland, the activity of France, and the dexterous and firm sagacity of English enterprise, have been more than equalled by this 'recent people.' " Hardy, enterprising, sagacious, industrious, and moral, the people of New England, of the present day, are worthy of their ancestors. Still less, Mr. President, has it been my intention to say any thing that could be construed into a want of respect for that party, who, trampling on all narrow, sectional feelings, have been true to their principles in the worst of times—I mean the democracy of New England.

Sir, I will declare, that, highly as I appreciate the democracy of the south, I consider even higher praise to be due to the democracy of New England—who have maintained their principles "through good and through evil report;" who, at every period of our national history, have stood up manfully for "their country, their whole country, and nothing but their country." In the great political revolution of '98, they were found united with the democracy of the south, marching under the banner of the constitution, led on by the patriarch of liberty, in search of the land of political promise, which they lived not only to behold, but to possess and to enjoy. Again, sir, in the darkest and most gloomy period of the war, when our country stood single handed against "the conqueror of the conquerors of the world;" when all about and around them was dark and dreary, disastrous and discouraging, they stood a Spartan band in that narrow pass, where the honour of their country was to be defended, or to find its grave. And in the last great struggle, involving, as we believe, the very existence of the principle of popular sovereignty, where were the democracy of New England? Where they always have been found, sir; struggling, side by side, with their brethren of the south and the west, for popular rights, and assisting in that glorious triumph by which the man of the people was elevated to the highest office in their gift.

Who, then, Mr. President, are the true friends of the union? Those who would confine the federal government strictly within the limits prescribed by the constitution; who would preserve to the states and the people all powers not expressly delegated; who would make this a federal, and not a national union, and who, administering the government in a spirit of equal justice, would make it a blessing, and not a curse. And who are its enemies? Those who are in favour of consolidation—who are constantly stealing power from the states, and adding strength to the federal government. Who, assuming an unwarrantable jurisdiction over the states and the people, undertake to regulate the whole industry and capital of the country. But, sir, of all descriptions of men, I consider those as the worst enemies of the union, who sacrifice the equal rights which belong to every member of the confederacy to combinations of interested majorities, for personal or political objects. But the gentleman apprehends no evil from the dependence of the states on the federal government; he can see no danger of corruption from the influence of money or of patronage. Sir, I know that it is supposed to be a wise saying, "that patronage is a source of weakness," and in support of that maxim, it has been said, that "every ten appointments makes a hundred enemies." But I am rather inclined to think, with the eloquent and sagacious orator now reposing on his laurels on the banks of the Roanoke, that "the power of conferring favours creates a crowd of dependants;" he gave a forcible illustration of the truth of the remark, when he told us of the effect of holding up the savoury morsel to the eager eyes of the hungry hounds gathered around his door. It mattered not whether the gift was bestowed on Towser or Sweetlips, "Tray, Blanch, or Sweetheart," while held in suspense, they were all governed by a nod, and when the morsel was bestowed, the expectation of the favours of to-morrow kept up the subjection of to-day.

The senator from Massachusetts, in denouncing what he is pleased to call the Carolina doctrine, has attempted to throw ridicule upon the idea, that a state has any constitutional remedy, by the exercise of its sovereign authority, against "a gross, palpable, and deliberate violation of the constitution." He calls it "an idle," or "a ridiculous notion," or something to that effect, and added, that it would make the union "a mere rope of sand." Now, sir, as the gentleman has not condescended to enter into any examination of the question, and has been satisfied with throwing the weight of his authority into the scale, I do not deem it necessary to do more than to throw into the opposite scale the authority on which South Carolina relies, and there, for the present, I am perfectly willing to leave the controversy. The South Carolina doctrine, that is to say, the doctrine contained in an exposition reported by a committee of the legislature, in December, 1828, and published by their authority, is the good old republican doctrine of '98—the doctrine of the celebrated "Virginia resolutions" of that year, and of "Madison's report" of '99. It will be recollected, that the legislature of Virginia, in December, '98, took into consideration the alien and sedition laws, then considered by all the republicans as a gross violation of the constitution of the United States, and on that day passed, among others, the following resolution:

"The general assembly doth explicitly and peremptorily declare, that it views the powers of the federal government, as resulting from the compact to which the states are parties, as limited by the plain sense and intention of the instrument constituting that compact, as no further valid than they are authorized by the grants enumerated in that compact; and that in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of other powers not granted by the said compact, the states who are parties thereto, have the right, and are in duty bound, to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to them."

In addition to these resolutions, the general assembly of Virginia "appealed to the other states, in the confidence that they would concur with that commonwealth, that the acts aforesaid [the alien and sedition laws] are unconstitutional, and that the necessary and proper measures would be taken by each for co-operating with Virginia in maintaining unimpaired the authorities, rights, and liberties, reserved to the states respectively, or to the people."

The legislatures of several of the New England states having, contrary to the expectation of the legislature of Virginia, expressed their dissent from these doctrines, the subject came up again for consideration during the session of 1799, 1800, when it was referred to a select committee, by whom was made that celebrated report, which is familiarly known as "Madison's report," and which

me, I, ANDREW JACKSON, President of the United States, have thought proper to issue this my PROCLAMATION, stating my views of the constitution deserves to last as long as the constitution itself. In that report, which was subsequently adopted by the legislature, the whole subject was deliberately re-examined, and the objections urged against the Virginia doctrines carefully considered. The result was, that the legislature of Virginia re-affirmed all the principles laid down in the resolutions of 1798, and issued to the world that admirable report, which has stamped the character of Mr. Madison as the preserver of that constitution which he had contributed so largely to create and establish. I will here quote from Mr. Madison's report one or two passages which bear more immediately on the point in controversy. "The resolution having taken this view of the federal compact," proceeds to infer, "that in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of other powers, not granted by the said compact, the states who are parties thereto have the right, and are in duty bound, to interpose for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to them."

"It appears to your committee to be a plain principle, founded on common sense, illustrated by common practice, and essential to the nature of compacts, that, where resort can be had to no tribunal, superior to the authority of the parties, the parties themselves must be the rightful judges in the last resort, whether the bargain made has been pursued or violated. The constitution of the United States was formed by the sanction of the states, given by each in its sovereign capacity. It adds to the stability and dignity, as well as to the authority of the constitution, that it rests on this legitimate and solid foundation. The states, then, being the parties to the constitutional compact, and in their sovereign capacity, it follows of necessity, that there can be no tribunal above their authority, to decide in the last resort, whether the compact made by them be violated, and consequently, that as the parties to it, they must themselves decide, in the last resort, such questions as may be of sufficient magnitude to require their interposition."

"The resolution has guarded against any misapprehension of its object, by expressly requiring for such an interposition 'the case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous breach of the constitution, by the exercise of powers not granted by it.' It must be a case, not of a light and transient nature, but of a nature dangerous to the great purposes for which the constitution was established."

"But the resolution has done more than guard against misconception, by expressly referring to cases of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous nature. It specifies the object of the interposition, which it contemplates to be solely that of arresting the progress of the evil of usurpation, and of maintaining the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to the states, as parties to the constitution."

"From this view of the resolution, it would seem inconceivable that it can incur any just disapprobation from those who, laying aside all momentary impressions, and recollecting the genuine source and object of the federal constitution, shall candidly and accurately interpret the meaning of the general assembly. If the deliberate exercise of dangerous powers, palpably withheld by the constitution, could not justify the parties to it, in interposing even so far as to arrest the progress of the evil, and thereby to preserve the constitution itself, as well as to provide for the safety of the parties to it, there would be an end to all relief from usurped power, and a direct subversion of the rights specified or recognised under all the state constitutions, as well as a plain denial of the fundamental principles on which our independence itself was declared."

But, sir, our authorities do not stop here. The state of Kentucky responded to Virginia, and on the 10th of November, 1798, adopted those celebrated resolutions, well known to have been penned by the author of the declaration of American independence. In those resolutions, the legislature of Kentucky declare, "that the government created by this compact, was not made the exclusive or final judge of the extent of the powers delegated to itself, since that would have made its discretion, and not the constitution, the measure of its powers; but that, as in all other cases of compact among and laws applicable to the measures adopted by the convention of South Carolina, and to the reasons they have put forth to sustain them, declaring the parties having no common judge, each party has an equal right to judge for itself, as well of infractions as of the mode and measure of redress."

At the ensuing session of the legislature, the subject was re-examined, and on the 14th of November, 1799, the resolutions of the preceding year were deliberately re-affirmed, and it was, among other things, solemnly declared, "That if those who administer the general government be permitted to transgress the limits fixed by that compact, by a total disregard to the special delegations of power therein contained, an annihilation of the state governments, and the erection upon their ruins of a general consolidated government, will be the inevitable consequence. That the principle and construction contended for by sundry of the state legislatures, that the general government is the exclusive judge of the extent of the powers delegated to it, stop nothing short of despotism; since the discretion of those who administer the government, and not the constitution, would be the measure of their powers. That the several states who formed that instrument, being sovereign and independent, have the unquestionable right to judge of its infraction, and that a nullification by those sovereignties, of all unauthorized acts done under colour of that instrument, is the rightful remedy."

Time and experience confirmed Mr. Jefferson's opinion on this all important point. In the year 1821, he expressed himself in this emphatic manner: "It is a fatal heresy to suppose that either our state governments are superior to the federal, or the federal to the state; neither is authorized literally to decide which belongs to itself or its copartner in government; in differences of opinion between their different sets of public servants, the appeal is to neither, but to their employers, peaceably assembled by their representatives in convention." The opinion of Mr. Jefferson on this subject has been so repeatedly and so solemnly expressed, that they may be said to have been among the most fixed and settled convictions of his mind.

In the protest prepared by him for the legislature of Virginia, in December, 1825, in respect to the powers exercised by the federal government in relation to the tariff and internal improvements, which he declares to be "usurpations of the powers retained by the states, mere interpolations into the compact, and direct infractions of it,"—he solemnly reasserts all the principles of the Virginia resolutions of '98—protests against "these acts of the federal branch of the government, as null and void, and declares, that although Virginia would consider a dissolution of the union as among the greatest calamities that could befall them, yet it is not the greatest. There is one yet greater—submission to a government of unlimited powers. It is only when the hope of this shall become absolutely desperate, that further forbearance could not be indulged."

In his letter to Mr. Giles, written about the same time, he says: "I see, as you do, and with the deepest affliction, the rapid strides with which the federal branch of our government is advancing towards the usurpation of all the rights reserved to the state, and the consolidation in itself of all powers, foreign and domestic, and that too, by constructions which leave no limits to their powers, &c. Under the power to regulate commerce, they assume indefinitely that also over agriculture and manufactures, &c. Under the authority to establish post roads, they claim that of cutting down mountains for the construction of roads and digging canals, &c. And what is our resource for the preservation of the constitution? Reason and argument? You might as well reason and argue with the marble columns encircling them, &c. Are we then to stand to our arms, with the hot-headed Georgian? No—[and I say no, and South Carolina has said no]—that must be the last resource. We must have patience and long endurance with our brethren, &c. and separate from our companions only when the sole alternatives left are a dissolution of our union with them, or submission to a government without limitation of powers. Between these two evils, when we must make a choice, there can be no hesitation."

course which duty will require me to pursue, and appealing to the understanding and patriotism of the people, warn them of the consequences that must

Such, sir, are the high and imposing authorities in support of "the Carolina doctrine," which is, in fact, the doctrine of the Virginia resolutions of 1798.

Sir, at that day the whole country was divided on this very question. It formed the line of demarcation between the federal and republican parties, and the great political revolution which then took place turned upon the very question involved in these resolutions. That question was decided by the people, and by that decision the constitution was, in the emphatic language of Mr. Jefferson, "saved at its last gasp." I should suppose, sir, it would require more self-respect than any gentleman here would be willing to assume, to treat lightly doctrines derived from such high sources. Resting on authority like this, I will ask gentlemen whether South Carolina has not manifested a high regard for the union, when under a tyranny ten times more grievous than the alien and sedition laws, she has hitherto gone no further than to petition, remonstrate, and solemnly to protest against a series of measures which she believes to be wholly unconstitutional, and utterly destructive of her interests? Sir, South Carolina has not gone one step further than Mr. Jefferson himself was disposed to go, in relation to the very subject of our present complaints; not a step further than the statesmen from New England were disposed to go under similar circumstances; no further than the senator from Massachusetts himself once considered as within "the limits of a constitutional opposition." The doctrine that it is the right of a state to judge of the violations of the constitution on the part of the federal government, and to protect her citizens from the operations of unconstitutional laws, was held by the enlightened citizens of Boston, who assembled in Faneuil Hall, on the 25th of January, 1809. They state, in that celebrated memorial, that "they looked only to the state legislature, who were competent to devise relief against the unconstitutional acts of the general government. That your power (say they) is adequate to that object, is evident from the organization of the confederacy."

A distinguished senator from one of the New England states, [Mr. Hillhouse,] in a speech delivered here, on a bill for enforcing the embargo, declared, "I feel myself bound in conscience to declare, (lest the blood of those who shall fall in the execution of this measure, shall be on my head,) that I consider this to be an act which directs a mortal blow at the liberties of my country—an act containing unconstitutional provisions, to which the people are not bound to submit, and to which, in my opinion, they will not submit."

And the senator from Massachusetts himself, in a speech delivered on the same subject, in the other house, said, "This opposition is constitutional and legal; it is also conscientious. It rests on settled and sober conviction, that such policy is destructive to the interests of the people, and dangerous to the being of the government. The experience of every day confirms these sentiments. Men who act from such motives, are not to be discouraged by trifling obstacles, nor awed by any dangers. They know the limit of constitutional opposition; up to that limit, at their own discretion, they will walk, and walk fearlessly." How "the being of the government" was to be endangered by "constitutional opposition" to the embargo, I leave to the gentleman to explain.

Thus, it will be seen, Mr. President, that the South Carolina doctrine is the republican doctrine of '98; that it was first promulgated by the fathers of the faith; that it was maintained by Virginia and Kentucky in the worst of times; that it constituted the very pivot on which the political revolution of that day turned; that it embraces the very principles, the triumph of which, at that time, saved the constitution at its last gasp, and which New England statesmen were not unwilling to adopt, when they believed themselves to be the victims of unconstitutional legislation. Sir, as to the doctrine that the federal government is the exclusive judge of the extent, as well as the limitations of its powers, it seems to me to be utterly subversive of the sovereignty and independence of the states. It makes but little difference, in my estimation, whether congress or the supreme court are invested with this power. If the federal government, in all, or any of its departments, are to pre-inevitably result from an observance of the dictates of the convention.

"Strict duty would require of me nothing more than scribe the limits of its own authority, and the states are bound to submit to the decision, and are not to be allowed to examine and decide for themselves, when the barriers of the constitution shall be overleaped, this is practically "a government without limitation of powers." The states are at once reduced to mere petty corporations, and the people are entirely at your mercy. I have but one word more to add. In all the efforts that have been made by South Carolina, to resist the unconstitutional laws which congress has extended over them, she has kept steadily in view the preservation of the union, by the only means by which she believes it can be long preserved—a firm, manly, and steady resistance against usurpation. The measures of the federal government have, it is true, prostrated her interests, and will soon involve the whole south in irretrievable ruin. But even this evil, great as it is, is not the chief ground of our complaints. It is the principle involved in the contest, a principle which, substituting the discretion of congress for the limitations of the constitution, bring the states and the people to the feet of the federal government, and leaves them nothing they can call their own. Sir, if the measures of the federal government were less oppressive, we should still strive against this usurpation. The south is acting on a principle she has always held sacred—resistance to unauthorized taxation. These, sir, are the principles which induced the immortal Hampden to resist the payment of a tax of twenty shillings. Would twenty shillings have ruined his fortune? No; but the payment of half twenty shillings, on the principle on which it was demanded, would have made him a slave. Sir, if, in acting on these high motives—if animated by that ardent love of liberty which has always been the most prominent trait in the southern character—we should be hurried beyond the bounds of a cold and calculating prudence, who is there, with one noble and generous sentiment in his bosom, that would not be disposed, in the language of Burke, to exclaim, "you must pardon something to the spirit of liberty!"

After Mr. Hayne had concluded, Mr. Webster made the following reply to his speech:—

Mr. President: When the mariner has been tossed, for many days, in thick weather, and on an unknown sea, he naturally avails himself of the first pause in the storm, the earliest glance of the sun, to take his latitude, and ascertain how far the elements have driven him from his true course. Let us imitate this prudence, and, before we float further, refer to the point from which we departed, that we may at least be able to conjecture where we now are. I ask for the reading of the resolution.

[The secretary read the resolution as follows:

"Resolved, that the committee on public lands be instructed to inquire and report the quantity of the public lands remaining unsold within each state and territory, and whether it be expedient to limit, for a certain period, the sales of the public lands to such lands only as have heretofore been offered for sale, and are now subject to entry at the minimum price. And, also, whether the office of surveyor general, and some of the land offices, may not be abolished without detriment to the public interest; or whether it be expedient to adopt measures to hasten the sales, and extend more rapidly the surveys of the public lands."]

We have thus heard, sir, what the resolution is, which is actually before us for consideration; and it will readily occur to every one, that it is almost the only subject about which something has not been said in the speech, running through two days, by which the senate has been now entertained by the gentleman from South Carolina. Every topic in the wide range of our public affairs, whether past or present—every thing, general or local, whether belonging to national politics or party politics, seems to have attracted more or less of the honourable member's attention, save only the resolution before us. He has spoken of every thing but the public lands. They have escaped his notice. To that subject, in all his excursions, he has not paid even the cold respect of a passing glance.

When this debate, sir, was to be resumed, on Thursday morning, it so happened that it would have been convenient for me to be elsewhere. The honourable member, however, did not incline to the exercise of those powers with which I am now, or may hereafter be invested, for preserving the peace of the union, and for the execution of the laws. But put off the discussion to another day. He had a shot, he said, to return, and he wished to discharge it. That shot, sir, which it was kind thus to inform us was coming, that we might stand out of the way, or prepare ourselves to fall before it, and die with decency, has now been received. Under all advantages, and with expectation awakened by the tone which preceded it, it has been discharged, and has spent its force. It may become me to say no more of its effect, than that, if nobody is found, after all, either killed or wounded by it, it is not the first time, in the history of human affairs, that the vigour and success of the war have not quite come up to the lofty and sounding phrase of the manifesto.

The gentleman, sir, in declining to postpone the debate, told the senate, with the emphasis of his hand upon his heart, that there was something rankling here which he wished to relieve. [Mr. Hayne rose, and disclaimed having used the word rankling.] It would not, Mr. President, be safe for the honourable member to appeal to those around him, upon the question, whether he did, in fact, make use of that word. But he may have been unconscious of it. At any rate, it is enough that he disclaims it. But still, with or without the use of that particular word, he had yet something here, he said, of which he wished to rid himself by an immediate reply. In this respect, sir, I have a great advantage over the honourable gentleman. There is nothing here, sir, which gives me the slightest uneasiness; neither fear, nor anger, nor that which is sometimes more troublesome than either, the consciousness of having been in the wrong. There is nothing, either originating here, or now received here, by the gentleman's shot. Nothing original, for I had not the slightest feeling of disrespect or unkindness towards the honourable member. Some passages, it is true, had occurred since our acquaintance in this body, which I could have wished might have been otherwise; but I had used philosophy, and forgotten them. When the honourable member rose, in his first speech, I paid him the respect of attentive listening; and when he sat down, though surprised, and I must say even astonished, at some of his opinions, nothing was further from my intention, than to commence any personal warfare; and through the whole of the few remarks I made in answer, I avoided, studiously and carefully, every thing which I thought possible to be construed into disrespect. And, sir, while there is thus nothing originating here, which I wished at any time, or now wish to discharge, I must repeat, also, that nothing has been received here which rankles, or in any way gives me annoyance. I will not accuse the honourable member of violating the rules of civilized war; I will not say that he poisoned his arrows. But whether his shafts were, or were not, dipped in that which would have caused rankling, if they had reached, there was not, as it happened, quite strength enough in the bow to bring them to their mark. If he wishes now to gather up those shafts, he must look for them elsewhere; they will not be found fixed and quivering in the object at which they were aimed.

The honourable member complained that I had slept on his speech. I must have slept on it, or not slept at all. The moment the honourable member sat down, his friend from Missouri rose, and with much honeyed commendation of the speech, suggested that the impressions which it had produced were too charming and delightful to be disturbed by other sentiments or other sounds, and proposed that the senate should adjourn. Would it have been quite amiable in me, sir, to interrupt this excellent good feeling? Must I not have been absolutely malicious, if I could have thrust myself forward to destroy sensations thus pleasing? Was it not much better and kinder, both to sleep upon them myself, and to allow others, also, the pleasure of sleeping upon them? But if it be meant, by sleeping upon his speech, that I took time to prepare a reply to it, it is quite a mistake; owing to other engagements, I could not employ even the interval between the adjournment of the senate, and its meeting the next morning, in attention to the subject of this debate. Nevertheless, sir, the mere matter of fact is undoubtedly true—I did sleep on the gentleman's speech, and slept soundly. And I slept equally well on his speech of yesterday, to which I am now replying. It is quite possible, that, in this respect the imposing aspect which opposition has assumed in this case, by clothing itself with state authority, and the deep interest which the people of the United also, I possess some advantage over the honourable member, attributable, doubtless, to a cooler temperament on my part; for, in truth, I slept upon his speeches remarkably well. But the gentleman inquires, why he was made the object of such a reply? Why was he singled out? If an attack had been made on the east, he he assures us, did not begin it—it was the gentleman from Missouri. Sir, I answered the gentleman's speech, because I happened to hear it; and because, also, I chose to give an answer to that speech, which, if unanswered, I thought most likely to produce injurious impressions. I did not stop to inquire who was the original drawer of the bill. I found a responsible endorser before me, and it was my purpose to hold him liable, and to bring him to his just responsibility, without delay. But, sir, this interrogatory of the honourable member was only introductory to another. He proceeded to ask me, whether I had turned upon him, in this debate, from the consciousness that I should find an over-match, if I ventured on a contest with his friend from Missouri. If, sir, the honourable member, ex gratia modestia, had chosen thus to defer to his friend, and to pay him a compliment, without intentional disparagement to others, it would have been quite according to the friendly courtesies of debate, and not at all ungrateful to my own feelings. I am not one of those, sir, who esteem any tribute of regard, whether light and occasional, or more serious and deliberate, which may be bestowed on others, as so much unjustly withheld from themselves. But the tone and manner of the gentleman's question, forbid me that I thus interpret it. I am not at liberty to consider it as nothing more than a civility to his friend. It had an air of taunt and disparagement, a little of the loftiness of asserted superiority, which does not allow me to pass it over without notice. It was put as a question for me to answer, and so put, as if it were difficult for me to answer, whether I deemed the member from Missouri an over-match for myself, in debate here. It seems to me, sir, that this is extraordinary language, and an extraordinary tone, for the discussions of this body.

Matches and over-matches! Those terms are more applicable elsewhere than here, and fitter for other assemblies than this. Sir, the gentleman seems to forget where and what we are. This is a senate; a senate of equals; of men of individual honour and personal character, and of absolute independence. We know no masters; we acknowledge no dictators. This is a hall for mutual consultation and discussion; not an arena for the exhibition of champions. I offer myself, sir, as a match for no man; I throw the challenge of debate at no man's feet. But then, sir, since the honourable member has put the question, in a manner that calls for an answer, I will give him an answer; and I tell him, that, holding myself to be the humblest of the members here, I yet know nothing in the arm of his friend from Missouri, either alone or when aided by the arm of his friend from South Carolina, that need deter even me from espousing whatever opinions I may choose to espouse, from debating whenever I may choose to debate, or from speaking whatever I may see fit to say, on the floor of the senate. Sir, when uttered as matter of commendation or compliment, I should dissent from nothing which the honourable member might say of his friend. Still less do I put forth any pretensions of my own. But, when put to me as matter of taunt, I throw it back, and say to the gentleman, that he could possibly say nothing less likely than such a comparison, to wound my pride of personal character. The anger of its tone rescued the remark from intentional irony, which otherwise, probably, would have been its general acceptance. But, sir, if it be imagined that by this mutual quotation and commendation; if it be supposed that, by casting the characters of the drama, assigning to each his part—to one the attack, to another the cry of onset; or if it be thought that, by a loud and empty vaunt of anticipated victory, any laurels are to be won here; if it be imagined, especially, that any or all these things will shake any purpose of mine, I can tell the honourable member, once for all, that he is greatly mistaken, and that he is dealing with one of whose temper and character he has yet much to learn. Sir, I shall not allow myself, on this occasion, I hope on no occasion, to be betrayed into any loss of temper; but, if provoked, as I trust I never shall allow myself to be, into crimination and recrimination, the honourable member may perhaps find, that, in that contest, there will be blows to take as well as blows to give; that others can state comparisons as significant, at least, as his own; and that his impunity may, perhaps, demand of him whatever powers of taunt and sarcasm he may possess. I commend him to a prudent husbandry of his resources.

States must all feel in preventing a resort to stronger measures, while there is a hope that any thing will be yielded to reasoning and remonstrance, perhaps de-

But, sir, the coalition! The coalition! Ay, "the murdered coalition!" The gentleman asks, if I were led or frightened into this debate by the spectre of the coalition. "Was it the ghost of the murdered coalition," he exclaims, "which haunted the member from Massachusetts, and which, like the ghost of Banquo, would never down?" "The murdered coalition!" Sir, this charge of a coalition, in reference to the late administration, is not original with the honourable member. It did not spring up in the senate. Whether as a fact, as an argument, or as an embellishment, it is all borrowed. He adopts it, indeed, from a very low origin, and a still lower present condition. It is one of the thousand calumnies with which the press teemed during an excited political canvass. It was a charge of which there was not only no proof or probability, but which was, in itself, wholly impossible to be true. No man of common information ever believed a syllable of it. Yet it was of that class of falsehoods, which, by continued repetition, through all the organs of detraction and abuse, are capable of misleading those who are already far misled, and of further fanning passion, already kindling into flame. Doubtless, it served in its day, and, in greater or less degree, the end designed by it. Having done that, it has sunk into the general mass of stale and loathed calumnies. It is the very cast-off slough of a polluted and shameless press. Incapable of further mischief, it lies in the sewer, lifeless and despised. It is not now, sir, in the power of the honourable member to give it dignity or decency, by attempting to elevate it, and to introduce it into the senate. He can not change it from what it is, an object of general disgust and scorn. On the contrary, the contact, if he choose to touch it, is more likely to drag him down, down, to the place where it lies itself.

But, sir, the honourable member was not, for other reasons, entirely happy in his allusion to the story of Banquo's murder and Banquo's ghost. It was not, I think, the friends, but the enemies of the murdered Banquo, at whose bidding his spirit would not down. The honourable gentleman is fresh in his reading of the English classics, and can put me right, if I am wrong; but, according to my poor recollection, it was at those who had begun with caresses, and ended with foul and treacherous murder, that the gory locks were shaken. The ghost of Banquo, like that of Hamlet, was an honest ghost. It disturbed no innocent man. It knew where its appearance would strike terror, and who would cry out, a ghost! It made itself visible in the right quarter, and compelled the guilty and the conscience-smitten, and none others, to start, with

"Pry'thee, see there! behold!—look! lo!
If I stand here, I saw him!"

Their eye-balls were seared (was it not so, sir?) who had thought to shield themselves, by concealing their own hand, and laying the imputation of the crime on a low and hireling agency in wickedness, who had vainly attempted to stifle the workings of their own coward consciences, by ejaculating, through white lips and chattering teeth, "Thou canst not say I did it!" I have misread the great poet, if it was those who had no way partaken in the deed of the death, who either found that they were, or feared that they should be, pushed from their stools by the ghost of the slain; or who exclaimed, to a spectre created by their own fears, and their own remorse, "Avant! and quit our sight!"

There is another particular, sir, in which the honourable member's quick perception of resemblances might, I should think, have seen something in the story of Banquo, making it not altogether a subject of the most pleasant contemplation. Those who murdered

mand, and will certainly justify a full exposition to South Carolina and the nation of the views I entertain of this important question, as well as a distinct enun-

Banquo, what did they win by it? Substantial good? Permanent power? Or disappointment, rather, and sore mortification—dust and ashes—the common fate of vaulting ambition, overleaping itself? Did not even-handed justice, ere long, commend the poisoned chalice to their own lips? Did they not soon find that for another they had "filled their mind?" that their ambition, though apparently for the moment successful, had but put a barren sceptre in their grasp? Ay, sir,

"A barren sceptre in their gripe,
Thence to be wrenched by an unlineal hand,
No son of their's succeeding."

Sir, I need pursue the allusion no further. I leave the honourable gentleman to run it out at his leisure, and to derive from it all the gratification it is calculated to administer. If he finds himself pleased with the associations, and prepared to be quite satisfied, though the parallel should be entirely completed, I had almost said, I am satisfied also; but that I shall think of. Yes, sir, I will think of that.

In the course of my observations, the other day, Mr. President, I paid a passing tribute of respect to a very worthy man, Mr. Dane, of Massachusetts. It so happened, that he drew the ordinance of 1787, for the government of the Northwestern Territory. A man of so much ability, and so little pretence; of so great a capacity to do good, and so unmixed a disposition to do it for its own sake; a gentleman who acted an important part, forty years ago, in a measure, the influence of which is still deeply felt in the very matter which was the subject of debate, might, I thought, receive from me a commendatory recognition.

But the honourable member was inclined to be facetious on the subject. He was rather disposed to make it matter of ridicule, that I had introduced into the debate the name of one Nathan Dane, of whom, he assures us, he had never before heard. Sir, if the honourable member had never before heard of Mr. Dane, I am sorry for it. It shows him less acquainted with the public men of the country than I had supposed. Let me tell him, however, that a sneer from him, at the mention of the name of Mr. Dane, is in bad taste. It may well be a high mark of ambition, sir, either with the honourable gentleman or myself, to accomplish as much to make our names known to advantage, and remembered with gratitude, as Mr. Dane has accomplished. But the truth is, sir, I suspect, that Mr. Dane lives a little too far north. He is of Massachusetts, and too near the north star to be reached by the honourable gentleman's telescope. If his sphere had happened to range south of Mason's and Dixon's line, he might, probably, have come within the scope of his vision!

I spoke, sir, of the ordinance of 1787, which prohibited slavery, in all future times, northwest of the Ohio, as a measure of great wisdom and foresight, and one which had been attended with highly beneficial and permanent consequences. I suppose, that, on this point, no two gentlemen in the senate could entertain different opinions. But, the simple expression of this sentiment has led the gentleman, not only into a laboured defence of slavery, in the abstract, and on principle, but also into a warm accusation against me, as having attacked the system of domestic slavery, now existing in the southern states. For all this, there was not the slightest foundation, in any thing said or intimated by me. I did not utter a single word, which any ingenuity could torture into an attack on the slavery of the south. I said only, that it was highly wise and useful, in legislating for the northwestern country, while it was yet a wilderness, to prohibit the introduction of slaves; and added, that, I presumed, in the neighbouring state of Kentucky, there was no reflecting and intelligent gentleman, who would doubt, that if the same prohibition had been extended, at the same early period, over that commonwealth, her strength and population would, at this day, have been far greater than they are. If these opinions be thought doubtful, they are, nevertheless, I trust, neither extraordinary nor disrespectful. They attack nobody, and menace nobody.

ciation of the course which my sense of duty will require me to pursue.

"The ordinance is founded, not on the indefeasi-

And yet, sir, the gentleman's optics have discovered, even in the mere expression of this sentiment, what he calls the very spirit of the Missouri question! He represents me as making an onset on the whole south, and manifesting a spirit which would interfere with, and disturb their domestic condition! Sir, this injustice no otherwise surprises me, than as it is done here, and done without the slightest pretence of ground for it. I say it only surprises me, as being done here; for I know full well, that it is, and has been, the settled policy of some persons in the south, for years, to represent the people of the north as disposed to interfere with them in their own exclusive and peculiar concerns. This is a delicate and sensitive point in southern feeling; and of late years it has always been touched, and generally with effect, whenever the object has been to unite the whole south against northern men, or northern measures. This feeling, always carefully kept alive, and maintained at too intense a heat to admit discrimination or reflection, is a lever of great power in our political machine. It moves vast bodies, and gives to them one and the same direction. But the feeling is without all adequate cause, and the suspicion which exists wholly groundless. There is not, and never has been, a disposition in the north to interfere with these interests of the south. Such interference has never been supposed to be within the power of government; nor has it been in any way attempted. It has always been regarded as a matter of domestic policy, left with the states themselves, and with which the federal government had nothing to do. Certainly, sir, I am, and ever have been, of that opinion. The gentleman, indeed, argues that slavery, in the abstract, is no evil. Most assuredly, I need not say I differ with him altogether and most widely on that point. I regard domestic slavery as one of the greatest of evils, both moral and political. But, though it be a malady, and whether it be curable, and if so, by what means; or, on the other hand, whether it be the vulnus immedicabile of the social system, I leave it to those whose right and duty it is to inquire and to decide. And this, I believe, sir, is, and uniformly has been, the sentiment of the north. Let us look a little at the history of this matter.

When the present constitution was submitted for the ratification of the people, there were those who imagined that the powers of the government which it proposed to establish, might, perhaps, in some possible mode, be exerted in measures tending to the abolition of slavery. This suggestion would of course attract much attention in the southern conventions. In that of Virginia, Governor Randolph said:

"I hope there is none here who, considering the subject in the calm light of philosophy, will make an objection dishonourable to Virginia—that, at the moment they are securing the rights of their citizens, an objection is started, that there is a spark of hope that those unfortunate men now held in bondage, may, by the operation of the general government, be made free."

At the very first congress, petitions on the subject were presented, if I mistake not, from different states. The Pennsylvania Society for promoting the Abolition of Slavery, took a lead, and laid before congress a memorial, praying congress to promote the abolition by such powers as it possessed. This memorial was referred, in the house of representatives, to a select committee, consisting of Mr. Foster, of New Hampshire; Mr. Gerry, of Massachusetts; Mr. Huntington, of Connecticut; Mr. Lawrence, of New York; Mr. Sinnickson, of New Jersey; Mr. Hartley, of Pennsylvania; and Mr. Parker, of Virginia. All of them, sir, as you will observe, northern men, but the last. This committee made a report, which was committed to a committee of the whole house, and there considered and discussed on several days; and being amended, although in no material respect, it was made to express three distinct propositions on the subjects of slavery and the slave trade. First, in the words of the constitution, that congress could not, prior to the year 1808, prohibit the migration or importation of such persons as any of the states, then existing, should think proper to admit. Second, that congress had authority to restrain the citizens of the United States from carrying on the African slave trade, for ble right of resisting acts which are plainly unconstitutional and too oppressive to be endured; but on the strange position that any one state may not only the purpose of supplying foreign countries. On this proposition, our early laws against those who engage in that traffic are founded. The third proposition, and that which bears on the present question, was expressed in the following terms:

"Resolved, That congress have no authority to interfere in the emancipation of slaves, or in the treatment of them in any of the states; it remaining with the several states alone to provide rules and regulations therein, which humanity and true policy may require."

This resolution received the sanction of the house of representatives so early as March, 1790. And now, sir, the honourable member will allow me to remind him, that not only were the select committee who reported the resolution, with a single exception, all northern men, but also that of the members then composing the house of representatives, a large majority, I believe nearly two thirds, were northern men also.

The house agreed to insert these resolutions in its journal; and, from that day to this, it has never been maintained or contended, that congress had any authority to regulate, or interfere with, the condition of slaves in the several states. No northern gentleman, to my knowledge, has moved any such question in either house of congress.

The fears of the south, whatever fears they might have entertained, were allayed and quieted by this early decision; and so remained, till they were excited afresh, without cause but for collateral and indirect purposes. When it became necessary, or was thought so, by some political persons, to find an unvarying ground for the exclusion of northern men from confidence and from lead in the affairs of the republic, then, and not till then, the cry was raised, and the feeling industriously excited, that the influence of northern men in the public councils would endanger the relation of master and slave. For myself, I claim no other merit, than that this gross and enormous injustice towards the whole north, has not wrought upon me to change my opinions, or my political conduct. I hope I am above violating any principles, even under the smart of injury and false imputations. Unjust suspicions and undeserved reproach, whatever pain I may experience from them, will not induce me, I trust, nevertheless, to overstep the limits of constitutional duty, or to encroach on the rights of others. The domestic slavery of the south, I leave where I find it—in the hands of their own governments. It is their affair, not mine. Nor do I complain of the peculiar effect which the magnitude of that population has had in the distribution of power under this federal government. We know, sir, that the representation of the states in the other house, is not equal. We know that great advantage, in that respect, is enjoyed by the slave-holding states; and we know, too, that the intended equivalent for that advantage, that is to say, the imposition of direct taxes in the same ratio, has become merely nominal; the habit of the government being almost invariably to collect its revenues from other sources, and in other modes. Nevertheless, I do not complain, nor would I countenance any movement to alter this arrangement of representation. It is the original bargain, the compact—let it stand: let the advantage of it be fully enjoyed. The union itself is too full of benefit to be hazarded in propositions for changing its original basis. I go for the constitution as it is, and for the union as it is. But I am resolved not to submit in silence to accusations, either against myself individually, or against the north, wholly unfounded and unjust; accusations which impute to us a disposition to evade the constitutional compact, and to extend the power of the government over the internal laws and domestic condition of the states. All such accusations, wherever and whenever made; all insinuations of the existence of any such purposes, I know and feel to be groundless and injurious. And we must confide in southern gentlemen themselves; we must trust to those whose integrity of heart and magnanimity of feeling will lead them to a desire to maintain and disseminate truth, and who possess the means of its diffusion with the southern public; we must leave it to them to disabuse that public of its prejudices. But, in the mean time, for my own part, I shall continue to act justly, declare an act of congress void, but prohibit its execution—that they may do this consistently with the constitution—that the true construction of that whether those towards whom justice is exercised receive it with candour or with contumely.

Having had occasion to recur to the ordinance of 1787, in order to defend myself against the inferences which the honourable member has chosen to draw from my observations on that subject, I am not willing now entirely to take leave of it without another remark. It need hardly be said, that that paper expresses just sentiments on the great subject of civil and religious liberty. Such sentiments were common, and abound in all our state papers of that day. But this ordinance did that which was not so common, and which is not, even now, universal; that is, it set forth and declared, as a high and binding duty of government itself, to encourage schools, and advance the means of education; on the plain reason, that religion, morality, and knowledge, are necessary to good government, and to the happiness of mankind. One observation further. The important provision incorporated into the constitution of the United States, and several of those of the states, and recently, as we have seen, adopted into the reformed constitution of Virginia, restraining legislative power, in questions of private right, and from impairing the obligation of contracts, is first introduced and established, as far as I am informed, as matter of express written constitutional law, in this ordinance of 1787. And I must add, also, in regard to the author of the ordinance, who has not had the happiness to attract the gentleman's notice, heretofore, nor to avoid his sarcasm now, that he was chairman of that select committee of the old congress, whose report first expressed the strong sense of that body, that the old confederation was not adequate to the exigencies of the country, and recommending to the states to send delegates to the convention which formed the present constitution.

An attempt has been made to transfer from the north to the south, the honour of this exclusion of slavery from the Northwestern Territory. The journal, without argument or comment, refutes such attempt. The cession by Virginia was made March, 1784. On the 19th of April following, a committee, consisting of Messrs. Jefferson, Chase, and Howell, reported a plan for a temporary government of the territory, in which was this article: "that, after the year 1800, there shall be neither slavery, nor involuntary servitude, in any of the said states, otherwise than in punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been convicted." Mr. Spaight, of North Carolina, moved to strike out this paragraph. The question was put, according to the form then practised: "shall these words stand as part of the plan," &c. New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania—seven states, voted in the affirmative. Maryland, Virginia, and South Carolina, in the negative. North Carolina was divided. As the consent of the nine states was necessary, the words could not stand, and were struck out accordingly. Mr. Jefferson voted for the clause, but was overruled by his colleagues.

In March of the next year, (1785,) Mr. King, of Massachusetts, seconded by Mr. Ellery, of Rhode Island, proposed the formerly rejected article, with this addition: "And that this regulation shall be an article of compact, and remain a fundamental principle of the constitutions between the thirteen original states, and each of the states described in the resolve," &c. On this clause, which provided the adequate and thorough security, the eight northern states at that time voted affirmatively, and the four southern states negatively. The votes of nine states were not yet obtained, and thus, the provision was again rejected by the southern states. The perseverance of the north held out, and two years afterwards the object was attained. It is no derogation from the credit, whatever that may be, of drawing the ordinance, that its principles had before been prepared and discussed, in the form of resolutions. If one should reason in that way, what would become of the distinguished honour of the author of the declaration of independence? There is not a sentiment in that paper which had not been voted and resolved in the assemblies, and other popular bodies in the country, over and over again.

But the honourable member has now found out that this gentle-instrument permits a state to retain its place in the union, and yet be bound by no other of its laws than those it may choose to consider as constitution-man, Mr. Dane, was a member of the Hartford convention. However uninformed the honourable member may be of characters and occurrences at the north, it would seem that he has at his elbow on this occasion, some high-minded and lofty spirit, some magnanimous and true-hearted monitor, possessing the means of local knowledge, and ready to supply the honourable member with every thing, down even to forgotten and moth-eaten twopenny pamphlets, which may be used to the disadvantage of his own country. But as to the Hartford convention, sir, allow me to say, that the proceedings of that body seem now to be less read and studied in New England than further south. They appear to be looked to, not in New England, but elsewhere, for the purpose of seeing how far they may serve as a precedent. But they will not answer the purpose; they are quite too tame. The latitude in which they originated was too cold. Other conventions, of more recent existence, have gone a whole bar's length beyond it. The learned doctors of Colleton and Abbeville have pushed their commentaries on the Hartford collect so far, that the original text-writers are thrown entirely into the shade. I have nothing to do, sir, with the Hartford convention. Its journal, which the gentleman has quoted, I never read. So far as the honourable member may discover in its proceedings a spirit in any degree resembling that which was avowed and justified in those other conventions to which I have alluded, or so far as those proceedings can be shown to be disloyal to the constitution, or tending to disunion, so far I shall be as ready as any one to bestow on them reprehension and censure.

Having dwelt long on this convention, and other occurrences of that day, in the hope, probably, (which will not be gratified,) that I should leave the course of this debate to follow him at length in those discussions, the honourable member returned, and attempted another object. He referred to a speech of mine in the other house, the same which I had occasion to allude to myself the other day, and has quoted a passage or two from it, with a bold, though uneasy and labouring air of confidence, as if he had detected in me an inconsistency. Judging from the gentleman's manner, a stranger to the course of the debate, and to the point in discussion, would have imagined, from so triumphant a tone, that the honourable member was about to overwhelm me with a manifest contradiction. Any one who heard him, and who had not heard what I had, in fact, previously said, must have thought me routed and discomfited, as the gentleman had promised. Sir, a breath blows all this triumph away. There is not the slightest difference in the sentiments of my remarks on the two occasions. What I said here on Wednesday, is in exact accordance with the opinions expressed by me in the other house, in 1825. Though the gentleman had the metaphysics of Hudibras—though he were able "To sever and divide

A hair 'twixt north and northwest side,"

he yet could not insert his metaphysical scissors between the fair reading of my remarks in 1825, and what I said here last week. There is not only no contradiction, no difference, but, in truth, too exact a similarity, both in thought and language, to be entirely in just taste. I had myself quoted the same speech; had recurred to it, and spoke with it open before me; and much of what I said was little more than a repetition from it. In order to make finishing work with this alleged contradiction, permit me to recur to the origin of this debate, and review its course. This seems expedient, and may be done as well now as at any time.

Well, then, its history is this: The honourable member from Connecticut moved a resolution, which constitutes the first branch of that which is now before us; that is to say, a resolution, instructing the committee on public lands to inquire into the expediency of limiting, for a certain period, the sales of the public lands, to such as have heretofore been offered for sale; and whether sundry offices, connected with the sales of the lands, might not be abolished, without detriment to the public service.

In the progress of the discussion which arose on this resolution, al. It is true, they add, that to justify this abrogation of a law, it must be palpably contrary to the constitution; but it is evident, that to give the right an honourable member from New Hampshire moved to amend the resolution, so as entirely to reverse its object; that is, to strike it all out, and insert a direction to the committee to inquire into the expediency of adopting measures to hasten the sales, and extend more rapidly the surveys of the lands.

The honourable member from Maine, (Mr. Sprague,) suggested, that both those propositions might well enough go, for consideration, to the committee; and in this state of the question, the member from South Carolina addressed the senate in his first speech. He rose, he said, to give us his own free thoughts on the public lands. I saw him rise with pleasure, and listened with expectation, though, before he concluded, I was filled with surprise. Certainly, I was never more surprised, than to find him following up, to the extent he did, the sentiments and opinions which the gentleman from Missouri had put forth, and which it is known he has long entertained.

I need not repeat, at large, the general topics of the honourable gentleman's speech. When he said, yesterday, that he did not attack the eastern states, he certainly must have forgotten, not only particular remarks, but the whole drift and tenor of his speech; unless he means, by not attacking, that he did not commence hostilities—but that another had preceded him in the attack. He, in the first place, disapproved of the whole course of the government, for forty years, in regard to its dispositions of the public land; and then, turning northward and eastward, and fancying he had found a cause for alleged narrowness and niggardliness in the "accursed policy" of the tariff, to which he represented the people of New England as wedded, he went on, for a full hour, with remarks, the whole scope of which was to exhibit the results of this policy, in feelings and measures unfavourable to the west. I thought his opinions unfounded and erroneous, as to the general course of the government, and ventured to reply to them.

The gentleman remarked on the analogy of other cases, and quoted the conduct of European governments towards their own subjects, settling on this continent, as in point, to show, that we had been harsh and rigid in selling, when we should have given the public lands to settlers. I thought the honourable member had suffered his judgment to be betrayed by a false analogy; that he was struck with an appearance of resemblance, where there was no real similitude. I think so still. The first settlers of North America were enterprising spirits, engaged in private adventure, or fleeing from tyranny at home. When arrived here, they were forgotten by the mother country, or remembered only to be oppressed. Carried away again by the appearance of analogy, or struck with the eloquence of the passage, the honourable member yesterday observed, that the conduct of government towards the western emigrants, or my representation of it, brought to his mind a celebrated speech in the British parliament. It was, sir, the speech of Col. Barre. On the question of the stamp act, or tea tax, I forget which, Col. Barre had heard a member on the treasury bench argue, that the people of the United States, being British colonists, planted by the maternal care, nourished by the indulgence, and protected by the arms of England, would not grudge their mite to relieve the mother country from the heavy burden under which she groaned. The language of Col. Barre, in reply to this, was—"They planted by your care! Your oppression planted them in America. They fled from your tyranny, and grew by your neglect of them. So soon as you began to care for them, you showed your care by sending persons to spy out their liberties, misrepresent their character, prey upon them, and eat out their substance."

And now, does the honourable gentleman mean to maintain, that language like this is applicable to the conduct of the government of the United States towards the western emigrants, or to any representation given by me of that conduct? Were the settlers of the west driven thither by our oppression? Have they flourished only by our neglect of them? Has the government done nothing but to prey upon them, and eat out their substance? Sir, this fervid eloquence of the British speaker, just when and where it was uttered, and fit to remain an exercise for the schools, is not a little

out of place, when it is brought thence to be applied here, to the conduct of our own country towards her own citizens. From America to England, it may be true; from Americans to their own government; it would be strange language. Let us leave it to be declaimed by our boys against a foreign nation; not introduce it here to recite and declaim ourselves against our own.

But I come to the point of the alleged contradiction. In my remarks on Wednesday, I contended, that we could not give away gratuitously all the public lands; that we held them in trust; that the government had solemnly pledged itself to dispose of them as a common fund for the common benefit, and to sell and settle them as its discretion should dictate. Now, sir, what contradiction does the gentleman find to this sentiment, in the speech of 1825? He quotes me as having then said, that we ought not to hug these lands as a very great treasure. Very well, sir, supposing me to be accurately reported, in that expression, what is the contradiction? I have not now said, that we should hug these lands as a favourite source of pecuniary income. No such thing. It is not my view. What I have said, and what I do say, is, that they are a common fund—to be disposed of for the common benefit—to be sold at low prices, for the accommodation of settlers, keeping the object of settling the lands as much in view, as that of raising money from them. This I say now, and this I have always said. Is this hugging them as a favourite treasure? Is there no difference between hugging and hoarding this fund, on the one hand, as a great treasure, and, on the other, of disposing of it at low prices, placing the proceeds in the general treasury of the union? My opinion is, that as much is to be made of the land, as fairly and reasonably may be, selling it all the while at such rates as to give the fullest effect to settlement. This is not giving it all away to the states, as the gentleman would propose; nor is it hugging the fund closely and tenaciously, as a favourite treasure; but it is, in my judgment, a just and wise policy, perfectly according with all the various duties which rest on government. So much for my contradiction. And what is it? Where is the ground of the gentleman's triumph? What inconsistency, in word or doctrine, has he been able to detect? Sir, if this be a sample of that discomfiture with which the honourable member threatened me, commend me to the word discomfiture for the rest of my life.

But, after all, this is not the point of the debate; and I must now bring the gentleman back to that which is the point.

The real question between him and me is, where has the doctrine been advanced, at the south or the east, that the population of the west should be retarded, or at least need not be hastened, on account of its effect to drain off the people from the Atlantic states? Is this doctrine, as has been alleged, of eastern origin? That is the question. Has the gentleman found any thing, by which he can make good his accusation? I submit to the senate, that he has entirely failed; and, as far as this debate has shown, the only person who has advanced such sentiments, is a gentleman from South Carolina, and a friend to the honourable member himself. The honourable gentleman has given no answer to this; there is none which can be given. The simple fact, while it requires no comment to enforce it, defies all argument to refute it. I could refer to the speeches of another southern gentleman, in years before, of the same general character, and to the same effect, as that which has been quoted; but I will not consume the time of the senate by the reading of them.

So then, sir, New England is guiltless of the policy of retarding western population, and of all envy and jealousy of the growth of the new states. Whatever there be of that policy in the country, no part of it is her's. If it has a local habitation, the honourable member has probably seen, by this time, where he is to look for it; and if it has now received a name, he has himself christened it.

We approach, at length, sir, to a more important part of the honourable gentleman's observations. Since it does not accord with my views of justice and policy to give away the public lands altogether, as mere matter of gratuity, I am asked by the honourable gentleman, on what ground it is, that I consent to vote them away

For, as by the theory, there is no appeal, the reasons alleged by the state, good or bad, must prevail. If it should be said, that public opinion is a sufficient in particular instances? How, he inquires, do I reconcile with these professed sentiments, my support of measures appropriating portions of the lands to particular roads, particular canals, particular rivers, and particular institutions of education in the west? This leads, sir, to the real and wide difference in political opinion between the honourable gentleman and myself. On my part, I look upon all these objects as connected with the common good, fairly embraced in its object and its terms; he, on the contrary, deems them all, if good at all, only local good. This is our difference. The interrogatory which he proceeded to put, at once explains this difference. "What interest," asks he, "has South Carolina in a canal in Ohio?" Sir, this very question is full of significance. It develops the gentleman's whole political system; and its answer expounds mine. Here we differ, toto calo. I look upon a road over the Alleghany, a canal round the falls of the Ohio, or a canal or railway from the Atlantic to the western waters, as being objects large and extensive enough to be fairly said to be for the common benefit. The gentleman thinks otherwise, and this is the key to open his construction of the powers of the government. He may well ask, upon his system, what interest has South Carolina in a canal in Ohio? On that system, it is true, she has no interest. On that system, Ohio and Carolina are different governments, and different countries, connected here, it is true, by some slight and ill-defined bond of union, but in all main respects, separate and diverse. On that system, Carolina has no more interest in a canal in Ohio, than in Mexico. The gentleman, therefore, only follows out his own principles; he does no more than arrive at the natural conclusions of his own doctrines; he only announces the true results of that creed which he has adopted himself, and would persuade others to adopt, when he thus declares that South Carolina has no interest in a public work in Ohio. Sir, we narrow-minded people of New England do not reason thus. Our notion of things is entirely different. We look upon the states not as separated, but as united. We love to dwell on that union, and on the mutual happiness which it has so much promoted, and the common renown which it has so greatly contributed to acquire. In our contemplation, Carolina and Ohio are parts of the same country; states, united under the same general government, having interests, common, associated, intermingled. In whatever is within the proper sphere of the constitutional power of this government, we look upon the states as one. We do not impose geographical limits to our patriotic feeling or regard; we do not follow rivers, and mountains, and lines of latitude, to find boundaries beyond which public improvements do not benefit us. We who come here, as agents and representatives of these narrow-minded and selfish men of New England, consider ourselves as bound to regard, with equal eye, the good of the whole, in whatever is within our power of legislation. Sir, if a railroad or a canal, beginning in South Carolina, and ending in South Carolina, appeared to me to be of national importance and national magnitude, believing, as I do, that the power of government extends to the encouragement of works of that description, if I were to stand up here, and ask, what interest has Massachusetts in a railroad in South Carolina, I should not be willing to face my constituents. These same narrow-minded men would tell me, that they had sent me to act for the whole country, and that one who possessed too little comprehension, either of intellect or feeling; one who was not large enough, in mind and heart, to embrace the whole, was not fit to be entrusted with the interest of any part. Sir, I do not desire to enlarge the powers of the government, by unjustifiable construction; nor to exercise any not within a fair interpretation. But when it is believed, that a power does exist, then it is, in my judgment, to be exercised for the general benefit of the whole: so far as respects the exercise of such a power, the states are one. It was the very object of the constitution to create unity of interests to the extent of the powers of the general government. In war and peace, we are one; in commerce one; because the authority of the general government reaches to war and peace, and to the regulation of commerce. I have never seen any more difficulty in erecting light-houses on the lakes, than on the ocean; in improving the harbours of inland seas, than if they were within the ebb and flow of the tide; or of removing obstructions in the vast streams of the west, more than in any work to facilitate commerce on the Atlantic coast. If there be power for one, there is power also for the other; and they are all and equally for the country.

There are other objects, apparently more local, or the benefit of which is less general, towards which, nevertheless, I have concurred with others to give aid, by donations of land. It is proposed to construct a road in or through one of the new states in which this government possesses large quantities of land. Have the United States no right, as a great and untaxed proprietor? Are they under no obligation to contribute to an object thus calculated to promote the common good of all the proprietors, themselves included? And even with respect to education, which is the extreme case, let the question be considered. In the first place, as we have seen, it was made matter of compact with these states, that they should do their part to promote education. In the next place, our whole system of land laws proceeds on the idea that education is for the common good; because, in every division, a certain portion is uniformly reserved and appropriated for the use of schools. And, finally, have not these new states singularly strong claims, founded on the ground already stated, that the government is a great untaxed proprietor in the ownership of the soil? It is a consideration of great importance, that probably there is in no part of the country, or of the world, so great a call for the means of education, as in those new states; owing to the vast numbers of persons within those ages, in which education and instruction are usually received, if received at all. This is the natural consequence of recency of settlement and rapid increase. The census of these states shows how great a proportion of the whole population occupies the classes between infancy and manhood. These are the wide fields, and here is the deep and quick soil for the seeds of knowledge and virtue; and this is the favoured season, the spring time for sowing them. Let them be disseminated without stint. Let them be scattered with a bountiful, broad cast. Whatever the government can fairly do towards these objects, in my opinion, ought to be done.

These, sir, are the grounds, succinctly stated, on which my votes for grants of lands for particular objects rest; while I maintain, at the same time, that it is all a common fund, for the common benefit. And reasons like these, I presume, have influenced the votes of other gentlemen from New England. Those who have a different view of the powers of the government, of course, come to different conclusions, on these, as on other questions. I observed, when speaking on this subject before, that if we looked to any measure, whether for a road, a canal, or any thing else, intended for the improvement of the west, it would be found, that if the New England ayes were struck out of the lists of votes, the southern noes would always have rejected the measure. The truth of this has not been denied, and can not be denied. In stating this, I thought it just to ascribe it to the constitutional scruples of the south, rather than to any other less favourable or less charitable cause. But, no sooner had I done this, than the honourable gentleman asks, if I reproach him and his friends with their constitutional scruples? Sir, I reproach nobody. I stated a fact, and gave the most respectful reason for it that occurred to me. The gentleman can not deny the fact; he may, if he choose, disclaim the reason. It is not long since I had occasion, in presenting a petition from his own state, to account for its being entrusted to my hands, by saying, that the constitutional opinions of the gentleman and his worthy colleague, prevented them from supporting it. Sir, did I state this as a matter of reproach? Far from it. Did I attempt to find any other cause than an honest one for these scruples? Sir, I did not. It did not become me to doubt nor to insinuate that the gentleman had either changed his sentiments, or that he had made up a set of constitutional opinions, accommodated to any particular combination of political occurrences. Had I done so, I should have felt, that while I was entitled to little credit in thus questioning other people's motives, I justified the whole world in suspecting my own.

There is, however, a restraint in this last case, which makes the assumed power of a state more indefensible, and which does not exist in the other. There

But how has the gentleman returned this respect for others' opinions? His own candour and justice, how have they been exhibited towards the motives of others, while he has been at so much pains to maintain, what nobody has disputed, the purity of his own? Why, sir, he has asked, when, and how, and why, New England votes were found going for measures favourable to the west; he has demanded to be informed, whether all this did not begin in 1825, and while the election of president was still pending? Sir, to these questions retort would be justified; and it is both cogent and at hand. Nevertheless, I will answer the inquiry, not by retort, but by facts. I will tell the gentleman when, and how, and why, New England has supported measures favourable to the west. I have already referred to the early history of the government—to the first acquisition of the lands—to the original laws for disposing of them, and for governing the territories where they lie; and have shown the influence of New England men and New England principles in all these leading measures. I should not be pardoned were I to go over that ground again. Coming to more recent times, and to measures of a less general character, I have endeavoured to prove that every thing of this kind, designed for western improvement, has depended on the votes of New England; all this is true, beyond the power of contradiction.

And now, sir, there are two measures to which I will refer, not so ancient as to belong to the early history of the public lands, and not so recent as to be on this side of the period when the gentleman charitably imagines a new direction may have been given the New England feeling, and New England votes. These measures, and the New England votes in support of them, may be taken as samples and specimens of all the rest. In 1820, observe, Mr. President, in 1820, the people of the west besought congress for a reduction in the price of lands. In favour of that reduction, New England, with a delegation of forty members in the other house, gave thirty-three votes, and one only against it. The four southern states, with fifty members, gave thirty-two votes for it, and seven against it. Again, in 1821, (observe again, sir, the time,) the law passed for the relief of the purchasers of the public lands. This was a measure of vital importance to the west, and more especially to the southwest. It authorized the relinquishment of contracts for lands, which had been entered into at high prices, and a reduction in the other cases of not less than 37 1-2 per cent. on the purchase money. Many millions of dollars, six or seven, I believe, at least, probably much more, were relinquished by this law. On this bill, New England, with her forty members, gave more affirmative votes than the four southern states, with their fifty-two or three members. These two are far the most important measures, respecting the public lands, which have been adopted within the last twenty years. They took place in 1820 and 1821. That is the time when. And as to the manner how, the gentleman already sees that it was by voting, in solid column, for the required relief; and, lastly, as to the cause why, I tell the gentleman, it was because the members from New England thought the measures just and salutary; because they entertained towards the west neither envy, hatred, nor malice; because they deemed it becoming them, as just and enlightened public men, to meet the exigency which had arisen in the west, with the appropriate measure of relief; because they felt it due to their own characters, and the characters of their New England predecessors in this government, to act towards the new states in the spirit of a liberal, patronizing, magnanimous policy. So much, sir, for the cause why; and I hope that by this time, sir, the honourable gentleman is satisfied; if not, I do not know when, or how, or why, he ever will be.

Having recurred to these two important measures, in answer to the gentleman's inquiries, I must now beg permission to go back to a period yet something earlier, for the purpose of still further showing how much, or rather, how little reason there is for the gentleman's insinuation, that political hopes, or fears, or party associations, were the grounds of these New England votes. And after what has been said, I hope it may be forgiven me, if I allude to some political opinions and votes of my own, of very little public are two appeals from an unconstitutional act passed by congress—one to the judiciary, the other to the people and the states. There is no appeal from importance, certainly, but which, from the time at which they were given and expressed, may pass for good witnesses on this occasion.

This government, Mr. President, from its origin to the peace of 1815, had been too much engrossed with various other important concerns, to be able to turn its thoughts inward, and look to the development of its vast internal resources. In the early part of President Washington's administration, it was fully occupied with organizing the government, providing for the public debt, defending the frontiers, and maintaining domestic peace. Before the termination of that administration, the fires of the French revolution blazed forth, as from a new opened volcano, and the whole breadth of the ocean did not entirely secure us from its effects. The smoke and the cinders reached us, though not the burning lava. Difficult and agitating questions, embarrassing to government, and dividing public opinion, sprung out of the new state of our foreign relations, and were succeeded by others, and yet again by others, equally embarrassing, and equally exciting division and discord, through the long series of twenty years; till they finally issued in the war with England. Down to the close of that war, no distinct, marked, and deliberate attention, had been given, or could have been given, to the internal condition of the country, its capacities of improvement, or the constitutional power of the government, in regard to objects connected with such improvement.

The peace, Mr. President, brought about an entirely new, and a most interesting state of things: it opened to us other prospects, and suggested other duties. We ourselves were changed, and the whole world was changed. The pacification of Europe, after June, 1815, assumed a firm and permanent aspect. The nations evidently manifested that they were disposed for peace. Some agitation of the waves might be expected, even after the storm had subsided, but the tendency was, strongly and rapidly, towards settled repose.

It so happened, sir, that I was at that time a member of congress, and, like others, naturally turned my attention to the contemplation of the newly altered condition of the country, and of the world. It appeared plainly enough to me, as well as to wiser and more experienced men, that the policy of the government would necessarily take a start, in a new direction; because new directions would necessarily be given to the pursuits and occupations of the people. We had pushed our commerce far and fast, under the advantage of a neutral flag. But there were now no longer flags, either neutral or belligerent. The harvest of neutrality had been great, but we had gathered it all. With the peace of Europe, it was obvious there would spring up in her circle of nations, a revived and invigorated spirit of trade, and a new activity in all the business and objects of civilized life. Hereafter, our commercial gains were to be earned only by success in a close and intense competition. Other nations would produce for themselves, and carry for themselves, and manufacture for themselves, to the full extent of their abilities. The crops of our plains would no longer sustain European armies, nor our ships longer supply those whom war had rendered unable to supply themselves. It was obvious, that, under these circumstances, the country would begin to survey itself, and to estimate its own capacity of improvement. And this improvement, how was it to be accomplished, and who was to accomplish it? We were ten or twelve millions of people, spread over almost half a world. We were twenty-four states, some stretching along the same seaboard, some along the same line of inland frontier, and others on opposite banks of the same vast rivers. Two considerations at once presented themselves, in looking at this state of things, with great force. One was, that that great branch of improvement, which consisted in furnishing new facilities of intercourse, necessarily ran into different states, in every leading instance, and would benefit the citizens of all such states. No one state, therefore, in such cases, would assume the whole expense, nor was the co-operation of several states to be expected. Take the instance of the Delaware Breakwater. It will cost several millions of money. Would Pennsylvania alone have ever constructed it? Certainly never, while this union lasts, because it is not for her sole benefit. Would Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Delaware, have united to the state decision in theory, and the practical illustration shows that the courts are shut against an application to review it, both judges and jurors being accomplish it at their joint expense? Certainly not, for the same reason. It could not be done, therefore, but by the general government. The same may be said of the large inland undertakings, except that, in them, government, instead of bearing the whole expense, co-operates with others who bear a part. The other consideration is, that the United States have the means. They enjoy the revenues derived from commerce, and the states have no abundant and easy sources of public income. The custom-houses fill the general treasury, while the states have scanty resources, except by resort to heavy direct taxes.

Under this view of things, I thought it necessary to settle, at least for myself, some definite notions, with respect to the powers of the government, in regard to internal affairs. It may not savour too much of self-commendation to remark, that, with this object, I considered the constitution, its judicial construction, its contemporaneous exposition, and the whole history of the legislation of congress under it; and I arrived at the conclusion, that government had power to accomplish sundry objects, or aid in their accomplishment, which are now commonly spoken of as INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS. That conclusion, sir, may have been right, or it may have been wrong. I am not about to argue the grounds of it at large. I only say, that it was adopted and acted on even so early as in 1816. Yes, Mr. President, I made up my opinion, and determined on my intended course of political conduct, on these subjects, in the fourteenth congress, in 1816. And now, Mr. President, I have further to say, that I made up these opinions, and entered on this course of political conduct, Teucro duce. Yes, sir, I pursued, in all this, a South Carolina track. On the doctrines of internal improvement, South Carolina, as she was then represented in the other house, set forth, in 1816, under a fresh and leading breeze, and I was among the followers. But if my leader sees new lights, and turns a sharp corner, unless I see new lights also, I keep straight on in the same path. I repeat, that leading gentlemen from South Carolina were first and foremost in behalf of the doctrines of internal improvements, when those doctrines first came to be considered and acted upon in congress. The debate on the bank question, on the tariff of 1816, and on the direct tax, will show who was who, and what was what, at that time. The tariff of 1816, one of the plain cases of oppression and usurpation, from which, if the government does not recede, individual states may justly secede from the government, is, sir, in truth, a South Carolina tariff, supported by South Carolina votes. But for those votes, it could not have passed in the form in which it did pass; whereas, if it had depended on Massachusetts votes, it would have been lost. Does not the honourable gentleman well know all this? There are certainly those who do, full well, know it all. I do not say this to reproach South Carolina. I only state the fact; and I think it will appear to be true, that among the earliest and boldest advocates of the tariff, as a measure of protection, and on the express ground of protection, were leading gentlemen of South Carolina, in congress. I did not then, and can not now, understand their language in any other sense. While this tariff of 1816 was under discussion, in the house of representatives, an honourable gentleman from Georgia, now of this house, (Mr. Forsyth,) moved to reduce the proposed duty on cotton. He failed, by four votes, South Carolina giving three votes (enough to have turned the scale) against his motion. The act, sir, then passed, and received on its passage the support of a majority of the representatives of South Carolina present and voting. This act is the first, in the order of those now denounced as plain usurpations. We see it daily, in the list, by the side of those of 1824 and 1828, as a case of manifest oppression, justifying disunion. I put it home to the honourable member from South Carolina, that his own state was not only "art and part" in this measure, but the causa causans. Without her aid, this seminal principle of mischief, this root of Upas, could not have been planted. I have already said, and it is true, that this act proceeded on the ground of protection. It interfered, directly, with existing interests of great value and amount. It cut up the Calcutta cotton trade by the roots, but it passed, nevertheless, and it passed on the sworn to decide in its favour. But reasoning on this subject is superfluous, when our social compact in express terms declares, that the laws of the United principle of protecting manufactures, on the principle against free trade, on the principle opposed to that which lets us alone.

Such, Mr. President, were the opinions of important and leading gentlemen from South Carolina, on the subject of internal improvement, in 1816. I went out of congress the next year; and returning again in 1823, thought I found South Carolina where I had left her. I really supposed that all things remained as they were, and that the South Carolina doctrine of internal improvements would be defended by the same eloquent voices, and the same strong arms, as formerly. In the lapse of these six years, it is true, political associations had assumed a new aspect, and new divisions. A party had arisen in the south, hostile to the doctrine of internal improvements, and had vigorously attacked that doctrine. Anti consolidation was the flag under which this party fought; and its supporters inveighed against internal improvements, much after the manner in which the honourable gentleman has now inveighed against them, as part and parcel of the system of consolidation. Whether this party arose in South Carolina herself, or in her neighbourhood, is more than I know. I think the latter. However that may have been, there were those found in South Carolina ready to make war upon it, and who did make intrepid war upon it. Names being regarded as things, in such controversies, they bestowed on the anti-improvement gentlemen the appellation of radicals. Yes, sir, the name of radicals, as a term of distinction, applicable and applied to those who denied the liberal doctrines of internal improvements, originated, according to the best of my recollection, somewhere between North Carolina and Georgia. Well, sir, these mischievous radicals were to be put down, and the strong arm of South Carolina was stretched out to put them down. About this time, sir, I returned to congress. The battle with the radicals had been fought, and our South Carolina champions of the doctrines of internal improvement had nobly maintained their ground, and were understood to have achieved a victory. They had driven back the enemy with discomfiture—a thing, by the way, sir, which is not always performed when it is promised. A gentleman, to whom I have already referred in this debate, had come into congress, during my absence from it, from South Carolina, and had brought with him a high reputation for ability. He came from a school with which we have been acquainted, et noscitur a sociis. I hold in my hand, sir, a printed speech of this distinguished gentleman, (Mr. McDuffie,) "ON INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS," delivered about the period to which I now refer, and printed with a few introductory remarks upon consolidation; in which, sir, I think he quite consolidated the arguments of his opponents, the radicals, if to crush be to consolidate. I give you a short, but substantive quotation, from these remarks. He is speaking of a pamphlet, then recently published, entitled, "Consolidation;" and having alluded to the question of renewing the charter of the former bank of the United States, he says, "Moreover, in the early history of parties, and when Mr. Crawford advocated a renewal of the old charter, it was considered a federal measure; which internal improvements never was, as this author erroneously states. This latter measure originated in the administration of Mr. Jefferson, with the appropriation for the Cumberland road; and was first proposed, as a system, by Mr. Calhoun, and carried through the house of representatives by a large majority of the republicans, including almost every one of the leading men who carried us through the late war."

So, then, internal improvement is not one of the federal heresies. One paragraph more, sir:

"The author in question, not content with denouncing as federalists General Jackson, Mr. Adams, Mr. Calhoun, and the majority of the South Carolina delegation in congress, modestly extends the denunciation to Mr. Monroe, and the whole republican party. Here are his words: 'During the administration of Mr. Monroe, much has passed which the republican party would be glad to approve if they could. But the principal feature, and that which has chiefly elicited these observations, is the renewal of the SYSTEM OF INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.' Now this measure was adopted by a vote of 115 to 86, of a republican congress, and sanctioned by a repub-

States, its constitution and treaties made under it, are the supreme law of the land—and for greater caution adds, ‘that the judges in every state shall be lican president. Who, then, is this author, who assumes the high prerogative of denouncing, in the name of the republican party, the republican administration of the country? A denunciation including within its sweep Calhoun, Lowndes, and Cherres—men who will be regarded as the brightest ornaments of South Carolina, and the strongest pillars of the republican party, as long as the late war shall be remembered, and talents and patriotism shall be regarded as the proper objects of the admiration and gratitude of a free people.”

Such are the opinions, sir, which were maintained by South Carolina gentlemen, in the house of representatives, on the subject of internal improvements, when I took my seat there as a member from Massachusetts, in 1823. But this is not all: we had a bill before us, and passed it in that house, entitled, “An act to procure the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, upon the subject of roads and canals.” It authorized the president to cause surveys and estimates to be made of the routes of such roads and canals as he might deem of national importance, in a commercial or military point of view, or for the transportation of the mail, and appropriated thirty thousand dollars, out of the treasury, to defray the expense. This act, though preliminary in its nature, covered the whole ground. It took for granted the complete power of internal improvement, as far as any of its advocates had ever contended for it. Having passed the other house, the bill came up to the senate, and was here considered and debated in April, 1824. The honourable member from South Carolina was a member of the senate at that time. While the bill was under consideration here, a motion was made to add the following proviso:

“Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to affirm or admit a power in congress, on their own authority, to make roads or canals, within any of the states of the union.”

The yeas and nays were taken on this proviso, and the honourable member voted in the negative! The proviso failed. A motion was then made to add this proviso, viz.:

“Provided, That the faith of the United States is hereby pledged, that no money shall ever be expended for roads or canals, except it shall be among the several states, and in the same proportion as direct taxes are laid and assessed by the provisions of the constitution.”

The honourable member voted against this proviso also, and it failed. The bill was then put on its passage, and the honourable member voted for it, and it passed, and became a law.

Now, it strikes me, sir, that there is no maintaining these votes, but upon the power of internal improvement, in its broadest sense. In truth, these bills for surveys and estimates have always been considered as test questions—they show who is for and who against internal improvement. This law itself went the whole length, and assumed the full and complete power. The gentleman’s vote sustained that power, in every form in which the various propositions to amend presented it. He went for the entire and unrestrained authority, without consulting the states, and without agreeing to any proportionate distribution. And now suffer me to remind you, Mr. President, that it is this very same power, thus sanctioned, in every form, by the gentleman’s own opinion, that is so plain and manifest a usurpation, that the state of South Carolina is supposed to be justified in refusing submission to any laws carrying the power into effect. Truly, sir, is not this a little too hard? May we not crave some mercy, under favour and protection of the gentleman’s own authority? Admitting that a road, or a canal, must be written down flat usurpation as ever was committed, may we find no mitigation in our respect for his place, and his vote, as one that knows the law?

The tariff, which South Carolina had an efficient hand in establishing, in 1816, and this asserted power of internal improvement, advanced by her in the same year, and, as we have seen, approved and sanctioned by her representatives in 1824, these two measures are the great grounds on which she is now thought to be justified in breaking up the union, if she sees fit to break it up!

I may now safely say, I think, that we have had the authority of bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding.’ And it may be asserted without fear of refutation, that no leading and distinguished gentlemen from South Carolina, in support of the doctrine of internal improvement. I repeat, that, up to 1824, I, for one, followed South Carolina; but, when that star, in its ascension, veered off in an unexpected direction, I relied on its light no longer. [Here the Vice-President said, “Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Massachusetts to say, that the person now occupying the chair of the senate has changed his opinions on the subject of internal improvement?”] From nothing ever said to me, sir, have I had reason to know of any change in the opinions of the person filling the chair of the senate. If such change has taken place, I regret it. I speak generally of the state of South Carolina. Individuals, we know there are, who hold opinions favourable to the power. An application for its exercise, in behalf of a public work in South Carolina itself, is now pending, I believe, in the other house, presented by members from that state.

I have thus, sir, perhaps not without some tediousness of detail, shown that if I am in error, on the subjects of internal improvement, how, and in what company, I fell into that error. If I am wrong, it is apparent who misled me.

I go to other remarks of the honourable member, and I have to complain of an entire misapprehension of what I said on the subject of the national debt, though I can hardly perceive how any one could misunderstand me. What I said was, not that I wished to put off the payment of the debt, but, on the contrary, that I had always voted for every measure for its reduction, as uniformly as the gentleman himself. He seems to claim the exclusive merit of a disposition to reduce the public charge. I do not allow it to him. As a debt, I was, I am for paying it, because it is a charge on our finances, and on the industry of the country. But I observed, that I thought I perceived a morbid fervour on that subject—an excessive anxiety to pay off the debt, not so much because it is a debt simply, as because, while it lasts, it furnishes one objection to disunion. It is a tie of common interest, while it lasts. I did not impute such motives to the honourable member himself, but that there is such a feeling in existence, I have not a particle of doubt. The most I said was, that if one effect of the debt was to strengthen our union, that effect itself was not regretted by me, however much others might regret it. The gentleman has not seen how to reply to this, otherwise than by supposing me to have advanced the doctrine that a national debt is a national blessing. Others, I must hope, will find less difficulty in understanding me. I distinctly and pointedly cautioned the honourable member not to understand me as expressing an opinion favourable to the continuance of the debt. I repeated this caution, and repeated it more than once; but it was thrown away.

On yet another point, I was still more unaccountably misunderstood. The gentleman had harangued against “consolidation.” I told him, in reply, that there was one kind of consolidation to which I was attached, and that was the consolidation of our union; and that this was precisely that consolidation to which I feared others were not attached. That such consolidation was the very end of the constitution—the leading object, as they had informed us themselves, which its framers had kept in view. I turned to their communication, and read their very words—“the consolidation of the union”—and expressed my devotion to this sort of consolidation. I said, in terms, that I wished not, in the slightest degree, to augment the powers of this government; that my object was to preserve, not to enlarge; and that by consolidating the union, I understood no more than the strengthening of the union, and perpetuating it. Having been thus explicit; having thus read, from the printed book, the precise words which I adopted, as expressing my own sentiments, it passes comprehension, how any man could understand me as contending for an extension of the powers of the government, or for consolidation, in that odious sense, in which it means an accumulation in the federal government of the powers properly belonging to the states.

I repeat, sir, that in adopting the sentiment of the framers of the constitution, I read their language audibly, and word for word; and I pointed out the distinction, just as fully as I have now done, be-federative government could exist without a similar provision. Look for a moment to the consequence. If South Carolina considers the revenue laws uncon-tween the consolidation of the union, and that other obnoxious consolidation which I disclaimed. And yet the honourable member misunderstood me. The gentleman had said that he wished for no fixed revenue—not a shilling. If, by a word, he could convert the capitol into gold, he would not do it. Why all this fear of revenue? Why, sir, because, as the gentleman told us, it tends to consolidation. Now, this can mean neither more nor less than that a common revenue is a common interest, and that all common interests tend to hold the union of the states together. I confess I like that tendency; if the gentleman dislikes it, he is right in deprecating a shilling's fixed revenue. So much, sir, for consolidation.

As well as I recollect the course of his remarks, the honourable gentleman next recurred to the subject of the tariff. He did not doubt the word must be of unpleasant sound to me, and proceeded, with an effort, neither new, nor attended with new success, to involve me and my votes in inconsistency and contradiction. I am happy the honourable gentleman has furnished me an opportunity of a timely remark or two on that subject. I was glad he approached it, for it is a question I enter upon without fear from any body. The strenuous toil of the gentleman has been to raise an inconsistency between my dissent to the tariff in 1824, and my vote in 1828. It is labour lost. He pays undeserved compliment to my speech in 1824; but this is to raise me high, that my fall, as he would have it, in 1828, may be more signal. Sir, there was no fall at all. Between the ground I stood on in 1824, and that I took in 1828, there was not only no precipice, but no declivity. It was a change of position, to meet new circumstances, but on the same level. A plain tale explains the whole matter. In 1816, I had not acquiesced in the tariff, then supported by South Carolina. To some parts of it, especially, I felt and expressed great repugnance. I held the same opinions in 1821, at the meeting in Faneuil Hall, to which the gentleman has alluded. I said then, and say now, that, as an original question, the authority of congress to exercise the revenue power, with direct reference to the protection of manufactures, is a questionable authority, far more questionable, in my judgment, than the power of internal improvements. I must confess, sir, that, in one respect, some impression has been made on my opinions lately. Mr. Madison's publication has put the power in a very strong light. He has placed it, I must acknowledge, upon grounds of construction and argument, which seem impregnable. But even if the power were doubtful, on the face of the constitution itself, it had been assumed and asserted in the first revenue law ever passed under that same constitution; and, on this ground, as a matter settled by contemporaneous practice, I had refrained from expressing the opinion, that the tariff laws transcended constitutional limits, as the gentleman supposes. What I did say at Faneuil Hall, as far as I now remember, was, that this was originally matter of doubtful construction. The gentleman himself, I suppose, thinks there is no doubt about it, and that the laws are plainly against the constitution. Mr. Madison's letters, already referred to, contain, in my judgment, by far the most able exposition extant, of this part of the constitution. He has satisfied me, so far as the practice of the government had left it an open question.

With a great majority of the representatives of Massachusetts, I voted against the tariff of 1824. My reasons were then given, and I will not now repeat them. But, notwithstanding our dissent, the great states of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Kentucky, went for the bill, in almost unbroken column, and it passed. Congress and the president sanctioned it, and it became the law of the land. What, then, were we to do? Our only option was, either to fall in with this settled course of public policy, and accommodate ourselves to it as well as we could, or to embrace the South Carolina doctrine, and talk of nullifying the statute by state interference.

This last alternative did not suit our principles, and, of course, we adopted the former. In 1827, the subject came again before congress, on a proposition favourable to wool and woollens. We looked upon the system of protection as being fixed and settled.

stitutional, and has a right to prevent their execution in the port of Charleston, there would be a clear constitutional objection to their collection in every

The law of 1824 remained. It had gone into full operation, and, in regard to some objects intended by it, perhaps most of them, had produced all its expected effects. No man proposed to repeal it; no man attempted to renew the general contest on its principle. But, owing to subsequent and unforeseen occurrences, the benefit intended by it to wool and woollen fabrics had not been realized. Events, not known here when the law passed, had taken place, which defeated its object in that particular respect. A measure was accordingly brought forward to meet this precise deficiency, to remedy this particular defect. It was limited to wool and woollens. Was ever any thing more reasonable? If the policy of the tariff laws had become established in principle, as the permanent policy of the government, should they not be revised and amended, and made equal, like other laws, as exigencies should arise, or justice require? Because we had doubted about adopting the system, were we to refuse to cure its manifest defects, after it became adopted, and when no one attempted its repeal? And this, sir, is the inconsistency so much bruited. I had voted against the tariff of 1824—but it passed; and in 1827 and 1828, I voted to amend it, in a point essential to the interest of my constituents. Where is the inconsistency? Could I do otherwise? Sir, does political consistency consist in always giving negative votes? Does it require of a public man to refuse to concur in amending laws, because they passed against his consent? Having voted against the tariff originally, does consistency demand that I should do all in my power to maintain an unequal tariff, burdensome to my own constituents, in many respects, favourable in none? To consistency of that sort, I lay no claim; and there is another sort to which I lay as little—and that is, a kind of consistency by which persons feel themselves as much bound to oppose a proposition after it has become a law of the land, as before.

The bill of 1827, limited, as I have said, to the single object in which the tariff of 1824 had manifestly failed in its effect, passed the house of representatives, but was lost here. We had then the act of 1828. I need not recur to the history of a measure so recent. Its enemies spiced it with whatsoever they thought would render it distasteful; its friends took it, drugged as it was. Vast amounts of property, many millions, had been invested in manufactures, under the inducements of the act of 1824. Events called loudly, as I thought, for further regulation to secure the degree of protection intended by that act. I was disposed to vote for such regulations, and desired nothing more; but certainly was not to be bantered out of my purpose by a threatened augmentation of duty on molasses, put into the bill for the avowed purpose of making it obnoxious. The vote may have been right or wrong, wise or unwise; but it is little less than absurd to allege against it an inconsistency with opposition to the former law.

Sir, as to the general subject of the tariff, I have little now to say. Another opportunity may be presented. I remarked the other day, that this policy did not begin with us in New England; and yet, sir, New England is charged, with vehemence, as being favourable, or charged with equal vehemence, as being unfavourable to the tariff policy, just as best suits the time, place, and occasion for making some charge against her. The credulity of the public has been put to its extreme capacity of false impression, relative to her conduct in this particular. Through all the south, during the late contest, it was New England policy, and a New England administration, that was afflicting the country with a tariff policy beyond all endurance; while on the other side of the Alleghany, even the act of 1828 itself, the very sublimated essence of oppression, according to southern opinions, was pronounced to be one of those blessings, for which the west was indebted to the "generous south."

With large investments in manufacturing establishments, and many and various interests connected with and dependent on them, it is not to be expected that New England, any more than other portions of the country, will now consent to any measure, destructive or highly dangerous. The duty of the government, at the present moment, would seem to be to preserve, not to destroy; to maintain the position which it has assumed; and, for one, I shall feel it other port, and no revenue could be collected any where, for all imposts must be equal. It is no answer to repeat, that an unconstitutional law is no law, so an indispensable obligation to hold it steady, as far as in my power, to that degree of protection which it has undertaken to bestow. No more of the tariff.

Professing to be provoked by what he chose to consider a charge made by me against South Carolina, the honourable member, Mr. President, has taken up a new crusade against New England. Leaving altogether the subject of the public lands, in which his success, perhaps, had been neither distinguished nor satisfactory, and letting go, also, of the topic of the tariff, he sallied forth, in a general assault on the opinions, politics, and parties of New England, as they have been exhibited in the last thirty years. This is natural. The "narrow policy" of the public lands had proved a legal settlement in South Carolina, and was not to be removed. The "accursed policy" of the tariff, also, had established the fact of its birth and parentage, in the same state. No wonder, therefore, the gentleman wished to carry the war, as he expressed it, into the enemy's country. Prudently willing to quit these subjects, he was, doubtless, desirous of fastening on others, which could not be transferred south of Mason and Dixon's line. The politics of New England became his theme; and it was in this part of his speech, I think, that he menaced me with such sore discomfiture. Discomfiture! Why, sir, when he attacks any thing which I maintain, and overthrows it; when he turns the right or left of any position which I take up; when he drives me from any ground I choose to occupy; he may then talk of discomfiture, but not till that distant day. What has he done? Has he maintained his own charges? Has he proved what he alleged? Has he sustained himself in his attack on the government, and on the history of the north, in the matter of the public lands? Has he disproved a fact, refuted a proposition, weakened an argument, maintained by me? Has he come within beat of drum of any position of mine? Oh, no, but he has "carried the war into the enemy's country!" Carried the war into the enemy's country! Yes, sir, and what sort of a war has he made of it? Why, sir, he has stretched a drag-net over the whole surface of perished pamphlets, indiscreet sermons, frothy paragraphs, and fuming popular addresses; over whatever the pulpit, in its moments of alarm, the press in its heats, and parties in their extravagance, have severally thrown off, in times of general excitement and violence. He has thus swept together a mass of such things as, but that they are now old, the public health would have required him rather to leave in their state of dispersion. For a good long hour or two, we had the unbroken pleasure of listening to the honourable member, while he recited, with his usual grace and spirit, and with evident high gusto, speeches, pamphlets, addresses, and all the et ceteras of the political press, such as warm heads produce in warm times; and such as it would be "discomfiture," indeed, for any one, whose taste did not delight in that sort of reading, to be obliged to peruse. This is his war. This it is to carry the war into the enemy's country. It is in an invasion of this sort, that he flatters himself with the expectation of gaining laurels fit to adorn a senator's brow!

Mr. President, I shall not, it will, I trust, not be expected that I should, either now, or at any time, separate this farrago into parts, and answer and examine its components. I shall hardly bestow upon it all, a general remark or two. In the run of forty years, sir, under this constitution, we have experienced sundry successive violent party contests. Party arose, indeed, with the constitution itself, and, in some form or other, has attended it through the greater part of its history. Whether any other constitution than the old articles of confederation, was desirable, was, itself, a question on which parties formed; if a new constitution were framed, what powers should be given to it, was another question; and, when it had been formed, what was, in fact, the just extent of the powers actually conferred, was a third. Parties, as we know, existed, under the first administration, as distinctly marked as those which manifested themselves at any subsequent period. The contest immediately preceding the political change in 1801, and that, again, which existed at the commencement of the late war, are other instances of party excitement, of something more than usual long as the question of its legality is to be decided by the state itself; for every law operating injuriously upon any local interest will be perhaps thought, and strength and intensity. In all these conflicts, there was, no doubt, much of violence on both and all sides. It would be impossible, if one had a fancy for such employment, to adjust the relative quantum of violence between these contending parties. There was enough in each, as must always be expected in popular governments. With a great deal of proper and decorous discussion, there was mingled a great deal, also, of declamation, virulence, crimination, and abuse. In regard to any party, probably, at one of the leading epochs in the history of parties, enough may be found to make out another equally inflamed exhibition, as that with which the honourable member has edified us. For myself, sir, I shall not rake among the rubbish of by-gone times, to see what I can find, or whether I can not find something, by which I can fix a blot on the escutcheon of any state, any party, or any part of the country. General Washington's administration was steadily and zealously maintained, as we all know, by New England. It was violently opposed elsewhere. We know in what quarter he had the most earnest, constant, and persevering support, in all his great and leading measures. We know where his private and personal character were held in the highest degree of attachment and veneration; and we know, too, where his measures were opposed, his services slighted, and his character vilified. We know, or we might know, if we turned to the journals, who expressed respect, gratitude, and regret, when he retired from the chief magistracy; and who refused to express either respect, gratitude, or regret. I shall not open those journals. Publications more abusive or scurrilous never saw the light, than were sent forth against Washington, and all his leading measures, from presses south of New England. But I shall not look them up. I employ no scavengers—no one is in attendance on me, tendering such means of retaliation; and, if there were, with an ass's load of them, with a bulk as huge as that which the gentleman himself has produced, I would not touch one of them. I see enough of the violence of our own times, to be no way anxious to rescue from forgetfulness the extravagances of times past. Besides, what is all this to the present purpose? It has nothing to do with the public lands, in regard to which the attack was begun; and it has nothing to do with those sentiments and opinions, which, I have thought, tend to disunion, and all of which the honourable member seems to have adopted himself, and undertaken to defend. New England has, at times, so argues the gentleman, held opinions as dangerous as those which he now holds. Suppose this were so; why should he, therefore, abuse New England? If he finds himself countenanced by acts of hers, how is it that, while he relies on these acts, he covers, or seeks to cover, their authors with reproach? But, sir, if, in the course of forty years, there have been undue effervescences of party in New England, has the same thing happened no where else? Party animosity and party outrage, not in New England, but elsewhere, denounced President Washington, not only as a federalist, but as a tory, a British agent, a man who, in his high office, sanctioned corruption. But does the honourable member suppose, that, if I had a tender here, who should put such an effusion of wickedness and folly in my hand, that I would stand up and read it against the south? Parties ran into great heats, again, in 1799 and 1800. What was said, sir, or rather, what was not said, in those years, against John Adams, one of the signers of the declaration of independence, and its admitted ablest defender on the floor of congress? If the gentleman wishes to increase his stores of party abuse and frothy violence; if he has a determined proclivity to such pursuits, there are treasures of that sort south of the Potomac, much to his taste, yet untouched—I shall not touch them.

The parties which divided the country at the commencement of the late war, were violent. But, then, there was violence on both sides, and violence in every state. Minorities and majorities were equally violent. There was no more violence against the war in New England, than in other states; nor any more appearance of violence, except that, owing to a dense population, greater facility of assembling, and more presses, there may have been more in quantity spoken and printed there, than in some other places. In certainly represented, as unconstitutional, and, as has been shown, there is no appeal.

"If this doctrine had been established at an earlier the article of sermons, too, New England is somewhat more abundant than South Carolina; and, for that reason, the chance of finding here and there an exceptionable one, may be greater. I hope, too, there are more good ones. Opposition may have been more formidable in New England, as it embraced a larger portion of the whole population; but it was no more unrestrained in its principle, or violent in manner. The minorities dealt quite as harshly with their own state governments, as the majorities dealt with the administration here. There were presses on both sides, popular meetings on both sides, ay, and pulpits on both sides, also. The gentleman's purveyors have only catered for him among the productions of one side. I certainly shall not supply the deficiency by furnishing samples of the other. I leave to him, and to them, the whole concern.

It is enough for me to say, that if, in any part of this, their grateful occupation; if, in all their researches, they find any thing in the history of Massachusetts, or New England, or in the proceedings of any legislative, or other public body, disloyal to the union, speaking slightly of its value, proposing to break it up, or recommending non-intercourse with neighbouring states, on account of difference of political opinion, then, sir, I give them all up to the honourable gentleman's unrestrained rebuke; excepting, however, that he will extend his buffetings, in like manner, to all similar proceedings, wherever else found.

The gentleman, sir, has spoken at large of former parties, now no longer in being, by their received appellations, and has undertaken to instruct us, not only in the knowledge of their principles, but of their respective pedigrees, also. He has ascended to the origin, and run out their genealogies. With most exemplary modesty, he speaks of the party to which he professes to have belonged himself, as the true Pure, the only honest, patriotic party, derived by regular descent, from father to son, from the time of the virtuous Romans! Spreading before us the family tree of political parties, he takes especial care to show himself snugly perched on a popular bough! He is wakeful to the expediency of adopting such rules of descent, as shall bring him in, in exclusion of others, as an heir to the inheritance of all public virtue, and all true political principle. His party, and his opinions, are sure to be orthodox; heterodoxy is confined to his opponents. He spoke, sir, of the federalists, and I thought I saw some eyes begin to open and stare a little, when he ventured on that ground. I expected he would draw his sketches rather lightly, when he looked on the circle round him, and, especially, if he should cast his thoughts to the high places, out of the senate. Nevertheless, he went back to Rome, ad annum urbe condita, and found the fathers of the federalists, in the primeval aristocrats of that renowned empire! He traced the flow of federal blood down, through successive ages and centuries, till he brought it into the veins of the American Tories, (of whom, by the way, there were twenty in the Carolinas, for one in Massachusetts.) From the Tories he followed it to the federalists; and, as the federal party was broken up, and there was no possibility of transmitting it further on this side the Atlantic, he seems to have discovered, that it has gone off, collaterally, though against all the canons of descent, into the ultras of France, and finally become extinguished, like exploded gas, among the adherents of Don Miguel! This, sir, is an abstract of the gentleman's history of federalism. I am not about to controvert it. It is not, at present, worth the pains of refutation; because, sir, if, at this day, any one feels the sin of federalism lying heavily on his conscience, he can easily obtain remission. He may even obtain an indulgence, if he be desirous of repeating the same transgression. It is an affair of no difficulty to get into this same right line of patriotic descent. A man, now-a-days, is at liberty to choose his political parentage. He may elect his own father. Federalist, or not, he may, if he choose, claim to belong to the favoured stock, and his claim will be allowed. He may carry back his pretensions just as far as the honourable gentleman himself; nay, he may make himself out the honourable gentleman's cousin, and prove, satisfactorily, that he is descended from the same political great grandfather. All this is allowable. We all know a process, sir, by which the whole Essex Junto could, in one hour, be all washed white from their ancient federalism, and come out, every one of them, an original democrat, dyed in the wool! Some of them have actually undergone the operation, and they say it is quite easy. The only inconvenience it occasions, as they tell us, is a slight tendency of the blood to the face, a soft suffusion, which, however, is very transient, since nothing is said by those whom they join, calculated to deepen the red on the cheek, but a prudent silence observed, in regard to all the past. Indeed, sir, some smiles of approbation have been bestowed, and some crumbs of comfort have fallen, not a thousand miles from the door of the Hartford convention itself. And if the author of the ordinance of 1787 possessed the other requisite qualifications, there is no knowing, notwithstanding his federalism, to what heights of favour he might not yet attain.

Mr. President, in carrying his warfare, such as it was, into New England, the honourable gentleman all along professes to be acting on the defensive. He elects to consider me as having assailed South Carolina, and insists that he comes forth only as her champion, and in her defence. Sir, I do not admit that I made any attack whatever on South Carolina. Nothing like it. The honourable member, in his first speech, expressed opinions, in regard to revenue, and some other topics, which I heard both with pain and with surprise. I told the gentleman that I was aware that such sentiments were entertained out of the government, but had not expected to find them advanced in it; that I knew there were persons in the south who speak of our union with indifference or doubt, taking pains to magnify its evils, and to say nothing of its benefits; that the honourable member himself, I was sure, could never be one of these; and I regretted the expression of such opinions as he had avowed, because I thought their obvious tendency was to encourage feelings of disrespect to the union, and to weaken its connexion. This, sir, is the sum and substance of all I said on the subject. And this constitutes the attack, which called on the chivalry of the gentleman, in his opinion, to harry us with such a foray, among the party pamphlets and party proceedings of Massachusetts! If he means that I spoke with dissatisfaction or disrespect of the ebullitions of individuals in South Carolina, it is true. But, if he means that I had assailed the character of the state, her honour, or patriotism; that I had reflected on her history or her conduct; he had not the slightest ground for any such assumption. I did not even refer, I think, in my observations, to any collection of individuals. I said nothing of the recent conventions. I spoke in the most guarded and careful manner, and only expressed my regret for the publication of opinions which I presumed the honourable member disapproved as much as myself. In this, it seems, I was mistaken. I do not remember that the gentleman has disclaimed any sentiment, or any opinion, of a supposed anti-union tendency, which on all, or any of the recent occasions, has been expressed. The whole drift of his speech has been rather to prove, that, in divers times and manners, sentiments equally liable to objection have been promulged in New England. And one would suppose that his object, in this reference to Massachusetts, was to find a precedent to justify proceedings in the south, were it not for the reproach and contumely with which he labours, all along, to load these, his own chosen precedents. By way of defending South Carolina from what he chooses to think an attack on her, he first quotes the example of Massachusetts, and then denounces that example, in good set terms. This two-fold purpose, not very consistent with itself, one would think, was exhibited more than once in the course of his speech. He referred, for instance, to the Hartford convention. Did he do this for authority, or for a topic of reproach? Apparently for both: for he told us that he should find no fault with the mere fact of holding such a convention, and considering and discussing such questions as he supposes were then and there discussed; but what rendered it obnoxious was the time it was holden, and the circumstances of the country then existing. We were in a war, he said, and the country needed all our aid—the hand of government required to be strengthened, not weaken-carriage tax in Virginia, were all deemed unconstitutional, and were more unequal in their operation than any of the laws now complained of; but fortunately ed—and patriotism should have postponed such proceedings to another day. The thing itself, then, is a precedent; the time and manner of it, only, a subject of censure. Now, sir, I go much further, on this point, than the honourable member. Supposing, as the gentleman seems to, that the Hartford convention assembled for any such purpose as breaking up the union, because they thought unconstitutional laws had been passed, or to consult on that subject, or to calculate the value of the union; supposing this to be their purpose, or any part of it, then, I say the meeting itself was disloyal, and was obnoxious to censure, whether held in time of peace or time of war, or under whatever circumstances. The material question is the object. Is dissolution the object? If it be, external circumstances may make it a more or less aggravated case, but can not affect the principle. I do not hold, therefore, sir, that the Hartford convention was pardonable, even to the extent of the gentleman's admission, if its objects were really such as have been imputed to it. Sir, there never was a time, under any degree of excitement, in which the Hartford convention, or any other convention, could maintain itself one moment in New England, if assembled for any such purpose as the gentleman says would have been an allowable purpose. To hold conventions to decide questions of constitutional law—to try the binding validity of statutes, by votes in a convention! Sir, the Hartford convention, I presume, would not desire that the honourable gentleman should be their defender or advocate, if he puts their case upon such untenable and extravagant grounds.

Then, sir, the gentleman has no fault to find with these recently promulgated South Carolina opinions. And, certainly, he need have none; for his own sentiments, as now advanced, and advanced on reflection, as far as I have been able to comprehend them, go the full length of all these opinions. I propose, sir, to say something on these, and to consider how far they are just and constitutional. Before doing that, however, let me observe, that the eulogium pronounced on the character of the state of South Carolina, by the honourable gentleman, for her revolutionary and other merits, meets my hearty concurrence. I shall not acknowledge that the honourable member goes before me in regard for whatever of distinguished talent, or distinguished character, South Carolina has produced. I claim part of the honour, I partake in the pride, of her great names. I claim them for countrymen, one and all. The Laurenses, the Rutledges, the Pinckneys, the Sumpters, the Marions—Americans, all—whose fame is no more to be hemmed in by state lines, than their talents and patriotism were capable of being circumscribed within the same narrow limits. In their day and generation, they served and honoured the country, and the whole country; and their renown is of the treasures of the whole country. Him, whose honoured name the gentleman himself bears—does he suppose me less capable of gratitude for his patriotism, or sympathy for his sufferings, than if his eyes had first opened upon the light in Massachusetts, instead of South Carolina? 'Sir, does he suppose it in his power to exhibit a Carolina name, so bright, as to produce envy in my bosom? No, sir, increased gratification and delight, rather. Sir, I thank God, that, if I am gifted with little of the spirit which is able to raise mortals to the skies, I have yet none, as I trust, of that other spirit, which would drag angels down. When I shall be found, sir, in my place here, in the Senate, or elsewhere, to sneer at public merit, because it happened to spring up beyond the little limits of my own state, or neighbourhood; when I refuse, for any such cause, or for any cause, the homage due to American talent, to elevated patriotism, to sincere devotion to liberty and the country; or, if I see an uncommon endowment of heaven—if I see extraordinary capacity and virtue in any son of the south—and if, moved by local prejudice, or galled by state jealousy, I get up here to abate the tithe of a hair from his just character and just fame, may my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth!

Sir, let me recur to pleasing recollections—let me indulge in refreshing remembrance of the past—let me remind you that in early times no states cherished greater harmony, both of principle none of those states discovered that they had the right now claimed by South Carolina. The war into which we were forced, to support the dignity of and of feeling, than Massachusetts and South Carolina. Would to God, that harmony might again return! Shoulder to shoulder they went through the revolution—hand in hand they stood round the administration of Washington, and felt his own great arm lean on them for support. Unkind feeling, if it exist, alienation and distrust, are the growth, unnatural to such soils, of false principles since sown. They are weeds, the seeds of which that same great arm never scattered.

Mr. President, I shall enter on no encomium upon Massachusetts—she needs none. There she is—behold her, and judge for yourselves. There is her history—the world knows it by heart. The past, at least, is secure. There is Boston, and Concord, and Lexington, and Bunker Hill—and there they will remain for ever. The bones of her sons, falling in the great struggle for independence, now lie mingled with the soil of every state, from New England to Georgia; and there they will lie for ever. And, sir, where American liberty raised its first voice; and where its youth was nurtured and sustained, there it still lives, in the strength of its manhood, and full of its original spirit. If discord and disunion shall wound it—if party strife and blind ambition shall hawk at and tear it—if folly and madness—if uneasiness, under salutary and necessary restraint—shall succeed to separate it from that Union, by which alone its existence is made sure, it will stand, in the end, by the side of that cradle in which its infancy was rocked: it will stretch forth its arm, with whatever vigour it may still retain, over the friends who gather round it; and it will fall at last, if fall it must, amidst the proudest monuments of its own glory, and on the very spot of its origin.

There yet remains to be performed, Mr. President, by far the most grave and important duty, which I feel to be devolved on me, by this occasion. It is to state, and to defend, what I conceive to be the true principles of the constitution under which we are here assembled. I might well have desired that so weighty a task should have fallen into other and abler hands. I could have wished that it should have been executed by those, whose character and experience give weight and influence to their opinions, such as cannot possibly belong to mine. But, sir, I have met the occasion, not sought it; and I shall proceed to state my own sentiments, without challenging for them any particular regard, with studied plainness, and as much precision as possible.

I understand the honourable gentleman from South Carolina to maintain, that it is a right of the state legislatures to interfere, whenever, in their judgment, this government transcends its constitutional limits, and to arrest the operation of its laws.

I understand him to maintain this right, as a right existing under the constitution; not as a right to overthrow it, on the ground of necessity, such as would justify violent revolution.

I understand him to maintain an authority, on the part of the states, thus to interfere, for the purpose of correcting the exercise of power by the general government, of checking it, and of compelling it to conform to their opinion of the extent of its powers.

I understand him to maintain, that the ultimate power of judging of the constitutional extent of its own authority, is not lodged exclusively in the general government, or any branch of it, but that, on the contrary, the states may lawfully decide for themselves, and each state for itself, whether, in a given case, the act of the general government transcends its power.

I understand him to insist, that if the exigency of the case, in the opinion of any state government, require it, such state government may, by its own sovereign authority, annul an act of the general government, which it deems plainly and palpably unconstitutional.

This is the sum of what I understand from him to be the South Carolina doctrine, and the doctrine which he maintains. I propose to consider it, and to compare it with the constitution. Allow me to say, as a preliminary remark, that I call this the South Carolina doctrine, only because the gentleman himself has so denominated it. I do not feel at liberty to say that South Carolina, as a state, has ever advanced these sentiments. I hope she has not, and never the nation and the rights of our citizens, might have ended in defeat and disgrace instead of victory and honour, if the states who supposed it a ruinous and may. That a great majority of her people are opposed to the tariff laws, is doubtless true. That a majority, somewhat less than that just mentioned, conscientiously believe these laws unconstitutional, may probably also be true. But that any majority holds to the right of direct state interference, at state discretion, the right of nullifying acts of congress, by acts of state legislation, is more than I know, and what I shall be slow to believe.

That there are individuals, besides the honourable gentleman, who do maintain these opinions, is quite certain. I recollect the recent expression of a sentiment, which circumstances attending its utterance and publication justify us in supposing was not unpremeditated. "The sovereignty of the state—never to be controlled, construed, or decided on, but by her own feelings of honourable justice."

[Mr. Hayne here rose, and said, that for the purpose of being clearly understood, he would state, that his proposition was in the words of the Virginia resolution, as follows:

"That this assembly doth explicitly and peremptorily declare, that it views the powers of the federal government as resulting from the compact, to which the states are parties, as limited by the plain sense and intention of the instrument constituting that compact, as no farther valid than they are authorized by the grants enumerated in that compact; and that, in case of a deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of other powers, not granted by the said compact, the states who are parties thereto have the right, and are in duty bound to interpose, for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining, within their respective limits, the authorities, rights, and liberties, appertaining to them."]

Mr. Webster resumed:

I am quite aware, Mr. President, of the existence of the resolution which the gentleman read, and has now repeated, and that he relies on it as his authority. I know the source, too, from which it is understood to have proceeded. I need not say that I have much respect for the constitutional opinions of Mr. Madison; they would weigh greatly with me, always. But, before the authority of his opinion be vouched for the gentleman's proposition, it will be proper to consider what is the fair interpretation of that resolution, to which Mr. Madison is understood to have given his sanction. As the gentleman construes it, it is an authority for him. Possibly, he may not have adopted the right construction. That resolution declares, that, in the case of the dangerous exercise of powers not granted, by the general government, the states may interpose to arrest the progress of the evil. But how interpose, and what does this declaration purport? Does it mean no more, than that there may be extreme cases, in which the people, in any mode of assembling, may resist usurpation, and relieve themselves from a tyrannical government? No one will deny this. Such resistance is not only acknowledged to be just in America, but in England also. Blackstone admits as much, in the theory, and practice, too, of the English constitution. We, sir, who oppose the Carolina doctrine, do not deny that the people may, if they choose, throw off any government, when it become oppressive and intolerable, and erect a better in its stead. We all know that civil institutions are established for the public benefit, and that when they cease to answer the ends of their existence, they may be changed. But I do not understand the doctrine now contended for to be that which, for the sake of distinctness, we may call the right of revolution. I understand the gentleman to maintain, that, without revolution, without civil commotion, without rebellion, a remedy for supposed abuse and transgression of the powers of the general government lies in a direct appeal to the interference of the state governments.

[Mr. Hayne here rose: He did not contend, he said, for the mere right of revolution, but for the right of constitutional resistance. What he maintained, was, that, in case of a plain, palpable violation of the constitution, by the general government, a state may interpose; and that this interposition is constitutional.]

Mr. Webster resumed:

So, sir, I understood the gentleman, and am happy to find that I did not misunderstand him. What he contends for, is, that it is constitutional to interrupt the administration of the constitution itself, in the hands of those who are chosen and sworn to administer it, by the direct interference, in form of law, of the states, in virtue of their sovereign capacity. The inherent right in the people to reform their government, I do not deny; and they have another right, and that is, to resist unconstitutional laws, without overturning the government. It is no doctrine of mine, that unconstitutional laws bind the people. The great question is, whose prerogative is it to decide on the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the laws? On that, the main debate hinges. The proposition, that, in case of a supposed violation of the constitution by congress, the states have a constitutional right to interfere, and annul the law of congress, is the proposition of the gentleman: I do not admit it. If the gentleman had intended no more than to assert the right of revolution, for justifiable cause, he would have said only what all agree to. But I cannot conceive that there can be a middle course, between submission to the laws, when regularly pronounced constitutional, on the one hand, and open resistance, which is revolution, or rebellion, on the other. I say, the right of a state to annul a law of congress, can not be maintained, but on the ground of the unalienable right of man to resist oppression; that is to say, upon the ground of revolution. I admit that there is an ultimate violent remedy above the constitution, and in defiance of the constitution, which may be resorted to when a revolution is to be justified. But I do not admit, that, under the constitution, and in conformity with it, there is any mode in which a state government, as a member of the union, can interfere and stop the progress of the general government, by force of her own laws, under any circumstances whatever.

This leads us to inquire into the origin of this government, and the source of its power. Whose agent is it? Is it the creature of the state legislatures, or the creature of the people? If the government of the United States be the agent of the state governments, then they may control it, provided they can agree in the manner of controlling it; if it be the agent of the people, then the people alone can control it, restrain it, modify, or reform it. It is observable enough, that the doctrine for which the honourable gentleman contends, leads him to the necessity of maintaining, not only that this general government is the creature of the states, but that it is the creature of each of the states severally; so that each may assert the power, for itself, of determining whether it acts within the limits of its authority. It is the servant of four-and-twenty masters, of different wills and different purposes, and yet bound to obey all. This absurdity (for it seems no less) arises from a misconception as to the origin of this government and its true character. It is, sir, the people's constitution, the people's government; made for the people; made by the people; and answerable to the people. The people of the United States have declared that this constitution shall be the supreme law. We must either admit the proposition, or dispute their authority. The states are, unquestionably, sovereign, so far as their sovereignty is not affected by this supreme law. But the state legislatures, as political bodies, however sovereign, are yet not sovereign over the people. So far as the people have given power to the general government, so far the grant is unquestionably good, and the government holds of the people, and not of the state governments. We are all agents of the same supreme power, the people. The general government and the state governments derive their authority from the same source. Neither can, in relation to the other, be called primary, though one is definite and restricted, and the other general and residuary. The national government possesses those powers which it can be shown the people have conferred on it, and no more. All the rest belongs to the state governments or to the people themselves. So far as the people have restrained state sovereignty, by the expression of their will, in the constitution of the United States, so far, it must be admitted, state sovereignty is effectually controlled. I do not contend that it is, or ought to be controlled farther. The sentiment to which I have referred, propounds that state sovereignty is only to be controlled by its own "feeling of justice;" that is to say, it is Hardly and unequally as those measures bore upon several members of the Union, to the legislatures of none did this efficient and peaceable remedy, as it is not to be controlled at all: for one who is to follow his own feeling is under no legal control. Now, however men may think this ought to be, the fact is, that the people of the United States have chosen to impose control on state sovereignties. There are those, doubtless, who wish they had been left without restraint; but the constitution has ordered the matter differently. To make war, for instance, is an exercise of sovereignty; but the constitution declares that no state shall make war. To coin money is another exercise of sovereign power; but no state is at liberty to coin money. Again, the constitution says that no sovereign state shall be so sovereign as to make a treaty. These prohibitions, it must be confessed, are a control on the state sovereignty of South Carolina, as well as of the other states, which does not arise "from her own feelings of honourable justice." Such an opinion, therefore, is in defiance of the plainest provisions of the constitution.

There are other proceedings of public bodies which have already been alluded to, and to which I refer again for the purpose of ascertaining, more fully, what is the length and breadth of that doctrine, denominated the Carolina doctrine, which the honourable member has now stood up on this floor to maintain. In one of them I find it resolved, that "the tariff of 1828, and every other tariff designed to promote one branch of industry at the expense of others, is contrary to the meaning and intention of the federal compact; and, as such, a dangerous, palpable, and deliberate usurpation of power, by a determined majority, wielding the general government beyond the limits of its delegated powers, as calls upon the states which compose the suffering minority, in their sovereign capacity, to exercise the powers which, as sovereigns, necessarily devolve upon them, when their compact is violated."

Observe, sir, that this resolution holds the tariff of 1828, and every other tariff, designed to promote one branch of industry at the expense of another, to be such a dangerous, palpable, and deliberate usurpation of power, as calls upon the states, in their sovereign capacity, to interfere by their own authority. This denunciation, Mr. President, you will please to observe, includes our old tariff of 1816, as well as all others; because that was established to promote the interest of the manufactures of cotton, to the manifest and admitted injury of the Calcutta cotton trade. Observe, again, that all the qualifications are here rehearsed and charged upon the tariff, which are necessary to bring the case within the gentleman's proposition. The tariff is a usurpation; it is a dangerous usurpation; it is a palpable usurpation; it is a deliberate usurpation. It is such a usurpation, therefore, as calls upon the states to exercise their right of interference. Here is a case, then, within the gentleman's principles, and all his qualifications of his principles. It is a case for action. The constitution is plainly, dangerously, palpably, and deliberately violated; and the states must interpose their own authority to arrest the law. Let us suppose the state of South Carolina to express this same opinion, by the voice of her legislature. That would be very imposing; but what then? Is the voice of one state conclusive? It so happens, that at the very moment when South Carolina resolves that the tariff laws are unconstitutional, Pennsylvania and Kentucky resolve exactly the reverse. They hold those laws to be both highly proper and strictly constitutional. And now, sir, how does the honourable member propose to deal with this case? How does he relieve us from this difficulty, upon any principle of his? His construction gets us into it; how does he propose to get us out?

In Carolina, the tariff is a palpable, deliberate usurpation; Carolina, therefore, may nullify it, and refuse to pay the duties. In Pennsylvania, it is both clearly constitutional, and highly expedient; and there, the duties are to be paid. And yet, we live under a government of uniform laws, and under a constitution, too, which contains an express provision, as it happens, that all duties shall be equal in all the states! Does not this approach absurdity?

If there be no power to settle such questions, independent of either of the states, is not the whole union a rope of sand? Are we not thrown back again, precisely, upon the old confederation?

called, suggest itself. The discovery of this important feature in our constitution was reserved to the present day. To the statesmen of South Carolina

It is too plain to be argued. Four and twenty interpreters of constitutional law, each with a power to decide for itself, and none with authority to bind any body else, and this constitutional law the only bond of their union! What is such a state of things, but a mere connexion during pleasure, or, to use the phraseology of the times, during feeling? And that feeling, too, not the feeling of the people who established the constitution, but the feeling of the state governments.

In another of the South Carolina addresses, having premised that the crisis requires "all the concentrated energy of passion," an attitude of open resistance to the laws of the union is advised. Open resistance to the laws, then, is the constitutional remedy, the conservative power of the state, which the South Carolina doctrines teach for the redress of political evils, real or imaginary. And its authors further say, that, appealing with confidence to the constitution itself, to justify their opinions, they can not consent to try their accuracy by the courts of justice. In one sense, indeed, sir, this is assuming an attitude of open resistance in favour of liberty. But what sort of liberty? The liberty of establishing their own opinions, in defiance of the opinions of all others; the liberty of judging and of deciding exclusively themselves, in a matter in which others have as much right to judge and decide as they; the liberty of placing their own opinions above the judgment of all others, above the laws, and above the constitution. This is their liberty, and this is the fair result of the proposition contended for by the honourable gentleman. Or it may be more properly said, it is identical with it, rather than the result from it.

In the same publication, we find the following: "Previously to our revolution, when the arm of oppression was stretched over New England, where did our northern brethren meet with a braver sympathy than that which sprung from the bosoms of Carolinians? We had no extortion, no oppression, no collision with the king's ministers, no navigation interests springing up, in envious rivalry of England."

This seems extraordinary language. South Carolina no collision with the king's ministers, in 1775! No extortion! No oppression! But, sir, it is also most significant language. Does any man doubt the purpose for which it was penned? Can any one fail to see that it was designed to raise in the reader's mind the question, whether, at this time—that is to say, in 1828—South Carolina has any collision with the king's ministers, any oppression, or extortion, to fear from England? Whether, in short, England is not as naturally the friend of South Carolina as New England, with her navigation interests springing up in envious rivalry of England?

Is it not strange, sir, that an intelligent man in South Carolina, in 1828, should thus labour to prove, that, in 1775, there was no hostility, no cause of war, between South Carolina and England? That she had no occasion, in reference to her own interest, or from a regard to her own welfare, to take up arms in the revolutionary contest? Can any one account for the expression of such strange sentiments, and their circulation through the state, otherwise than by supposing the object to be, what I have already intimated, to raise the question, if they had no "collision" (mark the expression) with the ministers of King George the Third, in 1775, what collision have they, in 1828, with the ministers of King George the Fourth? What is there now, in the existing state of things, to separate Carolina from Old, more, or rather, than from New England?

Resolutions, sir, have been recently passed by the legislature of South Carolina. I need not refer to them: they go no further than the honourable gentleman himself has gone—and, I hope, not so far. I content myself, therefore, with debating the matter with him.

And now, sir, what I have first to say on this subject is, that, at no time, and under no circumstances, has New England, or any state in New England, or any respectable body of persons in New England, or any public man of standing in New England, put forth such a doctrine as this Carolina doctrine.

The gentleman has found no case, he can find none, to support belongs the invention, and upon the citizens of that state will unfortunately fall the evils of reducing it to practice.

his own opinions by New England authority. New England has studied the constitution in other schools, and under other teachers. She looks upon it with other regards, and deems more highly and reverently, both of its just authority, and its utility and excellence. The history of her legislative proceedings may be traced—the ephemeral effusions of temporary bodies, called together by the excitement of the occasion, may be hunted up—they have been hunted up. The opinions and votes of her public men, in and out of congress, may be explored—it will all be in vain. The Carolina doctrine can derive from her neither countenance nor support. She rejects it now; she always did reject it; and till she loses her senses, she always will reject it. The honourable member has referred to expressions, on the subject of the embargo law, made in this place, by an honourable and venerable gentleman, (Mr. Hillhouse,) now favouring us with his presence. He quotes that distinguished senator as saying, that, in his judgment, the embargo law was unconstitutional, and that, therefore, in his opinion, the people were not bound to obey it. That, sir, is perfectly constitutional language. An unconstitutional law is not binding; but then it does not rest with a resolution or a law of a state legislature to decide whether an act of congress be, or be not, constitutional. An unconstitutional act of congress would not bind the people of this district, although they have no legislature to interfere in their behalf; and, on the other hand, a constitutional law of congress does bind the citizens of every state, although all their legislatures should undertake to annul it, by act or resolution. The venerable Connecticut senator is a constitutional lawyer, of sound principles, and enlarged knowledge; a statesman practised and experienced, bred in the company of Washington, and holding just views upon the nature of our governments. He believed the embargo unconstitutional, and so did others; but what then? Who did he suppose was to decide that question? The state legislatures? Certainly not. No such sentiments ever escaped his lips. Let us follow up, sir, this New England opposition to the embargo laws; let us trace it, till we discern the principle which controlled and governed New England throughout the whole course of that opposition. We shall then see what similarity there is between the New England school of constitutional opinions, and this modern Carolina school. The gentleman, I think, read a petition from some single individual, addressed to the legislature of Massachusetts, asserting the Carolina doctrine—that is, the right of state interference to arrest the laws of the union. The fate of that petition shows the sentiment of the legislature. It met no favour. The opinions of Massachusetts were otherwise. They had been expressed, in 1798, in answer to the resolutions of Virginia, and she did not depart from them, nor bend them to the times. Misgoverned, wronged, oppressed, as she felt herself to be, she still held fast her integrity to the union. The gentleman may find in her proceedings much evidence of dissatisfaction with the measures of government, and great and deep dislike to the embargo; all this makes the case so much the stronger for her; for, notwithstanding all this dissatisfaction and dislike, she claimed no right, still, to sever asunder the bonds of the union. There was heat, and there was anger, in her political feeling—be it so—her heat or her anger did not, nevertheless, betray her into infidelity to the government. The gentleman labours to prove that she disliked the embargo, as much as South Carolina dislikes the tariff, and expressed her dislike as strongly. Be it so; but did she propose the Carolina remedy?—did she threaten to interfere, by state authority, to annul the laws of the union? That is the question for the gentleman's consideration.

No doubt, sir, a great majority of the people of New England conscientiously believed the embargo law of 1807 unconstitutional; as conscientiously, certainly, as the people of South Carolina hold that opinion of the tariff. They reasoned thus: congress has power to regulate commerce; but here is a law, they said, stopping all commerce, and stopping it indefinitely. The law is perpetual; that is, it is not limited in point of time, and must, of course, continue, until it shall be repealed by some other law. It is as perpetual, therefore, as the law against treason or murder. Now, is this regulating commerce, or destroying it? Is it guiding, controlling, giving the rule to commerce, as a subsisting thing; or is it putting an end to it altogether? Nothing is more certain, than that a majority in New England deemed this law a violation of the constitution. The very case required by the gentleman, to justify state interference, had then arisen. Massachusetts believed this law to be a "deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of a power, not granted by the constitution." Deliberate it was, for it was long continued; palpable, she thought it, as no words in the constitution gave the power, and only a construction, in her opinion most violent, raised it; dangerous it was, since it threatened utter ruin to her most important interests. Here, then, was a Carolina case. How did Massachusetts deal with it? It was, as she thought, a plain, manifest, palpable violation of the constitution; and it brought ruin to her doors. Thousands of families, and hundreds of thousands of individuals, were beggared by it. While she saw and felt all this, she saw and felt, also, that, as a measure of national policy it was perfectly futile; that the country was no way benefited by that which caused so much individual distress; that it was efficient only for the production of evil, and all that evil inflicted on ourselves. In such a case, under such circumstances, how did Massachusetts demean herself? Sir, she remonstrated, she memorialized, she addressed herself to the general government, not exactly "with the concentrated energy of passion," but with her own strong sense, and the energy of sober conviction. But she did not interpose the arm of her own power to arrest the law, and break the embargo. Far from it. Her principles bound her to two things; and she followed her principles, lead where they might. First, to submit to every constitutional law of congress; and, secondly, if the constitutional validity of the law be doubted, to refer that question to the decision of the proper tribunals. The first principle is vain and ineffectual without the second. A majority of us in New England believed the embargo law unconstitutional; but the great question was, and always will be, in such cases, who is to decide this? Who is to judge between the people and the government? And, sir, it is quite plain, that the constitution of the United States confers on the government itself, to be exercised by its appropriate department, and under its own responsibility to the people, this power of deciding ultimately and conclusively, upon the just extent of its own authority. If this had not been done, we should not have advanced a single step beyond the old confederation.

Being fully of opinion that the embargo law was unconstitutional, the people of New England were yet equally clear in the opinion—it was a matter they did not doubt upon—that the question, after all, must be decided by the judicial tribunals of the United States. Before those tribunals, therefore, they brought the question. Under the provisions of the law, they had given bonds, to millions in amount, and which were alleged to be forfeited. They suffered the bonds to be sued, and thus raised the question. In the old-fashioned way of settling disputes, they went to law. The case came to hearing, and solemn argument; and he who espoused their cause, and stood up for them against the validity of the embargo act, was none other than that great man, of whom the gentleman has made honourable mention, Samuel Dexter. He was then, sir, in the fulness of his knowledge, and the maturity of his strength. He had retired from long and distinguished public service here, to the renewed pursuit of professional duties; carrying with him all that enlargement and expansion, all the new strength and force, which an acquaintance with the more general subjects, discussed in the national councils, is capable of adding to professional attainment, in a mind of true greatness and comprehension. He was a lawyer, and he was also a statesman. He had studied the constitution, when he filled public station, that he might defend it; he had examined its principles, that he might maintain them. More than all men, or at least as much as any man, he was attached to the general government and to the union of the states. His feelings and opinions all ran in that direction. A question of constitutional law, too, was, of all subjects, that one which was best suited to his talents and learning. Aloof from technicality, and unfettered by artificial rule, such a question gave opportunity for that deep and clear analysis, that mighty grasp of principle, which so much distinguished his higher efforts. His very statement was argument; his inference seemed demonstration. The earnestness of his own conviction, wrought conviction in others. One was convinced, and believed, and assented, because it was gratifying, delightful to think, and feel, and believe, in unison with an intellect of such evident superiority.

Mr. Dexter, sir, such as I have described him, argued the New England cause. He put into his effort his whole heart, as well as all the powers of his understanding; for he had avowed, in the most public manner, his entire concurrence with his neighbours, on the point in dispute. He argued the cause, it was lost, and New England submitted. The established tribunals pronounced the law constitutional, and New England acquiesced. Now, sir, is not this the exact opposite of the doctrine of the gentleman from South Carolina? According to him, instead of referring to the judicial tribunals, we should have broken up the embargo by laws of our own; we should have repealed it, quoad New England; for we had a strong, palpable, and oppressive case. Sir, we believed the embargo unconstitutional; but still, that was matter of opinion, and who was to decide it? We thought it a clear case; but, nevertheless, we did not take the law into our own hands, because we did not wish to bring about a revolution, nor to break up the union; for, I maintain, that, between submission to the decision of the constituted tribunals, and revolution, or disunion, there is no middle ground—there is no ambiguous condition, half allegiance, and half rebellion. And, sir, how futile, how very futile it is, to admit the right of state interference, and then attempt to save it from the character of unlawful resistance, by adding terms of qualification to the causes and occasions, leaving all these qualifications, like the case itself, in the discretion of the state governments. It must be a clear case, it is said; a deliberate case; a palpable case; a dangerous case. But then the state is still left at liberty to decide for herself, what is clear, what is deliberate, what is palpable, what is dangerous. Do adjectives and epithets avail any thing? Sir, the human mind is so constituted, that the merits of both sides of a controversy appear very clear and very palpable, to those who respectively espouse them; and both sides usually grow clearer, as the controversy advances. South Carolina sees unconstitutionality in the tariff; she sees oppression there, also; and she sees danger. Pennsylvania, with a vision not less sharp, looks at the same tariff, and sees no such thing in it—she sees it all constitutional, all useful, all safe. The faith of South Carolina is strengthened by opposition, and she now not only sees, but resolves, that the tariff is palpably unconstitutional, oppressive, and dangerous: but Pennsylvania, not to be behind her neighbours, and equally willing to strengthen her own faith by a confident asseveration, resolves, also, and gives to every warm affirmative of South Carolina, a plain, downright, Pennsylvania negative. South Carolina, to show the strength and unity of her opinion, brings her assembly to a unanimity, within seven voices; Pennsylvania, not to be outdone in this respect more than others, reduces her dissentient fraction to a single vote. Now, sir, again, I ask the gentleman, what is to be done? Are these states both right? Is he bound to consider them both right? If not, which is in the wrong? or rather, which has the best right to decide? and if he, and if I, are not to know what the constitution means, and what it is, till those two state legislatures, and the twenty-two others, shall agree in its construction, what have we sworn to, when we have sworn to maintain it? I was forcibly struck, sir, with one reflection, as the gentleman went on in his speech. He quoted Mr. Madison's resolutions to prove that a state may interfere, in a case of deliberate, palpable, and dangerous exercise of a power not granted. The honourable member supposes the tariff law to be such an exercise of power; and that, consequently, a case has arisen in which the state may, if it see fit, interfere by its own law. Now it so happens, nevertheless, that Mr. Madison himself deems this same tariff law quite constitutional. Instead of a clear and palpable violation, it is, in his judgment, no violation at all. So that, while they use his authority for a hypothetical case, they reject it in the very case before them. All this, sir, shows the inherent futility—I had almost used a stronger word—of conceding this power of interference to the states, and then attempting to secure it from abuse by imposing qualifications, of which the states themselves are to judge. One of two things is true; either the laws of the union are beyond the discretion, and beyond the control of the states; or else we have no constitution of general government, and are thrust back again to the days of the confederacy.

Let me here say, sir, that if the gentleman's doctrine had been received and acted upon in New England, in the times of the embargo and non-intercourse, we should probably not now have been here. The government would, very likely, have gone to pieces, and crumbled into dust. No stronger case can ever arise than existed under those laws; no states can ever entertain a clearer conviction than the New England states then entertained; and if they had been under the influence of that heresy of opinion, as I must call it, which the honourable member espouses, this union would, in all probability, have been scattered to the four winds. I ask the gentleman, therefore, to apply his principles to that case; I ask him to come forth and declare, whether, in his opinion, the New England states would have been justified in interfering to break up the embargo system, under the conscientious opinions which they held upon it? Had they a right to annul that law? Does he admit or deny? If that which is thought palpably unconstitutional in South Carolina, justifies that state in arresting the progress of the law, tell me, whether that which was thought palpably unconstitutional also in Massachusetts, would have justified her in doing the same thing? Sir, I deny the whole doctrine. It has not a foot of ground in the constitution to stand on. No public man of reputation ever advanced it in Massachusetts, in the warmest times, or could maintain himself upon it there at any time.

I wish now, sir, to make a remark upon the Virginia resolutions of 1798. I can not undertake to say how these resolutions were understood by those who passed them. Their language is not a little indefinite. In the case of the exercise, by congress, of a dangerous power, not granted to them, the resolutions assert the right, on the part of the state, to interfere, and arrest the progress of the evil. This is susceptible of more than one interpretation. It may mean no more than that the states may interfere by complaint and remonstrance; or by proposing to the people an alteration of the federal constitution. This would all be quite unobjectionable; or, it may be, that no more is meant than to assert the general right of revolution, as against all governments, in cases of intolerable oppression. This no one doubts; and this, in my opinion, is all that he who framed the resolutions could have meant by it: for I shall not readily believe, that he was ever of opinion that a state, under the constitution, and in conformity with it, could, upon the ground of her own opinion of its unconstitutionality, however clear and palpable she might think the case, annul a law of congress, so far as it should operate on herself, by her own legislative power.

I must now beg to ask, sir, whence is this supposed right of the states derived? Where do they find the power to interfere with the laws of the union? Sir, the opinion which the honourable gentleman maintains, is a notion, founded in a total misapprehension, in my judgment, of the origin of this government, and of the foundation on which it stands. I hold it to be a popular government, erected by the people; those who administer it responsible to the people; and itself capable of being amended and modified, just as the people may choose it should be. It is as popular, just as truly emanating from the people, as the state governments. It is created for one purpose; the state governments for another. It has its own powers; they have theirs. There is no more authority with them to arrest the operation of a law of congress, than with congress to arrest the operation of their laws. We are here to administer a constitution emanating immediately from the people and trusted by them to our administration. It is not the creature of the state governments. It is of no moment to the argument, that certain acts of the state legislatures are necessary to fill our seats in this body. That is not one of their original state powers, a part of the sovereignty of the state. It is a duty which the people, by the constitution itself, have imposed on the state legislature; and which they might have left to be performed elsewhere, if they had seen fit. So they have left the choice of president with electors; but all this does not affect the proposition, that this whole government, president, senate, and house of representatives, is a popular government. It leaves it still all its popular character. The governor of a state (in some of the states) is chosen, not directly by the people, but by those who are chosen by the people, for the purpose of performing, among other duties, that of electing a governor. Is the government of the state, on that account, not a popular government? This government, sir, is the independent offspring of the popular will. It is not the creature of state legislatures; nay, more, if the whole truth must be told, the people brought it into existence, established it, and have hitherto supported it, for the very purpose, amongst others, of imposing certain salutary restraints on state sovereignties. The states can not now make war; they can not contract alliances; they can not make, each for itself, separate regulations of commerce; they can not lay imposts; they can not coin money. If this constitution, sir, be the creature of state legislatures, it must be admitted that it has obtained a strange control over the volitions of its creators.

The people, then, sir, erected this government. They gave it a constitution, and in that constitution they have enumerated the powers which they bestow on it. They have made it a limited government. They have defined its authority. They have restrained it to the exercise of such powers as are granted; and all others, they declare, are reserved to the states or the people. But, sir, they have not stopped here. If they had, they would have accomplished but half their work. No definition can be so clear, as to avoid possibility of doubt; no limitation so precise, as to exclude all uncertainty. Who, then, shall construe this grant of the people? Who shall interpret their will, where it may be supposed they have left it doubtful? With whom do they repose this ultimate right of deciding on the powers of the government? Sir, they have settled all this in the fullest manner. They have left it with the government itself, in its appropriate branches. Sir, the very chief end, the main design, for which the whole constitution was framed and adopted, was to establish a government that should not be obliged to act through state agency, or depend on state opinion and state discretion. The people had had quite enough of that kind of government, under the confederacy. Under that system, the legal action—the application of law to individuals—belonged exclusively to the states. Congress could only recommend—their acts were not of binding force, till the states had adopted and sanctioned them. Are we in that condition still? Are we yet at the mercy of state discretion and state construction? Sir, if we are, then vain will be our attempt to maintain the constitution under which we sit.

But, sir, the people have wisely provided, in the constitution itself, a proper, suitable mode and tribunal for settling questions of constitutional law. There are, in the constitution, grants of powers to congress; and restrictions on these powers. There are, also, prohibitions on the states. Some authority must, therefore, necessarily exist, having the ultimate jurisdiction to fix and ascertain the interpretation of these grants, restrictions, and prohibitions. The constitution has itself pointed out, ordained, and established that authority. How has it accomplished this great and essential end? By declaring, sir, that "the constitution and the laws of the United States, made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land, any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding."

This, sir, was the first great step. By this, the supremacy of the constitution and laws of the United States is declared. The people so will it. No state law is to be valid, which comes in con-

OF AMERICA. That decisive and important step was taken jointly. We declared ourselves a nation by a joint, not by several acts, and when the terms of our flict with the constitution, or any law of the United States. But who shall decide this question of interference? To whom lies the last appeal? This sir, the constitution itself decides, also, by declaring, "that the judicial power shall extend to all cases arising under the constitution and laws of the United States." These two provisions, sir, cover the whole ground. They are, in truth, the key-stone of the arch. With these, it is a constitution; without them, it is a confederacy. In pursuance of these clear and express provisions, congress established, at its very first session, in the judicial act, a mode for carrying them into full effect, and for bringing all questions of constitutional power to the final decision of the supreme court. It then, sir, became a government. It then had the means of self-protection; and, but for this, it would, in all probability, have been now among things which are past. Having constituted the government, and declared its powers, the people have further said, that since somebody must decide on the extent of these powers, the government shall itself decide; subject, always, like other popular governments, to its responsibility to the people. And now, sir, I repeat, how is it that a state legislature acquires any power to interfere? Who, or what, gives them the right to say to the people, "We, who are your agents and servants for one purpose, will undertake to decide, that your other agents and servants, appointed by you for another purpose, have transgressed the authority you gave them?" The reply would be, I think, not impertinent, "Who made you a judge over another's servants? To their own masters they stand or fall."

Sir, I deny this power of state legislatures altogether. It can not stand the test of examination. Gentlemen may say, that, in an extreme case, a state government might protect the people from intolerable oppression. Sir, in such a case, the people might protect themselves, without the aid of the state governments. Such a case warrants revolution. It must make, when it comes, a law for itself. A nullifying act of a state legislature can not alter the case, nor make resistance any more lawful. In maintaining these sentiments, sir, I am but asserting the rights of the people. I state what they have declared, and insist on their right to declare it. They have chosen to repose this power in the general government, and I think it my duty to support it, like other constitutional powers.

For myself, sir, I do not admit the jurisdiction of South Carolina, or any other state, to prescribe my constitutional duty, or to settle, between me and the people, the validity of laws of congress, for which I have voted. I decline her umpirage. I have not sworn to support the constitution according to her construction of its clauses. I have not stipulated, by my oath of office, or otherwise, to come under any responsibility, except to the people, and those whom they have appointed to pass upon the question, whether laws, supported by my votes, conform to the constitution of the country. And, sir, if we look to the general nature of the case, could any thing have been more preposterous, than to make a government for the whole union, and yet leave its powers subject, not to one interpretation, but to thirteen, or twenty-four, interpretations? Instead of one tribunal, established by all, responsible to all, with power to decide for all, shall constitutional questions be left to four and twenty popular bodies, each at liberty to decide for itself, and none bound to respect the decisions of others; and each at liberty, too, to give a new construction on every new election of its own members? Would any thing, with such a principle in it, or rather, with such a destitution of all principle, be fit to be called a government? No, sir. It should not be denominated a constitution. It should be called, rather, a collection of topics, for everlasting controversy; heads of debate for a disputatious people. It would not be a government. It would not be adequate to any practical good, nor fit for any country to live under. To avoid all possibility of being misunderstood, allow me to repeat again, in the fullest manner, that I claim no powers for the government by forced or unfair construction. I admit, that it is a government of strictly limited powers; of enumerated, specified, and particularized powers; and that whatsoever is not granted, is withheld. But notwithstanding all this, and however the grant of powers may be confederation were reduced to form, it was in that of a solemn league of several states, by which they agreed that they would collectively form one nation expressed, its limit and extent may yet, in some cases, admit of doubt; and the general government would be good for nothing, it would be incapable of long existing, if some mode had not been provided, in which those doubts, as they should arise, might be peaceably, but authoritatively, solved.

And now, Mr. President, let me run the honourable gentleman's doctrine a little into its practical application. Let us look at his probable modus operandi. If a thing can be done, an ingenious man can tell how it is to be done. Now, I wish to be informed how this state interference is to be put in practice, without violence, bloodshed, and rebellion. We will take the existing case of the tariff law. South Carolina is said to have made up her opinion upon it. If we do not repeal it, (as we probably shall not,) she will then apply to the case the remedy of her doctrine. She will, we must suppose, pass a law of her legislature, declaring the several acts of congress, usually called the tariff laws, null and void, so far as they respect South Carolina or the citizens thereof. So far, all is a paper transaction, and easy enough. But the collector at Charleston is collecting the duties imposed by these tariff laws—he, therefore, must be stopped. The collector will seize the goods if the tariff duties are not paid. The state authorities will undertake their rescue; the marshal, with his posse, will come to the collector's aid, and here the contest begins. The militia of the state will be called out to sustain the nullifying act. They will march, sir, under a very gallant leader: for I believe the honourable member himself commands the militia of that part of the state. He will raise the NULLIFYING ACT on his standard, and spread it out as his banner! It will have a preamble, bearing, that the tariff laws are palpable, deliberate, and dangerous violations of the constitution! He will proceed, with his banner flying, to the custom-house in Charleston:

“All the while,
Sonorous metal blowing martial sounds.”

Arrived at the custom-house, he will tell the collector that he must collect no more duties under any of the tariff laws. This, he will be somewhat puzzled to say, by the way, with a grave countenance, considering what hand South Carolina herself had in that of 1816. But, sir, the collector would, probably, not desist at his bidding—here would ensue a pause: for they say, that a certain stillness precedes the tempest. Before this military array should fall on the custom-house, collector, clerks, and all, it is very probable some of those composing it would request of their gallant commander in chief, to be informed a little upon the point of law; for they have, doubtless, a just respect for his opinions as a lawyer, as well as for his bravery as a soldier. They know he has read Blackstone and the constitution, as well as Turenne and Vauban. They would ask him, therefore, something concerning their rights in this matter. They would inquire, whether it was not somewhat dangerous to resist a law of the United States? What would be the nature of their offence, they would wish to learn, if they, by military force and array, resisted the execution in Carolina of a law of the United States, and it should turn out, after all, that the law was constitutional? He would answer, of course, treason. No lawyer could give any other answer. John Fries, he would tell them, had learned that some years ago. How, then, they would ask, do you propose to defend us? We are not afraid of bullets, but treason has a way of taking people off, that we do not much relish. How do you propose to defend us? “Look at my floating banner,” he would reply; “see there the nullifying law!” Is it your opinion, gallant commander, they would then say, that if we should be indicted for treason, that same floating banner of yours would make a good plea in bar? “South Carolina is a sovereign state,” he would reply. That is true; but would the judge admit our plea? “These tariff laws,” he would repeat, “are unconstitutional, palpably, deliberately, dangerously.” That all may be so; but if the tribunals should not happen to be of that opinion, shall we swing for it? We are ready to die for our country, but it is rather an

for the purpose of conducting some certain domestic concerns and all foreign relations. In the instrument forming that union, is found an article which declares awkward business, this dying without touching the ground! After all, that is a sort of hemp tax, worse than any part of the tariff.

Mr. President, the honourable gentleman would be in a dilemma, like that of another great general. He would have a knot before him, which he could not untie. He must cut it with his sword. He must say to his followers, defend yourselves with your bayonets; and this is war—civil war.

Direct collisions, therefore, between force and force, is the unavoidable result of that remedy for the revision of unconstitutional laws, which the gentleman contends for. It must happen in the very first case to which it is applied. Is not this the plain result? To resist, by force, the execution of a law, generally, is treason. Can the courts of the United States take notice of the indulgence of a state to commit treason? The common saying, that a state can not commit treason herself, is nothing to the purpose. Can she authorize others to do it? If John Fries had produced an act of Pennsylvania, annulling the law of congress, would it have helped his case? Talk about it as we will, these doctrines go the length of revolution. They are incompatible with any peaceable administration of the government. They lead directly to disunion and civil commotion; and, therefore, it is, that at their commencement, when they are first found to be maintained by respectable men, and in a tangible form, I enter my public protest against them all.

The honourable gentleman argues, that if this government be the sole judge of the extent of its own powers, whether that right of judging be in congress or the supreme court, it equally subverts state sovereignty. This the gentleman sees, or thinks he sees, although he can not perceive how the right of judging, in this matter, if left to the exercise of state legislatures, has any tendency to subvert the government of the union. The gentleman's opinion may be, that the right ought not to have been lodged with the general government; he may like better such a constitution, as we should have under the right of state interference; but I ask him to meet me on the plain matter of fact; I ask him to meet me on the constitution itself; I ask him if the power is not found there—clearly and visibly found there?

But, sir, what is this danger, and what the grounds of it? Let it be remembered, that the constitution of the United States is not unalterable. It is to continue in its present form no longer than the people who established it shall choose to continue it. If they shall become convinced that they have made an injudicious or inexpedient partition and distribution of power, between the state governments and the general government, they can alter that distribution at will.

If any thing be found in the national constitution, either by original provision, or subsequent interpretation, which ought not to be in it, the people know how to get rid of it. If any construction be established, unacceptable to them, so as to become, practically, a part of the constitution, they will amend it, at their own sovereign pleasure. But while the people choose to maintain it, as it is; while they are satisfied with it, and refuse to change it, who has given, or who can give, to the state legislatures a right to alter it, either by interference, construction, or otherwise? Gentlemen do not seem to recollect that the people have any power to do any thing for themselves; they imagine there is no safety for them, any longer than they are under the close guardianship of the state legislatures. Sir, the people have not trusted their safety, in regard to the general constitution, to these hands. They have required other security, and taken other bonds. They have chosen to trust themselves, first, to the plain words of the instrument, and to such construction as the government itself, in doubtful cases, should put on its own powers, under their oaths of office, and subject to their responsibility to them; just as the people of a state trust their own state governments with a similar power. Secondly they have reposed their trust in the efficacy of frequent elections, and in their own power to remove their own servants and agents, whenever they see cause. Thirdly, they have reposed trust in the judicial power, which, in order that it might be trust worthy, they that 'every state shall abide by the determination of congress on all questions which by that confederation should be submitted to them.'

"Under the confederation, then, no state could legally annul a decision of the congress, or refuse to submit to its execution; but no provision was made to enforce these decisions. Congress made requisitions, but they were not complied with. The government could not operate on individuals. They had no judiciary, no means of collecting revenue.

"But the defects of the confederation need not be detailed. Under its operation we could scarcely be called a nation. We had neither prosperity at home nor consideration abroad. This state of things could not be endured, and our present happy constitution was formed, but formed in vain, if this fatal doctrine prevails. It was formed for important objects that are announced in the preamble, made in the name, and by the authority of the people of the United States, whose delegates framed, and whose conventions approved it. The most important among these have made as respectable, as disinterested, and as independent as was practicable. Fourthly, they have seen fit to rely, in case of necessity, or high expediency, on their known and admitted power, to alter or amend the constitution, peaceably and quietly, whenever experience shall point out defects or imperfections. And, finally, the people of the United States have, at no time, in no way, directly or indirectly, authorized any state legislature to construe or interpret their high instrument of government; much less to interfere, by their own power, to arrest its course and operation.

If, sir, the people, in these respects, had done otherwise than they have done, their constitution could neither have been preserved, nor would it have been worth preserving. And, if its plain provisions shall now be disregarded, and these new doctrines interpolated in it, it will become as feeble and helpless a being as its enemies, whether early or more recent, could possibly desire. It will exist in every state, but as a poor dependant on state permission. It must borrow leave to be; and will be no longer than state pleasure, or state discretion, sees fit to grant the indulgence, and to prolong its poor existence.

But, sir, although there are fears, there are hopes also. The people have preserved this, their own chosen constitution, for forty years, and have seen their happiness, prosperity, and renown, grow with its growth, and strengthen with its strength. They are now, generally, strongly attached to it. Overthrown by direct assault, it can not be; evaded, undermined, nullified, it will not be, if we, and those who shall succeed us here, as agents and representatives of the people, shall conscientiously and vigilantly discharge the two great branches of our public trust—faithfully to preserve, and wisely to administer it.

Mr. President, I have thus stated the reasons of my dissent to the doctrines which have been advanced and maintained. I am conscious of having detained you and the senate much too long. I was drawn into the debate, with no previous deliberation, such as is suited to the discussion of so grave and important a subject. But it is a subject of which my heart is full, and I have not been willing to suppress the utterance of its spontaneous sentiments. I can not even now persuade myself to relinquish it, without expressing, once more, my deep conviction, that, since it respects nothing less than the union of the states, it is of most vital and essential importance to the public happiness. I profess, sir, in my career, hitherto, to have kept steadily in view the prosperity and honour of the whole country, and the preservation of our federal union. It is to that union we owe our safety at home, and our consideration objects, that which is placed first in rank, on which all the others rest, is 'to form a more perfect Union.' Now, is it possible that even if there were no express provision giving supremacy to the constitution and laws of the United States over those of the states—it can be conceived, that an instrument made for the purpose of 'forming a more perfect Union' than that of the confederation, could be so constructed by the assembled wisdom of our country, as to substitute for that confederation a form of government, dependent for its existence on the local interest, the party spirit of a state, or of a prevailing faction in a state? Every man of plain, unsophisticated understanding, who hears the question, will give such an answer as will preserve the union. Metaphysical subtlety, in pursuit of an impracticable theory, could alone have devised one that is calculated to destroy it.

"I consider, then, the power to annul a law of the United States, assumed by one state, INCOMPATIBLE WITH THE EXISTENCE OF THE UNION, CONTRADICTED EXPRESSLY BY THE LETTER OF THE CONSTIand dignity abroad. It is to that union that we are chiefly indebted for whatever makes us most proud of our country. That union we reached only by the discipline of our virtues in the severe school of adversity. It had its origin in the necessities of disordered finance, prostrate commerce, and ruined credit. Under its benign influences, these great interests immediately awoke, as from the dead, and sprang forth with newness of life. Every year of its duration has teemed with fresh proofs of its utility and its blessings; and, although our territory has stretched out wider and wider, and our population spread further and further, they have not outrun its protection or its benefits. It has been to us all a copious fountain of national, social, and personal happiness. I have not allowed myself, sir, to look beyond the union, to see what might lie hidden in the dark recess behind. I have not coolly weighed the chances of preserving liberty, when the bonds that unite us together shall be broken asunder. I have not accustomed myself to hang over the precipice of disunion, to see whether, with my short sight, I can fathom the depth of the abyss below; nor could I regard him as a safe counsellor in the affairs of this government, whose thoughts should be mainly bent on considering, not how the union should be best preserved, but how tolerable might be the condition of the people when it shall be broken up and destroyed. While the union lasts, we have high, exciting, gratifying prospects spread out before us, for us and our children. Beyond that I seek not to penetrate the veil. God grant that, in my day, at least, that curtain may not rise. God grant that on my vision never may be opened what lies behind. When my eyes shall be turned to behold, for the last time, the sun in heaven, may I not see him shining on the broken and dishonoured fragments of a once glorious union; on states dissevered, discordant, belligerent; on a land rent with civil feuds, or drenched, it may be, in fraternal blood! Let their last feeble and lingering glance, rather behold the gorgeous ensign of the republic, now known and honoured throughout the earth, still full high advanced, its arms and trophies streaming in their original lustre, not a stripe erased or polluted, nor a single star obscured—bearing for its motto, no such miserable interrogatory as, What is all this worth? nor those other words of delusion and folly, Liberty first, and union afterwards—but every where, spread all over in characters of living light, blazing on all its ample folds, as they float over the sea and over the land, and in every wind under the whole heavens, that other sentiment, dear to every true American heart—Liberty and Union, now and for ever, one and inseparable!

TUTION, UNAUTHORIZED BY ITS SPIRIT, INCONSISTENT WITH EVERY PRINCIPLE ON WHICH IT WAS FOUNDED, AND DESTRUCTIVE OF THE GREAT OBJECT FOR WHICH IT WAS FORMED.

"After this general view of the leading principle, we must examine the particular application of it which is made in the ordinance.

"The preamble rests its justification on these grounds:—It assumes as a fact, that the obnoxious laws, although they purport to be laws for raising revenue, were in reality intended for the protection of manufactures, which purpose it asserts to be unconstitutional; that the operation of these laws is unequal; that the amount raised by them is greater than is required by the wants of the government; and, finally, that the proceeds are to be applied to objects unauthorized by the constitution. These are the only causes alleged to justify an open opposition to the laws of the country, and a threat of seceding from the union, if any attempt should be made to enforce them. The first virtually acknowledges that the law in question was passed under a power expressly given by the constitution, to lay and collect imposts; but its constitutionality is drawn in question from the motives of those who passed it. However apparent this purpose may be in the present case, nothing can be more dangerous than to admit the position, that an unconstitutional purpose, entertained by the members who assent to a law enacted under a constitutional power, shall make that law void; for how is that purpose to be ascertained? Who is to make the scrutiny? How often may bad purposes be falsely imputed? in how many cases are they concealed by false professions? in how many is no declaration of motive made? Admit this doctrine, and you give to the states an uncontrolled right to decide, and every law may be annulled under this pretext. If, therefore, the absurd and dangerous doctrine should be admitted, that a state may annul an unconstitutional law, or one that it deems such, it will not apply to the present case.

"The next objection is, that the laws in question operate unequally. This objection may be made with truth to every law that has been or can be passed. The wisdom of man never yet contrived a system of taxation that would operate with perfect equality. If the unequal operation of a law makes it unconstitutional, and if all laws of that description may be abrogated by any state for that cause, then indeed is the federal constitution unworthy of the slightest effort for its preservation. We have hitherto relied on it as the perpetual bond of our union. We have received it as the work of the assembled wisdom of the nation. We have trusted to it as to the sheet anchor of our safety, in the stormy times of conflict with a foreign or domestic foe. We have looked to it with sacred awe as the palladium of our liberties, and, with all the solemnities of religion, have pledged to each other our lives and fortunes here, and our hopes of happiness hereafter, in its defence and support. Were we mistaken, my countrymen, in attaching this importance to the constitution of our country? Was our devotion paid to the wretched, inefficient, clumsy contrivance, which this new doctrine would make it? Did we pledge ourselves to the support of an airy nothing, a bubble that must be blown away by the first breath of disaffection? Was this self-destructing, visionary theory, the work of the profound statesmen, the exalted patriots, to whom the task of constitutional reform was intrusted? Did the name of Washington sanction, did the states deliberately ratify, such an anomaly in the history of fundamental legislation? No. We were not mistaken! The letter of this great instrument is free from this radical fault: its language directly contradicts the imputation: its spirit, its evident intent, contradicts it. No, we did not err! Our constitution does not contain the absurdity of giving power to make laws, and another power to resist them. The sages, whose memory will always be revered, have given us a practical, and, as they hoped, a permanent constitutional compact. The Father of his country did not affix his revered name to so palpable an absurdity. Nor did the states, when they severally ratified it, do so under the impression that a veto on the laws of the United States was reserved to them, or that they could exercise it by implication. Search the debates in all their conventions—examine the speeches of the most zealous opposers of federal authority—look at the amendments that were proposed. They are all silent—not a syllable uttered, not a vote given, not a motion made, to correct the explicit supremacy given to the laws of the union over those of the states—or to show that implication, as is now contended, could defeat it. No, we have not erred! The constitution is still the object of our reverence, the bond of our union, our defence in danger, the source of our prosperity in peace. It shall descend, as we have received it, uncorrupted by sophistical construction, to our posterity; and the sacrifices of local interest, of state prejudices, of personal animosities, that were made to bring it into existence, will again be patriotically offered for its support.

"The two remaining objections made by the ordinance to these laws are, that the sums intended to be raised by them are greater than are required, and that the proceeds will be unconstitutionally employed. The constitution has given expressly to congress the right of raising revenue, and of determining the sum the public exigencies will require. The states have no control over the exercise of this right, other than that which results from the power of changing the representatives who abuse it, and thus procure redress. Congress may undoubtedly abuse this discretionary power, but the same may be said of others with which they are vested. Yet the discretion must exist somewhere. The constitution has given it to the representatives of all the people, checked by the representatives of the states, and by the executive power. The South Carolina construction gives it to the legislature or the convention of a single state, where neither the people of the different states, nor the states in their separate capacity, nor the chief magistrate elected by the people, have any representation? Which is the most discreet disposition of the power? I do not ask you, fellow-citizens, which is the constitutional disposition—that instrument speaks a language not to be misunderstood. But if you were assembled in general convention, which would you think the safest depository of this discretionary power in the last resort? Would you add a clause giving it to each of the states, or would you sanction the wise provisions already made by your constitution? If this should be the result of your deliberations when providing for the future, are you—can you—be ready to risk all that we hold dear, to establish, for a temporary and local purpose, that which you must acknowledge to be destructive, and even absurd, as a general provision? Carry out the consequences of this right vested in the different States, and you must perceive that the crisis your conduct presents at this day would recur whenever any law of the United States displeased any of the states, and that we should soon cease to be a nation.

“The ordinance, with the same knowledge of the future that characterizes a former objection, tells you that the proceeds of the tax will be unconstitutionally applied. If this could be ascertained with certainty, the objection would, with more propriety, be reserved for the law so applying the proceeds, but surely cannot be urged against the laws levying the duty.

“These are the allegations contained in the ordinance. Examine them seriously, my fellow-citizens, judge for yourselves. I appeal to you to determine whether they are so clear, so convincing, as to leave no doubt of their correctness; and even if you should come to this conclusion, how far they justify the reckless, destructive course, which you are directed to pursue. Review these objections and the conclusions drawn from them, once more. What are they? Every law, then, for raising revenue, according to the South Carolina ordinance, may be rightfully annulled unless it be so framed as no law ever will or can be framed. Congress have a right to pass laws for raising revenue, and each state has a right to oppose their execution, two rights directly opposed to each other; and yet is this absurdity supposed to be contained in an instrument drawn for the express purpose of avoiding collisions between the states and the general government, by an assembly of the most enlightened statesmen and purest patriots ever embodied for a similar purpose.

“In vain have these sages declared that congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises—in vain have they provided that they shall have power to pass laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry those powers into execution; that those laws and that constitution shall be the ‘supreme law of the land; and that the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding.’ In vain have the people of the several states solemnly sanctioned these provisions, made them their paramount law, and individually sworn to support them whenever they were called on to execute any office. Vain provisions! ineffectual restrictions! vile profanation of oaths! miserable mockery of legislation! if a bare majority of the voters in any one state may on a real or supposed knowledge of the intent with which a law has been passed, declare themselves free from its operation—say here it gives too little, there too much, and operates unequally—here it suffers articles to be free that ought to be taxed, there it taxes those that ought to be free—in this case the proceeds are intended to be applied to purposes which we do not approve, in that the amount raised is more than is wanted. Congress, it is true, are invested by the constitution with the right of deciding these questions according to their sound discretion. Congress is composed of the representatives of all the states, and of all the people of all the states; but we, part of the people of one state, to whom the constitution has given no power on the subject, from whom it has expressly taken it away—we, who have solemnly agreed that this constitution shall be our law—we, most of whom have sworn to support it—we now abrogate this law, and swear, and force others to swear, that it shall not be obeyed, and we do this, not because congress have no right to pass such laws, this we do not allege; but because they have passed them with improper views. They are unconstitutional from the motives of those who passed them, which we can never with certainty know ; from their unequal operation, although it is impossible from the nature of things that they should be equal ; and from the disposition which we presume may be made of their proceeds, although that disposition has not been declared. This is the plain meaning of the ordinance in relation to laws which it abrogates for alleged unconstitutionality. But it does not stop there. It repeals, in express terms, an important part of the constitution itself, and of laws passed to give it effect, which have never been alleged to be unconstitutional. The constitution declares that the judicial powers of the United States extend in cases arising under the laws of the United States, and that such laws, the constitution, and treaties, shall be paramount to the state constitutions and laws. The judiciary act prescribes the mode by which the case may be brought before a court of the United States by appeal, when a state tribunal shall decide against this provision of the constitution. The ordinance declares there shall be no appeal ; makes the state law paramount to the constitution and laws of the United States ; forces judges and jurors to swear that they will disregard their provisions ; and even makes it penal in a suitor to attempt relief by appeal. It further declares that it shall not be lawful for the authorities of the United States, or of that state, to enforce the payment of duties imposed by the revenue laws within its limits.

"Here is a law of the United States, not even pretended to be unconstitutional, repealed by the authority of a small majority of the voters of a single state. Here is a provision of the constitution which is solemnly abrogated by the same authority.

"On such expositions and reasonings, the ordinance grounds not only an assertion of the right to annul the laws of which it complains, but to enforce it by a threat of seceding from the union, if any attempt is made to execute them.

"This right to secede is deduced from the nature of the constitution, which, they say, is a compact between sovereign states, who have preserved their whole sovereignty, and, therefore, are subject to no superior ; that, because they made the compact, they can break it when, in their opinion, it has been departed from by the other states. Fallacious as this course of reasoning is, it enlists state pride, and finds advocates in the honest prejudices of those who have not studied the nature of our government sufficiently to see the radical error on which it rests.

"The people of the United States formed the constitution, acting through the state legislatures in making the compact, to meet and discuss its provisions, and acting in separate conventions when they ratified those provisions ; but the terms used in its construction, show it to be a government in which the people of all the states collectively are represented. We are ONE PEOPLE in the choice of the president and vice president. Here the states have no other agency than to direct the mode in which the votes shall be given. The candidates having the majority of all the votes are chosen. The electors of a majority of states may have given their votes for one candidate, and yet another may be chosen. The people, then, and not the states, are represented in the executive branch.

"In the house of representatives there is this difference, that the people of one state do not, as in the case of president and vice president, all vote for the same officers. The people of all the states do not vote for all the members, each state electing only its own representatives. But this creates no material distinction. When chosen, they are all representatives of the United States, not representatives of the particular state from which they come. They are paid by the United States, not by the state ; nor are they accountable to it for any act done in the performance of their legislative functions : and however they may in practice, as it is their duty to do, consult and prefer the interests of their particular constituents when they come in conflict with any other partial or local interests, yet it is their first and highest duty, as representatives of the United States, to promote the general good.

"The constitution of the United States, then, forms a government, not a league ; and whether it be formed by compact between the states, or in any other manner, its character is the same. It is a government in which all the people are represented, which operates directly on the people individually, not upon the states ; they retained all the power they did not grant. But each state having expressly parted with so many powers as to constitute jointly with the other states, a single nation, cannot from that period possess any right to secede, because such secession does not break a league, but destroys the unity of a nation ; and any injury to that unity is not only a breach, which would result from the contravention of a compact, but it is an offence against the whole union. To say that any state may at pleasure secede from the union, is to say that the United States are not a nation ; because it would be a solecism to contend that any part of a nation might dissolve its connexion with the other parts, to their injury or ruin, without committing any offence. Secession, like any other revolutionary act, may be morally justified by the extremity of oppression ; but to call it a constitutional right is confounding the meaning of terms ; and can only be done through gross error, or to deceive those who are willing to assert a right, but would pause before they made a revolution, or incur the penalties consequent on a failure.

"Because the union was formed by compact, it is said the parties to that compact may, when they feel themselves aggrieved, depart from it : but it is precisely because it is a compact that they cannot. A compact is an agreement or binding obligation. It may, by its terms, have a sanction or penalty for its breach, or it may not. If it contains no sanction, it may be broken with no other consequence than moral guilt : if it have a sanction, then the breach incurs the designated or implied penalty. A league between independent nations, generally has no sanction other than a moral one ; or, if it should contain a penalty, as there is no common superior, it cannot be enforced. A government, on the contrary, always has a sanction, express or implied ; and, in our case, it is both necessarily implied and expressly given. An attempt by force of arms to destroy a government, is an offence, by whatever means the constitutional compact may have been formed ; and such government has the right, by the law of self-defence, to pass acts for punishing the offender, unless that right is modified, restrained, or resumed, by the constitutional act.—In our system, although it is modified in the case of treason, yet authority is expressly given to pass all laws necessary to carry its powers into effect, and under this grant provision has been made for punishing acts which obstruct the due administration of the laws.

"It would seem superfluous to add any thing to show the nature of that union which connects us ; but as erroneous opinions on this subject are the foundation of doctrines the most destructive to our peace, I must give some further development to my views on this subject. No one, fellow-citizens, has a higher reverence for the reserved rights of the states, than the magistrate who now addresses you. No one would make greater personal sacrifices, or official exertions, to defend them from violation ; but equal care must be taken to prevent on their part an improper interference with, or resumption of, the rights they have vested in the nation. The line has not been so distinctly drawn as to avoid doubts in some cases of the exercise of power. Men of the best intentions and soundest views may differ in their construction of some parts of the constitution : but there are others on which dispassionate reflection can leave no doubt. Of this nature appears to be the assumed right of secession. It rests, as we have seen, on the alleged undivided sovereignty of the states, and on their having formed in this sovereign capacity a compact which is called the constitution, from which, because they made it, they have the right to secede. Both of these positions are erroneous, and some of the arguments to prove them so have been anticipated.

The states severally have not retained their entire sovereignty. It has been shown that in becoming parts of a nation, not members of a league, they surrendered many of their essential parts of sovereignty. The right to make treaties—declare war—levy taxes—exercise exclusive judicial and legislative powers, were all of them functions of sovereign power. The states then, for all these important purposes, were no longer sovereign. The allegiance of their citizens was transferred, in the first instance, to the government of the United States—they became American citizens, and owed obedience to the constitution of the United States, and to the laws made in conformity with the powers it vested in congress. This last position has not been, and can not be denied. How then can that state be said to be sovereign and independent, whose citizens owe obedience to laws not made by it, and whose magistrates are sworn to disregard those laws, when they come in conflict with those passed by another ? What shows conclusively that the states can not be said to have reserved an undivided sovereignty, is, that they expressly ceded the right to punish treason—not treason against their separate power—but treason against the United States. Treason is an offence against sovereignty, and sovereignty must reside with the power to punish it. But the reserved rights of the states are not less sacred, because they have for their common interest made the general government the depository of these powers. The unity of our political character (as has been shown for another purpose) commenced with its very existence. Under the royal government we had no separate character—our opposition to its oppression began as United Colonies. We were the United States under the confederation, and the name was perpetuated, and the union rendered more perfect, by the federal constitution. In none of these stages did we consider ourselves in any other light than as forming one nation. Treaties and alliances were made in the name of all. Troops were raised for the joint defence. How, then, with all these proofs, that under all changes of our position we had, for designated purposes and with defined powers, created national governments—how is it, that the most perfect of those several modes of union should now be considered as a mere league, that may be dissolved at pleasure ? It is from an abuse of terms. Compact is used as synonymous with league, although the true term is not employed, because it would at once show the fallacy of the reasoning. It would not do to say that our constitution was only a league; but, it is laboured to prove it a compact, (which in one sense it is,) and then to argue that as a league is a compact, every compact between nations must of course be a league, and from such an engagement every sovereign power has a right to secede. But it has been shown, that in this sense the states are not sovereign, and that even if they were, and the national constitution had been formed by compact, there would be no right in any one state to exonerate itself from its obligations.

"So obvious are the reasons which forbid this secession, that it is necessary only to allude to them. The union was formed for the benefit of all. It was produced by mutual sacrifices of interests and opinions. Can those sacrifices be recalled? Can the states who magnanimously surrendered their title to the territories of the west, recall the grant? Will the inhabitants of the inland states agree to pay the duties that may be imposed without their assent by those on the Atlantic or the Gulf, for their own benefits? Shall there be a free port in one state, and onerous duties in another? No one believes that any right exists in a single state to involve all the others in these and countless other evils, contrary to the engagements solemnly made. Every one must see that the other states, in self-defence, must oppose at all hazards.

"These are the alternatives that are presented by the convention—a repeal of all the acts for raising revenue, leaving the government without the means of support; or an acquiescence in the dissolution of our union by the secession of one of its members. When the first was proposed, it was known that it could not be listened to for a moment. It was known if force was applied to oppose the execution of the laws, that it must be repelled by force—that congress could not, without involving itself in disgrace, and the country in ruin, accede to the proposition; and yet, if this is not done in a given day, or if any attempt is made to execute the laws, the state is, by the ordinance, declared to be out of the union. The majority of a convention assembled for the purpose have dictated these terms, or rather this rejection of all terms, in the name of the people of South Carolina. It is true that the governor of the state speaks of the submission of their grievances to a convention of all the states; which, he says, they 'sincerely and anxiously seek and desire.' Yet this obvious and constitutional mode of obtaining the sense of the other states on the construction of the federal compact, and amending it, if necessary, has never been attempted by those who have urged the state on to this destructive measure. The state might have proposed the call for a general convention to the other states; and congress, if a sufficient number of them concurred, must have called it. But the first magistrate of South Carolina, when he expressed a hope that, 'on a review by congress and the functionaries of the general government of the merits of the controversy,' such a convention will be accorded to them, must have known that neither congress nor any functionary of the general government has authority to call such a convention, unless it be demanded by two thirds of the states. This suggestion, then, is another instance of the reckless inattention to the provisions of the constitution with which this crisis has been madly hurried on, or of the attempt to persuade the people that a constitutional remedy had been sought and refused. If the legislature of South Carolina 'anxiously desire' a general convention 'to consider their complaints, why have they not made application for it in the way the constitution points out? The assertion that they 'earnestly seek' it is completely negatived by the omission.

"This, then, is the position in which we stand. A small majority of the citizens of one state in the union have elected delegates to a state convention: that convention has ordained that all the revenue laws of the United States must be repealed, or that they are no longer a member of the union. The governor of the state has recommended to the legislature the raising of an army to carry the secession into effect, and that he may be empowered to give clearances to vessels in the name of the state. No act of violent opposition to the laws has yet been committed, but such a state of things is hourly apprehended, and it is the intent of this instrument to PROCLAIM, not only that the duty imposed on me by the constitution, 'to take care that the laws be faithfully executed,' shall be performed to the extent of the powers already invested in me by law, or of such others as the wisdom of congress shall devise, and entrust to me for the purpose; but to warn the citizens of South Carolina, who have been deluded into an opposition to the laws, of the danger they incur by obedience to the illegal and disorganizing ordinance of the convention—to exhort those who have refused to support it to persevere in their determination to uphold the constitution and laws of their country, and to point out to all, the perilous situation into which the good people of that state have been led—and that the course that they are urged to pursue is one of ruin and disgrace to the very state whose rights they affect to support.

“Fellow-citizens of my native state!—Let me not only admonish you, as the first magistrate of our common country, not to incur the penalties of its laws, but use the influence that a father would over his children whom he saw rushing to a certain ruin. In that paternal feeling, let me tell you, my countrymen, that you are deluded by men who are either deceived themselves, or wish to deceive you. Mark under what pretences you have been led on to the brink of insurrection and treason, on which you stand! First a diminution of the value of your staple commodity, lowered by over production in other quarters, and the consequent diminution in the value of your lands, were the sole effect of the tariff laws. The effect of those laws are confessedly injurious, but the evil was greatly exaggerated by the unfounded theory you were taught to believe, that its burdens were in proportion to your exports, not to your consumption of imported articles. Your pride was roused by the assertion that a submission to those laws was a state of vassalage, and that resistance to them was equal, in patriotic merit, to the opposition our fathers offered to the oppressive laws of Great Britain. You were told that this opposition might be peaceably—might be constitutionally made—that you might enjoy all the advantages of the union, and bear none of its burdens.

“Eloquent appeals to your passions, to your state pride, to your native courage, to your sense of real injury, were used to prepare you for the period when the mask which concealed the hideous features of DISUNION should be taken off. It fell, and you were made to look with complacency on objects which, not long since, you would have regarded with horror. Look back at the arts which have brought you to this state—look forward to the consequences to which it must inevitably lead! Look back to what was first told you as an inducement to enter into this dangerous course. The great political truth was repeated to you, that you had the revolutionary right of resisting all laws that were palpably unconstitutional and intolerably oppressive; it was added, that the right to nullify a law rested on the same principle, but that it was a peaceable remedy! This character which was given to it, made you receive, with too much confidence, the assertions that were made of the unconstitutionality of the law, and its oppressive effects. Mark, my fellow-citizens, that by the admission of your leaders, the unconstitutionality must be palpable, or it will not justify either resistance or nullification! What is the meaning of the word palpable, in the sense in which it is here used? that which is apparent to every one; that which no man of ordinary intellect will fail to perceive. Is the unconstitutionality of these laws of that description? let those among your leaders who once approved and advocated the principle of protective duties, answer the question; and let them choose whether they will be considered as incapable, then, of perceiving that which must have been apparent to every man of common understanding, or as imposing upon your confidence, and endeavouring to mislead you now. In either case, they are unsafe guides in the perilous path they urge you to tread. Ponder well on this circumstance, and you will know how to appreciate the exaggerated language they address to you. They are not champions of liberty, emulating the fame of our revolutionary fathers; nor are you an oppressed people, contending, as they repeat to you, against worse than colonial vassalage. You are free members of a flourishing and happy union. There is no settled design to oppress you. You have indeed felt the unequal operation of laws which may have been unwisely, not unconstitutionally passed; but that inequality must necessarily be removed. At the very moment when you were madly urged on to the unfortunate course you have begun, a change in public opinion had commenced. The nearly approaching payment of the public debt, and the consequent necessity of a diminution of duties, had already produced a considerable reduction, and that too on some articles of general consumption in your state. The importance of this change was underrated, and you were authoritatively told, that no further alleviation of your burdens was to be expected, at the very time when the condition of the country imperiously demanded such a modification of the duties as should reduce them to a just and equitable scale. But, as if apprehensive of the effect of this change in allaying your discontents, you were precipitated into the fearful state in which you now find yourselves.

“I have urged you to look back to the means that were used to hurry you on to the position you have now assumed, and forward to the consequences it will produce. Something more is necessary. Contemplate the condition of that country of which you still form an important part! Consider its government, uniting in one bond of common interest and general protection so many different states, giving to all their inhabitants the proud title of AMERICAN CITIZENS, protecting their commerce, securing their literature and the arts, facilitating their intercommunication, defending their frontiers, and making their name respected in the remotest parts of the earth ! Consider the extent of its territory, its increasing and happy population, its advance in arts, which render life agreeable, and the sciences which elevate the mind ! See education spreading the lights of religion, morality, and general information, into every cottage in this wide extent of our territories and states ! Behold it as the asylum where the wretched and the oppressed find a refuge and support ! Look on this picture of happiness and honour, and say—WE TOO, ARE CITIZENS OF AMERICA : Carolina is one of these proud states : her arms have defended, her best blood has cemented this happy union ! And then add, if you can, without horror and remorse, this happy union we will dissolve—this picture of peace and prosperity we will deface—this free intercourse we will interrupt—these fertile fields we will deluge with blood—the protection of that glorious flag we renounce—the very name of Americans we discard—And for what, mistaken men !—for what do you throw away these inestimable blessings—for what would you exchange your share in the advantages and honour of the union ? For the dream of a separate independence—a dream interrupted by bloody conflicts with your neighbours, and a vile dependence on a foreign power. If your leaders could succeed in establishing a separation, what would be your situation ? Are you united at home—are you free from the apprehension of civil discord, with all its fearful consequences ? Do our neighbouring republics, every day suffering some new revolution, or contending with some new insurrection—do they excite your envy ? But the dictates of a high duty oblige me solemnly to announce that you can not succeed.

“ The laws of the United States must be executed. I have no discretionary power on the subject—my duty is emphatically pronounced in the constitution. Those who told you that you might peaceably prevent their execution, deceived you ; they could not have been deceived themselves. They know that a forcible opposition could alone prevent the execution of the laws, and they know that such opposition must be repelled. Their object is disunion ; but be not deceived by names ; disunion by armed force is TREASON. Are you really ready to incur its guilt ? If you are, on the heads of the instigators of the act be the dreadful consequence,—on their heads be the dishonour, but on yours may fall the punishment—on your unhappy state will inevitably fall all the evils of the conflict you force upon the government of your country. It can not accede to the mad project of disunion, of which you would be the first victims—its first magistrate can not, if he would, avoid the performance of his duty—the consequence must be fearful for you, distressing to your fellow-citizens here, and to the friends of good government throughout the world. Its enemies have beheld our prosperity, with a vexation they could not conceal—it was a standing refutation of their slavish doctrines, and they will point to our discord with a triumph of malignant joy. It is yet in your power to disappoint them. There is yet time to show that the descendants of the Pinckneys, the Sumpters, the Rutledges, and of the thousand other names which adorn the pages of your revolutionary history, will not abandon that union, to support which, so many of them fought, and bled, and died. I adjure you, as you honour their memory—as you love the cause of freedom, to which they dedicated their lives—as you prize the peace of your country, the lives of its best citizens, and your own fair fame, to retrace your steps. Snatch from the archives of your state the disorganizing edict of its convention—bid its members to re-assemble and promulgate the decided expressions of your will to remain in the path which alone can conduct you to safety, prosperity, and honour—tell them that compared to disunion, all other evils are light, because that brings with it an accumulation of all—declare that you will never take the field unless the star spangled banner of your country shall float over you : that you will not be stigmatized when dead, and dishonoured and scorned, while you live, as the authors of the first attack on the constitution of your country !—its destroyers you can not be. You may disturb its peace—you may interrupt the course of its prosperity—you may cloud its reputation for stability—but its tranquillity will be restored, its prosperity will return, and the stain upon its national character will be transferred, and remain an eternal blot on the memory of those who caused the disorder.

“ Fellow-citizens of the United States ! The threat of unhallowed disunion—the names of those once respected, by whom it is uttered—the array of military force to support it—denote the approach of a crisis in our affairs on which the continuance of our unexampled prosperity, our political existence, and perhaps that of all free governments, may depend. The conjunction demanded a free, a full, and explicit enunciation, not only of my intentions, but of my principles of action ; and as the claim was asserted of a right by a state to annul the laws of the union, and even to secede from it at pleasure, a frank exposition of my opinions in relation to the origin and form of our government, and the construction I give to the instrument by which it was created, seemed to be proper. Having the fullest confidence in the justice of the legal and constitutional opinion of my duties which has been expressed, I rely with equal confidence on your undivided support in my determination to execute the laws—to preserve the union by all constitutional means—to arrest, if possible, by moderate but firm measures, the necessity of a recourse to force; and, if it be the will of heaven that the recurrence of its primeval curse on man for the shedding of a brother's blood should fall upon our land, that it be not called down by any offensive act on the part of the United States.

“Fellow-citizens! The momentous case is before you. On your undivided support of your government depends the decision of the great question it involves, whether your sacred union will be preserved, and the blessings it secures to us as one people, shall be perpetuated. No one can doubt that the unanimity with which that decision will be expressed, will be such as to inspire new confidence in republican institutions, and that the prudence, the wisdom, and the courage which it will bring to their defence, will transmit them unimpaired and invigorated to our children.

“May the great ruler of nations grant that the signal blessings with which he has favoured ours, may not, by the madness of party, or personal ambition, be disregarded and lost: and may his wise providence bring those who have produced this crisis to see the folly, before they feel the misery of civil strife: and inspire a returning veneration for that union which, if we may dare to penetrate his designs, he has chosen as the only means of attaining the high destinies to which we may reasonably aspire.”

The language of the proclamation is too precious to be forgotten. The second election of General Jackson was of a decided character. The opposition was overwhelming. After this event, he made a tour to the eastern and northern states. Every where he was received with enthusiasm. Party feelings were forgotten, and the president alone was considered. A brave and generous people received a gallant commander, with every demonstration of respect and admiration. The most ancient university in the country made him a Doctor of Laws. He visited Bunker Hill, saw the plains of Lexington, ground sacred to the descendants of the Pilgrims, and returned with their warmest wishes for his prosperity.

SEVERAL events which occurred during the first term of the presidency of General Jackson, may with propriety be referred to, before we proceed to consider the measures of his second administration. His elevation to the chief magistracy is regarded as the period from which is to be dated the introduction of several new doctrines and practices in the administration of the national government. These were adopted and pursued also by his successor, and constituted the chief ground for the nomination and election of General Harrison. President Jackson claimed powers which had never been assumed by any of his predecessors. Soon after his inauguration, he dissolved his cabinet because they differed upon points of etiquette quite unconnected with public affairs. He appointed Mr. Moore minister to Colombia, thus recalling General William Henry Harrison, who had been residing at Bogota a short time in that capacity, having received his appointment from Mr. Adams. The contest between Bolivar and the friends of liberty in the republic of Colombia was, at that time, warm and violent. The great champion of national independence had become the leader of a powerful party opposed to constitutional republicanism, and had proposed to establish over the Hispano-South-American countries a vast hereditary monarchical and aristocratical government, with himself at its head. His splendid project for a strong government first received the support of the auxiliary army which he commanded in Peru, and afterwards of many of the people of Colombia. Certain foreign agents at Bogota cherished this anti-American project, and the presses, writers, and orators, enlisted in the interest of the new party, advocated principles far better suited to the old, than to the new world. The vice-president of Colombia, General Francisco de Paila Santander took the front rank in opposition to these attempts; and he, with his friends, turned with confidence for sympathy to the United States. But they found their object and motives generally misunderstood in the country which they had made their political model.

General Harrison's presence at Bogota was very opportune, and his sound principles, frankness, and honesty, boldness and decision, soon conciliated the confidence and encouraged the hopes of the friends of freedom. One of the earliest acts of General Jackson was the recall of our minister, and the transmission of a letter to General Bolivar, which was thought to hold language of rather doubtful import, if not decidedly favourable to the ambitious project which he was pursuing; and a contrast was drawn between it and the frank and glowing terms of an appeal which General Harrison had made to the same distinguished South American. On his landing in New York, he received marked tokens of respect from the citizens, on account of the course which he had adopted.

General Jackson was in favour of a course of policy towards the Indian nations residing within the bounds of some of the Southern States, which had been proposed, and recommended for some time before his accession to office. The Cherokees had claimed the protection of the United States against the encroachments of Georgia, showing fourteen treaties in which their right in perpetuity to their lands in that state had been acknowledged by the government; several of these treaties bore the signature of Andrew Jackson as agent for the United States. The president, however, recommended to them the abandonment of their lands for a reasonable consideration, that they might remove beyond the Mississippi; and at the same time he declined to interfere for their protection, on the ground that it would be an unwarrantable encroachment on the jurisdiction of a sovereign state. A large territory was designated, by act of congress, west of the Mississippi, which was divided into suitable portions for several different nations, and a title was promised, upon a nation's faith, that should be secure forever. It is hardly to be wondered at that the Cherokees generally rejected the offer, expressing a strong attachment to their native land; and petitions were sent to congress in their behalf from the northern parts of the Union, but in vain. The legislature of Georgia passed acts calculated to force the Indians into emigration, and forbidding any white man to reside in their territory without taking an oath to support the constitution and laws of the state.

There were at that time three gentlemen, missionaries of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, residing in the Cherokee country, who had established schools and churches, and were fast bringing the people into a more civilized state. Having declined the oath prescribed, on the ground that the acts of the legislature were opposed to the constitution of the United States, they were arrested, tried, condemned, and imprisoned in the Penitentiary of Georgia, (September, 1831,) where they remained at hard labour, until the United States Supreme Court declared the law under which they had been sentenced "unconstitutional, null, and void;" soon after which they were released, but were left without redress. Georgia prosecuted her plans for the removal of the Indians, and, by dividing their valuable lands among the inhabitants, enlisted the population warmly in its favour. Two parties were formed among the Cherokees, one in favour of removal, and the other opposed to it, and each claiming the power of holding or disposing of the lands. The claims of the party in favour of removal were acknowledged by our government, and the Indians gradually emigrated to the new territory, though with loud complaints of broken faith, national injustice, and cruel oppression. The Choc-taws, Chickasaws, &c., were also induced to remove; but some large bodies of these reluctant emigrants suffered severely from privations, fatigue, and change of climate, on their way, and hundreds of lives were lost before they reached the place of their destination.

General Jackson, soon after his inauguration, distinctly avowed the intention of putting his own interpretation on the terms of the constitution, and of acting as his own judgment might dictate. As it was understood that he thought himself at liberty, or rather bound in duty, to disregard and to set aside all previous interpretations, by whomsoever made and sanctioned, whenever they might appear to him incorrect, this declaration created some alarm. Before President Jackson's election, the veto power had been but very rarely used, and it was generally regarded as a power intrusted with the chief magistrate only for a few extraordinary possible emergencies. He first introduced the practice of resorting to it with frequency; at the same time, he claimed powers which had never been before allowed to the president, viz., of being "a coördinate branch of the government," meaning that a part of the legislation was intrusted to him. On this principle he acted in a number of instances, chiefly by putting his veto on bills which had been passed by congress. In some cases, however, he withheld bills so long that they could not become laws; and this was complained of as being a still greater stretch of power. A striking instance occurred in the case of a bill making appropriations for coast surveys, which it was thought would have received the votes of two thirds of each house; he did not return it with his reasons for withholding his signature, but retained it until the term when the existing congress had expired, so that it never could be brought up again, except as a new bill. General Jackson had repeatedly expressed a wish for an amendment of the constitution, to limit the election of president to one term of four or six years; and his acceptance of a nomination for a second term was therefore regarded as being an act in opposition to his avowed opinions.

With Great Britain there was still pending the question of the unsettled north-eastern boundary. It had been referred for arbitration to the king of the Netherlands; but his award was not accepted by the United States, because in it he had proposed the cession to Great Britain of a large tract of land described in the treaty of 1783, and allowed in that of Ghent, in 1815, as belonging to us. The question was therefore left unsettled, and has continued to give rise to disturbances and difficulty to the present time.

In the year 1832, a new apportionment was made of representation, founded on the results of the census taken in 1831. In 1791, it was enacted that one representative in congress should be chosen for every thirty thousand persons; in 1801, for thirty-three thousand; in 1811, for forty thousand: in 1831, the number was raised to forty-seven thousand. In 1832, a new pension law was passed, which made a provision for all surviving soldiers of the revolution, who had served six months or more; they were granted a sum of money annually, equal to the pay at that time in the army. The same year congress adopted a new tariff, by which the former high duties on high-priced woollen goods were continued with little diminution, but those on low-priced ones were greatly reduced. Those valued below thirty-five cents per yard had previously been subject to a duty of more than one hundred per cent. Wool had been subject to a duty of four cents per pound, and an ad valorem duty of fifty per cent. Now, that which cost under eight cents per pound was free from duty, while that above eight cents was subject to a duty of four cents, and an ad valorem duty of forty per cent. The duties on silk, teas, and wines, were greatly reduced, and those on cotton cloths and iron in a less proportion. All duties whatever were taken off from common teas imported directly from beyond the Cape of Good Hope. The new tariff, however, was not satisfactory to the Southern States; they had strongly urged the repeal of that adopted in 1828, because it was still regarded as founded upon the principle of protecting domestic manufactures, or the American system, as the plan of fostering native industry was denominated. In 1831, the difficulties which had for some time existed between the United States and Mexico were brought to a favourable termination, by a treaty of boundaries, and one of commerce and navigation. A convention was also concluded with France, by which were allowed most of the claims of American citizens for depredations on commerce in the periods of the directory, the first consulship, and the empire. The French, in previous negotiations on this subject, had presented a claim founded on the failure of the United States to fulfil an engagement to assist them in the defence of the West Indies against Great Britain: a reply had been made that the course of events subsequent to that engagement fully excused the United States from performing it; but with this explanation the French commissioners had never been satisfied. The justice of our claim and the futility of the opposing one were admitted, and a promise was given that the amount due should be paid, excepting a certain sum which was to be retained on account of claims on the United States; at the same time, the French agreed to waive certain important commercial privileges, which they claimed under their construction of the treaty for the cession of Louisiana; and it was also arranged that the duties on French wines imported into the United States, and those on cotton imported into France, should be reduced. When the time of payment arrived, however, the money was not sent; and a long delay led to a threatening state of things between the two countries, three years afterwards.

The French government, at the latter period, showing a disposition still longer to avoid the fulfilment of their stipulation, General Jackson made an imperative demand, in terms which were at first retorted by the French. Some time after, the chamber of deputies voted the supply of the amount due, which was received in successive instalments, and distributed among the holders of claims through the Union.

The contest cost the French on one occasion a change of ministry: a more particular account of the matter will be found in its proper place. Much time was occupied by congress in discussing the question respecting the disposition of the public lands. As these lay in the new states, some of the western members proposed that they should be given up to those states within whose boundaries they were comprehended. But there were other plans presented by other members, such as the sale of them at low prices and on long credit, for the purpose of encouraging rapid settlement. At length a bill upon the subject passed both houses, in 1833, and was sent to the president for his signature; but he refused to sign it, and it was lost for want of a majority of two thirds in both houses. The vote in the senate was twenty-four to twenty, and that of the house of representatives, ninety-six to forty.

Among the most remarkable events which transpired in the course of the few preceding years, we may mention the following: In June, 1831, the greater part of the capital of the state of North Carolina was accidentally destroyed by fire, with the much admired statue of Washington, which had been sculptured in Italy by the celebrated Canova, and purchased at great expense. James Monroe, ex-president of the United States, died in New York on the 4th of July of the same year, being the third ex-president who deceased on the anniversary of our national independence. In consequence of the massacre of the crew of an American trading vessel at Qualloh Battoo, in the Island of Sumatra, the United States frigate Potomac had been ordered to stop at that place on her voyage round the world, with instructions to destroy the town, if satisfaction should be refused. On the 3d of February, 1831, after an unsuccessful attempt to negotiate, the forts were surprised in the night, the town was burnt, and about one hundred and fifty of the natives killed, including several women. This severe measure against a tribe of ignorant savages was condemned by many as useless, inhuman, and disgraceful to an enlightened and Christian nation. In April, a treaty was formed with the Creek Indians, by which they surrendered all their land east of the Mississippi River. The building occupied by the treasury department in Washington, was destroyed by fire on the 31st of March, 1833, with most of the contents.

Andrew Jackson was inaugurated a second time president of the United States on the 4th of March, 1833, and Martin Van Buren, of the state of New York, vice-president; this gentleman was his decided personal and political friend. Mr. Van Buren had been a senator of the United States, and governor of New York; he had been nominated by General Jackson minister to England, but the senate had rejected the nomination on the 25th of January, 1831. This measure, on the part of the senate, was regarded by his friends as an indignity, and formed one of the grounds for his nomination and election to the vice-presidency. The message which President Jackson presented contained the following expressions: "There are two objects relating to the domestic policy of the government, which especially deserve both the attention of the people and of the representatives, which have lately been, and will probably continue to be, subjects of deep solicitude; and these are, the preservation of the rights of the states and the integrity of the Union. These great objects are necessarily connected, and can only be attained by an enlightened exercise of the powers of each, within its appropriate sphere, in conformity with the public will constitutionally expressed. It becomes the duty of all, therefore, to yield a ready submission to laws constitutionally enacted, and thereby promote and strengthen a proper confidence in those institutions of the several states, and of the United States, which the people have ordained for their own government." On the subject of foreign relations, the president declared the policy pursued by the government of the country had been "crowned with almost complete success, and has elevated the American character among the nations of the earth. So happy have been its results, that we are at peace with all the world, and have few causes of controversy, and those of minor importance, remaining unadjusted." He added that it was his "fixed and solemn purpose to exert all his best faculties to maintain the just powers of the constitution, and to transmit unimpaired to posterity the blessings of the Federal Union."

One of the leading features of the policy of General Jackson was opposition to the Bank of the United States. The charter of that institution was to expire in 1836, and he proposed in several of his messages that it should not be renewed. He even went so far as to pronounce it an unsafe depository of the public money, although a committee of congress had a short time before made a report on it as safe, after an investigation of its condition. The president, on different occasions, recommended substitutes of several different kinds, on various principles, but all resembling each other in this respect, that they would place the public money more under the control of the government. The course which he pursued had the effect to injure and embarrass the bank to some extent, as well as to bring into vogue a doctrine in political economy which has generally been considered unsound, viz., that a hard money currency is preferable to paper under all forms and circumstances. It became common to hear that, under a new system, which remained to be developed, gold and silver would take the place of bank paper, and become abundant throughout the country. On the 23d of September, 1833, it was announced by the "Globe," the official paper, that the president of the United States, having, after a very full and careful examination, come to the conclusion that the public deposits ought to be changed to the state banks, "had read a communication to his cabinet containing his reasons in favour of removing the deposits from the Bank of the United States." He begs his cabinet to consider the proposed measure his own, "in support of which he shall require no one of them to make a sacrifice of opinion or principle. Its responsibility has been assumed after the most mature deliberation and reflection, as necessary to preserve the morals of the people, the freedom of the press, and the purity of the elective franchise." It was announced, a few days afterwards, that William Duane, secretary of the treasury, having declined to sign the order for the removal of the deposits from the Bank of the United States, was removed from office, and Roger B. Taney appointed in his place. The step on which the president had decided was then taken without further delay, and, on the 1st of October, the new secretary removed the collection of the public money to certain selected banks in different parts of the country. At the opening of congress, a multitude of petitions were presented from different parts of the country, representing business of all kinds as greatly injured by the state of the currency, and want of confidence arising out of the measures of the president in relation to the public money, praying that the deposits might be restored to the keeping of that institution, to which they had been confided by the laws. This subject became the leading topic with both houses through the session. Mr. Taney, who had been appointed secretary of the treasury in the recess of congress, made a report to both houses on the 4th of December, relating to the removal of the public deposits from the Bank of the United States, giving the reasons for that measure, and on the 4th of February, 1834 a message was sent by the president in relation to the conduct of the bank. It stated that, when the secretary of the treasury had demanded the delivery of some of the public money, in their keeping, it was refused, on the ground that he was not authorized by law to make the demand. The president, in that document, censured "the conduct of the Bank of the United States in refusing to deliver the books, papers, and funds, relating to the execution of the act of congress of June 7, 1832, entitled 'An Act supplementary to the act for the relief of certain surviving officers of the revolution.'" The report of Mr. Taney was referred to a committee of the senate, of which Mr. Webster made a report on the 5th of December, which was adopted on the 28th of March, and embodied in a resolution which declared that "the reasons assigned by the secretary of the treasury for the removal of the money of the United States deposited in the Bank of the United States and its branches, communicated to congress on the 4th of December, 1833, are unsatisfactory and insufficient." This resolution passed by a vote of twenty-six to twenty; but it was laid on the table by the house of representatives, by a vote of one hundred and fourteen to one hundred and one. The following resolution, also, was adopted the same day by the senate, twenty-eight to eighteen: "Resolved, that the president, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, and in derogation of both." The house of representatives, in April, adopted these resolutions: 1st, "That the Bank of the United States ought not to be rechartered;" and, 2d, "That the public deposits ought not to be restored to the Bank of the United States." The former resolution was passed by a vote of one hundred and thirty-five to eighty-two, and the latter by one hundred and nineteen to one hundred and four. On the 17th, the president communicated to the senate a message and a protest against the resolution adopted by them on his proceedings respecting the deposits, with a request "that the message and protest might be entered at length on the journal of the senate." To this they replied, by a resolution, adopted on the 7th of May, "That the protest communicated to the senate, on the 17th, by the president of the United States, asserts power as belonging to the president, which is inconsistent with the just authority of the two houses of congress, and inconsistent with the constitution of the United States, and that therefore the aforesaid protest is a breach of the privileges of the senate, and that it be not entered on the journal." About this time, numerous petitions were presented from different parts of the country, for and against the restoration of the deposits to the Bank of the United States; eight thousand seven hundred and twenty-one signatures only were against the restoration, while one hundred and fourteen thousand nine hundred and eighteen were in favour of it. Long debates arose on this question, which occupied most of the session.

The Indians in Florida, who had shown much unwillingness to emigrate, were at length supposed to have agreed to accept the offers made to them, for a treaty was contracted between General Jesup and a chief who professed to have sufficient authority for that purpose. It was agreed, in that treaty, that the Indians should receive certain sums for their lands and other property, and leave by a certain time, to occupy a portion of the new Western Indian Territory. The nation, however, refused to acknowledge the treaty and the authority under which it was contracted, and soon began to make aggressions upon the troops in the territory, retreating to regions extremely difficult of access when pursued. The lamentable contest which has been continued till the present time was commenced on the 18th of November, 1833, by an attack on Fort Crum, by a body of Seminoles, who killed nearly the whole garrison, consisting of thirty or forty Americans. A much more disastrous affair took place on the 28th of the same month, when two companies of United States troops, under the command of Major Dade, were ambushed and cut off almost to a man. A great part of the standing army was soon ordered to Florida, and enlistments were made, in successive years, to supply the mortality among the troops, caused chiefly by the unhealthiness of the climate, and the severe labours and exposures necessary in such an enterprise. The expense of money was complained of in congress, as well as some of the measures adopted at different stages of the war; but the natural obstacles presented by the territory to the operations of an invading army, with protection offered to the savage defenders, and abundance of food, to which they had access in regions in the interior in their possession, have rendered the war one of the most harassing and costly, especially in the sacrifice of valuable officers. If the people of the United States, in any future case of a similar character, shall be inclined to learn wisdom from experience, they will prefer to observe peace, and avoid the charge of injustice and inhumanity in the view of mankind, by allowing to their uncivilized neighbours something nearer to the value of the lands of which they may wish to become the possessors. Both the whites and the Indians accuse each other of faithlessness and perfidy, of cruelty and falsehoods; and on both sides acts have been apologized for, on the ground that they have been provoked. From the complicated aspect of this war, and the fact that the Americans were the aggressors, and their enemies were fighting for their country and homes, there is reason to apprehend that future historians will find it difficult to present our national honour in unsullied purity.

In January, 1835, President Jackson sent a message to the senate on the pending negotiations with France, respecting the claims for indemnity. After remarking on the justice of the claim, he mentioned that nearly two years had elapsed since, on the 2d day of February, 1833, the first instalment promised had become due, and yet no provision had been made for its payment. "The idea," said he, "of acquiescing in the refusal of the execution of the treaty, will not for a moment be entertained by any branch of the American government." He expressed his conviction that "the United States ought to insist upon a prompt execution of the treaty, and, in case it is refused, to take redress into their own hands." He therefore recommended that "a law be passed authorizing reprisals upon French property, in case provision shall not be made for the payment of the debt at the approaching sessions of the French chambers." He thought that "the American government would not give any just cause of war; for if France should, in violation of the laws of nations, make reprisals, on our part, the occasion of hostilities against the United States, she would add violence to injustice, and could not fail to expose herself to the just censure of civilized nations, and to the retributive judgments of Heaven." Mr. Clay made a long and able report on the subject thus introduced to the senate. As the president had suggested two courses to be adopted towards France in the existing juncture, he considered them both at large. They were, first, to make reprisals, as above stated, and, second, to take no immediate steps, but wait for the result, in reliance on the good faith and justice of the nation. Although the president had expressed a preference for the former, Mr. Clay approved of the latter; and his report closed with a resolution offered by the committee, and adopted by the senate, in these terms: "That it is inexpedient to grant power to the president to make reprisals of French property." The proposal of the president to take so violent, unusual, and hostile a step as the seizure of the property of citizens of France residing in this country, or visiting it for commercial or other purposes, was not received with much approbation by the people, while it threw confiding and unoffending foreigners into a state of great alarm. They were soon relieved for a time from their apprehensions; but the extraordinary conduct of the French government soon after threatened to involve them in circumstances equally distressing. On the 6th of December, 1836, General Jackson delivered his last annual message to congress, in which, after speaking of the state of the country as prosperous, and the foreign relations as on the whole amicable, he adverted to the treasury in terms like the following: "Under our present revenue system, there is every probability that there will continue to be a surplus beyond the wants of the government." * * * "This must be retained in the treasury as it now is, or distributed among the people, or the states. To retain it in the treasury as it now is, is impracticable. It is, besides, contrary to the genius of our free institutions to lock up in vaults the treasury of the nation. To collect merely for distribution among the states will seem to be highly impolitic, if not as dangerous as the proposition to retain it in the treasury." * * * "About three fifths of the duties on imports are paid in the city of New York; but it is obvious that the means to pay these duties are drawn from every quarter of the Union." * * * "The safest and simplest mode of obviating all these difficulties is, to collect only revenue enough to meet the wants of the government." With respect to the currency, he remarked that, "although various dangers to our institutions were obviated by the failure of the Bank of the United States to obtain the renewal of its charter, little more had yet been done towards the securing of a better currency (meaning gold and silver) than a salutary change in public opinion."

The president communicated a message to congress on the 21st of January, 1836, informing them that our minister in France having, according to his instructions, asked for the final determination of the French government respecting the payment of the indemnification secured by the treaty of July 4, 1831, a reply had been received from the French minister. This reply, however, stated that explanations would be required from the American government, of such a nature as could never be given, and an answer, the president declared, had already been returned with this assurance. The following extract shows the spirit of the communication of the French minister: "The payment will be made when the government of the United States is ready, on its part, to declare to us, by addressing its claim to us officially in writing, that it regrets the misunderstanding that has arisen between the two countries; that this misunderstanding is formed on a mistake; that it never entered into its intention to call in question the good faith of the French government, nor to take a menacing attitude towards France." Another expression was the following: "If the government of the United States does not give these assurances, we shall be obliged to think that this misunderstanding is not the result of an error." After quoting this language, the president, in his address, asked, "Does France want a degrading, servile petition, in terms which she will dictate, and which will involve an assumed right to interfere in our domestic councils? She will never obtain them. The spirit of the American people, the dignity of the legislature, and the firm resolve of their executive government, forbid it." After remarking that France had acknowledged the justice of our claim, he proposed "the prohibition of the introduction of French imports, and the entry of French vessels in our ports." As our chargé d'affaires had returned, in consequence of the unfriendly state of the negotiations, and, according to the latest accounts, the French government had given orders for active preparations for war in the navy-yards of the kingdom, serious apprehensions were entertained of the result. The steady firmness of the president was generally approved, and the universal opinion was, that the extraordinary demand made through the French minister ought to be utterly rejected. The two countries were relieved from their threatening danger, and happily delivered from an embarrassing position, by a prompt and friendly offer of mediation, made by the king of England, through Charles Bankhead, his chargé d'affaires at Washington. This offer, having first been made to the king of the French, was instantly accepted by him; and General Jackson, in his reply, through Mr. Forsyth, made on the 16th of February, 1836, showed an equal readiness to avoid a war, and to acknowledge the kindness shown by the king of England. The following is an extract: "By the fulfilment of the obligations of the convention between the two governments, the first cause of difference will be removed; and the president anticipates that the benevolent and magnanimous wishes of his Britannic majesty's government will be speedily realized, as the temporary estrangement between the two nations, who have so many common interests, will, no doubt, be followed by the restoration of their ancient ties of friendship and esteem." The secretary was further instructed to express to his Britannic majesty's government how sensible the president is of the anxious desire "it has displayed to preserve the relations of peace between the United States and France, and the exertions it has prepared to make to effect that object, essential to the prosperity, and congenial to the wishes, of the two nations, and the applause of the world."

The specie circular was issued by the secretary of the treasury on the 11th of July, 1836. It was addressed to the receivers of public money and the deposit banks; and it directed them to receive only specie in payment for public lands sold, from the ensuing 15th of August, with an exception in favour of actual settlers, or inhabitants of the states in which the lands should be situated. This measure produced general surprise and consternation among men of business, the state of the country being such, that the derangement of the currency, already very great, was likely to be much increased by it. Soon after the meeting of congress, two resolutions were introduced into the senate, of the following purport: The first repealed the treasury order or circular, and the second declared "that it shall not be lawful for the secretary of the treasury to delegate to any person, or to any corporation, the power of directing what funds shall be receivable for customs or for the public lands; nor shall he make any discriminations in the funds as receivable between different individuals, or between the different branches of the public revenue." Mr. Webster spoke in favour of these resolutions at length, and the discussions occupied much attention during the session. Several other measures were brought before congress; but most of them failed, in consequence of want of harmony between the different branches of the government. Among them were the fortification bill, (with a clause, which had been appended to it, for the distribution of the surplus revenue,) the land bill, the army bill, and the bill for the reduction of the revenue. A bill to regulate the currency, which had passed both houses, and had been sent to the president for his signature, he retained until it expired in his hands by the lapse of time. In fact, none of the most important bills of the session became laws, except the appropriation bills, which were indispensably necessary to the operation of the government.

Martin Van Buren was inaugurated president of the United States on the 4th of March, 1837. He delivered his inaugural address on the eastern portico of the Capitol, in the presence of the senate, the heads of the departments, the foreign ministers, many of the officers of the government, and a large assemblage of citizens, the oath of office having been administered by Chief Justice Taney. After speaking in terms of the highest respect of his predecessor, and giving an extensive view of the progress made by the United States in numbers, power, and wealth, he expressed his feelings respecting the abolition of slavery in the following terms: "I go into the presidential chair the inflexible and uncompromising opponent of every attempt on the part of congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, against the wishes of the slaveholding states, and also with a determination equally decided to resist the slightest interference with it in the states where it exists." * * * "No bill conflicting with those views can ever receive my constitutional sanction." The election of Mr. Van Buren was effected by one hundred and sixty-seven votes, against fourteen for Daniel Webster, seventy-three for General Harrison, twenty-six for Hugh L. White, and eleven for W. P. Mangum. Richard M. Johnson was elected vice-president by one hundred and forty-four votes. Mr. Van Buren's cabinet consisted of the following members: John Forsyth, secretary of state; Levi Woodbury, secretary of the treasury; J. R. Poinsett, secretary of war; Mahlon Dickerson, secretary of the navy; and Benjamin F. Butler, attorney-general.

The great and general commercial embarrassments which prevailed in 1837 were attributed, by most men of business, to the interference of the government with the credit of the national bank and the currency of the country. Numerous petitions were laid before congress, at their extra session that year, praying for measures to restore public credit, and avert the extensive and alarming evils, which already threatened a general bankruptcy. A very large meeting was held by the merchants of New York, who appointed a numerous committee to bear their resolutions to Washington; but their efforts, combined with those made in other places, had no effect on the president, who, in his message, affirmed that congress had no power to do any thing in the case, any measure that might be advised for the relief of commerce being beyond the constitutional sphere of their duties. On this subject his views were regarded as quite new, when they were expressed in his message to congress on its assembling. He said, "That the government and the people were in a great degree independent, and unconnected in interest and spheres of action; and that each was properly bound to care and provide for itself, without regard to the business of the other." This doctrine appeared to be in opposition to the common opinion, that the government was created and supported expressly for the good of the people, and of no value for any other purpose. The president, with these views, declined all exertion for the improvement of commerce or the relief of existing embarrassments; but the congress devoted their chief attention to the aid and relief of the government, for which they authorized the issue of ten millions of dollars in treasury notes, and gave the secretary of the treasury power to borrow money, if he should find it necessary. As the notes were made negotiable, they became, in fact, mere paper money. In the year 1838, the issue of a similar amount of treasury notes was again authorized, and once more in 1839, after a part of the former notes had been redeemed. In October 1837, the law was suspended which had been passed the year previous, providing for the distribution of the surplus funds of the government to the several states, after three quarters of the amount had been distributed. It soon proved that some portions of the national funds, which had been withdrawn from the Bank of the United States, had been deposited in other banks at a disadvantage, as losses occurred through their mismanagement or misfortune. As the places of deposit were left entirely at the discretion of the secretary of the treasury, and, according to the new doctrines, he was under the control of the president, he was regarded as responsible for the consequences. Soon after the opening of the session, a resolution was offered in the senate for the expunging from the journal of the resolution, passed in 1834, censuring General Jackson. After a long debate, it was adopted, on the 16th of January, 1837, by a vote of twenty-four to nineteen; and, in obedience to it, the clerk drew black lines around it, to signify its repeal with disapprobation. This extraordinary mutilation of the records of the senate is regarded to this day with astonishment, and some of the senators, whose votes produced the result, have keenly regretted the precedent which they so rashly afforded. In the course of the debate, Mr. Clay made a speech, from which the following are extracts: "Our British ancestors understood perfectly well the importance of the money power in a representative government. It is the great lever by which the crown had been made to conform the administration to the interests of the kingdom and the will of the people. * * * Our immediate ancestors, profiting by the lessons on civil liberty which had been taught in the country from which we spring, endeavoured to place around the public purse, in the hands of congress, every possible security against the intrusion of the executive. With this view, congress alone is invested by the constitution with the power to lay and collect the taxes. When collected, not a cent is to be drawn from the public treasury but in virtue of an act of congress. And among the first acts of this government was the passage of a law establishing a treasury department, for the safe keeping and the legal and regular disbursement of the money so collected. By that act, a secretary of the treasury is placed at the head of that department; and, varying in that respect from the other departments, he is to report, NOT TO THE PRESIDENT, but directly to congress, and is liable to be called to give information in person before congress. It is impossible to examine dispassionately that act, without coming to the conclusion that it is implicitly the agent of congress in performing the duties assigned by the constitution to congress. The act further provides that a treasurer shall be appointed to receive and keep the public money; and none can be drawn from his custody but under the authority of law, and in virtue of the warrant drawn by the secretary of the treasury, countersigned by the comptroller, and recorded by the register. Only when such a warrant is presented can the treasurer lawfully pay a dollar from the public purse. Why was the concurrence of these four officers required in disbursements of the public money? Was it not for further security? Was it not intended that each, exercising a separate and independent will, should be a check upon every other?

* * * Thus stood the treasury from 1789 to 1816. During that long period, no president ever attempted to interfere with the custody of the public purse. It remained where the laws placed it, undisturbed; and every chief magistrate, including the father of his country, respected the law. In 1816, an act passed to establish the late Bank of the United States, for the term of twenty years; and by the 16th section of the act, it is enacted 'that the deposits of the money of the United States, in places in which the said Bank of the United States, and the branches thereof, may be established, shall be made in said bank, and branches thereof, unless the secretary shall at any time otherwise order and direct; and the secretary of the treasury shall immediately lay before congress, if in session, and, if not, immediately after the commencement of the next session, the reasons for such order or direction.' Thus it is perfectly manifest, from the express words of the law, that the power to make any order or direction for the removal of the public deposits is confided to the secretary alone, to the absolute exclusion of the president, and all the world besides. And the law, proceeding upon the established principle that the secretary of the treasury, in all that concerns the public purse, acts as the direct agent of congress, requires, in the event of his ordering a removal of deposits, that he shall immediately lay the reasons therefor—before whom? The president? No—before congress. So stood the public treasury, and the public deposits, from the year 1816 to September, 1833. In the session of congress of 1832 and 1833, an inquiry had been instituted by the house of representatives into the condition of the Bank of the United States. It resulted in a conviction of its entire safety, and a declaration of the house, made only a short time before the adjournment of congress, on the 4th of March, 1833, that the public deposits were perfectly secure. This declaration was probably made in consequence of suspicions then afloat of a design, on the part of the executive, to remove the deposits. Those suspicions were denied by the press friendly to the administration. Nevertheless the members had scarcely reached their homes, before measures were commenced by the executive for the removal of the deposits from that very place of safety which it was among the last acts of the house to declare existed in the Bank of the United States! In the prosecution of the design, Mr. McLean, the secretary of the treasury, who was decidedly opposed to the measure, was advanced to the department of state, and Mr. Duane was appointed to succeed him. But Mr. Duane was equally convinced with his predecessor that he was forbidden by every consideration of duty to execute the power with which the law had invested the secretary of the treasury, and refused to remove the deposits; whereupon he was dismissed from office, a new secretary of the treasury was appointed, and in September, 1833, by the command of the president, the measure was finally accomplished.

In December, 1837, an attempt was made, by persons calling themselves patriots, to effect a revolution in Canada. A body of about one thousand occupied Navy Island, in Niagara River. Most of them were Canadians; but there were many who went from the state of New York, and other parts of the frontier. They were under the command of a Mr. Van Renssalaer, of Albany, who assumed the title of general. They threw up fortifications, and mounted cannon which they had taken by force from a state arsenal, showing a determination to hold the position which commanded Chippewa, until an opportunity should offer to land on the British side. A British colonel, who had collected a force of two or three thousand men on the main land, despatched five boats, on the evening of December 29th, to capture or destroy the American steamboat Caroline, which, he said, had been employed that day in transporting the patriots from the American side to that island. They found the vessel lying near the shore at Fort Schlosser, in our waters, with thirty or forty men in her; and, in boarding her, killed one of them. They then towed her into the stream, set her on fire, and destroyed her. This act produced some excitement in the United States, where it was regarded by many as an unjustifiable violation of our territory, with the destruction of American property, attended with murder. The government of Upper Canada, however, justified it on the ground that the men in whose service the boat was employed, were pirates. Major-General Winfield Scott was officially ordered by Mr. Poinsett, secretary of war, to "repair without delay to the frontier, and assume the military command there." Duplicate letters to the governors of New York and Vermont were enclosed to him, in which they were requested to call into the service of the United States such a military force as General Scott might deem necessary, and which it was recommended should be drawn from parts of those states distant from the scene of action.

'The disposition of the force with regard to the points to be occupied," said the letter, "is confided to your discretion, military skill, and intimate knowledge of the country; and the amount of that force must depend upon the character and duration of that contest now going on in Canada, and the disposition manifested by the people and the public authorities of that colony." The following letter was addressed to the governor of New York:—

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE, }
WASHINGTON, December 7, 1837. }

"SIR: A contest having commenced in a territory of Great Britain, adjoining the United States, between portions of the population and the government, during which attempts have been made to violate the laws of the United States, passed to preserve the relations of amity with foreign powers, and to fulfil the obligations of our treaties with them,—by the directions of the president, I have the honour to request the attention of your excellency to any movements of that character that may be contemplated in the state of New York, and your prompt interference to arrest the parties concerned, if any preparations are made of a hostile nature against any foreign power in amity with the United States.—I have the honour to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JOHN FORSYTH.

"To His Excellency WILLIAM L. MARCY, } Governor of New York." }

Similar letters were addressed on the same day to the governors of Vermont and Michigan; and the district attorneys of those states were "earnestly enjoined," in letters addressed to them, "to prosecute, without discrimination, all violators of laws and treaties," &c. The confidence placed by the secretary in the skill, energy, and faithfulness, of General Scott, was fully justified by his exertions and success;—for, without resorting to any violent measures, the insurgents were compelled to abandon their enterprise. They evacuated Navy Island on the 13th of January, 1838; crossed to Grand Island; there they surrendered their arms; and then, landing on the opposite American shore, where the New York militia, who had been called out by the governor, were assembled, the insurgent leader, Van Renssalaer, was there arrested by the marshal, and taken to Buffalo, where he obtained bail to answer for his appearance at the next term of the Supreme Court. The whole number of persons who were found on the island was about six hundred and fifty.

About the same time, a considerable body of men appeared in the neighbourhood of Detroit, with the design of acting in concert with those of Navy Island, by invading the adjoining part of Canada. The city arsenal was broken open in the night, and robbed of all the state arms it contained; the jail was entered for the same purpose; and four hundred stands of arms were openly seized by force at Monroe. Several hundred men were enlisted in the neighbouring counties, and a body of insurgents set the civil authorities at defiance. General Scott, however, soon succeeded in dispersing the force, and thus relieved the country from all apprehension.

Within the period embraced by the presidential terms of General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren, events are to be noticed which indicated changes in the opinions, practices, or circumstances, of society. On the one hand, there was a greater external show of respect for the founders of the states, by centennial and other celebrations. On the other, there were alarming evidences of a departure from old principles and habits, and an extensive deterioration of public morals. Evil symptoms were seen in the abusive language of the periodical press, and the virulence of party spirit, and the false principles too often avowed, and even made a subject of open profession. What chiefly alarmed the apprehensions of reflecting men, however, was the frequency and extravagance of mobs, which prevailed at intervals, for several years, in a number of the cities and towns in different parts of the Union. A society for the abolition of slavery in the Union had been in existence several years, composed chiefly of persons residing in the Northern and Eastern States. Discussions soon arose between them and the Colonization Society, which gave room for public meetings and publications, in which warm expressions were used, and the subjects in debate between them soon attracted general attention. The southerners objected to the discussion of the question of slavery, and still more to the existence of societies for emancipation out of the slave states, as a virtual violation of their constitutional rights, claiming that the sole management of their slaves was left with them, and that otherwise the Southern States would never have consented to join the Union. They remonstrated against the agitation of the question, as dangerous to the tranquil use and enjoyment of their property, and even to the safety of their lives. On the other hand, the abolitionists claimed, as the right of freemen, the liberty of discussing the question of slavery in all its relations, as well as every other question, whatever; and pronounced the pretensions of the slaveholders unfounded, unconstitutional, and arrogant. Acrimonious language was used on both sides, mingled with expressions which were easily construed as threats; and acts were performed inconsistent with the rules of propriety and the laws of the land. Most of the mobs which, at different periods, disturbed the public peace, owed their origin to the excitement thus produced; though many unoffending persons by them lost their property, and sometimes their lives. In a number of instances, men were seized and beaten, or otherwise ill treated, on suspicion of being agents or members of abolition societies, without trial, or after a mock process, in which some of the forms of law were gone through in mockery, before a self-constituted court. This lawless manner of proceeding was for a time quite common in some parts of the country, under the name of Lynch law; and it was too often justified or excused by a corrupt and time-serving press. One of the first mobs which occurred was excited in the city of New York, by an unfounded inflammatory charge, made in a daily paper, against a respectable clergyman. Unfortunately, neither the rioters were punished as they should have been, nor was the offending editor called to account for the public injury he had caused; and their impunity encouraged many ill-designing and more inconsiderate men to imitate their examples. In Philadelphia, on the 12th of August, 1833, about forty houses were destroyed, chiefly the habitations of colored people, and several lives were lost. On another occasion, a large and expensive building in the same city, erected for public lectures, &c., and called Pennsylvania Hall, was deliberately burnt by a numerous mob. In Boston, the assembling of abolition societies was, for a time, prevented by riotous crowds of men threatening to interfere with force.

It may not be improper to notice, in this connection, that, in the year 1840, the sloop Amistad, from Cuba, was seized by a United States vessel at the entrance of Long Island Sound, on suspicion of piracy. It was found to contain about forty Africans, who had been recently brought as slaves from Africa, sold to Spaniards, and embarked in that vessel, to be transported to another part of the island. They had seized the vessel by force, and killed some of the white men. The Africans were transferred to Connecticut, and imprisoned for some time at New Haven. They were claimed by the reputed owners in Cuba; but, after the delay of many months, the Supreme Court of the United States decided that they should not be surrendered to them, but set at liberty. Among other counsel retained for the Africans, they enjoyed the able services of the venerable Ex-president Adams, who volunteered his efforts, and highly distinguished himself by an eloquent plea. A committee of the Abolition Society, who had them in charge after their release, and provided them with subsistence and instruction, sent them to Africa in 1841. with a missionary, who, at their desire, was to undertake to introduce Christianity and learning into their country.

The session of the Pennsylvania legislature was interrupted by a mob on the 4th of December, 1838, so that the governor sent to Philadelphia for a detachment of militia. That very extraordinary occurrence took place in consequence of high political excitement. The election of the Philadelphia members was contested, on the opening of the session that morning, in the chamber of representatives; and two speakers were chosen, and two bodies organized by the opposite parties. In the afternoon, the senate were prevented from opening their session by a body of riotous men, who assembled about the door, and, when the senators had withdrawn, entered and occupied it. On the 8th, the troops of the first division of militia arrived from Philadelphia, and restored order. The two bodies in the house, however, continued to hold separate meetings, until the senate recognized one of them by a majority of one vote; and thus the disturbance ended.

The session of congress of 1839 and 1840 was greatly agitated in consequence of the early refusal of seats to the representatives from New Jersey. Congress met on the 26th of December, and the clerk of the house, after calling the names of the representatives from the New England states and New York, named only one of those from New Jersey, remarking that the seats of the other five were to be contested, and proposing to omit them. As they had brought certificates of their election, this proposition was opposed, and a prolonged and disorderly debate ensued. On the 4th of January, the Honourable John Quincy Adams was chosen chairman, and the subject was debated until the 16th. Mr. Hunter was then elected speaker, but without allowing the five members liberty to vote. On the following day, the other members took the oath, and the right of the five New Jersey members was denied by the rejection of a resolution offered to assert their claim. This measure produced great dissatisfaction, partly because it was effected by a vote of one hundred and sixteen to one hundred and twelve, the numbers being such that the five reelected members would have placed the majority on the other side, if they had been permitted to vote. The delivery of the president's message was thus delayed three weeks.

The sect called Mormons, who had assembled in large numbers in the west, and were marching about in search of a settlement about this time, caused much difficulty in Missouri. Imagining themselves to be under the express guidance of the Almighty, they moved about for a time without any fixed plan, until they found themselves in want of provisions as well as habitations; and on the 28th of October, 1828, they surrendered to General Atkinson, who was at the head of three thousand Missouri militia. Their whole number was said to amount to five thousand, and among them were seven hundred armed men. On the borders of Ray county, in that state, a body of three hundred or four hundred Mormons destroyed a party of about fifty men, of which only three or four made their escape.—At Charlestown, near Boston, an Ursuline convent had been erected, which received young ladies as pupils from different parts of the country. Two of them, who had escaped, at different periods, by eluding the vigilance of their foreign guardians, made such representations of the severe treatment they had received, and cast such grave suspicions on the moral character of the priests and nuns, that a mob proceeded against the institution on the night of August 11, 1833, and burned it to the ground. Repeated attempts were made to recover damages for the property destroyed; but neither the courts nor the legislature would grant any redress.—On the 7th of November, 1835, the New York and Lake Erie Railroad was commenced, which is to pass through the southern counties of that state, and open a communication with the Hudson River and the city of New York. The same year, Samuel Smithson, of London, left a legacy of one hundred thousand pounds sterling, to be devoted to an institution in the United States, for the intellectual improvement of mankind, under the direction of congress.—A vast amount of property was destroyed by fire, principally in a few of the chief cities. By far the most remarkable case of this kind was the great fire in New York. It broke out in the evening of December 16, 1835, and continued to burn until one o'clock on the following day. The destruction of property, in those few hours, was far greater than by any other fire on this side of the Atlantic. A great part of that portion of the city was consumed which was the principal seat of business; and, according to the official estimate, the loss amounted to seventeen million one hundred and fifteen thousand six hundred and ninety-two dollars: of this, thirteen million one hundred and fifteen thousand six hundred and ninety-two dollars was merchandise, and four million dollars in buildings, of which no less than five hundred and twenty-nine were consumed. On the 15th of December, 1836, the United States general post-office at Washington was burned, with the patent office, and the Washington post-office. The contents of all these were also consumed, excepting only a portion of those of the first. Among the valuable articles which fell a prey to the flames, were seven thousand models of patent machines, instruments, &c.; one hundred and sixty-three large folio volumes of records; twenty-six large portfolios, containing nine thousand drawings, many of which were very valuable, and of fine execution; ten thousand original descriptions of inventions, &c. A report made by a committee of congress stated that about three thousand of the most valuable might be replaced at an expense of thirty-three dollars each, or one hundred thousand dollars for that number.

The disputed territory in Maine became the scene of much disorder in the winter of 1839. The land agent of that state, Mr. McIntyre, having led a party of men against individuals who were cutting wood in the disputed territory, was captured and imprisoned at Frederickton, N. B., but was soon released by the governor, who issued a proclamation, declaring the Americans guilty of an invasion of the possessions of her majesty. The British warden of the disputed territory was in turn captured by a party of Americans, and taken to Bangor. Much excitement prevailed on this subject, until the following terms were agreed upon between Mr. Fox, the minister plenipotentiary of Great Britain, and Mr. Forsyth, the American secretary of state: "Her majesty's officers will not seek to expel by military force the armed party which has been sent by Maine into the district bordering on the Aroostook River; but the government of Maine will voluntarily, and without needless delay, withdraw beyond the bounds of the disputed territory any armed force now within them; and, if future necessity should arise for dispersing notorious trespassers, or protecting public property from depredations, by armed force, the operation shall be conducted by concert, jointly or separately, according to agreements between the governments of Maine and New Brunswick." About the close of March, a proposition was made by Major-General Scott, of the United States army, to Sir John Harvey, lieutenant-governor of New Brunswick, and his Excellency John Fairfield, governor of Maine, to leave the question at rest until further instruction should be received by the former from his government; and the troops of Maine were disbanded. This important service was highly creditable to the skill and disposition of the distinguished officer to whom it had been intrusted, and whose talents were now as signally displayed in the field of diplomacy, as they had formerly been in that of his own proper profession.—The independence of the republic of Texas was acknowledged by the United States on the 1st of March, 1837, by a resolution of the senate. The vote was twenty-three to nineteen. On the 31st of the same month, the Mexican minister protested in the most solemn manner, before all civilized nations, against the acknowledgment of the pretended republic of Texas, made by the United States. On the 17th of April, the United States sloop of war Natchez captured a Mexican brig of war off the Brazos de St. Jago, after making a formal demand upon the Mexican authorities to release six American vessels illegally captured.—An exploring expedition, which had been sent out for the discovery of unknown countries in the South Pacific Ocean, to explore and survey certain coasts and islands, &c., discovered the Antarctic continent, on the 19th of January, in the year 1840. The expedition consisted of the Vincennes, Peacock, and Porpoise, with a smaller vessel, and was under the command of Lieutenant Wilkes, of the United States navy. The land was discovered by the Vincennes, though, it is said, it had been seen a few days before on board the Porpoise. The Vincennes fell in with it in south latitude $66^{\circ} 20'$, east longitude $15^{\circ} 40' 18''$, and ran along the coast to $97^{\circ} 45'$ east, a distance of about seventeen hundred miles. The weather was cold and stormy, and the coast so guarded by ice, that it was impossible to effect a landing. The new continent presents a long chain of mountains, apparently destitute of vegetation and human inhabitants. The French exploring expedition, under the command of Commodore D'Urville, discovered the same continent in latitude $66^{\circ} 8'$, on the same day as the Vincennes, but could not prosecute the discovery on account of the ice.—An address to the senate, signed by fifty-six distinguished British authors, was presented by Mr. Clay on the 1st of February, 1837, petitioning for a copy-right law, to secure to them and other foreign writers some benefit from the sale of their books. The following is an extract: "That they have long been exposed to injury, in their reputation and property, from the want of a law, by which the exclusive right to their respective writings may be secured to them in the United States; that, for the want of such a law, deep and extensive injuries have been inflicted on their reputation and property, and on the interests of liberty and science, which ought to constitute a bond of union and friendship between the United States and Great Britain; and that, deeply impressed with the conviction that the only firm ground of friendship between nations is a strict regard to simple justice, they earnestly request the senate of the United States, in congress assembled, speedily to use, in behalf of the authors of Great Britain, their power of securing to the authors the exclusive right of their writings." The address goes on to state "that their property is injured by the American publishers, who appropriate the money received, from the sale of their works, contrary to their wishes; and that their reputation is exposed to injury by the imitation or alteration of their works, while their names are retained as the authors, and are thus made responsible for works which they no longer recognize as their own. From all these evils they have now no redress; while American authors are injured by this free competition, and the American public deceived with imperfect and mutilated editions." This address was referred to a committee; and a petition was afterwards presented in the same spirit, from a number of American authors.

Railroads have been constructed in great numbers in different parts of the country, in so many directions, and of such extent, that it is unnecessary to attempt an enumeration of them. Their united length has been estimated at four thousand miles. Travelling and transportation have been facilitated and extended to a wonderful degree, and the rapidity, cheapness, and comfort, of travelling on the principal routes, and on many branches, have caused a great increase in communication and intercourse throughout the Union. Although railroads have in a great measure superseded canals, some of the latter are still very useful, being employed chiefly for the transportation of more bulky articles. The construction of canals, however, has ceased, and there is little probability that any more will ever be made in this country.

The country was at this period in a state of great depression, and many of the people attributed the extensive and alarming embarrassments of trade to the measures of the government. General William Henry Harrison, of Ohio, was proposed as a candidate for the presidency, and a convention from all the states was invited to meet at Harrisburgh, Pennsylvania, on the 4th of December, to consist of persons opposed to the administration of Mr. Van Buren. Mr. Webster and Mr. Clay had, ere this, been nominated by their friends as candidates; but they both publicly requested that their names might be withdrawn in case any other person should be found, on whom the opposition party (who had assumed the title of Whigs) might be expected to unite. General Harrison had been a candidate at the preceding election, having been nominated by the anti-masonic party for president, and he received seventy-two electoral votes. But the time had arrived when he was to see his popularity rapidly increase, and to enjoy a greater degree of public favour than had been expressed to any man in the country, with the single exception of him who had so justly borne the title of its father. The Harrisburgh convention contained delegates from twenty-two of the states; and the first vote given showed there were for Mr. Clay, one hundred and three; for General Harrison, ninety-four; and for General Scott, fifty-seven. The second was as follows: Harrison, one hundred and forty-eight; Clay, ninety; and Scott, sixteen. It was agreed, with perfect unanimity and much enthusiasm, that General Harrison should be nominated to the people for president, and John Tyler, of Virginia, for vice-president. Meetings were now held in great numbers in all parts of the Union, friendly to these candidates, and the new practice soon prevailed of "mass meetings," as they were called, at which the people assembled in much greater numbers than ever before. An air of gayety also began to prevail; and the customary gravity and too frequent asperity of political meetings generally gave place to addresses of a conciliatory character, alternating with songs. The hope of better times was encouraged, and the evils suffered by the country were attributed to the ill-placed confidence of a large and honest party in selfish, ignorant, or unfaithful leaders. General Harrison's life and character became the topic of general eulogium, and in a generous outbreak of national enthusiasm, the simplicity, industry, and economy, of a new country received their merited praise, as well as the hardihood, bravery, and self-denial, of the patriotic soldier. As an emblem of unsophisticated society in the west, log-houses were erected at the places of political meetings, and equipped with the furniture and decorations of the rudest frontier habitations; miniature log-cabins were borne in procession, and worn about the person, as insignia of political partisanship, while their praises were the burden of many a popular song.

General William Henry Harrison, of Ohio, was inaugurated president of the United States, for the ensuing four years, on the 4th of March, 1841, and John Tyler, of Virginia, vice-president, for the same term. Each had been elected by a vote of two hundred and thirty-four. The only other votes given for president, were sixty for Mr. Van Buren. General Harrison was son of the distinguished man of that name who signed the Declaration of Independence in 1776, as a member of the continental congress from Virginia. Having received his education at Hampden-Sidney College, he began to study medicine; but at the age of nineteen, he received a commission from Washington, and in 1792 entered actual service as an aid of General Wayne, against the Indians. He appeared in congress at the age of twenty-six, as a delegate from the North-Western Territory, and the next year was appointed governor of Indiana, which then comprehended all the western territory, except Ohio. Continuing in that office in 1811, he commanded at the victory of Tippecanoe, and at the battle of the Thames, in 1813, as a general of the regular army. By treaties with the Indians, which are believed to have been fairly and honestly made, he purchased for the country fifty-one millions of acres of the richest land, and he introduced the plan for the sale of the public domain in sections of six hundred and forty, and three hundred and twenty acres, instead of four thousand, so that poor settlers could purchase farms. He was appointed Indian commissioner again in 1814, a representative in congress in 1816, and a senator in the Ohio legislature, and in congress, and in 1828 minister to Colombia. His pure character, however, his sound judgment, active devotion to his country, and high sense of honour, which had always kept him in a sphere far above the polluting suspicion of selfishness, were not forgotten; and he was sought out in his retirement, like Cincinnatus at the plough, by those who wished to find a man possessing substantial qualifications for the chief magistracy. His simple manners and frankness of address, but above all his stern virtue and decided example in favor of religion, and moral and political integrity, rendered him one of the most popular men the country has ever produced. The following passages are extracts from the address he delivered, after his inauguration: "However strong may be my present purpose to realize the expectations of a magnanimous and confiding people, I too well understand the infirmities of human nature, and the dangerous temptations to which I shall be exposed from the magnitude of the power which it has been the pleasure of the people to commit to my hand, not to place my chief confidence in the aid of that Almighty Power which has hitherto protected me, and enabled me to bring to favorable issues other important but still inferior trusts, heretofore confided to me by my countrymen." * * * "The great danger to our institutions does not appear to me to be in a usurpation by the government of power not granted by the people, but the accumulation in one of the departments of that which was assigned to others." Some of the sources of the evils complained of he thought to be the defects of the constitution, and a misconstruction of some of its provisions. The reeligibility of the president, he said, was an evil which any president might correct in his own case. "Until an amendment of the constitution can be effected," said he, "public opinion may secure the desired object. I give my aid to it, by renewing the pledge heretofore given, that under no circumstances will I consent to serve a second term." With respect to the veto power, the president said that the constitution had given that power to the judiciary as well as to the executive; yet the judiciary had never exercised it. On the subject of setting aside precedents, he remarked, "I believe, with Mr. Madison, that repeated recognitions, under varied circumstances, in the acts of the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the government, accompanied by indications, in different modes, of the concurrence of the general will of the nation, as affording to the president sufficient authority for his considering such disputed points as settled." After a full consideration of the evil effects of encouraging public officers to take an active part in electioneering, he added, "Never, with my consent, shall an officer of the people, compensated for his services out of their pockets, become the pliant instrument of executive will." The freedom of the press, he declared, "is one of the most precious legacies they (our ancestors) have left us." With respect to the public funds, he thus expressed himself: "The mode of keeping the public treasure should be prescribed by them, (the people;) and the farther removed it may be from the control of the executive, the more wholesome the arrangement, and the more in accordance with republican principle." "In relation to the adoption of gold and silver, instead of paper money," he declared "that an exclusive metallic currency would favour the necessary toleration of usury, and be in danger of breaking down the character of the country for generosity and nobleness of feeling." He enforced at length the general duty of kindness and conciliation among the inhabitants of all the states; and especially at that juncture when party spirit prevailed in so great a degree.

On account of the deranged state of the commercial affairs of the country, General Harrison convoked an extra session of congress for May 13. But that day he was never permitted to see. After a short illness, General Harrison died on the 4th of April, of pneumonia, with congestion of the liver, only one month after his inauguration. The following official announcement was made by the members of his cabinet:—

"CITY OF WASHINGTON, April 4, 1841.

"An all-wise Providence having suddenly removed from this life William Henry Harrison, late president of the United States, we have thought it our duty, in the recess of congress, and in the absence of the vice-president from the seat of government, to make this afflicting bereavement known to the country, by this declaration, under our hands.

"He died at the president's house, in this city, this 4th day of April, Anno Domini 1841, at thirty minutes before one o'clock in the morning.

"The people of the United States, overwhelmed, like ourselves, by an event so unexpected and so melancholy, will derive consolation from knowing that his death was calm and resigned, as his life has been patriotic, and useful, and distinguished; and that the last utterance of his lips expressed a fervent desire for the perpetuity of the constitution, and the preservation of its true principles. In death, as in life, the happiness of his country was uppermost in his thought.

"DANIEL WEBSTER, Secretary of State.

"THOMAS EWING, Secretary of the Treasury.

"JOHN BELL, Secretary of War.

"J. J. CRITTENDEN, Attorney-General.

"FRANCIS GRANGER, Postmaster-General."

Mr. Badger, the secretary of the navy, was absent at the time.

The funeral of the president took place on the 7th of April. Minute guns were fired in the morning at the military stations near the city; and the burial service was read in the east room of the president's house about noon, where the coffin was placed, in the centre. Near it, in a semicircle, stood about forty clergymen, opposite whom sat the members of the cabinet round the head of the coffin, while behind them were the foreign ministers; beyond them were the mourners, the physicians, pall-bearers, and officers of the army and navy, while a great number of other persons occupied the other parts of the spacious room. The coffin was carried on a car drawn by six white horses, attended by the pall-bearers, who represented the different states and territories of the Union. A military escort preceded the car, consisting of officers of the army and navy, and of different corps in the District, and of the city of Baltimore. The civic procession, which followed the military, was led by the United States marshal for the District, clerk of the Supreme Court, the mayors of the neighbouring cities, and clergy, before the car; and after it, the family of the deceased, the vice-president and heads of departments, ex-presidents, &c., foreign ministers, judges, senators, representatives, governors, officers of department, soldiers, societies, citizens, &c. &c. The houses were crowded with spectators, and bore ensigns of mourning, as the procession moved to the congressional burying-ground, where the coffin was deposited in solemn silence. It was afterwards removed to the banks of the Ohio, and placed in a new tomb, erected for the purpose by public subscriptions.

On the 6th of April, the vice-president, having arrived in Washington, was waited on by the heads of the departments, to pay him their personal and official respects. He signified to them his wish that they would continue to fill the station they held, and expressed his confidence that they would afford him their aid in the administration of the government. He then took and subscribed the following oath, that no room might remain for doubts of his legal qualifications for the discharge of the duties of president, which the death of General Harrison had devolved upon him.

"I do solemnly swear, that I will faithfully execute the office of president of the United States, and will, to the best of my ability, preserve, protect, and defend, the constitution of the United States.

"JOHN TYLER.

"April 6, 1841."

This oath was administered to Mr. Tyler by the Honourable William Cranch, chief justice of the District of Columbia. On the 13th of April, the president issued the following proclamation for a national fast:—

“ To the People of the United States.— A Recommendation.

“ When a Christian people feel themselves to be overtaken by a great public calamity, it becomes them to humble themselves under the dispensation of divine Providence, to recognize His righteous government over the children of men, to acknowledge His goodness in time past, as well as their own unworthiness, and to supplicate His merciful protection for the future.

“ The death of William Henry Harrison, late president of the United States, so soon after his elevation to that high office, is a bereavement peculiarly calculated to be regarded as a heavy affliction, and to impress all minds with a sense of the uncertainty of human things, and of the dependence of nations, as well as individuals, upon our heavenly Parent.

“ I have thought, therefore, that I should be acting in conformity with the general expectation and feelings of the community, in recommending, as I now do, to the people of the United States, of every religious denomination, that, according to their several modes and forms of worship, they observe a day of fasting and prayer, by such religious services as may be suitable on the occasion; and I recommend Friday, the 14th day of May next, for that purpose; to the end that, on that day, we may all, with one accord, join in humble and reverential approach to Him in whose hands we are, invoking Him to inspire us with a proper spirit, and temper of heart and mind, under those frowns of his Providence, and still to bestow His precious benedictions upon our government and our country.

“ WASHINGTON, April 13, 1841.”

No president, since Washington, had commenced his administration under such favourable auspices as Mr. Tyler. Though elevated, by the suffrages and exertions of the Whig party, to that position from which, under the provisions of the constitution, he stepped into the vacant presidency, he was not personally pledged to any specific measures, or any course of policy, for which that party contended. With a high-minded and honourable regard for the supreme will of the people, as indicated in his election, he might have blended a noble independence of sectional and party shackles, and, steering a middle course between the factions, have disarmed the violence of the conflict, and given to the country a season of political repose. By many of the wise and moderate, on both sides, this was desired and expected.

In accordance with these just and patriotic sentiments, Mr. Tyler courteously requested the entire cabinet of his lamented predecessor to retain their respective places, and announced his determination to make no immediate changes in the administrative policy of the government. But matters of graver import than the distribution of executive favours soon arose. The quæstiones veratæ of political strife began to be revived. The bank, which, it was supposed, had received its quietus in the sub-treasury,—the tariff, internal improvements, and the distribution of the public lands,—were all to be taken up de novo, as problems not yet solved.

On all these questions, Mr. Tyler's cabinet was diametrically opposed to that of the Van Buren administration; and measures were soon in progress to effect a radical change, as soon as congress could be brought to act upon the subject.

The extra session of congress, which had been called by proclamation from General Harrison, commenced at the time appointed, on the 31st of May. This was not an event of rare occurrence, having been resorted to five times before, since the adoption of the constitution. The house of representatives was organized by the election of the Whig candidate for speaker, Mr. John White, of Kentucky. Mr. Mangum, of North Carolina, president pro tem. of the senate, presided over that body, becoming, de facto, vice-president of the United States, and receiving the full salary of that office.

The message of President Tyler was brief and appropriate. Alluding to his peculiar position, and the occasion which called for a message from him at that time, he gave a succinct view of the relations of the country with foreign powers, and the domestic crisis which made it expedient to call an extra session. He commended to the notice of congress the deranged condition of the currency and the monetary affairs of the country; condemned the sub-treasury, as wholly incompetent to the duty assigned it, and recommended the establishment of some fiscal agent, which might come within the range of the constitution, and harmonize the conflicting views of the different schools of political economists. In planning, and putting into active operation, such an agent, he promised his hearty coöperation, reserving the right of interfering only to prevent an actual infringement of the constitution.

The measures of relief proposed by the new administration were, a repeal of the sub-treasury, a modification of the tariff, and a general bankrupt law. The former, it was contended, was paralyzing the energies of the business community, by withdrawing from active circulation a large portion of the currency, and holding it, in terrorem, over the banks, to prevent them from accommodating the merchants. It was, moreover, unsafe to the public, since these large accumulations of money were now intrusted to a few individuals, and protected by individual responsibility; whereas, under the banking system, the safety of the deposits was guaranteed by the joint responsibility of many stockholders. It was argued, also, that, as experience is always a safer guide than theory, the history of the past afforded a strong argument in favour of the safety of the bank over that of the sub-treasury. Of all the millions upon millions which had been received and disbursed by two national banks, each having a charter of twenty years, the government had not lost a dollar. It was always at her command, in any amount, at any place, and in any kind of funds, she might demand. By the state banks she had lost a million and a half, and by defaulting officers several millions more.

On these and other points, however, there were many conflicting opinions and views; and it was only by a strict drawing of party lines, that any measure, connected with this subject, could be carried. By this means alone, the last bank had been destroyed, and all plans to renew and improve it defeated. By this means the tariff and the land bills had been arranged. And by this means only were those great questions yet to be disposed of. The general sense of the people was in favour of a change, or rather of a return to the "good old way." The éclat of General Jackson's name no longer overshadowed all other considerations. What he had been fully sustained in doing would not have been tolerated in any other man. This the people began to see and to feel. Tired of mere political strife, which resulted in no good to the people, but only in perpetuating office to a few of the more ambitious leaders, they wished for repose. They resolved on a change; though it was more than probable that it would only be a change in name.

This change was made. A new administration was invested with the powers of government. But the stroke of Providence had taken away its head. The executive will, which had recently been allowed to assert a personality and supremacy unknown to the early days of the constitution, was yet undeveloped. The whole country looked eagerly for the first fore-shadowings of its purpose. In this, however, all were disappointed. As Mr. Tyler had not openly and directly committed himself, in the recent contest, on the details of the great leading questions of national policy, so, probably, he had not, at this time, distinctly marked out to himself the precise course he should pursue.

He was soon brought to a stand. One of the first matters taken up by congress, in its extra session, was the bank question. The secretary of the treasury, to whose department it more properly belonged, presented, in his report, the outline of a national bank, to the main features of which Mr. Tyler was understood to have given his full assent. It was vehemently opposed in both houses of congress, but passed into a bill notwithstanding. The sub-treasury was already repealed, to make way for the establishment of the new institution. To the latter measure the president had freely given his official sanction, and the Whigs, with apparent good reason, expected his approval of this bill. To their utter disappointment and dismay, however, he returned it with objections.

This veto was the signal for a vigorous renewal of the strife of party. Defeated where they least expected it, and by the exercise of a power of which they were always extremely jealous, as savouring too much of absolutism, the Whigs were confounded and disheartened, not knowing on whom to depend.

Mr. Tyler, like his "illustrious predecessor," General Jackson, had disclaimed hostility to the bank on constitutional grounds, by averring that he had a plan of his own for a fiscal agent, which would meet the exigencies of the case, and harmonize the conflicting views of all the real friends of the bank. Upon this encouragement, a new bill was prepared, every feature of which was supposed to be so guarded and adjusted as to meet the executive scruple. This, however, though sanctioned by a majority of both houses of congress, met the same fate, at the hand of the president, as the former one.

Congress did not renew the subject, but the executive did. At the opening of the next session, the secretary of the treasury presented the plan for an exchequer, which was recommended by the president. It was rejected by the house of representatives, by a vote of 193 to 18.

The exercise of the veto power had always been regarded with extreme jealousy by congress and the people. It had been very rarely used in the early administration of the government. Washington vetoed two bills; Madison, four; Monroe, one; Jackson, ten. It is, perhaps, a necessary constitutional provision, but confers an absolute prerogative, which is somewhat anomalous in a democratic constitution—a prerogative so absolute that few, if any, of the constitutional monarchs of Europe would venture to exercise it in the face of a decided majority. It is odious to the people, as "the one-man power," and would probably be somewhat restrained, if submitted now to a popular vote.

In the measures thus defeated by executive interposition, the cabinet were agreed and deeply interested.

Feeling that the president had already virtually taken other counsellors, and indicated a course of policy in which they could never harmonize, they resolved to retire. Accordingly, with the exception of Mr. Webster, they all sent in their resignations. Never did this great man appear more truly independent than in retaining office against the expressed wishes of many of his friends. He knew the crisis which existed, and felt that duty to his country demanded his services.

The cabinet was recomposed in the following manner :
 Daniel Webster, of Mass., (continuing) Sec'y of State.
 Walter Forward, of Penn., . . Sec'y of the Treasury.
 Abel P. Upshur, of Virginia, . . . " " Navy.
 John C. Spencer, of New York, " " War.
 Hugh S. Legare, of S. Carolina, . . Attorney-General.
 Charles A. Wickliffe, of Ky., . . Postmaster-General.

The boundary line between the United States, in its north-eastern section, and the province of Nova Scotia, had been long in dispute. Several earnest attempts had been made to settle it. Much bad feeling, and some powder, had been expended upon it; and the amicable relations which had so long subsisted between the two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon family were in some danger of being seriously disturbed. With a commendable disposition to adjust the difficulty, the British government had appointed Lord Ashburton, an intelligent, liberal-minded statesman, having large American interests and relations, to represent them at Washington. The correspondence between this distinguished man and Mr. Webster was of the highest order of diplomatic merit, worthy of the men and of the nations they represented. The result was a treaty, definitively and forever adjusting the north-eastern boundary. It was ratified by the United States on the 20th of August, and by Great Britain on the 14th of October. The treaty of Washington will remain forever a monument to the talent and patriotism of the great American statesman.

The "exploring expedition," which had been sent out, in 1838, under command of Lieutenant Wilkes, returned on the 10th of June, 1842, having successfully accomplished the object for which it was designed. On the 16th of January, 1840, land was discovered far south of New Holland, in latitude 66°. This was the first discovery of the Antarctic continent. Unable to effect a landing, on account of the ice, Captain Wilkes coasted along the shore for many leagues, in imminent danger of being crushed among the icebergs; they bore away for the western coast of America, whence, having surveyed the Columbia and Sacramento Rivers, he returned home by way of the Cape of Good Hope.

This year (1842) was further signalized by the out-breaking of domestic troubles in Rhode Island, which, for a time, wore a most threatening aspect. This state, instead of adopting a new constitution, on coming into the Union, retained, as the fundamental law, its old colonial charter, derived from the British crown in 1663, with only such modifications as were necessary to adapt it to its new relations. Various amendments and improvements had been enacted from time to time; but that peculiarly British feature, which limited the right of suffrage to landholders, remained unchanged. As the manufacturing interest increased, and with it a movable population seldom acquiring a right in the soil, this provision began to be felt as a grievance, and many unavailing efforts had been made, to induce the legislature to call a convention of the people, in due form, to revise the charter. Two parties were strongly arrayed on this point — the charter party, holding tenaciously to their ancient privileges, and the suffrage party, demanding a share in the great prerogative of freemen.

At length, in January, 1841, the legislature, upon the petition of the suffrage party, consented to call a convention for the purpose of forming a new constitution. The time of meeting was fixed for the following November. This did not satisfy the suffrage party. They accordingly held a general caucus on the 17th of April, and another on the 5th of July, at Providence, which assumed the right to call for a delegate convention, to meet in October, thus hoping to forestall, and perhaps annul, the action of a regular constitutional convention.

The two conventions met at the times appointed for each respectively. Each formed a constitution, and submitted it to the people for ratification. The suffrage party, deeming it necessary to secure the votes of a majority of all those to whom their constitution accorded the right, kept the polls open six days, and received proxies. In this manner they obtained fourteen thousand votes. The whole number of adult citizens being only twenty-three thousand, they claimed to have established their constitution by the voice of the people. They accordingly proceeded to choose state officers, and representatives to the legislature.

Through the zealous efforts of the suffrage party, the constitution submitted by the legal convention was rejected by a majority of six hundred and seventy-seven votes. This event threw them back upon the charter, and they proceeded to their annual elections, as usual.

For so small a state as Rhode Island, two governors, two legislatures assembled at the same time, was rather an imposing and startling spectacle. Samuel W. King was the regular governor under the charter. Thomas W. Dorr was the governor elect of the suffrage party. Serious difficulties were apprehended. Governor King made application to President Tyler for a military force to sustain him, if necessary, in supporting the constitution of the state, and received assurances of aid whenever it should be necessary.

On the 16th of May, 1842, Mr. Dorr entered Providence, under the escort of about thirteen hundred of his supporters, of whom three hundred were in arms. Arriving at his quarters, he issued a proclamation, defying the power of the regular government, and declaring his determination to maintain, to the last extremity, the position to which he had been called. Very early in the morning of the 18th, he proceeded to the state arsenal, at the head of his adherents, and having drawn up his troops in battle array, and planted his cannon, sent in a flag and demanded a surrender. Colonel Blodget, who was in command, inquired, "For whom, and in whose name?" The answer was, "For Governor Dorr, and in the name of Colonel Wheeler." Blodget replied, that he knew no such men, and that the arsenal would be defended, in case of attack.

When the flag returned, Mr. Dorr gave orders to fire; but his gun flashed three times. It is said that there was dissatisfaction in his ranks, and that some of his men had dampened the powder. However that may be, no other demonstration was made. Mr. Dorr returned to his quarters.

The state military were now called out, with orders to arrest Mr. Dorr, in the name of Governor King. Conscious of wrong, and intimidated by this array, the insurgents were soon dispersed, without resort to violence. Their governor made his escape into Connecticut. Most of the officers chosen by the party resigned, and thus this precocious rebellion seemed to be subdued without bloodshed.

But the spirit of discontent was not wholly quieted. The state was still under the old charter, and the right of suffrage was restricted to the few who were freeholders. The discussion of this vital question was maintained with greater eagerness than ever, and words, as is often the case, soon led to blows. On the 28th of June, Mr. Dorr again appeared, and, with about seven hundred of his adherents, took possession of a hill in Chepachet. Here he intrenched himself, in due order, with five pieces of cannon, and called upon the people to rally for their rights. Upon this, Governor King ordered out three thousand of the militia, to support the cause of "law and order," and proclaimed martial law throughout the state. These decisive measures had the desired effect. Seeing the utter hopelessness of their position, the insurgents again dispersed, without resistance, leaving their general, as before, to provide for his own safety by flight. Returning a few months after to the state, Mr. Dorr was arrested, tried for treason, convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment and hard labor for life. In the mean time, a new constitution had been adopted, according to the prescribed forms of law. Mr. Dorr remained in ignoble confinement for one year, when he was released by an act of amnesty from the legislature.

A very serious incident occurred, near the close of this year, on board of one of the national vessels of the United States. The brig Somers, commander McKenzie, had been cruising on the African coast, and was about returning home, when a mutiny, just ripe for execution, was discovered among the crew. Some of the officers were concerned in it. The leader was Philip Spencer, a son of Hon. John C. Spencer, of New York, at that time secretary of war. He had drawn around him a considerable number of the restless, daring spirits of that little community, and arranged a plot for murdering the captain and his officers, and getting possession of the ship for piratical purposes. The plot was fully arranged and matured, and about to be put into execution, when it was revealed to Captain McKenzie by one of the supposed confederates. He had been made a confidant, in the hope of securing him in the plot, and threatened with instant death if he breathed a word of it to any one. He feigned assent to the scheme, but sought opportunity to reveal it. With difficulty he found such an opportunity, and so the fearful tragedy was prevented; not, however, without another much to be lamented, and only less fearful than that which the mutineers had plotted. A summary trial of the ringleaders was had, which resulted in the decision to put three of them to death. Accordingly, on the 1st of December, Philip Spencer, midshipman, Samuel Cromwell, boatswain's mate, and Elisha H. Small, common seaman, were hung at the yard arm, in presence of the assembled crew of the ship. This sad example of the severity of naval discipline produced intense excitement throughout the length and breadth of the land. The matter was thoroughly investigated by a court-martial, the result of which was a full vindication of Captain McKenzie and his council of advisers in the course they had pursued.

In May, 1844, a very serious disturbance, of a political character, occurred in Philadelphia, between the Native American party and the Irish Catholics. A meeting of the "Native Americans" was held in the quarter where many of the "adopted citizens" resided. The meeting was interrupted and broken up by a riotous attack from a large body of Irish. This was on Friday, the 3d of May. On the following Monday, the Americans reassembled at the same place, in great numbers, for the avowed purpose of vindicating their right to meet, when and where they pleased, without molestation.

The American flag was raised over the platform, and two or three addresses were delivered without interruption. The meeting was then dispersed by a sudden shower of rain, but was immediately reorganized in a market-house, not far from the place of their first assembling. The speaker had scarcely taken his stand, when a disturbance commenced in the crowd. A pistol was fired, which became the signal for a general mêlée. The Irish rushed out of their houses to join in the fray. They were fired upon by the Americans, and several of their number wounded, some of them mortally. The Native Americans were driven from the ground, but soon rallied around the remnants of their flag, which had been torn in shreds by their infuriated assailants. After a contest of nearly an hour, the Irish were driven to take shelter in their houses, and the Americans remained masters of the ground.

By this time, the police of the city had mustered. The sheriff arrived on the ground, and order was partially restored. In the evening, the riot was renewed. In this the Americans were the assailants. They attempted to demolish a Catholic seminary in the vicinity, but were met by a volley of musketry from within, and repulsed. Five persons were shot, one of whom was killed on the spot.

The next day, May 7, at three o'clock, a great meeting of the American party was held in Independence Square, about one and a half miles from the scene of the former outrages. The addresses made on this occasion were, for the most part, of a conciliatory character, and designed to prevent a further resort to violence. In this spirit, the assembly broke up; but a large portion, smarting under the indignities of the preceding day, resolved to go in procession to Kensington. They displayed, as they went, the tattered ensign of American independence, bearing, by the side of it, a banner with this inscription: "This is the flag which was trampled under foot by the Irish Papists."

On reaching the scene of the former outrages, they attempted to organize a meeting. They had scarcely commenced, however, when one of their number was shot down, and instantly killed, by a ball from the window of a house opposite the market. This was followed by continued volleys from most of the surrounding houses. The Americans were unarmed. Many of them, however, ran for their muskets, and, in a short time, a band of about forty presented themselves in front of the market. Exposed in the open street, while their assailants were protected within the walls of their houses, they fought with desperation nearly an hour, during which some of the number were killed, and several more wounded.

At length the Americans set fire to one of the buildings from which the firing proceeded. The flames spread with great rapidity. In a short time, between twenty and thirty houses were on fire. The market-house, where the meeting had been held, took fire by accident.

About nine o'clock, a detachment of soldiers, under the command of General Cadwallader, arrived on the ground, having been ordered out to quell the riot.

Planting his cannon so as to sweep the streets, where the principal disturbance had occurred, the general ordered the mob to disperse. His force was too formidable to be trifled with. The murderous firing ceased, and the exasperated multitude withdrew from the scene of conflict. Protected by the military, the firemen, who had been prevented by the mob from making any effort to arrest the conflagration, succeeded in bringing it under. Some of the Irish were shot down, while attempting to escape from their houses. Others, it was thought, were consumed in their dwellings.

The next day a gang of desperadoes, not recognized by any party, commenced searching the houses of the Irish; and wherever they found arms secreted, they demolished the building, or set it on fire. The Irish, completely overawed, offered little resistance. The church of St. Michael, the priest's house adjoining, and the nunnery, were fired and consumed. This occupied the forenoon. Late in the afternoon, the mob moved off toward the church of St. Augustine. A large force was drawn out to protect it. The mayor of the city was there in person. But, unfortunately, he did not understand his position. Mistaking weakness for clemency, he attempted to subdue the enraged populace with words; to arrest, like the courtiers of Canute, the swelling of the tide by a mere show of authority. The rabble laughed him to scorn, and hurled defiance at his semblance of power. The police were driven back. The windows of the church were broken, a match was applied to the drapery, the gas pipes were cut, and in a moment the building was in flames. The firemen were forcibly prevented from interfering, and the church was soon a ruin.

On the following morning, an immense meeting of citizens was held in Independence Square, to devise measures for the restoration of peace, and the maintenance of the majesty of law. Volunteer patrols were organized. A proclamation was issued by the mayor and the sheriff, declaring martial law. This had the desired effect. A mob, assembled in front of the principal cathedral, was instantly dispersed by the announcement of General Cadwallader that he should comply with the very letter of the proclamation. Order was soon perfectly restored, and, a few days after the enactment of these fearful scenes, the Native American party held a meeting in Kensington without molestation.

An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, to take effect on the 2d day of February, 1842, was passed by congress in August, 1841, and was approved by the president on the 19th of the month. The act provided for two kinds of bankruptcy; namely, voluntary, where the proceedings were commenced by the bankrupt, for his own relief; and compulsory, where they were commenced by one or more of the creditors, to enforce the settlement of the affairs of a delinquent debtor, for the benefit of all concerned.

This law was cautiously and wisely framed, with a true utilitarian view to the greatest good of the greatest number. It was in accordance with a fundamental provision of the constitution, specifically vesting in congress the power to enact such a law. A similar law had been passed by congress in 1800, which remained in operation three years.

It was a salutary enactment. A tremendous crisis in the monetary affairs of the country had just passed. A season of unparalleled inflation and all-pervading speculation had been followed by a universal prostration, a complete collapse in the fiscal system of the nation. Not only the wild and reckless, but thousands of the most cautious and experienced, in all departments of trade, had fallen into hopeless embarrassment. Those who were regarded as substantially rich, and entitled to the highest grade of mercantile confidence and credit, were whelmed in the same indiscriminate ruin with those whom the unwholesome agitation of the moment had thrown up, like bubbles, to float in the sunshine of a seeming prosperity. Banks had suspended, failed, and ceased to be; individual and associated enterprise had been paralyzed; and hundreds of thousands of competent, honest, industrious men were suddenly plunged into a state of inextricable embarrassment, from which it was impossible they should recover by the ordinary operation of the common law, and the established customs and principles of trade. It was an unusual disease, and demanded an unusual remedy. The operation of the law was, doubtless, in some cases severe and oppressive. Dishonest men took advantage of its provisions to rob the innocent and helpless of their just dues. It was as carefully guarded, in all respects, as the nature of the case admitted. But imperfection is incident to all human legislation. Its operation, on the whole, was eminently happy, and conducive to the general good. Enterprise was resuscitated. Business revived, and soon recovered its wonted elasticity. The avenues of trade were reopened, and the marts of commerce, which seemed like a populous city just swept by a tornado, were repeopled, and replenished with more than their former stability and fulness.

An incident of some importance occurred in the latter part of the year 1841, which brought into powerful contrast the differing policies of the United States and Great Britain, on the subject of slavery, and gave rise to animated discussions in both countries, as well as to some able diplomatic communications between the two governments. The brig Creole sailed from Richmond, in the latter part of October, with a cargo of merchandise, and about one hundred and thirty-five slaves, bound to New Orleans. On the evening of the 7th of November, some of the slaves rose upon the crew, killed a passenger, and wounded the captain and three of his men. Under the direction of the mutineers, the brig was then taken to Nassau, in the island of New Providence, belonging to Great Britain. At the request of the American consul, a guard was placed on board the Creole, to prevent the escape of the mutineers. The case was formally investigated by the magistrates of the place, and nineteen slaves, who were implicated in the mutiny, were committed to prison. The remainder, one hundred and fourteen in number, were liberated, and, being on British ground, were free. The American consul claimed that, being American property, they should be sent to the United States. This the British authorities refused, on the ground that their law, repudiating the right of property in man, gave them no power to restrain their personal liberty, except for crime. They had committed no offence against English law. There was no power to arraign or arrest them. They were absolutely and irrecoverably free, ex virtute loci.

The nineteen slaves implicated in the mutiny were demanded by the American consul, to be sent for trial to the United States. This was refused on the ground that the consul had no proper authority to make the demand. The demand was not pressed from any other source; and, as no one appeared against them, they were all ultimately discharged.

The project of annexing Texas to the United States had been entertained by many, from the very outbreak of the revolution which separated it from Mexico. It found favour with a considerable portion of the people, both of Texas and the United States. The interest of the slaveholding section was to be greatly extended by the measure. This drew to its support nearly all the political influence of the Southern States. To this was added the influence of that portion of the political parties of the Northern and Western States who are moved by any scheme of national aggrandizement, and who saw in this enlargement of territory only "an extension of the area of freedom"! The merits of the question were widely discussed. The prevailing sentiment, in the whole country, was adverse to annexation. The action of congress had indicated this, when, in the early part of the discussion, Texas came and asked admission to the Union, and was refused. But Mr. Tyler was in favour of the measure, and resolved to carry it. He accordingly entered into diplomatic negotiations with the "lone star," and arranged the whole matter in the usual form of a treaty. This mode of action had many advantages. It was carried on secretly, until it was fully matured, and ripe for execution. When so ripe, it was laid before the senate only, and that in secret session. Thus the popular branch of the national legislature could not interfere. In this manner the measure was carried, and Texas became an integral part of the United States. It was the last act of Mr. Tyler's administration, and was scarcely consummated, when his term of service expired. To him belongs the credit of the scheme, and the peculiar mode of legislation by which it was effected. The details of its execution he bequeathed to his successor, entailing upon the country, at the same time, the settlement of all the difficulties involved in the yet unfinished conflict between Texas and Mexico. It proved a golden apple, in more than one sense.

The republic of Texas had no sooner asserted her independence, than she began to look to the United States to receive her into the great confederacy. She first asked for the recognition of her independence, as a preparatory step to this end. The subject was introduced by President Jackson into his message of December 21, 1836, in the following terms: "It becomes us to beware of too early a movement, as it might subject us, however unjustly, to the imputation of seeking to establish the claim of our neighbours to territory, with the view to its subsequent acquisition by ourselves. Prudence, therefore, seems to dictate that we should stand aloof, and maintain our present position, if not until Mexico herself, or one of the great foreign powers, shall recognize the independence of the new government, at least until the lapse of time, or the course of events, shall have proved, beyond a cavil or dispute, the ability of the people of that country to maintain the separate sovereignty, and to uphold the government constituted by them."

The independence of Texas was acknowledged by a resolution of the American senate, passed on the 1st day of March, 1837. This act, together with the strong sympathy felt by the American people for Texas, and the avowed desire of Texas for admission to the Union, greatly disturbed the equanimity of Mexico, and produced several severe diplomatic menaces, and intimations of hostile resistance, which were entirely harmless and inefficient under the cool and dignified diplomacy of Mr. Webster.

On the 6th of October, 1843, Mr. Upshur, having succeeded Mr. Webster as secretary of state, proposed a renewal of negotiations with Texas, which was immediately accepted. The threats of Mexico, which were now most vehemently repeated, were met by the declaration that, as Texas was now acknowledged an independent nation, they were under no obligation to consult any foreign power in their intercourse with her.

The negotiation of the treaty for annexation proceeded silently and slowly. A sudden impulse was given to it by the following bold and startling note addressed to Mr. Upshur, by Mr. Van Zandt, the Texan minister, at Washington, on the 17th January, 1844:—

“Sir: It is known to you that an armistice has been proclaimed between Mexico and Texas; that an armistice has been obtained through the intervention of several great powers, mutually friendly, and that negotiations are now pending, having for their object a settlement of the difficulties heretofore existing between the two countries. A proposition having been likewise submitted by the president of the United States, through you, for the annexation of Texas to this country, therefore (without indicating the nature of the reply which the president of Texas may direct to be made to this proposition) I beg leave to suggest that it may be apprehended, should a treaty of annexation be concluded, Mexico may think proper to at once terminate the armistice, break off all negotiation for peace, and again threaten or commence hostilities against Texas; and that some of the other governments who have been instrumental in obtaining their cession, if they do not throw their influence into the Mexican scale, may altogether withdraw their good offices of mediation, thus losing to Texas their friendship, and exposing her to the unrestrained menaces of Mexico. In view, then, of these things, I desire to submit, through you, to his excellency, the president of the United States, this inquiry: Should the president of Texas accede to the proposition of annexation, would the president of the United States, after the signing of the treaty, and before it shall be ratified and receive the final action of the other branches of both governments, in case Texas should desire it, or with her consent, order such number of the military and naval forces of the United States to such necessary points or places upon the territory or borders of Texas or the Gulf of Mexico, as shall be sufficient to protect her against foreign aggression?”

This note was never satisfactorily answered. Mr. Henderson, the newly-appointed Texan minister, refusing to renew the negotiations on any other terms, Mr. Tyler, on the 11th of April, 1844, acceded to them, in the following note from the secretary of state, Mr. Calhoun, who had succeeded Mr. Upshur:—

“Gentlemen: The letter addressed by Mr. Van Zandt to the late secretary of state, Mr. Upshur, to which you have called my attention, dated Washington, 17th January, 1844, has been laid before the president of the United States.

“In reply to it, I am directed by the president to say, that the secretary of the navy has been instructed to order a strong naval force to concentrate in the Gulf of Mexico, to meet any emergency; and that similar orders have been issued by the secretary of war, to move the disposable military forces on our south-western frontier, for the same purpose. Should the exigency arise to which you refer in your note to Mr. Upshur, I am further directed by the president to say, that, during the pendency of the treaty of annexation, he would deem it his duty to use all the means placed within his power by the constitution, to protect Texas from all foreign invasion. I have the honour to be, &c.”

On the following day, April 12, the treaty of annexation was signed by Mr. Calhoun, on the one part, and by Messrs. Van Zandt and Henderson, the Texan commissioners, on the other part. It was immediately submitted to the American senate, in the full confidence that it would be eagerly confirmed by that body. It was, however, decidedly rejected; some of the friends of the measure uniting with its enemies to defeat it, on the ground, secret if not avowed, that too much éclat would result to the retiring administration from having privately and peaceably effected so brilliant a negotiation. There was too much political capital embarked in the enterprise, to be withdrawn at once. It was therefore defeated in that form, to be brought up in another.

Meanwhile, the correspondence between the great functionaries of Mexico and the United States grew daily more unfriendly and portentous. Threats on one side were followed by demands on the other. The armistice which had, for some time, existed between Mexico and Texas, was abruptly terminated, and preparations made to renew the war with the utmost vigour and an unheard-of severity. No quarter was to be given to any foreigner, who might be taken fighting against the troops of Mexico. It was, in fact, to be a war of extermination.

The American envoy at Mexico was hereupon instructed to inform the Mexican government, that a renewal of the war with Texas, while the question of annexation was pending, would not be looked upon with indifference by the United States. He was also advised to protest against the war, and the manner in which it was proposed to carry it on.

The Mexican government, on the other hand, had already openly committed itself on this point. In the official note from Mr. Bocanegra, minister of foreign relations, in reply to one from Mr. Green, American chargé d'affaires ad interim, informing him that the treaty of annexation had been signed; the position was unequivocally taken and reiterated, that Mexico would consider the ratification of the treaty as a declaration of war. The treaty was rejected in the senate, and the Mexican government had the temporary satisfaction of making the people believe it had carried the point, by the bold and determined tone it had assumed.

On the 28th of February, 1844, an event transpired at the seat of government, which, by its awful and sudden character, agitated the whole country. The United States steamship Princeton, then on the Potomac, commanded by Captain Stockton, had a very large party on board, invited by the secretary of the navy to partake of a collation and witness experiments with the celebrated Paixhan gun, which had been called the Peacemaker. Among the company were the president, his cabinet, a large number of members of congress, and distinguished citizens, with their families. The party amounted to nearly three hundred persons. The day was spring-like, and all that conduced to the happiness of the guests had been provided by Captain Stockton and Mr. Secretary Gilmer.

The gun was loaded with a ball of over two hundred pounds, and charged with between thirty and forty pounds of powder, and had been fired several times. As the steamer was returning, and near to Mount Vernon, it was again discharged with a ball, and exploded. A cluster of persons stood around, and they were all either killed or badly wounded. Mr. Upshur, the secretary of state, Mr. Gilmer, secretary of the navy, Mr. Virgil Maxcy, formerly minister at the Hague, Commodore Kennon, and Mr. Gardner, of New York, were killed on the spot, and fifteen other persons badly wounded, and several of them mortally.

In the earlier days of the republic, it had become an established precedent, which nothing but party spirit had interfered with, that the president should be allowed to serve two terms. As the aspirants for office became more numerous and eager, and party spirit became paramount in the selection, this custom was found often to stand in the way of the cherished designs of the defeated party. It was therefore denounced as selfish, unpatriotic, and at variance with the spirit of the constitution. The objection was a popular one, and easily wrought up into ammunition for the small arms of noisy demagogues. It was adopted, as a watchword, by both of the leading parties. General Harrison, in accepting the nomination to the chief magistracy, had declared himself in favor of the principle, and pledged himself, in any case, not to stand as a candidate for reelection.

Mr. Tyler, having reached the presidency without the ordeal of a canvass for that office, had not been called upon to give a similar pledge. Nor, in assuming the mantle of his fallen chief, did he hold himself bound to carry his pledges, or fulfil his promises. He looked to a reelection. And some of his friends urged the point, with the apparent hope of securing a nomination.

Mr. Clay and Mr. Van Buren, who were put forth as the opposing candidates, by the two great parties, both took strong ground against this last favourite measure of Mr. Tyler, the annexation of Texas. Mr. Clay stated his objections thus, in a letter dated May 9, 1844: "I consider the annexation of Texas, at this time, without the assent of Mexico, as a measure compromising the national character, involving us certainly in a war with Mexico, probably with other foreign powers, dangerous to the integrity of the Union, inexpedient in the present financial condition of the country, and not called for by any general expression of public opinion." This may be taken as a fair indication of the general sentiment of the Whig party, who favoured the election of Mr. Clay.

Mr. Van Buren, in terms nearly as explicit as the above, set forth his objections to the measure, and arrayed himself, and the party of which he was the exponent, in direct hostility to the system of measures it was designed to promote. By mutual consent, it was made a sectional question. It had two aspects, a northern and a southern. It was originated and sustained for the purpose of extending the area of slavery, and preserving, to the peculiar institutions of the south, their preponderant influence in the councils of the nation. But "to extend the area of freedom" was the ostensible motive, the motto on the banner of all its supporters, both at the north and at the south.

In the elections of 1844, the parties were unusually divided. So many candidates claimed the support of the people, that it became very difficult to make a selection, without disturbing the party organization on which the whole depended. In the Democratic party, Mr. Van Buren, of New York, Mr. Cass, of Michigan,

Mr. Johnson, of Kentucky, Mr. Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, Mr. Woodbury, of New Hampshire, and several other less prominent names, took part in the competition. The convention assembled at Baltimore. Great difficulties were apprehended in coming at a nomination that should unite the strength of the party. But, acting upon the principle that in union only there is strength, they resolved to yield all personal and sectional considerations to the one paramount purpose of securing a triumph in the coming contest. Accordingly, after much caucusing and contriving, they concluded to abandon all their candidates, and take up a new one, who had not yet entered the course. Backed by the commendation of General Jackson, then about to take his departure from the conflicts and honours of life, James K. Polk, of Tennessee, received the nomination and pledges of the Baltimore convention for president, while George M. Dallas, of Pennsylvania, was honoured with the office of the vice-presidency.

The Whig party, at the same time, and with great unanimity, nominated their old champion, Henry Clay, of Kentucky, for president, and Theodore Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey, then chancellor of the university of New York, for vice-president. The prominent questions at issue were, the currency, the tariff, the annexation of Texas, the veto power, and the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands.

The canvass was the most exciting since the organization of the government. It was most fiercely contested on both sides, and almost every expedient was resorted to for the purpose of winning votes. Both parties were confident of success, and were animated by the greatest ardour and enthusiasm. The result was a complete triumph of the Democratic party, in the election of James K. Polk to the presidency, and of George M. Dallas to the vice-presidency, by a majority of sixty-five electoral votes.

James Knox Polk, the eleventh president of the United States, was born in Mecklenburgh county, North Carolina, on the 2d of November, 1795. He was the eldest of ten children. His ancestors emigrated from Ireland during the first part of the eighteenth century, and settled in the state of Maryland. A portion of the family removed, first to Pennsylvania, and about the year 1750 they located in North Carolina. In 1806, Major Samuel Polk, the father of James K. Polk, emigrated to Tennessee, and settled upon Duck River. It was here that young Polk endured the hardships of a border life, until his constitution, which was then quite delicate, came near giving way under the toil and fatigue to which he was exposed. Yielding to the persuasions of his son, Major Polk enabled him to enter the college at Chapel Hill, North Carolina, in 1815, where he graduated in three years, with the highest honours. He was distinguished at college for laborious application to his studies, and by a strict conformity to the regulations of the institution. He was always present at recitations, and invariably attended morning and evening prayers in the chapel.

When he completed his collegiate education, he entered the office of the celebrated Felix Grundy to prepare himself for the practice of the law. He commenced the arduous duties of his profession in 1820, in the county of Maury, and at once assumed a high position at the bar.

In 1821, he was clerk to the legislature of Tennessee. His political career commenced in 1823, when he was elected a member of the legislature of Tennessee. In 1825, he was elevated to a seat in congress. He was reelected every succeeding two years, until 1839. In 1835, he was speaker of the house of representatives, to which position he was reelected in 1837. In 1839, he was chosen governor of Tennessee, and in 1844, president of the United States.

It is worthy of remark, in this connection, that, while Mr. Clay and the Whig party professed stern opposition to the annexation of Texas, and the consequent extension of the slave interest, protesting that it would inevitably lead to a war with Mexico, and the still further enlargement of the area of slavery, the "liberty party," so called, holding in several states the balance of power, and being fully competent to decide the fate of the canvass, refused all and every solicitation, on the part of the real friends of freedom, adhered to their hopeless and suicidal purpose of sustaining their own candidates, and thus virtually procured the election of a man pledged to go against them on every point of their political creed, in preference to one who was equally pledged to sustain and carry out its fundamental article.

Of Mr. Polk's antagonist in this struggle, the following is presented as the voluntary eulogium of his political enemies:—

"Mr. Clay, the unsuccessful candidate of the Whig party for the presidency, had for a long period been an aspirant for that office. As early as 1824, he was supported for that position by many warm admirers. Perhaps no man in the Union has won the attachment of so many ardent and enthusiastic personal friends as

Mr. Clay. No disaster can dampen their zeal, and each successive defeat only has the effect of attaching them still more closely to his person and his fortunes. He is, indeed, a noble leader. His bold and impassioned eloquence, his affability and fascination of manner, and his unwavering devotion to his friends, altogether constitute him one of the most influential statesmen which this country has ever produced.

"His patriotism has been too often put to the test to admit of doubt. Upon two occasions he has interposed his form between the exasperated citizens of the north and south. When the excitement raged with frightful violence before the admission of Missouri, and threatened to destroy the Union itself, with a promptness and sincerity which proved that a patriot's heart beat within his bosom, he poured oil upon the troubled waters, and assisted to allay the storm. And now, when danger thickens, and a dark and threatening cloud hovers over the temple of liberty, his tall and venerable form is again seen protecting from sacrilege and violence our glorious constitution, and in tones which are tremulous with age, he implores our distracted countrymen to pause in their career, and save the American confederacy from the frightful horrors which must flow from its dissolution."*

The treaty of April, 1844, had laid open to the world the plans and wishes of the two republics. The European powers looked upon the measure with an unfavourable eye. Though neither possessing nor claiming any right to interfere, they would gladly have prevented such an accession to the territory of the United States, especially on its southern border. Overtures had been made, on the part of Texas, to England and to France, but they had not been met. The United States, after a season of merely prudential delay, had extended the right hand of fellowship, and was now negotiating a full matrimonial alliance.

The representatives of England and France both forbade the bans, by a formal protest in the name of their respective governments. It was, however, only a paper protest, and never intended to be carried any further.

President Tyler brought the subject again before congress, in his last message of December, 1844, urging it upon their attention as a matter of paramount importance. Immediately after the organization of the two houses, joint resolutions were introduced for effecting the measure, and it continued for three months, the all-absorbing topic of the session. After a spirited but unavailing opposition, the resolution passed both houses, and on the 3d of March, the very last day of his official term, received the signature of the president, and became a law.

The second of the joint resolutions provided, that if the president of the United States shall, in his judgment and discretion, deem it most advisable, instead of proceeding to submit the first resolution to the republic of Texas as an overture on the part of the United States for admission, to negotiate with that republic, then, that a state to be formed out of the present republic of Texas, with suitable extent and boundaries, and with two representatives in congress until the next apportionment of representation, shall be admitted into the Union by virtue of this act, on an equal footing with the existing states, as soon as the terms and conditions of such admission, and the cession of the remaining Texan territory to the United States, shall be agreed upon by the governments of Texas and the United States; and the sum of one hundred thousand dollars is hereby appropriated to defray the expenses of missions and negotiations to agree upon the terms of said admission and cession, either by treaty to be submitted to the senate, or by articles to be submitted to the two houses of congress, as the president may direct.

It is a singular circumstance, that, although he had scarcely half a day remaining of his magistracy, President Tyler availed himself of the proviso here presented, which was manifestly intended for his successor, and, withholding the overture made in the first resolution, commissioned and despatched a messenger, that very night, to proceed to Texas with a new proposition. He had scarcely passed the boundary of the District of Columbia, when Mr. Tyler ceased to be president.

On the 6th of March, Mr. Almonte, the Mexican minister, protested against this act of the United States, reiterated the right of Mexico still to claim and recover, by any means in her power, her revolted province, and demanded his passports.

But annexation was not yet consummated. The consent of the people of Texas was required to the arrangement. Her governor, who had hoped for more liberal terms than the United States had been disposed to grant, seemed inclined to reopen negotiations with the powers of Europe, which had a twofold purpose to achieve; viz.: curbing the growing power of the American confederacy, and checking the growth of slavery. Preliminary conditions were submitted to the envoys of England and France, for a treaty of peace between Mexico and Texas, providing that Mexico should acknowledge the independence of Texas, and that Texas should bind herself, as the condition of such acknowledgment, to refuse all future projects of annexation, and remain forever separate and independent.

These preliminaries were forwarded to Mexico, and laid before the government, Herrera being the president, supported by a strong array of French and English influence. Under the pressure of the crisis, which was felt to be imminent and inevitable, they were instantly met by a full assent on the part of the Mexican congress, and the necessary authority given to open negotiations on the subject.

This looked, for the moment, like a sudden reversal of the whole scheme. But, in all this matter, the people of Texas had not been consulted. It was now submitted to the senate of that state for ratification, fortified by an official intimation, that war would be the consequence, if it was not immediately accepted. It was, nevertheless, unanimously rejected.

A few weeks after, the existing government of Texas gave its consent to the proposal for annexation, as set forth in the joint resolutions of the American congress, by the unanimous vote of both houses, and the official approval of the president.

THE WAR WITH MEXICO.

It has been seen that the apprehension of Mexican invasion on the part of Texas was so great, that her commissioners refused to enter upon the treaty of 1844, unless supported by the actual presence of the United States army on their frontier, and the United States navy on their coast. And the fear of Mr. Tyler was so great, that he should lose the glory of having achieved so desirable an acquisition, that he overcame all the scruples of neutrality, and, without declaration of war, or any other intimation of the national purpose, prepared to plant a hostile force on the borders of Mexico.

It was in this complicated state of its foreign relations that Mr. Polk entered upon the administration of the government. Strongly committed to the acquisition of Texas, and even carrying his views so far as to look upon that country as having already belonged to the United States, and now only to be "reannexed," he was prepared to follow vigorously in the footsteps of his predecessor.

The rejection of the Tyler treaty rendered unnecessary the immediate presence of the United States arms within the borders of Texas. But, as the negotiations were still going on, under the joint resolutions, Mexico continued to maintain the same threatening attitude toward Texas, and to refuse the customary diplomatic intercourse with the United States.

In the mean time, General Zachary Taylor, then having command in the south-western department, had been ordered, by a letter from the adjutant-general, bearing date March 21, to hold a portion of the troops under his immediate command in readiness to move into Texas, at any time, upon further orders from the department. The first ostensible motive of this management was the suppression of any hostile movement on the part of the Indian tribes that infested the Texan border. The better to understand his position in this respect, General Taylor was directed to put himself in immediate correspondence with the authorities of Texas, and with any diplomatic agent of the United States who might be residing therein.

On the 28th of May, these orders were recapitulated, in a confidential communication from the war department, with the following clause, indicating another object besides the protection of Texas against her Indian neighbours:—

"Should the territories of Texas be invaded by a foreign power, and you shall receive certain intelligence through her functionaries of that fact, after her convention shall have acceded to the terms of annexation contained in the resolutions of the congress of the United States, you will at once employ, in the most effective manner your judgment may dictate, the forces under your command, for the defence of these territories, and to expel the invaders."

On the 23d of June, 1845, the government of Texas accepted, on its part, the terms offered for annexation, leaving the final action to a convention of the people, which had been duly called for that purpose.

On the 28th of June, Mr. Donelson, the American charge d'affaires, wrote to General Taylor, directing him, in pursuance of previous orders from Washington, to proceed without delay to the western frontier of Texas, in order to give that protection against the menaced invasion of Mexico, which the president of the United States had offered. He accordingly took immediate measures for the removal of his troops. Seven companies of the second dragoons, the cavalry of his command, marched by land to San Antonio, while his infantry, composed of the third and fourth regiments, moved to New Orleans, to be transported by water to Aransas Bay. At the same time, Commodore Connor, commanding the ship of war Falmouth, being ordered to the Gulf of Mexico, took his station off Vera Cruz, the other vessels of the squadron occupying various positions along the coast.

On the 4th of July, the Texan convention gave a unanimous assent to the terms of annexation, by which, though a formal vote of admission was yet to be passed by the congress of the United States, the act was fully consummated.

On the 25th of July, General Taylor, with eight companies of infantry, arrived at Aransas Bay, and formed a temporary encampment on St. Joseph's Island. Finding the place wholly unsuitable for a permanent post, he soon removed to Corpus Christi, a point immediately west of the mouth of the Nueces, then the farthest limit of Texan population.

During the progress of these events, great changes had taken place in Mexico. The revolution of December, 1844, had deposed and banished Santa Anna, and placed Herrera at the head of the government, through whose agency it was intimated to the United States government, that the customary intercourse might now be renewed between the two countries. The result of this was the appointment of Mr. John Slidell as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Mexico, with full power to negotiate a settlement of all difficulties then existing between the two nations. At the same time, the American squadron was ordered to retire from Vera Cruz.

The announcement of this approach to a pacific arrangement highly exasperated some of the Mexican agitators, who immediately declared the purpose of overturning the government of Herrera, in favour of some one who could better maintain the dignity of the republic. This movement was headed by Paredes, who had been the instrument of placing Herrera in power. He was in command of a considerable force at San Luis Potosi. He was ordered to break up his cantonments, and distribute his troops to several specified posts. Instead of doing this, however, he immediately, on the 15th of December, pronounced against Herrera, and moved his columns upon the capital. On the 30th, Herrera resigned the presidency. Paredes, a few days after, entered the city as military dictator, and set about organizing a government for himself.

Mr. Slidell arrived at Mexico about a month before the resignation of Herrera. That functionary, perceiving that his popularity would be jeopardized by seeming to yield to the claims of the United States, now refused to receive the minister, on the ground that he had been appointed and commissioned as a minister plenipotentiary, with full powers to settle and adjust all disputes and differences between the two republics; while Mexico, unwilling, at that time, to go into other questions, could only receive him as a commissioner ad hoc, to settle the Texas question. By admitting him as a full envoy, they would be sanctioning the complete reestablishment of diplomatic relations: the matter of Texas, her revolt and annexation, would be complicated with mere pecuniary claims, and commercial arrangements, and thus the international relations become more hopelessly entangled than ever.

As no such intimation had been given, in connection with their consent to receive a minister from the United States, this objection on the part of the Mexican government, so frivolous in itself, was regarded only as another of a long series of insulting and abusive equivocations, by which the forbearance of their northern neighbours had been severely tested, and which it would be pusillanimous longer to endure. It was therefore resolved to put matters immediately in a train to enforce an adjustment of every claim. General Taylor was, accordingly, ordered to make instant preparation to advance from Corpus Christi to the Rio Grande, thus taking forcible possession of territory not clearly belonging to Texas, and peremptorily and steadily claimed by Mexico, as having never been recognized as a part of that province. The squadron in the Gulf of Mexico was, at the same time, ordered to be considerably increased.*

Notwithstanding these preparations, Mr. Slidell was directed not to leave Mexico without making another attempt to obtain a hearing from the new government. He had removed to Jalapa. From that place he addressed a note to the minister of foreign relations,

* The Gulf squadron varied at different times. It consisted, however, of the following, in part:—

The Lawrence,	44 guns.	The Somers,	16 guns.
The Cumberland,	44 "	Steamer Princeton,	10 "
The Potomac,	44 "	" Mississippi,	10 "
The Raritan,	44 "	" Spitfire,	3 "
The St. Mary's,	20 "	" Vixen,	3 "
The Falmouth,	20 "	" McLane,	3 "

And a considerable number of gunboats.

Mr. Castillo y Lauzas, setting forth his credentials and asking to be received. On the 12th of March, 1846, an answer was received, refusing the request of the minister, and intimating that preparations were making for open war. The position was assumed that the United States had already taken the aggressive, by locating their troops at Corpus Christi, and menacing the coast of Mexico with an armed squadron. To this Mr. Slidell replied in full, setting forth the views and claims of his own government, and, demanding his passports, left Mexico on the 1st of April.

Before proceeding with the detail of affairs on the southern border, it will be necessary to take a brief notice of another question, which now arose into considerable importance, touching the foreign relations of the United States. This was the question of boundary on her north-western frontier, commonly designated the Oregon question.

The purchase of Louisiana, in 1803, was understood to include all the territory lying west of the Mississippi, and north of the forty-second degree of north latitude, with certain defined boundaries to the south of that line. This was fully confirmed and established in the treaty of 1819. Previous to this transfer, the American title had been secured to all the territory lying east of the Rocky Mountains, and south of the forty-ninth parallel. It was contended that the Spanish claim, now transferred to the United States, extended, on the west of the mountains, to latitude 61° north, but that, by a convention between the United States and Russia, the boundary between the two powers was fixed at 54° 40'. The British, on the other hand, claimed that part lying west of the Rocky Mountains, and north of the forty-sixth parallel, or the latitude of Columbia River. The American claim to the whole of this territory (the part in dispute being called Oregon) was based upon purchase, and priority of discovery, Captain Gray, in the ship Columbia, from Boston, having first discovered and entered the Columbia River, in May, 1792. The British claimed the northern portion by right of possession, having a few trading stations somewhere in that direction. The question had been held in suspense for several years, under a treaty of joint occupancy, which was now about to terminate.

In connection with this Oregon question, Mr. Polk, in the judgment of his political friends, committed a fatal error, amounting to what Talleyrand would call a "blunder," and which, having the effect of alienating some of his warmest friends, greatly embarrassed his administration throughout. In his first communication to the American people, he proclaimed to the world, that our title to the country of the Oregon was "clear and unquestionable." "Nor will it become in a less degree my duty," said he, in his inaugural address, "to assert and maintain, by all constitutional means, the right of the United States to that portion of our territory which lies beyond the Rocky Mountains. Our title to the country of Oregon is clear and unquestionable, and already are our people preparing to perfect that title by occupying it with their wives and children."

This statement was reiterated in language equally plain and unequivocal, in his first message to congress, in which he stated that a proposition of compromising having been offered to Great Britain, and rejected, it had been withdrawn, by his direction, and the American "title to the whole Oregon territory asserted, and, as is believed, maintained by irrefragable facts and arguments." The proposition, thus offered and rejected, repeated the offer of the forty-ninth parallel of latitude as a boundary, which had been made by two preceding administrations, but without conceding, as they had done, the free navigation of the Columbia River.

In the same message, Mr. Polk reannounced a principle put forth by Mr. Monroe, during his presidency, which he thought should control the action of the United States.

"Near a quarter of a century ago," said he, "the principle was distinctly announced to the world in the annual message of one of my predecessors, that 'the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power.' This principle will apply with greatly increased force, should any European power attempt to establish any new colony in North America. In the existing circumstances of the world, the present is deemed a proper occasion to reiterate and reaffirm the principle avowed by Mr. Monroe, and to state my cordial concurrence in its wisdom and sound policy. The reassertion of this principle, especially in reference to North America, is at this day but the promulgation of a policy which no European power should cherish the disposition to resist."

The "blunder," which Mr. Polk is thought to have made, in relation to this matter, is well set forth in the following pertinent question of his biographer: "If it is the unchangeable policy of this country to prevent Europeans from colonizing any portion of this continent, it applies to territory to which we have no claim, as well as to that which belongs to us; and if we cannot suffer them to colonize parts of the American continent to which we have no claim, how can we surrender territory to which our title is "clear and unquestionable"?

Whether the action of this administration was a political blunder, or, in any sense, an error either of judgment or of fact, we shall not stop to consider, but proceed with the history of its negotiation and settlement.

A determination to enforce the claim of the United States to the territory of Oregon had been solemnly announced in various forms by the government of the United States. The recommendation contained in the president's message to congress, to give notice to Great Britain that the joint occupancy of the territory of Oregon should cease, was discussed at great length in congress. A debate, remarkable for its ability and the display of varied and extensive acquirements, followed the introduction of resolutions giving the twelve months' notice, in pursuance of the convention of 1827. Masterly inactivity was proclaimed by the distinguished senator from South Carolina, as the true policy of the United States. Fears were manifested that the country would be involved in a war with Great Britain, resulting in the destruction of our commerce, and financial embarrassment and ruin. Southern representatives gave indications of a willingness to surrender a portion of the territory, to destroy the growing ascendancy of the north. The characteristics of the members from the two great sections of the confederacy seemed to have changed, and impassioned eloquence and fiery denunciation breathed through every sentence which was uttered by the representatives from the Northern States; while a temporizing, if not a timid, policy controlled many of the representatives from the south. After a long and protracted discussion, the following resolutions passed the house of representatives on the 9th of February, 1846:—

"Resolved, By the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, that the president of the United States cause notice to be given to the government of Great Britain, that the convention between the United States of America and Great Britain, concerning the territory of the north-west coast of America, west of the Stony or Rocky Mountains, of the 6th day of August, 1827, signed at London, shall be annulled and abrogated twelve months after giving said notice.

"Resolved, That nothing herein contained is intended to interfere with the right and discretion of the proper authorities of the two contracting parties, to renew or pursue negotiations for an amicable settlement of the controversy respecting the Oregon territory."

This was afterwards amended so as to leave it at the discretion of the president, whether or not to give such a notice, and thus to throw upon his administration all the responsibility of the measure and its consequences. In this form it passed both houses of congress.

This responsibility Mr. Polk immediately assumed, and, by an official communication through his minister at London, dated April 28, 1846, announced that, "at the end of twelve months from and after the delivery of these presents by the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States at London to her Britannic majesty, or her majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, the said convention shall be entirely annulled and abrogated."

This was soon followed by an offer, upon the part of Mr. Packenham, to settle the question upon the basis of the proposition made by Mr. Polk in 1845. On the 10th of June, 1846, the executive transmitted the proposal to the senate, and solicited the advice of that body as to the course he should pursue. He stated in his message that the opinions which he had expressed in December, 1845, were unchanged; and that if the senate should decline, by the constitutional majority, to advise him to accept the proposition, he should reject it. If, on the contrary, they should, by the majority required to ratify a treaty, advise him to accept the offer of the British government, he would do so.

When Mr. Polk asserted that the title of the United States to the whole Oregon territory was "clear and unquestionable," and asserted his determination to maintain it, he spoke as an American, acting on his own convictions, which, as he several times afterwards declared, both publicly and privately, were never changed. When he passively referred the whole matter to congress, waiving his own cherished convictions of the "clear and unquestionable" rights of his country, and consenting to hold his official responsibility subject to the dictation of a partisan majority in congress, he spoke as a southern man, more watchful of the "peculiar institutions of the south" than of the acknowledged rights of the nation. We utterly repudiate all party and sectional views on this subject. But he must be more than blind who does not see a marked and uniform difference in the action of the south on all questions of territory, graduated by position only. Timid to an extreme, and "pliant to the very point of cowardice," when a claim of Great Britain is made to a portion of northern territory, which would of necessity be free, — they neither hesitate, nor suffer any one else to hesitate, in swallowing up whole empires of tropical territory, which, in their view, is entitled to the blessings of slavery.

The question thus referred to congress was soon decided. Declamation gave way to action, and a resolution was immediately passed, advising the president to accept the proposition of Mr. Packenham. On that basis, a treaty was accordingly entered into between the two countries. It was signed by Mr. Buchanan, secretary of state, and Mr. Packenham, the British minister at Washington, on the 15th of June, 1846, and duly ratified by the senate a few days thereafter. Thus ended a question of long standing and some importance, in the settlement of which Great Britain obtained all that she claimed of territory, with the additional advantage of the right forever to the free navigation of the Columbia River. An effort was made by Mr. Niles, of Connecticut, to restrict this right to a definite period, to terminate in 1863. But it was defeated by a close party vote, the southern interest going strongly against it.

Before resuming the narrative of the Mexican war, it will be proper to state briefly the grounds of complaint against her sister republic, on the part of the United States. These consisted of spoliations of our commerce, violations of the liberty and rights of individual citizens of the United States, and the refusal, or unexplained delay, to pay just and acknowledged claims, after they had been duly ascertained and verified. In the face of treaties of amity and alliance, these outrages and spoliations continued, till, in the language of President Jackson, in his message to congress, on the 8th of February, 1837, "the length of time since some of the injuries had been committed, the repeated and unavailing applications for redress, the wanton character of some of the outrages upon the persons and property of our citizens, upon the officers and flag of the United States, independent of recent insults to this government, by the late extraordinary Mexican minister, would justify, in the eyes of all nations, immediate war."

The insult to the nation, specially alluded to in the above extract, was in the conduct and correspondence of Mr. Gorostiza, who, but a short time before, had abruptly terminated his mission, on the refusal of the United States government to comply with his peremptory demands, and published a portion of his official correspondence, appealing to the American people against the acts of their own government.

The revolt of Texas, the deep interest felt and manifested in her success, the part borne in the struggle by American citizens who had emigrated thither, and the early disposition of the people of the south to look to the ultimate adoption of the revolted province, as a member of the northern confederacy, greatly exasperated the feelings of the Mexican people towards the United States, and gave them never-failing pretexts for petty insults and indignities, as well as for delays and refusals to recognize just and acknowledged claims. Or perhaps it would be rendering most exact justice to the case, to say, that these circumstances furnished excellent material for agitation and excitement to the endless succession of parties and partisans, by which that unhappy country was distracted, and kept in a state of civil war, for more than a quarter of a century. This was the true source of the evil. Mexico, though independent of Spain during that period, has never had an established government. The rule has passed in rapid succession from hand to hand of her military chieftains, each one in his turn a usurper, and no one feeling bound to recognize the act of his predecessors, or to acknowledge his own, so long as he could successfully win time by quibbling diplomacy. It cannot be denied that the United States had borne, with the most commendable patience, a long series of injuries and insults, which, with any other nation, under the existing international code, and the prevailing views of national honor, would have rendered a resort to arms unavoidable. Whether, in the case of so feeble an adversary, a nation so "divided against herself" as scarcely to possess the individuality requisite for national accountability, some other course than open war might not have been wisely resorted to, it is too late now to consider. It is to be hoped, however, that the time is not far distant, when such matters will be differently adjusted; when equals among the nations, or those in the full possession of their faculties, will estimate human life too highly to sacrifice them by thousands in the settlement of pecuniary claims, or to fill up their breaches with the mangled corpses of their subjects, and magnanimously consent to refer to arbitration all the questions which cannot be settled by simple negotiation. It may well be doubted if any of the wars of the nations have paid for themselves. In the case before us, the United States have sacrificed more than twenty-five thousand lives of their own people, and one hundred and thirty millions of money,* to say nothing of the irreparable demoralization attendant upon the course of war, not only in the camp and the march, the sack of town and city, the legalized plunder of the defenceless, the familiarity with scenes of cruelty and violence, the vulgar and beastly abuse of the mere power of self-indulgence, and the long absence from all the hallowed associations and wholesome restraints of home, but in those long-deserted, and, for the most part, desolated houses, the absence of paternal authority and guardianship, the sundering of natural ties, the interruption of household order, the letting down of domestic discipline, and all the long train of moral and social evils which flow from the dismemberment of the family state, and the rude and unnatural putting asunder of what God has joined together. Of these and many kindred evils, the inseparable accompaniments of a state of war, there is no arithmetic, no scale by which to estimate them. To offset them with dollars, with territories—though they be richer than Golconda or Ophir—with empires —or with that singularly elastic Protean fantasy, national honour—how is it wiser, on the part of a statesman or a people, than for a man to take “the whole world in exchange for his soul”?

There was now a casus belli on both sides. Mexico, by refusing to receive Mr. Slidell, had declined negotiation upon the matters in dispute, and virtually said, “Seek your remedy in your own way.” The United States, by the annexation of Texas, and the planting of a military force on her border, had provoked Mexico to this attitude, and assumed the war then existing between Mexico and her revolted province. At least, these were the views set forth by the responsible managers in this great conflict. Without attempting to judge between them, or to decide which of them was the actual aggressor, we will proceed to narrate the leading incidents of the war.

On the announcement of Mr. Slidell’s departure from Mexico, General Taylor was ordered to advance to the Rio Bravo del Norte, which was the farthest limit claimed by any of the extensionists of the United States, or Texas. On the 11th of March, 1846, he moved from Corpus Christi, having under his immediate command about three thousand five hundred men. In pursuance of authority, previously vested in him, he made immediate requisition upon the governor of Louisiana for four regiments of infantry, and upon the governor of Texas for two regiments of infantry and two of cavalry, to be brought into the field as soon as practicable. Similar requisitions were also soon after made.

On the 28th of March, the little army, somewhat diminished in numbers by the necessity of protecting the posts in their rear, arrived on the left bank of the Rio del Norte, opposite to Matamoras, where it encamped on a commanding position, and commenced the erection of works of defence.

The Mexican forces at Matamoras assumed a beligerent attitude, and, on the 12th of April, General Ampudia, then in command, notified General Taylor to break up his camp within twenty-four hours, and to retire beyond the Nueces River, and, in the event of his failure to comply with these demands, announced that arms, and arms alone, must decide the question. But no open act of hostility was committed until the 24th of April. On that day, General Arista, who had succeeded to the command of the Mexican forces, communicated to General Taylor that “he considered hostilities commenced, and should prosecute them.” A party of dragoons, of sixty-three men and officers,

* Official statistics show that the territories of New Mexico and California cost the Union $ 124,038,353 65 cts. in the expenses of the war and the indemnity paid for the territory acquired. And there will be not less than $ 6,000,000 in bounties, pensions, and a legion of claims yet to come up for adjustment. Besides which, we have the following statistics of the loss of human life in the war: The number of deaths returned by the officers of the army is 12,878; 9,749 were discharged for disability, of whom at least half have died, say 4,874; 73,260 men were mustered into service during the war, and 50,573 were mustered out; of the residue, amounting to 22,687, 20,072 were returned as dead, discharged, or deserted, and the difference, 2,615, are supposed to be dead; of those mustered out of service, it is estimated that 10 per cent., or 5,057, have since died, making a fearful aggregate, thus:—

Returned dead,	12,878
Half the disabled,	4,874
Missing,	2,615
10 per cent. of the remnant of the army, (which is a very small allowance.)	5,057
	<hr/> 25,424

To this should be added the unascertained and immeasurable amount of domestic misery, pauperism, starvation, and suicide, among the thousands of wives made widows, children made orphans, and parents made childless, by the oft-repeated decimations of this relentless Moloch.

under command of Captain Thornton, were, on the same day, despatched from the American camp up the Rio del Norte, on its left bank, to ascertain whether the Mexican troops had crossed, or were preparing to cross, the river, and "became engaged with a large body of these troops, and, after a short affair, in which some sixteen were killed and wounded, were surrounded and compelled to surrender."

In pursuance of the purpose of General Arista to prosecute hostilities with vigour, he had ordered General Torrejon, with two thousand five hundred men, to cross the river a few miles above the American camp. It was in watching the movements of this body that Captain Thornton and his company were surprised and captured. Preparations were also made to pass over another division of the Mexican army, below the camp, to form a junction with General Torrejon. General Taylor was aware of these movements, and supposed that their intention was either to surround his position, or to attack his depot at Point Isabel.

Hastening the completion of his defences, which he regarded sufficiently strong to resist any force then opposed to him, he left them, with a garrison of three hundred men, under the command of Major Brown, and marched, with his main force, to Point Isabel. Not meeting with any opposition, nor seeing any traces of the Mexican detachments, he proposed remaining at that post until the arrival of some expected supplies and recruits.

On the morning of the 3d of May, at an early hour, General Arista opened his batteries on the American position, and was immediately answered by a heavy and successful cannonade from Major Brown. The first Mexican battery was silenced in thirty minutes. The firing was then renewed from other points, and kept up during that and several succeeding days, with little effect on either side. On the 4th, the main Mexican army crossed the Rio Grande, with a view to securing a position in the rear of the American fort, and cutting off the communication with Point Isabel. Thus surrounded, and severely cannonaded on every side, for several days, the little garrison bravely defended itself against all odds, and kept the enemy at bay. On the 5th, Major Brown was mortally wounded by a shell. One other man was killed, and thirteen wounded.

The heavy and constant cannonading at Fort Brown was heard at Point Isabel, and induced General Taylor to hasten his return. Without any increase of his force, beyond what was necessary to complete the garrison at Point Isabel, he took up his line of march on the 7th.

General Arista was impressed with the idea that the Americans, though skilful skirmishers, and formidable in forest warfare, could easily be beaten in open conflict with regular troops. He therefore determined to dispute the passage of General Taylor by offering him battle. His position was well chosen, at Palo Alto, about nine miles from Matamoras. His force was six thousand of the best troops in Mexico. Its left wing, composed of regular cavalry, occupied the road, and rested on a thicket of chapparal, while the infantry in line, with twelve pieces of artillery posted at intervals, extended a mile and a half across the plain. On the right was formed the rancho cavalry, their rear covered by a thicket of chapparal on the south of the road.

On the 8th, about noon, General Taylor came up, his forces numbering about two thousand. After a few moments' halt for refreshment, he formed his column, and, curtained by two squadrons in advance, moved forward. As soon as he was within cannon range, the Mexican batteries opened upon him. The column was then formed in line for battle. Colonel Twiggs commanded the right, composed of three companies of infantry and Major Ringgold's artillery. Duncan's battalion of light artillery, on foot, and the 8th regiment of infantry, were on the left, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Belknap.

At two o'clock, the Americans advanced in line, immediately after which the work of death commenced; the Mexicans opening their batteries as soon as they could be made to tell with effect. They were answered, promptly and powerfully, by the American artillery, still advancing. The cannonade was kept up more than an hour; the light troops, on either side, taking no part in the contest, though some part of the Mexican line suffered severely from Ringgold's well-directed battery. At length a movement was made to turn the American right. A detachment of cavalry and infantry, under General Torrejon, supported by two guns, turned the lagoon, and, coming up from the right and rear, approached within musket range. This movement was immediately opposed and driven back by Colonel Twiggs.

Meanwhile, the dry grass of the prairie had taken fire, and, fanned by a gentle breeze, the sheet of flame rolled away to the American left, partially concealing the combatants from each other. This occasioned a temporary suspension, during which General Arista changed the disposition of his forces, so as to avoid the galling fire of the American artillery. General Taylor, who noticed the movement, made a corresponding change in his position, so that, on resuming battle, after an hour's cessation, Ringgold's and Duncan's guns told with greater effect than before on the enemy's ranks.

Unable to stand still and inactive under so destructive a fire, the Mexican troops now demanded to be led to the onset, or to be allowed to fall back. Yielding to their desire, Arista moved his whole right wing to turn the American left, under cover of the cloud of smoke arising from the burning prairie. At the same time, he ordered an attack of the right, by a large body of cavalry. A momentary rift in the wavering volume of smoke revealed this movement to Duncan, who, with the consent of Colonel Belknap, immediately galloped the two sections of his battery to the left, wheeling round the cloud of fire, which had curtailed his movements, with a celerity which astonished the enemy. A severe action here took place, Duncan maintaining his position, and making fearful havoc in the Mexican ranks. The battle now became general. But it was of short duration. The fire of the Americans, being deliberate and well-aimed, was exceedingly destructive, while that of the Mexicans was hasty, wild, and ineffective. The grape from the light artillery, which was movable, and almost ubiquitous, literally mowed down the advancing corps, till, squadron after squadron, they halted, turned, and fled. Repulsed, in the same masterly manner, on the left, the whole line soon after gave way, and retired from the field. Night having set in, and it being quite dark, their retreat was unmolested.

In this engagement, the first of a series of uninterrupted and unparalleled successes, the American army lost nine killed in battle, and forty-seven wounded, several of whom afterward died of their wounds. Major Ringgold, distinguished as the leader of the flying artillery, to the organization and discipline of which he had devoted much time and energy, was one of the marked victims of this conflict. Captain Page, of the 4th infantry, was another. Made prominent by their stations as officers, they were honoured and mourned by the nation, as well as by a large circle of admiring and devoted friends; while the unnamed and unrecorded, who fell by their side, were equally lamented in their own bereaved circles of relatives and friends. It is the fate of war, that the leaders, if they survive the battle, win the laurels of victory; and if they fall, are honoured with a requiem, a monument, and a place on the enduring rolls of history; while the brave hearts and strong arms that obey their commands, giving and receiving the death-dealing blows, and dying almost unnoticed on the fields they have won, are unknown and unremembered, except in the homes that are made desolate by their fall.

The Mexican loss has been variously stated, from two hundred and fifty-two as officially reported by General Arista, to more than five hundred. As we take the official return of General Taylor, in the one case, candour compels us to admit that of General Arista, on the other; and our natural repugnance to wholesale slaughter comes in strongly in favour of the admission. For, in our view, all Central America, to the Isthmus of Panama, would not compensate for the ravages of this one battle.

Both armies encamped near the field on the following night. At early dawn, on the morning of the 9th, General Arista moved on to Resaca de la Palma. Here he placed himself in a strong position, having been reinforced by the arrival of two thousand infantry and a strong body of cavalry. His forces were skilfully arranged on both sides of a ravine, which traversed the route of the American army, and through which there were only two narrow passes; the road from Point Isabel to Matamoras being one of them. A thick growth of chapparal, on both sides of the road, and all around the ravine, concealed the position and force of the enemy, and made the movement of General Taylor necessarily a cautious and doubtful one. The road pass was protected by a battery of three guns at its northern entrance, facing the American advance, and four in the rear; both of them strongly flanked by heavy bodies of infantry. The cavalry, unable to act in such a position, was posted in strong masses in the rear.

As a pitched battle was impossible in such a position, General Taylor divided his force into small parties of skirmishers. A picked corps of two hundred and twenty men, under command of Captains McCall and Smith, accompanied by Walker's Rangers, and a small party of dragoons under Ridgeley, formed the advanced guard. Ridgeley's guns, planted on the right of the road, within three hundred yards of the pass, opened a lively fire, which was briskly returned, but without effect on either side; the intervening chapparal preventing even an attempt at an accurate aim. McCall and Smith, pressing forward on the left and right, dislodged the Mexicans of the first line from their positions on the northern side of the ravine. A brisk skirmish ensued; other detachments pressing through the thicket, on the right and left, the action became general. The nature of the ground prevented the use of any other artillery than Ridgeley's battery, which, from the intervening chapparal, was of little effect. There was no position in which a line could be arrayed. Each officer took position, and led his command, as he could, battling, in separate independent squadrons, with any portion of the enemy that could be reached. All was apparent confusion; yet, as there was one spirit of advance and action pervading the whole, there was a general harmony in the attack, which made it scarcely less effective than a regular onset. The thicket was ablaze with the incessant discharges of fire-arms. A skirmish here, a hand-to-hand encounter there, a series of pêle-mêle assaults and repulses, charges and counter charges,—such was the opening of the battle of Resaca de la Palma.

While the action continued in this manner, the Mexican artillery kept up a destructive fire from their batteries on either side of the road pass. That on the northern side, though somewhat checked by the quick discharges of Ridgeley's guns, was most troublesome, and General Taylor resolved to silence it. With this view, he ordered Captain May to charge and take it. "I will do it," replied May; and, turning to his men, he said, "Remember your regiment, and follow your officers." Dashing down the road, at full gallop, to execute this order, Ridgeley, who saw what he was at, called out to him, saying, "Stop, Charley, let me draw their fire for you," and instantly poured in a heavy charge of canister, to which the Mexican battery made full reply. The gallant May put spurs to his horse, and, followed by his dragoons, overrode the battery, dispersed the artillery-men at the guns, and instantly rallying the few men that were left, and seizing General De la Vega, who was entangled in the mêlée, retired under a severe fire from the second line of Mexican infantry.

Meanwhile, Ridgeley, who, as May was in front, could no longer act from his position, had followed at a gallop, and planted his guns at the road pass, by the side of those just abandoned by the Mexicans, ready to defend it at all hazards. The whole American force now pressed forward, and pushing into the chapparal, and beating through the ravine, engaged, in the same irregular manner as before, with the entire Mexican force on the other side. The struggle was severe and well contested, but not of long continuance.

Disputing, in small parties, the American advance till their last gun was captured, the Mexicans finally gave way on all sides, and took to flight. They were followed in close pursuit, and driven, in broken masses, into the chapparal, and over the Rio Grande. As the pursuers came up to the bank, the batteries at Matamoras opened fire upon them. The guns at Fort Brown replied, by heavy discharges upon the upper ferry, at which the fugitives were crossing. But, night coming on, the cannonading ceased, and, under favour of the darkness, the vanquished fled unmolested, and the conquerors sought repose in their tents.

The loss, in this battle, was about fifty slain, and more than a hundred wounded, on the American side. That of the Mexicans is unknown, but is supposed to have been very great. It is estimated by some at a thousand men. The estimate is not extravagant, if we include those lost in attempting to cross the river. A Mexican narrative of the battle says, "The defeat having taken place, the dispersion became general. The soldiers sought the river in all directions, not believing themselves safe while they were on the other side. A large part of the army having reached the crossing at Auacuitas, the confusion and trampling on each other were astonishing. They began to dispute for the preference in being ferried over in the only two boats that were found. The obstinacy of every one increased the difficulty. The boats were detained, in pushing off from the bank, by the efforts of the men in them to get rid of those who rushed in to take their places. Fright spread the idea that the pursuing enemy approached. The disorder increased. The want of transports rendered desperate the miserable fugitives, who, to escape from one danger, rushed into another. They sought some ford which saved them, or threw themselves into the river with their clothes and arms, and almost all were drowned. A very limited number, if in fact any, safely reached the other shore. The army was diminished to one fifth of its original strength." Beside this heavy loss in their effective force of men, their entire artillery, consisting of eight pieces, with its equipment and ammunition, their camp and camp furniture, and five hundred pack mules and saddles, fell into the hands of the victors. General Arista lost his personal baggage, a valuable service of plate, and all his public correspondence.

Reënforcements having commenced arriving at Point Isabel, General Taylor made immediate preparations for crossing the river, and carrying the war into Mexico. Being informed of these preparations, General Arista sent, on the 17th, to propose an armistice. This was promptly refused by General Taylor, and the immediate possession of Matamoras made a sine qua non. No answer having been received on the morning of the 18th, General Taylor commenced the passage at an early hour. The usual precautions were taken to meet any effective opposition. But it was soon ascertained that the town had been evacuated, during the night, by the remnant of the army, about three hundred of the sick and wounded only being left behind. The arms and public stores had been, to a large extent, concealed, or thrown into the river. By the diligence of the Americans, a great portion of it was recovered.

It was now determined to push the war vigorously into the heart of the country, with a direct aim at the capital.

By the act of the 13th of May, 1846, the president was authorized to call into the field fifty thousand volunteers, to serve for one year, or during the war; and an appropriation was made for the purpose of carrying it into effect. Here arose a serious political difficulty. The preamble to that act declared that, "whereas, by the act of the republic of Mexico, war exists," &c. The opposition members of congress distinctly charged that the war was brought on by the unconstitutional order given by Mr. Polk for the concentration of our troops upon the Rio Grande. It was nevertheless entertained; and although the whigs were disposed to vote for an appropriation of money, and the raising of men for the purpose of relieving General Taylor, still they made strenuous exertions to strike the preamble from the bill. This they were unable to do, and upon its passage, they all voted for it, with the exception of fourteen members of the house and two or three senators. The position which they occupied was an exceedingly delicate one. They had to adopt one of two alternatives; either to vote for the preamble, which they declared was untrue, or to vote against the bill.

This they were most reluctant to do, as that was to refuse supplies to a gallant and victorious army, situated, by no fault of theirs, in the heart of an enemy's country. The wording of the preamble was one of those political juggles, by which, without reference to truth, honour, or patriotism, a faction seeks to make capital out of the exigencies of the nation. Its whole purpose was to compel the opposers of the war to take an unpopular position, by voting against supplies which they were as ready to furnish as their opponents, and which the whole country demanded, or consent to the false declaration of the preamble, and thereby admit the justice of the war. The fairness and honourableness of the manœuvre can easily be seen, by supposing that a majority of either house had been opposed to the administration, and yet anxious to furnish General Taylor with all the requisites of actual warfare; and that, in framing a bill for that purpose, they had harshly and severely censured the action of the president in the premises. Would his friends have felt themselves treated fairly and honourably, to be compelled to meet such a dilemma? The result has shown, emphatically and instructively, that "to manœuvre is not always to win;" and that, even in politics, "honesty is the best policy."

The call for volunteers was promptly responded to on every side. Where fifty thousand were wanted, five hundred thousand were offered, and the difficulty was to keep back the eager thousands that were pressing into the service.

The dismemberment of the Mexican territory now became the palpable object of the war party. Commodore Sloat, with a sufficient squadron, had been stationed on the Pacific coast, a year before the first outbreak on the Rio Grande, with orders, in case of war, to possess himself at once of California. "The Mexican ports on the Pacific are said to be open and defenceless," said the secretary of the navy, in a letter, dated June 24, 1845. "If you ascertain with certainty that Mexico has declared war against the United States, you will at once possess yourself of the port of San Francisco, and blockade or occupy such other ports as your force will permit." And this notwithstanding the repeated declarations of the president, that the war was not waged with a view to conquest, but to obtain, with an honourable peace, "indemnity for the past, and security for the future."

Under the act of May 13, requisitions were immediately made upon the governors of the states of Arkansas, Mississippi, Alabama, Georgia, Tennessee, Kentucky, Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and Texas, for a volunteer force amounting to twenty-six regiments, which, with a battalion from the District of Columbia and the state of Maryland, numbered in all about twenty-three thousand effective men, to serve for the period of twelve months, or to the end of the war. A large portion of this force was placed under the command of General Taylor, who had made the Rio Grande the base of his operation. The plan of operations, designed by the administration, was to attack Mexico in several directions. Taylor was to advance in the direction of Monterey; General Wool was to march from Antonio de Bexar, in the direction of Chihuahua; and General Kearney was to assemble the volunteers from the state of Missouri, and a few hundred regular troops at Fort Leavenworth, and make a descent upon Santa Fé, and from thence, with a portion of his command, was to advance rapidly upon California. At the same time, a more direct attack was to be made upon the capital, by way of its principal, and, in the view of the Mexicans, impregnable fortress at Vera Cruz. Any one, by glancing at a map, will at once discover the comprehensiveness of this plan. The advance of General Taylor and General Wool into that portion of the Mexican territory would be calculated to convince the Mexicans of the importance of reopening negotiations; whilst the expedition under General Kearney would obtain possession of that portion of Mexico which it was desirable to retain.

Meanwhile, as the reinforcements began to arrive, and General Taylor's force was augmented to some eight thousand men, he commenced his movement into the interior. On the 1st of August, he left Matamoras with a column of six thousand regular and volunteer troops, and, on the 8th, entered Camargo, where General Worth, with his division, had arrived on the 24th of July previous. No opposition was made to his progress, the entire Mexican army having fallen back on the road to Monterey.

Monterey* was the first point now aimed at by General Taylor, and Camargo was an important depot pending his operations in that quarter. It is on a bend of the Rio Grande, above Matamoras, and is the nearest point of access to Monterey. Having made the necessary dispositions here, and left competent garrisons at all the intervening towns on the river, General Taylor sent forward two divisions, under the command of Generals Twiggs and Worth, who took up their line of march on the 19th of August. General Butler's brigade followed on the 24th, and General Taylor on the 5th September. On the 13th, the whole column was in motion for Monterey.

Generals Arista and Ampudia had both been summoned to Mexico, to answer for the disasters of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma. The command in the north devolved upon Mejia. His force at Monterey was somewhat over four thousand men. On the 28th of August, General Ampudia arrived, with large reinforcements, and assumed the command.

General Taylor arrived before Monterey on the 19th of September, with six thousand six hundred and forty-five men, and nineteen pieces of cannon. After reconnoitering the city, he encamped at Walnut Springs, three miles distant. On the 20th, General Worth's division was ordered, by a circuitous route, to gain the Saltillo road, to the west of the city, and to storm the heights above the Bishop's Palace. On the 21st, he met a large body of Mexican cavalry and infantry, supported by artillery from the heights. Having repulsed them, he encamped, covering the passage to the Saltillo road. Two forts on the opposite side of the San Juan River were then stormed and carried; and the guns of the fort last taken were immediately turned on the Bishop's Palace.

To favour the movements of General Worth, the first division of regular troops, and a division of volunteers, under General Butler, were ordered to make a diversion on the left of the town. Lieutenant-Colonel Garland was ordered forward, to carry, if possible, the advance battery on the extreme left of the city. A heavy and destructive fire opened upon the advance of the Americans; but, passing through two batteries, an incessant cross-fire from the citadel, and the thousand musketeers on the housetops and behind barricades, they entered the city, and engaged with the enemy in the streets. The rear of the first battery was soon turned, and the reverse fire of the troops, through the gorge of the works, killed or dislodged the artillery in its rear. The first division was followed and supported by the Mississippi, Tennessee, and First Ohio regiments. The two former were the first to scale and occupy the fort. The loss of the Americans in killed and wounded, during the day, was three hundred and ninety-four.

On the 22d, at dawn, the second division, under General Worth, carried the height above the Bishop's Palace; and soon after noon the Palace itself was taken. In the lower part of the city, the Mexicans continued their fire during the day; but at night they

* Monterey, the capital of the state of Nueva Leon, lies in a valley at the eastern base of the Sierra Madre. The valley, though not large, is of great fertility, and supports a considerable population. On its east rises the single elevation of the Saddle Mountain; and the main chain of the Sierra, and its spurs, are the boundaries on the southern, western, and parts of the northern limits. The main road from the Rio Grande to the capital of Mexico leads from the east, through a cultivated country, some distance to the north of the Saddle Mountain, and, passing through the city, continues on by a pass, varying from one to three miles in width, through the Sierra, and on to the desert country, between the latter place and San Louis de Potosi. A rivulet—the Rio San Juan de Monterey—rises in this pass, and, running eastward, traverses the valley.

Monterey stands on the northern bank of this rivulet, and extends, in its length, near a mile and a half along the stream. It contains ordinarily about ten thousand inhabitants evacuated nearly all their defences. On the 23d, General Quitman was ordered to advance into the city, assisted by Captain Bragg's battery and the dismounted Texan volunteers. This advance was conducted vigorously, but with due caution, till the troops arrived within one square of the principal plaza, near which the enemy's troops were concentrated.

On the morning of the 24th, General Ampudia made an offer of capitulation. The terms accepted were, that the Mexican troops should march out of the city with their arms and accoutrements, and should be allowed seven days to evacuate. The American troops were not to occupy the city till that time. The citadel, however, was to be evacuated on the 25th, and an American garrison marched in. An armistice of eight weeks was also agreed upon.

The American loss, in capturing the city, was one hundred and twenty killed, and three hundred and sixty-eight wounded. Forty-two pieces of cannon, and a large supply of ammunition, fell into the hands of the victors.

The terms of this capitulation created much dissatisfaction among the advocates of the war in the United States. It was a subject of much regret that General Taylor did not exact more rigorous terms. He was informed, by the secretary of war, that the president regretted that he had not insisted upon the terms he had first proposed. It was stated that the object of this urgency was, by the stringency of our measures, to compel the Mexican government to come at once to terms. To this General Taylor replied as follows:—

"The force with which I advanced on Monterey was limited, by causes beyond my control, to about six thousand men. With this force, as every military man must admit, who has seen the ground, it was entirely impossible to invest Monterey so closely as to prevent the escape of the garrison. Although the main communication with the interior was in our possession, yet one route was open to the Mexicans throughout the operations, and could not be closed, as were also other minor tracks and passes through the mountains. Had we, therefore, insisted on more rigorous terms than those granted, the result would have been the escape of the body of the Mexican force, with the destruction of its artillery and magazines; our only advantage being the capture of a few prisoners of war, at the expense of valuable lives and much damage to the city. The consideration of humanity was present to my mind during the conference which led to the convention, and outweighed, in my judgment, the doubtful advantages to be gained by a resumption of the attack upon the town. This conclusion has been fully confirmed by an inspection of the enemy's position and means since the surrender. It was discovered that his principal magazine, containing an immense amount of powder, was in the cathedral, completely exposed to our shells from two directions. The explosion of this mass of powder, which must have ultimately resulted from a continuance of the bombardment, would have been infinitely disastrous, involving the destruction not only of the Mexican troops, but of non-combatants, and even our own people, had we pressed the attack.

"In regard to the temporary cessation of hostilities, the fact that we are not at this moment (within eleven days of the termination of the period fixed by the convention) prepared to move forward in force, is a sufficient explanation of the military reasons which dictated this suspension of arms. It paralyzed the enemy during a period when, from the want of necessary means, we could not possibly move. At the date of the surrender of Monterey, our force had not more than ten days' rations; and even now, with all our endeavours, we have not more than twenty-five. The task of fighting and beating the enemy is among the least difficult that we encounter: the great question of supplies necessarily controls all the operations in a country like this.

"In the conference with General Ampudia, I was distinctly told by him that he had invited the convention to spare the further effusion of blood, and because General Santa Anna had declared himself favourable to peace. I knew that our government had made propositions to that of Mexico to negotiate; and I deemed that the change of government in that country since my last instructions fully warranted me in entertaining considerations of policy. My grand motive in moving forward with very limited supplies had been to increase the inducements of the Mexican government to negotiate for peace. Whatever may be the actual views or disposition of the Mexican rulers, or of General Santa Anna, it is not unknown to the government that I had the very best reason for believing the statement of General Ampudia to be true. It was my opinion at the time of the convention, and it has not been changed, that the liberal treatment of the Mexican army, and the suspension of arms, would exert none but a favorable influence in our behalf.

"The result of the entire operation has been to throw the Mexican army back more than three hundred miles, to the city of San Luis Potosi, and to open the country to us, as far as we choose to penetrate it, up to the same point."

The allusions to Santa Anna in the above letter, and the two months' armistice agreed upon, make it necessary to turn aside, for the present, from the brilliant course of General Taylor's victories, to take a view of what was passing at other points in the wide field of operations.

Another revolution had taken place in Mexico. The government of Paredes was overthrown. Santa Anna had been residing in exile at Havana. What means the American government had of becoming acquainted with the ulterior designs of this modern Proteus has never been publicly divulged. But, under the persuasion that, in some way, benefit to the American cause would accrue from his restoration to power, the administration wished his return. He was notified of this fact, and Commodore Connor, commanding the blockade at Vera Cruz, was instructed, by a private and confidential order from the secretary of the navy, to let him pass freely.

[Private and confidential.]

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 13, 1846.

COMMODORE: If Santa Anna endeavors to enter the Mexican ports, you will allow him to pass freely.

GEORGE BANCROFT.

Commodore DAVID CONNOR, Commanding Home Squadron.

He entered, accordingly, unmolested, and was soon invested with supreme dictatorial powers, under solemn pledges to prosecute the war with all diligence, and to drive back the hated invaders of the Mexican soil.

The views of the American government, in favouring the return of Santa Anna, were known to General Ampudia, and he made skilful use of them in negotiating with General Taylor. Santa Anna, however, entertained no views but those which looked to his own aggrandizement. Promises and pledges, which seemed to stand in the way of this one object, were laid aside, or trampled on, as easily as they were made. Accordingly, without one effort at conciliation, he took up the popular cry, and made vigorous preparation to prosecute the war, taking command of the army in person, and leaving the presidency, ad interim, in the hands of Gomez Farias, the vice-president.

With the design of occupying as much of the territory of Mexico as possible, three expeditions were organized, distinct from those of the main army; one, under General Wool, against the province of Chihuahua; a second, under General Kearney, against New Mexico; and a third, under Colonel Fremont, against California. Attempts were also to be made upon all the important ports on the Gulf of Mexico.

The column under Brigadier-General Wool, consisting of about one thousand four hundred men, destined for the conquest of Chihuahua, was put in motion from San Antonio de Bexar, on the 29th of September, 1846, four days after General Taylor had taken possession of Monterey. Crossing the Rio Grande, he traversed Coahuila, and arrived at Monclova, on the 31st of October, and was well received by the inhabitants. The force of General Wool having been diverted from its original destination, it never reached Chihuahua, and he subsequently joined his command to the army of General Taylor.

On the 30th of June, Brigadier-General Kearney, with one thousand six hundred regulars and volunteers, marched from Fort Leavenworth, in the direction of Santa Fé, where he arrived, after a march of eight hundred and seventy-three miles, on the 18th of August, and took peaceable and unresisted possession of New Mexico. The Mexican forces, under the command of Governor Armijo, amounting to four thousand men, fled; and the governor himself, with a small party of dragoons, departed in haste for Chihuahua. General Kearney was authorized to muster into service a battalion from among the emigrants, who were on their way to Oregon and California; in addition to this force, one thousand volunteers were started from Missouri to reënforce him.

In August, 1846, General Kearney communicated to the war department the fact, that he had under his command a greater number of troops than was necessary to retain possession of Santa Fé, and for the conquest of California; and that he proposed sending a portion of them to reënforce General Wool, who, he supposed, was advancing upon Chihuahua. On the 23d of September, 1846, Colonel Doniphan, with the first regiment of Missouri volunteers, started upon that celebrated march, which has not inaptly been compared to that of Xenophon. The men who composed that regiment were young, hardy, and possessed of a desperate and reckless courage, and were well fitted for a service which was surrounded by so many perils. It was not known, when Doniphan left Santa Fé, that the column under the command of General Wool had been diverted from its movement upon Chihuahua, and he therefore penetrated, with his small band of heroes, into a country thronged with foes, and which had never been trod by the footsteps of an American soldier.

On the 25th of December, the advance guard of his regiment was met by the Mexicans in force, in the vicinity of Brazito, where a battle ensued, resulting in the total overthrow of the enemy, with a loss on their part of nearly two hundred killed and wounded, and on that of the Americans of only seven wounded. In this engagement, less than five hundred Americans defeated twelve hundred Mexicans. Continuing his march, Doniphan entered El Paso without again encountering a foe. It was here ascertained, that the movement had to be made without the aid of General Wool; and the command was detained until February, for the purpose of receiving reinforcements of artillery from Santa Fé, when the force continued to advance towards Chihuahua.

On the 28th of February, 1847, they discovered a large force of Mexicans, intrenched behind their batteries at the pass of Sacramento. It was at once determined to storm the Mexican intrenchments; they were furiously assaulted, and defended with equal desperation. The ardour of the Americans proved irresistible; the fortifications were scaled, the enemy was driven from his artillery with dreadful slaughter, and the victory was signal and complete. The American troops entered the capital of Chihuahua in triumph, and shortly after proceeded to join General Taylor at Monterey.

In September, 1846, General Kearney, with a regular force of about three hundred dragoons, in pursuance of the instructions from the war department, started for California. Passing down the Rio Grande more than two hundred miles, he prepared to cross over to the River Gila; but, after advancing about one hundred and eighty miles, he was met by an express from California, despatched by Colonel Fremont. Deeming it unnecessary to take an additional force into that country, he ordered most of his troops to return to Santa Fé, while he advanced with about one hundred men.

In May, 1845, Captain Fremont left Washington, under orders from the war department to continue his explorations beyond the Rocky Mountains—a service purely of a scientific character. There were no soldiers under his command, and the sixty-two men who made up his party were taken as a protection against the Indians. His route lay through a portion of California that was settled, and he was fully apprised of the danger of a rupture between Mexico and the United States, and was resolved to give no umbrage to the authorities in California. Leaving his company one hundred miles from Monterey, in Upper California, he proceeded to that place alone, for the purpose of explaining to Castro the object of his mission, and to obtain permission to enter the valley of the San Joaquin, to obtain forage for his horses and provisions for the men. His request was granted; but scarcely had he arrived at the place which he had selected, before he received information that General Castro was preparing to overwhelm him with a superior force. For the purpose of defending himself from this unwarrantable attack, he intrenched his men upon a mountain thirty miles distant from Monterey. There he remained from the 7th to the 10th of March, 1846, without being attacked by the Mexicans; and he at length yielded to the wishes of some of his men, discharged them, and pursued his march for Oregon. After being attacked by hostile Indians, who were instigated by General Castro, he was informed that Castro himself was advancing against him at the head of more than four hundred men, and that the American settlers in the valley of the Sacramento, as well as his own party, were to be involved in the scheme of destruction. Driven, in self-defence, to repel the foe, he determined to overthrow the Mexican authority in California. By rapidity of movement he surprised several parties, and obtained possession of nine brass cannon, and several hundred stand of arms. Castro was driven from one position to another, until he reached Ciudad de Los Angeles. Colonel Fremont having formed a junction with Commodore Stockton, their united forces, on the 12th of August, 1846, entered the City of the Angels, the governor-general, Pico, and the rest of the Mexican authorities, having fled. Commodore Stockton took possession of the whole country, and appointed Colonel Fremont governor. In the short space of sixty days the conquest of a country was achieved, which has more recently attracted the attention of the civilized world.

The territories thus occupied were regarded and treated as conquered. The existing governments were set aside, and military governments formally established in their stead. On the gulf, Tampico was occupied, and without resistance. This port, the capital of the department of Tamaulipas, is second in importance only to Vera Cruz. It is the key to one of the great avenues to the capital. Situated near the mouth of the River Panuco, with a good harbour, and well defended, it was a point of great importance, both in a commercial and a military view. The garrison consisted of more than one thousand soldiers, a detachment of artillery, with one hundred and twenty cannon of all calibres, and with abundant material of the park. In addition to these was a national guard of two thousand citizens. There were also three vessels of war, fully equipped, in the harbour. It is hardly conceivable that such a place, so fortified, should be abandoned without striking a blow in its defence, unless there was treason somewhere. The stories of the manner in which this was effected are various and amusing. One of them, whose authenticity is not without able support, attributes the evacuation mainly to a woman, the brave and worthy wife of the American consul. Her husband, Mr. Chase, having been expelled from the city by a decree of the Mexican government, was received, for a time, on board one of the vessels of the squadron cruising the gulf. While there, Mrs. Chase contrived, in spite of the vigilance of the authorities, to hold communication with him, and subsequently with the naval commanders. Watched, suspected, and not a little persecuted, she contrived to sustain herself, and to impress upon the Mexicans the idea of immense preparations to take the place by storm. Whether from this source, or from another, it is certain that the commanding general had no hope of holding the city. The order was given for its abandonment, which was executed, with great precipitation, on the 27th of October. In the haste of departure, a large portion of the arms and munitions of the city were lost. The works of defence were, to some extent, demolished, and considerable quantities of arms and military stores conveyed to a distance up the river. Notice of the evacuation was given to the American commodore, by the heroic wife of the consul, who also caused the American flag to be hoisted in front of her house, in anticipation of his immediate arrival to take possession. This event was, however, delayed until the 14th of November, by the necessity of sending to Vera Cruz for a sufficient force to enter the place, and protect it.

Victoria, an inland city of some importance, having a port at Soto la Marina, was entered, peaceably, on the 29th December. As commanding some of the mountain passes, and lying between Monterey and Tampico, its occupation was deemed very desirable by General Taylor. But it was not expected to be secured without opposition. Two brigades, commanded by Generals Twiggs and Quitman, were detached from Monterey, for this expedition, about the 12th of November, General Taylor accompanying in person. Alarmed by despatches from General Butler, at Monterey, setting forth the danger of a probable attack, by superior numbers, on General Worth, at Saltillo, General Taylor, with Twiggs's brigade, returned to Monterey, before reaching Victoria. General Quitman proceeded and took quiet possession, General Urrea, with all his force, retiring at his approach.

The troops of the United States now held possession of all the region north of the Sierra Madre, extending from Tampico to Saltillo and Santa Fé. It was next resolved to make a descent upon Vera Cruz, and thence penetrate to the capital. As General Taylor could not leave his important conquests in the interior, this expedition was placed under the immediate command of General Scott, who had hitherto remained at home, in consequence of some personal misunderstanding with the president. As the senior general in the army, he had solicited the command in May, and again in September; but it was withheld on the ground of an unwillingness to supersede General Taylor in his command.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, September 14, 1846. }

SIR: I have received your letter of the 12th instant, and submitted it to the president. He requests me to inform you that it is not within the arrangements for conducting the campaign in Mexico to supersede General Taylor in his present command, by assigning you to it.

I am, with great respect, your obedient servant,
W. L. MARCY.

Major-General W. Scott.

On the 23d November, General Scott received orders to place himself at the head of the invading army, with the most ample discretionary powers as to the conduct of the campaign.

The plan of operations required the concentration of a large force, both military and naval, at Vera Cruz. For this purpose, a large portion of General Taylor's division was withdrawn from the interior, so as to leave him no power to act, except on the defensive. It was supposed that a formidable demonstration at Vera Cruz would immediately cause the transfer of Santa Anna, and his army, from San Luis de Potosi to the defence of the capital, and its approaches from the coast. This effect, however, did not follow immediately. He had, by the greatest exertions, and by pledging, for a loan, a portion of his own private property, succeeded in organizing a large army, and found himself at the head of an effective force of more than twenty thousand men. Employing himself with great industry in disciplining the troops under his command, he was prepared to avail himself of a favourable opportunity to precipitate his army through the mountain gorges of the Sierra Madre, upon the scattered and weakened forces of General Taylor. He knew the absolute necessity of arousing the desponding hopes of the Mexican nation, by a brilliant demonstration, and he saw the time had arrived for striking an effective blow when General Scott was too far advanced towards Vera Cruz to fly to the rescue of General Taylor. Leaving the city of Vera Cruz and the castle of San Juan d'Ulloa to its fate, he determined to measure swords with the "invincible" General Taylor.

The favourable moment for which Santa Anna had anxiously waited, from October until February, had now arrived, and he rapidly advanced from San Luis in the direction of Agua Nueva. General Taylor was assured of this fact on the 20th of February, 1847, and fell back to a more favourable position for defence, at Buena Vista, seven miles south of Saltillo, and eleven miles from his advanced post at Agua Nueva. This movement was made at noon on the 21st.* With a small force, General Taylor returned the same day to Saltillo, to make some arrangements for the defence of that town, leaving General Wool in command of the troops. Before his return on the morning of the 22d, the enemy were advancing and in sight, having marched from Encarnacion, a distance of forty miles, after 11 o'clock the day previous. The position selected by the American commander was one of remarkable strength. The road at that point passed through a narrow defile, and the valley on its right was cut up by deep and impassable gullies; while, on the left, rugged hills and precipitous ravines extended to the mountain which overlooked the battle-field; thus obstructing the use of the enemy's artillery and cavalry, and destroying the advantages which he possessed in the numerical superiority of his infantry. At 11 o'clock, General Taylor received a summons from Santa Anna to surrender at discretion, which he declined acceding to. No serious attack was meditated by the Mexican commander during that day, as he was evidently waiting for the arrival of his rear-guard. The troops bivouacked without fires, and rested with arms in their hands. A body of fifteen hundred cavalry hovered upon the rear of the Americans during the day, evidently having been ordered to take that position for the purpose of harassing the retreat.

The American commander returned again to Saltillo; and when he arrived upon the field, on the morning of the 23d, the battle had already commenced. The action was brought on by an attempt of the enemy, with light troops, to outflank the American left, where they were met by the riflemen under Colonel Marshall, and a portion of the Illinois volunteers. At 8 o'clock, a heavy column advanced along the road, for the purpose of breaking the centre; but they were repulsed and driven back in confusion. About this time, a dark and threatening mass was seen hovering upon the left, and column after column was poured upon that point, for the purpose of forcing it by immensely superior numbers. Here was stationed the 2d Indiana and the 2d Illinois regiments, covering O'Brien's battery, under the immediate command of General Lane, who ordered the Indiana regiment and the artillery to advance. That regiment receiving a terrible fire from small arms, and being raked by a cross fire of grape and canister from a Mexican battery planted upon the left, broke in disorder and fled from the field, with the exception of a small number, who were rallied by Colonel Bowles. O'Brien's battery was served with tremendous effect; but still the Mexican battalions continued to advance, and, not being supported, he was forced to retire, leaving behind him one of his pieces. A gallant stand was now made by the 2d Illinois regiment; but, being at last outflanked, it was forced to fall back. The movement of the Mexicans in this part of the field was completely successful, and the light troops who had so gallantly defended the mountain were forced to retire, and were not rallied until they reached the depot at Buena Vista, which they subsequently aided to defend. Heavy columns of infantry and cavalry were now poured by Santa Anna along the foot of the mountain, to the rear of the Americans, where they assembled in great numbers. It was at this critical moment, when the victory was almost within the grasp of the enemy, that General Taylor arrived upon the field, accompanied by the Mississippi riflemen, who were ordered into action, and greatly distinguished themselves under the leadership of Colonel Davis. They were gallantly sustained by the 2d Kentucky and a portion of the 1st Illinois regiments, and by the batteries of Sherman and Bragg, and the Mexicans were driven with great loss from the positions they had gained. The American artillery, being in position on the plateau, produced terrible havoc among the masses who had gained the left. Again and again the Mexican columns advanced furiously to the onset, but were as often driven back.

The situation of the enemy, who had broken through the left wing, and had gained the rear of the Americans, was now exceedingly critical. At that moment, Santa Anna sent a message to the American commander, to propound the extraordinary question of "what he wanted." Taylor immediately despatched General Wool to the Mexican general-in-chief, and at the same time sent orders to cease firing. The Mexicans still continued the attack, and General Wool returned without having obtained an interview. Santa Anna had, in the mean time, gained his object, which was to enable that part of his army which was in imminent danger of being cut off, to rejoin the main body.* The small demonstrations which were made by General Miñon in the rear of the Americans during this portion of the day, were easily checked by Shover's battery and Webster's command. The firing had partially ceased upon that part of the field which had been so hotly disputed; but the cessation was for a very brief period.

The Illinois and Kentucky regiments, instead of acting on the defensive, made an advance movement to meet the foe. The collision was terrific; the ground was covered with the slain, but the Americans were overwhelmed by superior numbers, and were forced to retreat, leaving dead upon the field Colonels Hardin and McKee, and Lieutenant-Colonel Clay. The trophies of this brilliant charge were two of Captain O'Brien's pieces. He had sustained his position to the very last, and until the infantry which supported him was driven back in disorder. At this critical moment, when the victory had almost deserted the American eagles, Captain Bragg, who had once before assisted to change the fortunes of the day, arrived upon the plateau from the left, and rapidly passing General Taylor, without any infantry support, at once placed his guns in battery. The enemy were within a few yards of their muzzles, and rapidly advancing. The first discharge of canister from his guns made terrible havoc in the ranks of the enemy; they reeled and staggered as the iron hail swept away whole platoons. The second and third discharge forced them to recoil in dismay, and they fled madly from the field. That was the last attempt made by the enemy to carry the American position; and the night furnished the exhausted troops the opportunity for refreshing themselves. Amid the dead and the dying, without fires, they bivouacked upon the field of battle, listening to the groans of the wounded, and to the chilling blasts which howled through the valley, expecting the morning sun to witness a renewal of the combat. But the result of that long and desperate conflict had broken the spirit of the Mexican army. They expected to achieve an easy victory, but were wholly put to the rout; and they retired under the disheartening impression that the fates were against them, and their foes not to be conquered.

The force engaged under General Taylor was three hundred and thirty-four officers, and four thousand four hundred and twenty-five men, of which only four hundred and fifty-three were regular troops. The strength of the Mexican army was at least twenty thousand men. The American loss was two hundred and sixty-seven killed, four hundred and fifty-six wounded, and twenty-three missing. The loss of the Mexicans in killed and wounded, according to the lowest estimate, was fifteen hundred, and probably amounted to two thousand.

While these important events were transpiring in the field, the capital of Mexico was agitated and distracted with the violence of contending factions, and apparently on the eve of a new revolution. The disasters of Santa Anna were nearly as fatal to him in a political as in a military point of view. Farias, who exercised the presidency in his absence, greatly increased the popular exasperation, by endeavouring to force further contributions from the church, to carry on the war. The excitement was so great, that a resort was had to arms, and a general insurrection was only prevented by the timely arrival of Santa Anna, who, advised of this formidable "fire in his rear," turned his retreat from a foreign foe into an advance upon a far more dangerous domestic one.

While Mexico was thus torn and distracted by internal conflicts, General Scott, on the 9th of March, 1847, effected a landing in the vicinity of Vera Cruz, with a well-appointed army of twelve thousand men, ably supported by a sufficient naval force. The landing was effected without opposition, under the guns of the American squadron. The line of investment was commenced on the same day, but was not completed until the 12th. During that time, a norther prevailed, which drove the clouds of sand into the faces of the troops, and rendered their operations exceedingly difficult. Frequent discharges from the city and castle greatly annoyed the American troops. On the 14th, the Americans forced the enemy to relinquish the space which intervened between the American lines and the city. But the continuance of the storm rendered it very difficult to land the heavy ordnance from the fleet until the 18th. On the 22d, at two o'clock, General Scott issued a summons to the governor of Vera Cruz to surrender, informing him that the city was invested by sea and land. This communication was responded to on the same day by the governor, Juan Morales, who rejected his proposal; and General Scott ordered the seven mortars, which were placed in battery, to fire upon the city. The lighter vessels which composed Commodore Perry's squadron approached within range, and, being somewhat protected from the raking fire of the castle, opened their guns upon the city. The discharges from the fleet and the mortars continued during the night of the 22d, and on the 23d three more mortars were added to the number. During the 24th, the fire somewhat slackened; but on the 25th, all the batteries were in operation, and proved terribly destructive. The shells, exploding in the heart of the city, not only demolished the buildings, but the iron missiles with which they were charged carried death and dismay in every direction. The bombardment was so disastrous that the consuls of Great Britain, France, Spain, and Russia, desired General Scott to grant a truce, to enable the neutrals, and the Mexican women and children, to abandon the city. To that communication General Scott replied, that he could not grant a truce, unless applied for by the governor of Vera Cruz, accompanied by a distinct proposition to surrender the city. He also informed them that the communication between the neutral ships of war lying in the vicinity of Vera Cruz was kept open to allow the neutrals in the city an opportunity for escape.

* "The Mexicans, on the contrary, assert, that Santa Anna never did send such a message, but that a Mexican lieutenant, Don Jose Maria Monto e, having been surrounded by the Americans, and not desiring to be taken prisoner, pretended to have been sent to General Taylor by Santa Anna, and managed, while accompanying General Wool to the Mexican general-in-chief, to separate from them, and thus rejoined the Mexicans." — See Mexican History of the War with Mexico, p. 126.

On the 26th, General Scott received overtures from General Landero for a suspension of hostilities, for the purpose of having honourable terms made with the garrison. This proposition was accepted, and the terms of capitulation were ratified on the 27th. It was agreed that the garrison should surrender themselves prisoners of war, the Mexican officers to preserve their arms and private effects, and, together with the rank and file of the regular portion of the prisoners, to give their parole not to serve again during the war, or until they were duly exchanged. With the city of Vera Cruz and San Juan de Ulloa were surrendered five thousand prisoners.

This achievement, accomplished as it was with comparatively a very small loss, was one of the most brilliant events of the Mexican war. The castle of San Juan de Ulloa was considered impregnable by Europeans, and was only taken by the French, a few years previous, by the accidental explosion of a magazine. To land upon a hostile shore, and to encircle the city of Vera Cruz, under the fire of her batteries, illustrated the military skill of General Scott, and the patient endurance and gallantry of the American troops. A new base of operations was thus obtained, which opened a short and direct line to the city of Mexico. The eminent skill and science of Colonel Totten, of the engineer corps, were admirably displayed in this siege, and contributed greatly to the success of the enterprise.

On the 6th of April, the American army took up its line of march for the city of Mexico. On the 17th, they met the first organized opposition at Plan del Rio. The Mexicans were intrenched in a formidable position, which was defended by a much larger force than General Scott expected to find there. The national road crosses a small, but very rapid stream, at the village of Plan del Rio. Near the village were several heights, upon which were planted batteries, that commanded the road for some distance, and rendered the position exceedingly formidable. General Scott at once determined to storm the batteries, and drive the enemy from their intrenchments, and issued his orders accordingly.

These orders were brilliantly executed. The assault under Pillow, whose command was ordered to charge before it was formed, was twice repulsed by the terrible fire from the Mexican batteries. The charge under Colonel Harney, up the steep and precipitous ascent, in the face of the Mexican guns, was a daring and brilliant affair, and resulted in driving the enemy, with great slaughter, from that part of the field. The orders issued to the division of Worth and Twiggs were executed with great gallantry, and the command of the latter general sustained considerable loss in executing his orders. About three thousand prisoners, with five generals and many other officers of rank, were some of the fruits of this victory. The loss of the Americans, in killed and wounded, was about two hundred and fifty; that of the enemy, about three hundred and fifty. Among the American officers who were desperately wounded was General Shields. The pursuit of the enemy was rapidly continued in the direction of Jalapa. The rout of the Mexicans was complete. They dispersed in utter confusion, and the Americans soon after took possession of Jalapa and the strong fortress of Perote. At the latter place were captured fifty-four guns and mortars, eleven thousand sixty-five cannon balls, fourteen thousand three hundred bombs and hand-grenades, and five hundred muskets. A considerable portion of the troops under General Scott were volunteers, who had entered the service for a limited period, which being now about to expire, congress had passed a law for the reënlistment of such portions of them as were disposed to continue with the army; and strenuous efforts were made to induce them to remain. But they had seen enough of war. Notwithstanding their uninterrupted successes, they did not covet more of the glory of conquest. Fresh from the bosoms of their families, and from their peaceful firesides, and unused not merely to the hardships, but to the restraints and discipline, of a military life, they could brook them no longer. They served out their terms with the fidelity and devotion of veterans, enduring fatigue and hardship of every description, and fighting in the field or in the breach, in the assault or in the skirmish, with the cool bravery and determined, invincible courage of soldiers trained to war. But they were now free to depart with honour, and were quite willing to share the remaining laurels of the contest with the eager thousands at home who were panting to take their places in the field. In these circumstances, General Scott determined to discharge them at once, and to wait the arrival of the ten regiments of regulars, already ordered to be enlisted and organized for the war.

In order to lessen the growing expenses of the war, and thus silence some part of the clamours of the opposition, the president directed contributions to be levied upon the conquered country, for the support of the invading army. To this course both General Taylor and General Scott strenuously objected. They did not deny the military right, but they doubted the expediency, and even the practicability, of the measure. They felt that, in penetrating so far into the enemy's country, their only safety depended upon cultivating, as far as possible, the good will of the people. They accordingly refrained from every act of individual oppression, and paid liberal prices for all the articles they required. Private property and private rights were every where respected. The property of the government, whenever it fell in their way, was freely appropriated. This course operated well for the army, who were never in want of any thing which the country afforded; while to multitudes of the Mexican farmers it was a golden harvest of rare occurrence.

At Washington, and throughout the United States, the war absorbed almost all other subjects. It gave a colour to all political action. All parties admired and applauded the gallant feats of the armies and their generals. The praises of Taylor and Scott, of Worth and Quitman, of Duncan, and Pierce, and Lally, and scores of others equally or more distinguished, were on every tongue. Still there was a powerful opposition to the war, and to the administration of Mr. Polk, as its authors and abettors. So powerful was this feeling, and so well had it been wrought upon, that a majority of the representatives elected to the thirtieth congress was opposed to the president. The twenty-ninth had not yet closed its session. Measures of great importance were proposed. But every thing was contested inch by inch. The progress of legislation was slow, and the movements of the army were consequently delayed. The employment of volunteers was not acceptable to the commanders, as they only enlisted for definite periods, and were liable to leave at the very moment when their services were most needed. The immediate raising of ten regiments of regular troops, to serve for the war, was urgently recommended. At the same time that measures were thus urged to prosecute the war, the president asked an appropriation of three millions, to be placed at his private disposal, evidently with a design to purchase a peace. To meet these heavy demands upon the treasury, three measures were devised. The first and easiest was a loan. The second — a vexed question — was the sale, at a very low minimum, of such of the public lands as had been long in the market. The third was the imposition of a war revenue upon some articles on the free list of the tariff. The ten regiments were raised, after long and wearisome discussion. The loan was ordered; but the other two measures died of debate.

In connection with the proposition to appropriate three millions to assist the president in negotiating a peace, a new difficulty arose. It was clearly seen that, notwithstanding the president's disavowal of such a purpose, one of the great objects of the war party was the acquisition of a portion of the Mexican territory. This, being in a southern latitude, it was naturally supposed, would be claimed for slavery. The determination, on the part of the northern advocates for freedom, brought out that tough and unmanageable bone of contention, the "Wilmot Proviso." This was a simple amendment to the three million bill, proposed by Mr. David Wilmot, of Pennsylvania, prohibiting slavery in any of the territories that might be acquired as the result of the contemplated negotiations. This famous "Proviso" has made its humble author a very prominent man, and given him a world-wide distinction. And yet it is nothing more nor less than a proposition to extend over newly-acquired territories the provisions of an ordinance of sixty years standing—an ordinance framed by Jefferson, and supported, without opposition or division, by all the fathers of the constitution. But the southern interest, which has, from the beginning, monopolized the government, prevailed. The "Proviso" was rejected, and the question left open for further and more bitter agitation in a time of peace.

In the prospect, not very distant, of a new presidential election, the position of the two victorious generals in Mexico, both of whom were opposed in politics to the party then in power, was decidedly alarming to the administration. General Scott had shown some political aspirations already; and it was desirable, if possible, to dim the lustre of his name, by dividing the glory of the conquest of Mexico. This was first proposed to be done by the creation of a new grade in the army, to take rank of all others, under the title of lieutenant-general. Colonel Benton, of Missouri, was the prominent and only candidate for this distinction. No possible motive, other than a personal one, could be assigned for this measure. General Scott's courage, skill, and consummate ability were unquestioned and unquestionable. He had accomplished whatever he had undertaken. He had done more and better than his instructions had demanded of him. There was not a man from Maine to Texas who would have risked his reputation upon the assertion that Colonel Benton, or any other inexperienced man in the country, could finish what Scott had begun better than he could do it himself. In such a crisis, to supersede all the experienced and tried officers in the army, by the arbitrary elevation of a mere civilian to the supreme command, would have been either to woo and insure defeat, or to turn the whole matter of the war into a broad farce. Fortunately, the good sense of the people prevailed, and the anomalous measure was defeated.

A second attempt was made to obtain the same end, by ingrafting on a bill for the increase of the number of general officers in the army a provision, that the president should be authorized to place any one of them, without regard to rank, in command of the army in Mexico. But this met with the same opposition, and shared the same fate as the other. Thus it was not without reason that General Scott apprehended "a fire in his rear," when he undertook the command of the army.

The disasters of Vera Cruz and Cerro Gordo had not exhausted the resources of Santa Anna, nor entirely broken the spirits of the Mexicans. The president-general with difficulty escaped capture, and, with a few companions, after two or three days and nights of solitary wandering and romantic adventure among the mountain passes and secluded valleys of that alpine region, arrived at the city of Orizaba. Here he was received with great enthusiasm, and immediately set himself to devising measures to retrieve his lost fortunes. This he would have had no time to do, if General Scott had vigorously pursued his advantages. But his determination to discharge a large portion of the volunteers, and wait the arrival of recruits,—which was doubtless a prudent and commendable exercise of "the better part of valor,"—afforded ample time for the discomfited Mexican to arouse his countrymen to renewed exertions, and to convince them of the possibility of yet driving back the invaders.

During this state of inactivity and mutual preparation, a commissioner from the United States government, authorized to treat for peace, arrived at Vera Cruz. A more singular and injudicious appointment was probably never made, under circumstances so grave. Mr. N. P. Trist was simply a clerk in the state department at Washington, having neither position, experience, nor talent, to qualify him for so important a diplomatic mission. He was scarcely known out of Washington. His name had never been heard in Mexico. It is impossible to imagine a reason for the selection of such a man, unless it was intended as a deliberate insult both to the Mexican nation and to the commanding general of the American army. General Scott received the commissioner with a marked coldness, which seriously offended the dignity of that functionary. The following letter to the secretary of war will serve, not only to indicate the feelings of General Scott on this occasion, but to show the true military aspects of the whole transaction :—

“ Mr. Trist arrived here on the 14th instant. He has not done me the honour to call upon me. Possibly he has thought the compliment of a first visit was due to him !

“ When I wrote to you and Mr. Trist, late in the night of the 7th instant, to go down by a detachment of horse that I was obliged to despatch early the next morning, I had not time to defend the position you had forced me to assume ; I shall now but glance at that position. The Hon. Mr. Benton has publicly declared, that if the law had passed making him general-in-chief of the United States armies in Mexico, either as lieutenant-general, or as junior major-general over seniors, the power would have been given him not only of agreeing to an armistice, (which would, of course, have appertained to his position,) but the much higher power of concluding a treaty of peace ; and it will be remembered, also, that in my letter to Major-General Taylor, dated June 12, 1846, written at your instance, and, as I understood at the time, approved by the cabinet, his power to agree to an armistice was merely adverted to in order to place upon it certain limitations. I understand your letter to me of the 14th ultimo as not only taking from me, the commander of an army under the most critical circumstances, all voice or advice in agreeing to a truce with the enemy, but as an attempt to place me under the military command of Mr. Trist ; for you tell me that, ‘ should he make known to you, in writing, that the contingency has occurred in consequence of which the president is willing that further active military operations should cease, you will regard such notice as a direction from the president to suspend them until further orders from this department.’

“ That is, I am required to respect the judgment of Mr. Trist here, on passing events purely military, as the judgment of the president, who is some two thousand miles off !

“ I suppose this is to be the second attempt of the kind ever made to dishonour a general-in-chief in the field, before or since the time of the French convention.

“ That other instance occurred in your absence from Washington, in June, 1845, when Mr. Bancroft, acting secretary of war, instructed General Taylor in certain matters to obey the orders of Mr. Donaldson, chargé d'affaires in Texas ; and you may remember the letter that I wrote to General Taylor, with the permission of both Mr. Bancroft and yourself, to correct that blunder.

“ Whenever it may be the pleasure of the president to instruct me, directly or through any authorized channel, to propose or to agree to an armistice with the enemy, on the happening of any given contingency or contingencies, or to do any other military act, I shall most promptly and cheerfully obey him ; but I entreat to be spared the personal dishonour of being again required to obey the orders of the chief clerk of the state department as the orders of the constitutional commander-in-chief of the army and navy of the United States.

“ To Mr. Trist, as a functionary of my government, I have caused to be shown, since his arrival here, every proper attention. I sent the chief quartermaster and an aid-de-camp to show him the rooms I had ordered for him. I have caused him to be tendered a sentinel, to be placed at his door and to receive his orders. I shall from time to time send him word of my personal movements, and I shall continue to show him all other attentions necessary to the discharge of any diplomatic functions with which he may be intrusted.”

This letter called forth from the war department a very strong and pungent reply. The secretary observes in relation to the letter respecting the mission of Mr. Trist, “ The president would not have deemed it proper that I should advert again to this subject, but for the apprehension he has that your course may obstruct the measures he has taken to procure a peace. It does not appear, from any communication made by you to this department, that you have executed or attempted to execute the order which you have received to forward the despatch from the secretary of state addressed to the Mexican secretary of foreign affairs. The president is, however, unwilling to believe that you have not done your duty in this respect. If it has not been sent, he presumes that you have not been able to send it, and that you will, in due time, explain the causes which compelled you to detain it.

“ My letter, taken by itself, neither sustains nor excuses such an interpretation as you have given to it ; and, taken in connection with the facts which Mr. Trist was directed to communicate to you, and which it was expected would have been communicated with that letter, shows how idle it is to imagine that there was any attempt to place you ‘ under the military command of Mr. Trist,' or that you were 'required to respect the judgment of Mr. Trist here, (in Mexico,) on passing events purely military, as the judgment of the president, who is some two thousand miles off.' The respect due to yourself, as well as that due to the president, who had placed you in chief command of our armies in Mexico, should have made you extremely reluctant to adopt such a conclusion, even on adequate proof of the fact; and to me it seems, as I am sure it will appear to others, strange indeed that you have been able to extract any such inference from my letter. You and Mr. Trist are both functionaries of the government of the United States, with important public interests confided to each in his respective sphere of action: cordial coöperation was expected; duty imposed it; the public good, the cause of humanity, demanded it. If there has been a failure in this respect, — and from the tenor of your despatch the president fears that there has been, — a high responsibility rests somewhere.

"In relation to the direction for an armistice, or the suspension of hostilities, the president, after duly considering all you have said on the subject, does not doubt that it was an order proper and right for him to give, and consequently one which you were bound to obey. He sincerely regrets your strange misapprehension of it; and he is wholly unable to conceive how you can reconcile with duty and subordination the making of it a topic of remark, I may say of incidental reproof, of your common superior, in an official communication to a subordinate officer in another branch of the public service."

Mr. Trist continued with the army in its marches, and finally had an opportunity, after General Scott had "conquered a peace," and taken possession of strongholds, palaces, and citadels, to negotiate a treaty with the vanquished. In doing this, he transcended his orders, lost the confidence of the president and his cabinet, and fully confirmed, to the nation and the world, General Scott's estimate of his fitness for the place to which he was so singularly elevated.

Soon after his arrival at Jalapa, General Scott addressed a proclamation to the people of Mexico, setting forth the causes of the war, the true state of the belligerents, the utter hopelessness of further resistance on their part, and his wish, if possible, to prevent the further effusion of blood, and bring his work to a close without the necessity of fighting his way up to the "halls of the Montezumas." It is an admirable document, and worthy of preservation.

"The General-in-chief of the Armies of the United States of America to the Mexican Nation."

"MEXICANS: The late events of the war, and the measures adopted in consequence by your government, make it my duty to address you, in order to lay before you truths of which you are ignorant, because they have been criminally concealed from you. I do not ask you to believe me singly on my word, — though he who has not been found false has a claim to be believed, — but to judge for yourselves of these truths, from facts within the view and scrutiny of you all.

"Whatever may have been the origin of this war, which the United States were forced to undertake by insurmountable causes, we regard it as an evil. War is ever such to both belligerents; and the reason and justice of the case, if not unknown on both sides, are in dispute, and claimed by each. You have proof of this truth, as well as we; for in Mexico, as in the United States, there have existed, and do exist, two opposite parties — one desiring peace; another, war.

"Governments, however, have sacred duties to perform, from which they cannot swerve; and these duties frequently impose, from national considerations, a silence and a reserve that displease, at times, the majority of those who, from views purely personal or private, are found in opposition; to which governments can pay little attention, expecting the nation to repose in them the confidence due to a magistracy of its own selection.

"Considerations of high policy and of continental American interests precipitated events, in spite of the circumspection of the cabinet at Washington. This cabinet, ardently desiring to terminate all differences with Mexico, spared no efforts compatible with honour and dignity. It cherished the most flattering hopes of attaining this end by frank explanations and reasonings addressed to the judgment and prudence of the virtuous and patriotic government of General Herrera. An unexpected misfortune dispelled these hopes, and closed every avenue to an honourable adjustment. Your new government disregarded your national interests as well as those of continental America, and yielded, moreover, to foreign influences the most opposed to those interests — the most fatal to the future of Mexican liberty, and of that republican system which the United States hold it a duty to preserve and to protect. Duty, honour, and dignity placed us under the necessity of not losing a season of which the monarchical party was fast taking advantage. As not a moment was to be lost, we acted with a promptness and decision suited to the urgency of the case, in order to avoid a complication of interests which might render our relations more difficult and involved.

"Again: in the course of civil war, the government of General Paredes was overthrown. We could not but look upon this as a fortunate event, believing that any other administration, representing Mexico, would be less deluded, more patriotic, and more prudent; looking to the common good, weighing probabilities, strength, resources, and, above all, the general opinion as to the inevitable results of a national war. We were deceived — as perhaps you, Mexicans, were also deceived — in judging of the real intentions of General Santa Anna, whom you recalled, and whom our government permitted to return.

"Under this state of things, the Mexican nation has seen the results lamented by all, and by us most sincerely; for we appreciate, as is due, the valour and noble decision of those unfortunate men who go to battle, ill conducted, worse cared for, and almost always enforced by violence, deceit, or perfidy.

"We are witnesses — and we shall not be taxed with partiality, as a party interested, when we lament with surprise — that the heroic behaviour of the garrison of Vera Cruz, in its valiant defence, has been aspersed by the general who had just been routed and put to shameful flight at Buena Vista, by a force far inferior to his own; that the same general rewarded the insurgents of the capital, — promoters of civil war, — and heaped outrage on those who had just acquired for themselves singular distinction by a resistance beyond expectation, and of admirable decision.

"Finally, the bloody event of Cerro Gordo has plainly shown the Mexican nation what it may reasonably expect, if it longer continues blind to its real situation — a situation to which it has been brought by some of its generals, whom it has most distinguished, and in whom it has most confided.

"The hardest heart would have been moved to grief, in contemplating any battle-field of Mexico, a moment after the last struggle. Those generals whom the nation has paid, without service rendered, for so many years, have, in the day of need, with some honourable exceptions, but served to injure her by their bad example or unskilfulness. The dead and wounded on those fields received no marks of military distinction, sharing alike the sad fate which has been the same from Palo Alto to Cerro Gordo; the dead remained unburied, and the wounded abandoned to the clemency and charity of the victor. Soldiers who go to battle, knowing they have such reward to look for, deserve to be classed with the most heroic; for they are stimulated by no hope of glory, nor remembrance, nor a sigh — not even a grave.

"Again: contemplate, honourable Mexicans, the lot of peaceful and industrious citizens in all classes of your country. The possessions of the church menaced, and presented as an allurement to revolution and anarchy; the fortunes of rich proprietors pointed out for the plunder of armed ruffians; the merchant and the mechanic, the husbandman and the manufacturer, burdened with contributions, excises, monopolies, duties on consumption, and surrounded by officers and collectors of these odious internal customs; the man of letters and the legislator; the freeman of knowledge, who dares to speak, persecuted, without trial, by some faction, or by the very rulers who abuse their power; and criminals, unpunished, are set at liberty, as were those of Perote. What, then, Mexicans, is the liberty of which you boast?

"I will not believe that Mexicans of the present day want the courage to confess errors which do not dishonour them, or to adopt a system of true liberty — one of peace and union with their brethren and neighbours of the north.

"Neither can I believe Mexicans ignorant of the infamy of the calumnies put forth by the press, in order to excite hostility against us. No; public spirit cannot be created nor animated by falsehood. We have not profaned your temples, nor abused your women, nor seized your property, as they would have you believe. We say it with pride, and we confirm it by an appeal to your bishops and the curates of Tampico, Tuzpan, Matamoras, Monterey, Vera Cruz, and Jalapa; to all the clergy, civil authorities, and inhabitants of all the places we have occupied.

"We adore the same God; and a large portion of our army, as well as of the people of the United States, is Catholic, like yourselves. We punish crime wherever we find it, and reward merit and virtue.

"The army of the United States respects, and will ever respect, private property of every class, and the property of the Mexican church. Woe to him who does not — where we are.

"Mexicans: the past is beyond remedy, but the future may yet be controlled. I have repeatedly declared to you that the government and people of the United States desire peace — desire your sincere friendship. Abandon, then, state prejudices; cease to be the sport of private ambition, and conduct yourselves like a great American nation. Abandon at once those old colonial habits, and learn to be truly free—truly republican. You may then soon attain prosperity and happiness, of which you possess all the elements; but remember that you are Americans, and that your happiness is not to come from Europe.

“I desire, in conclusion, to say to you, with equal frankness, that, were it necessary, an army of one hundred thousand Americans would soon be among you; and that the United States, if forced to terminate by arms their differences with you, would not do it in an uncertain or precarious, or still less in a dishonourable manner. It would be an insult to the intelligent people of this country to doubt their knowledge of our power.

“The system of forming guerilla parties to annoy us will, I assure you, produce only evils to this country, and none to our army, which knows how to protect itself, and how to proceed against such cutthroats; and if, so far from calming resentments and passions, you try to irritate, you will but force upon us the hard necessity of retaliation. In that event, you cannot blame us for the consequences which will fall upon yourselves.

“I shall march with this army upon Puebla and Mexico. I do not conceal this from you. From those capitals I may again address you. We desire peace, friendship, and union; it is for you to choose whether you prefer continued hostilities. In either case, be assured I will keep my word.

HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE ARMY, }
JALAPA, May 11, 1847.” }

This proclamation of General Scott was highly commended by all parties in the United States, and was received with great favour by a large portion of the people of Mexico, who would have yielded at once to its generous suggestions, if they had been free to act for themselves. They were entirely in the power of their military leaders. The secretary of war thus commended the proclamation:—

“I have received and laid before the president the copy of your proclamation to the Mexican nation of the 11th of May. The considerations you have presented to the people of Mexico, as inducements to them to wish for peace and to concur in measures for the accomplishment of that desirable object, are well selected and ably enforced. As it could not have been your design to enter into a full discussion of the causes which led to the war, it is not to be taken as an authoritative exposition of the views of the executive in this respect; but he regards it as a document containing ‘topics and sentiments the most likely to find a response in the bosoms of the Mexicans, and to promote the cause of justice, moderation, and peace.’ Such were properly the scope and end of the proclamation, and most ably have they been carried out.”

Señor Auvaya was now president of Mexico ad interim. The Mexican congress was in session. So excited and exasperated were they, on receiving tidings of the disastrous issue of the battle of Cerro Gordo, that they “passed many violent decrees, breathing war to the uttermost against the United States; declaring that the executive should have no power to conclude a treaty, or even an armistice, and denouncing as a traitor any Mexican functionary who should entertain either proposition.” While the punishment of treason was thus proclaimed against any one who should presume to speak of peace, the executive officers were endowed with extraordinary powers for the prosecution of the war. The greatest activity prevailed. The guerilla system was strongly recommended and fostered. A levy en masse was ordered, the capital was declared in a state of siege, and great preparations were made to put the fortifications of the city in the best possible condition of defence.

Such being the temper of the existing government and the capital, it required something more than the issuing of a proclamation by General Scott, or the waving of an olive-branch by Mr. Trist, to restore the nation to its right mind.

Preparations for an advance upon the capital of Mexico were at length completed, and, on the 8th of May, General Worth took up his line of march from Perote. On the 15th he arrived at Puebla, and took possession of the city without resistance. General Santa Anna had arrived there but a few days before, expecting to find supplies of money, ammunition, arms, and men, and resolved to make another stand in defence of the passage to the capital. To his dismay, however, he found no preparations for defence, no means to employ for that purpose, and no spirit in the people to second his design. Forcible exactions were attempted, but without success. Ten thousand dollars were all he could obtain, even by force. It is due to Santa Anna to say, that he did what he could to induce, and even to compel, the place to make a stand. But there were absolute terror and perfect apathy with the people, and with the governor, Don Rafael Inzunza, a full conviction that defence was impossible in the then state of the city. Santa Anna was requested to evacuate, and leave the place to the mercy of the invaders.

Resolved, if possible, to do something to annoy the enemy, and attach some little éclat to his own position, Santa Anna attempted to surprise and cut off the American advance. Throwing forward a strong body of horse, by a circuitous and concealed route, to occupy the height of Chacapa, which overlooks the town of Amozoc, he thought to place himself between the two divisions of the American advance, of which General Worth led the van and General Quitman the rear. But Worth was too quick for him. He was already at Amozoc, though unaware of his approach. Instead of surprising his enemy, however, Santa Anna was himself surprised, and driven back with considerable loss. General Worth was not aware of the designs of the Mexican, until the head of his column was seen winding along the mountain side, and endeavoring to conceal itself in the thickets, the object being to pass Amozoc, attack Quitman, and thus compel Worth to fall back. Not knowing the intentions of the enemy, or what force he had to contend with, General Worth immediately threw the guns of the siege train into battery at the angles of the plaza of the village, and sent out corps of observation by different routes. Supposing, from their movements, that the enemy had Quitman's corps in view, he sent a detachment, under Colonel Garland, in that direction. On passing out of the village, a long column of lancers was seen moving rapidly down on the right. Their number was afterwards ascertained to be three thousand, unsupported by infantry or artillery. When the head of the column reached a point opposite the centre of the town, the batteries opened a rapid and effective fire. A few rounds sufficed to break and scatter the column. Flying up the sides of the hills, it soon after reunited, and resumed its march in the same direction as before. The 2d artillery and 8th infantry, with two sections of the light batteries, were put upon its track, when suddenly it swerved to the left, and disappeared among the hills. Retreating by the slope of the Malinche, and traversing, with great difficulty and fatigue, a portion of country which was every where broken by deep gullies, or tangled with almost impenetrable thickets, they arrived, a little before sunset, at Puebla, weary, dispirited, and their numbers somewhat reduced. General Santa Anna led this enterprise in person.

The result of this adventure tended in no way to rouse the authorities of Puebla to measures of resistance or defence; and General Santa Anna, after seizing all the horses he could find for the use of his cavalry, left the city early the next morning, continuing his retreat towards Mexico. The same day, the 15th of May, General Worth entered the city, the authorities having come out three miles to meet him, and make arrangements for the capitulation.

Santa Anna now fixed his head-quarters, temporarily, at the village of St. Martin Teamalucan, about twenty-five miles from Mexico. His recent defeats had lost him the confidence and favour of the people to a great extent. A new election, or, rather, an attempt at an election, had just passed, resulting in no choice. This left the general still in power, till a new election. Having, by great exertions, increased the force of the army, so as to make a fair show of power and resolution, he hastened to the capital, to see what could be done there to reestablish himself with the people. The city was distracted with contending factions. The government was a mere name, a shadow, under which unprincipled men sought to accomplish their private ends. Santa Anna, possessed of the extraordinary powers so recently conferred by congress, seized his personal enemies, and shut them up in prison, or assigned them to distant service. Almonte was incarcerated at San Jago, and Arista at Acapulco. Bustamante was ordered to Sinaloa, and Ampudia to Cuernavaca. This done, Santa Anna resigned the presidency, on the 29th of May. His example was soon followed by several generals, the veteran Bravo at their head, and all appeared in irretrievable confusion.

Having thus "sacrificed himself for the public good," and lain four days upon the altar, exposed to the admiration of the people and the army, who knew not which way to look for a leader, he rose, suddenly, on the 2d of June, withdrew his resignation, on which congress had taken no action, and resumed the dictator. The Mexicans were once more roused to vigorous action. Reënforcements to the army were rapidly concentrating, and the work of fortifying the city at every point was pushed with the greatest energy. Battalion after battalion poured in from the different cities and states of the republic; each sent its guns for the defence; while many more were in the process of casting, at a newly-established foundery near the capital; so that, by the end of June, the dictator found himself at the head of twenty-five thousand men, with sixty pieces of artillery.

The reënforcements did not arrive as fast as General Scott expected, and he was detained in a state of "masterly inactivity" nearly all summer. Impatient of the long delay, and knowing the heavy force already collecting about the capital of Mexico, he thought it best to concentrate his own forces. He accordingly, on the 3d of June, ordered up the garrison from Jalapa to Puebla, keeping possession of the castle of Perote, for the accommodation of the sick. This left the whole route from Perote to Vera Cruz unguarded, and open to the enemy. Parties of guerillas were skulking about in all directions, to cut off stragglers from the army, and to plunder the trains on their way to headquarters. These banditti were now well organized, having a secret understanding with the dictator. Colonel Cenobio, a notorious chief among them, held his rendezvous near Mango de Clavo, the magnificent hacienda of Santa Anna. Serious losses were incurred in this way by the Americans, and many valuable lives were sacrificed. On the 4th of June, Colonel McIntosh marched from Vera Cruz, with a train of one hundred and twenty-eight wagons, and a command of two companies of mounted and one of dismounted dragoons, and six of infantry. General Cadwallader followed him, on the 8th, with about five hundred men, and two mountain howitzers. On the 10th, he overtook McIntosh, both having been greatly annoyed by the guerilleros, who amused themselves by firing at a long range from behind the shelter of rock, or tree, or mound, and then retiring from pursuit. They also succeeded in robbing some of the wagons. On the 11th, the train arrived at the National Bridge, which spans the Rio de la Antigua, a few miles below Cerro Gordo. Here the enemy was found to be in considerable force, having possession of the bridge, and of the surrounding heights. The position was strong and well posted. It was near night, and the full force of the enemy was not seen. Cadwallader ordered an instant charge by a detachment of dragoons, at the same time bringing his howitzers to bear. When the dragoons reached the middle of the bridge, the hills on either side were suddenly lighted up by the flash of five hundred muskets. The dragoons were thrown into confusion, recoiled, and seemed about giving way, but immediately rallied under the voice and example of their commander, Lieutenant Maury, and carried the point. Had the Americans been in the position of the Mexicans, there would not have been a man left to tell how the adventure fared. The American soldiers take sure aim in fighting, which soon decides a conflict. The Mexicans generally fire at random, as if the flash and the noise were to frighten the enemy, or the lead to find its own way to his heart.

A temporary barricade, which had been thrown across the road, was instantly carried, and, the infantry coming up to the support of the dragoons, the enemy were dislodged, and driven back in great disorder. The Americans lost, in this affair, thirty-two men in the ranks, besides a considerable number of drivers, and other persons attendant upon the train. On the 13th, the march was resumed, the enemy hovering on its flanks all the way to Jalapa, and firing from the thickets, and from behind the rocks, inflicting a severe loss both in men and animals.

At the pass of La Hoya a similar reception was prepared for the train. The heights commanding the pass were occupied by guerilleros, and the passage was fiercely disputed, but carried without much loss. Joined by Colonel Childs at Jalapa, the train moved on to Perote, and awaited the arrival of General Pillow, who left Vera Cruz on the 17th, with fifteen hundred men. Though annoyed, in all its march, by small parties of skulking guerilleros, and threatened with serious opposition at the pass of El Pinal, the column reached Puebla on the 8th of July. By these accessions, General Scott's force was increased to more than ten thousand. General Pierce, who left Vera Cruz on the 19th of July, with a command of three thousand men, reached headquarters, at Puebla, early in August, having encountered the same difficulties and dangers with those who preceded him, and having lost, by the guerillas and by disease, nearly five hundred of his men.

By the 6th of August, the army was ready to commence its march on Mexico. Just at this moment, a communication was received, through secret agents, from the president-general of Mexico, of a character so singular, that, had it purported to come from any other man in the wide world, it would have been regarded as a forgery. But, as nothing in the way of duplicity, cunning, or treason, was out of character with Santa Anna, it was received as a genuine proposal, and treated as such. It suggested that, as the Mexicans relied upon their defences and their army of thirty-six thousand men, and felt confident of being able to annihilate the Americans on their approach to the city, the only hope of securing a peace was in once more attacking and carrying some of their strongholds. It accordingly proposed that General Scott should march into the valley with his whole force, assault and carry one of the outworks of the Mexican line of defence, its sworn defender conniving at and permitting it; and then, in the moment of gaining so signal an advantage, send in a flag of truce, and offer to negotiate. A previous proposition had been made to purchase a peace, by placing at the private disposal of the "invincible" Mexican a million of dollars. The desire to spare the effusion of blood was all that induced the American commander to listen to such proposals. He knew the character he had to deal with, and was as willing to buy the man who was willing to be sold, as to fight the man who, for a price, could secretly consent beforehand to be beaten. There was a division in the council in respect to these propositions. So little confidence was reposed in the integrity of Santa Anna, that no one was willing to risk even a delay of action upon the responsibility of his word. Yet all were desirous of accomplishing the great end of the war, by peaceable means if they could. General Scott was strongly inclined to meet the propositions as they rose, but could not bring himself to consent, after a partial victory, to seem to sue for peace. The result was a sort of non-committal answer, which left both parties free to act according to their own subsequent views of duty and interest.

The crisis of the war was now at hand. The capital of Mexico, the first and oldest city in the western world, the jewel of Central America, was about to be attacked—a city of one hundred and eighty thousand inhabitants, remarkably well situated for defence, and defended, at every assailable point, by fortifications deemed absolutely impregnable, and guarded by a well-appointed army of more than three times the force of the assailants. The contest was one of the most unequal that ever was waged. That of Cortez with Montezuma, in the same beautiful valley, three hundred and fifty years before, was scarcely more rash and daring. He had horses and fire-arms, which were wholly unknown to the Aztecs, and against which their simple arrows and their naked bodies were no defence. He had, also, the friendship and assistance of powerful tribes of natives, the natural enemies of Montezuma. The Americans had no such advantage. Every thing was against them but their own indomitable courage, and the very exigency of their case. They well knew that victory or annihilation were their only alternatives. A single defeat would have been their instant ruin. If they had faltered or given way at a single point, it would have nerved every arm in Mexico to resist and exterminate them. The doubtful and timid would have become bold as lions. Those who had been disposed, from fear or advantage, to show them respect, or to supply their wants, would have combined en masse, to crush them; all factions, and all leaders, would have united, each vying with the other to immolate, on the altar of their country, the greatest possible number of their ruthless invaders. Under these circumstances, the American army took up their last line of march, and entered the valley on the 10th of August. The headquarters of the commander-in-chief were fixed at Ayotla, a small village on the north-eastern angle of Lake Chalco.

An extraordinary energy seemed to have taken possession of the Mexican troops. A determination to resist to the last extremity appeared to govern them all. Those persons who had hitherto been anxious for the establishment of peace now hesitated to utter their sentiments, and all seemed resolved to vindicate the honour of their country. Fortifications were repaired, cannon cast, and powder manufactured with great industry. The plan of operations adopted by Santa Anna was, to await the attack of the Americans in his intrenchments, while the army of the north, under General Valencia, composed of the flower of the Mexican troops, was ordered to assail the invaders in the rear. The first barrier to the advance of General Scott was the truly formidable position of El Peñon. This was a lofty hill, on the southern shore of Lake Tezcuco, strongly fortified, and commanding the great thoroughfare leading to the city. On the southern line of the city were the fortifications of Mexicalcingo, San Antonio, the Convent, and the bridge of Churubusco. Its south-western side was defended by the fortress of Chapultepec. The north, from whence no danger of attack could be apprehended, was only protected by three garitas; while the eastern part, where it was supposed the Americans would make the most formidable demonstration, was defended by El Peñon. On the 9th of August, the brigade of General Leon marched out of the city, for the purpose of covering that fortification. Santa Anna himself visited it, for the purpose of giving his final orders for its defence.

On the 12th, a daring and successful reconnaissance of El Peñon was effected. As the party approached, a Mexican, in the proud confidence that the place was absolutely impregnable, jumped upon the parapet, and shouted defiance to the invaders. On the 13th, a detachment, under the command of Brigadier-General Smith, ventured into the narrow valley beyond El Peñon, to reconnoitre Mexicalcingo. This was the most daring reconnaissance of the whole war. To accomplish it, a handful of men were obliged to traverse a narrow pass between two of the most formidable of the enemy's strongholds, where they were in the most imminent danger of being shut up between two fires, without the possibility of an escape. The adventure was ably and successfully conducted. The two great outposts of the city were declared to be impregnable, and consequently the ordinary route to its gates was impracticable. The army was encamped, in divisions, in several small villages along the northern and eastern shores of Lake Chalco. Lieutenant-Colonel Duncan having volunteered to reconnoitre the road around the southern shore of that lake, and found it practicable, the whole army was put in motion on the 15th, with a view to reach the capital by its southern approach, and thus avoid the necessity of carrying those formidable outposts in the northern valley. The southern line of defence was by no means feebly fortified. It consisted of several points, no one of them, except San Antonio, to be compared to El Peñon or Mexicalcingo, but altogether presenting an appalling barrier to so small an army. San Antonio, Contreras, San Angel, Churubusco, Tacubaya, Molino del Rey, and Chapultepec, were each in succession to be carried, before they could reach the city, which, with their ranks thinned, and their strength exhausted by so many hard-fought battles, might prove the most difficult conquest of all. The events of the first few days that followed this movement will be given in the language of General Scott's official report to the war department. If it seem partial and one sided, it will have, at least, the advantage of coming fresh from the pen of one who ought to have known every circumstance accurately, and whose successes were so brilliant and uninterrupted, that he could well afford to allow to his enemy every advantage which they could with any propriety claim; and, as it details the actions, and applauds the gallantry of his officers and men, it is wholly free from that distasteful egotism which usually characterizes the narratives of personal exploits. It commences at San Augustin, the last unfortified village on the south-western border of Lake Xochimilco.

"Arriving here on the 18th, Worth's division and Harney's cavalry were pushed forward a league, to reconnoitre, and to carry or to mask San Antonio, on the direct road to the capital. This village was found strongly defended by field-works, heavy guns, and a numerous garrison. It could only be turned by infantry to the left, over a field of volcanic rocks and lava; for, to our right, the ground was too boggy. It was soon ascertained, by the daring engineers, Captain Mason and Lieutenants Stevens and Tower, that he point could only be approached, by the front, over a narrow causeway, flanked with wet ditches of great depth. Worth was ordered not to attack, but to threaten and to mask the place.

"The first shot fired from San Antonio, on the 18th, killed Captain S. Thornton,* 2d dragoons, a gallant officer, who was covering the operations with his company.

"The same day, a reconnaissance was commenced to the left of San Augustin, first over difficult mounds, and farther on, over the same field of volcanic rocks and lava, which extends to the mountains, some five miles from San Antonio towards Magdalena. This reconnaissance was continued by Captain Lee, assisted by Lieutenants Beauregard and Tower, all of the engineers; who were joined, in the afternoon, by Major Smith, of the same corps. Other divisions coming up, Pillow's was advanced to make a practicable road for heavy artillery, and Twiggs's thrown farther in front, to cover that operation; for, by the partial reconnaissance of yesterday, Captain Lee discovered a large corps of observation in that direction, with a detachment of which his supports of cavalry and foot under Captain Kearney and Lieutenant-Colonel Graham, respectively, had a successful skirmish.

"By three o'clock this afternoon, the advanced divisions came to a point where the new road could only be continued under the direct fire of twenty-two pieces of the enemy's artillery, most of them of large calibre, placed in a strong intrenched camp, to oppose our operations, and surrounded by every advantage of ground, besides immense bodies of cavalry and infantry, hourly reënforced from the city, over an excellent road beyond the volcanic field, and consequently entirely beyond the reach of our cavalry and artillery.

"Arriving on the ground an hour later, I found that Pillow's and Twiggs's division had advanced to dislodge the enemy, picking their way (all officers on foot) along his front, and extending themselves towards the road, from the city and the enemy's left. Captain Magruder's field battery, of twelve and six-pounders, and Lieutenant Callender's battery of mountain howitzers and rockets, had also, with great difficulty, been advanced within range of the intrenched camp. These batteries, most gallantly served, suffered much, in the course of the afternoon, from the enemy's superior metal.

to rage, with great violence, until nightfall. General P. F. Smith's and Colonel Riley's brigades, supported by Generals Pierce and Cadwallader's brigades, were more than three hours under a heavy fire of artillery and musketry, along the almost impassable ravine in front and to the left of the intrenched camp. Besides the twenty-two pieces of artillery, the camp and ravine were defended closely by masses of infantry, and these again supported by clouds of cavalry at hand and hovering in view. Consequently, no decided impression could be made by daylight on the enemy's most formidable position, because, independent of the difficulty of the ravine, our infantry, unaccompanied by cavalry and artillery, could not advance in column without being mowed down by the grape and canister of the batteries, nor advance in line without being ridden over by the enemy's numerous cavalry. All our corps, however, including Magruder's and Callender's last batteries, not only maintained the exposed positions early gained, but all attempted charges upon them, respectively, — particularly on Riley, twice closely engaged with cavalry in greatly superior numbers, — were repulsed and punished.

"From an eminence, soon after arriving near the scene, I observed the church and hamlet of Contreras, (or Ansalda,) on the road leading up from the capital, through the intrenched camp, to Magdalena; and seeing, at the same time, the stream of reinforcements advancing by that road from the city, I ordered Colonel Morgan, with his regiment, till then held in reserve by Pillow, to move forward, and to occupy Contreras, (or Ansalda,) being persuaded, if occupied, it would arrest the enemy's reinforcements, and ultimately decide the battle.

"Riley was already on the enemy's left, in advance of the hamlet. A few minutes later, Brigadier-General Shields, with his volunteer brigade, coming up, under my orders, from San Augustin, I directed Shields to follow and to sustain Morgan. These corps, over the extreme difficulties of ground — partially covered with a low forest — before described, reached Contreras, and found Cadwallader's brigade in position, observing the formidable movement from the capital, and much needing the timely reinforcement.

"It was already dark, and the cold rain had begun to fall in torrents upon our unsheltered troops; for the hamlet, though a strong defensive position, can hold only the wounded men, and, unfortunately, the new regiments have little or nothing to eat in their haversacks. Wet, hungry, and without the possibility of sleep, all our gallant corps, I learn, are full of confidence, and only wait for the last hour of darkness, to gain the positions whence to storm and carry the enemy's works.

"The morning of the 20th opened with one of a series of unsurpassed achievements, all in view of the capital, and to which I shall give the general name battle of Mexico.

"In the night of the 19th, Generals Shields, P. F. Smith, and Cadwallader, and Colonel Riley, with their brigades, and the 15th regiment, under Colonel Morgan, detached from General Pierce, found themselves in and about the important position, the village, hamlet, or hacienda, called, indifferently, Contreras, Ansalda, San Geronimo, half a mile nearer to the city than the enemy's intrenched camp, on the same road, towards the factory of Magdalena.

"That camp had been, unexpectedly, our formidable point of attack the afternoon before, and we had now to take it, without the aid of cavalry or artillery, or to throw back our advanced corps upon the road from San Augustin to the city, and thence force a passage through San Antonio.

"Accordingly, to meet contingencies, Major-General Worth was ordered to leave, early in the morning of the 20th, one of his brigades to mask San Antonio, and to march, with the other, six miles, via San Augustin, upon Contreras. A like destination was given to Major-General Quitman and his remaining brigade in San Augustin, replacing, for the moment, the garrison of that important depot with Harney's brigade of cavalry, as horse could not pass over the intervening rocks to reach the field of battle.

"Shields, the senior officer at the hamlet, having arrived in the night, after Smith had arranged with Cadwallader and Riley the plan of attack for the morning, delicately waived interference, but reserved to himself the double task of holding the hamlet, with his two regiments, (South Carolina and New York volunteers,) against ten times his numbers on the side of the city, including the slopes to his left, and, in case the camp in his rear should be carried, to face about and cut off the flying enemy.

"At 3 o'clock A. M., the great movement commenced on the rear of the enemy's camp, Riley leading, followed successively by Cadwallader's and Smith's brigades, the latter temporarily under the orders of Major Dimick of the 1st artillery; the whole force being commanded by Smith, the senior in the general attack, and whose arrangements, skill, and gallantry always challenge the highest admiration.

"The march was rendered tedious by the darkness, rain, and mud; but, about sunrise, Riley, conducted by Lieutenant Tower, engineer, had reached an elevation behind the enemy, whence he precipitated his columns, stormed the intrenchments, planted his several colours upon them, and carried the work—all in seventeen minutes.

"Conducted by Lieutenant Beauregard, engineer, and Lieutenant Brooks, of Twiggs's staff,—both of whom, like Lieutenant Tower, had, in the night, twice reconnoitred the ground,—Cadwallader brought up to the general assault two of his regiments, the voltigeurs and the 11th, and at the appointed time, Colonel Ransom, with his temporary brigade, conducted by Captain Lee, engineer, not only made the movement to divert and to distract the enemy, but, after crossing the deep ravine in his front, advanced, and poured into the works, and upon the fugitives, many volleys from his destructive musketry.

"In the mean time, Smith's own brigade, under the temporary command of Major Dimick, following the movements of Riley and Cadwallader, discovered, opposite to, and outside of the works, a long line of Mexican cavalry, drawn up as a support. Dimick, having at the head of the brigade the company of sappers and miners, under Lieutenant Smith, engineer, who had conducted the march, was ordered by Brigadier-General Smith to form line faced to the enemy, and, in a charge against a flank, routed the cavalry.

"Shields, too, by the wise disposition of his brigade, and gallant activity, contributed much to the general results. He held masses of cavalry and infantry, supported by artillery, in check below him, and captured hundreds, with one general, (Mendoza,) of those who fled from above.

"I doubt whether a more brilliant or decisive victory,—taking into view ground, artificial defences, batteries, and the extreme disparity of numbers,—without cavalry or artillery on our side, is to be found on record. Including all our corps directed against the intrenched camp, with Shields's brigade at the hamlet, we positively did not number over four thousand five hundred rank and file; and we knew by sight, and since, more certainly, by many captured documents and letters, that the enemy had actually engaged on the spot seven thousand men, with at least twelve thousand more hovering within sight and striking distance, both on the 19th and 20th. All, not killed or captured, now fled with precipitation.

"Thus was the great victory of Contreras achieved; one road to the capital opened, seven hundred of the enemy killed; eight hundred and thirteen prisoners, including, among eighty-eight officers, four generals; besides many colours and standards; twenty-two pieces of brass ordnance, half of large calibre; thousands of small arms and accoutrements; an immense quantity of shot, shells, powder, and cartridges; seven hundred pack mules, many horses, &c., &c.; all in our hands.

"The battle being won before the advancing brigades of Worth's and Quitman's divisions were in sight, both were ordered back to their late positions; Worth to attack San Antonio in front, with his whole force, as soon as approached in the rear by Pillow's and Twiggs's divisions; moving from Contreras, through San Angel and Coyoacan. By carrying San Antonio, we knew that we should open another, a shorter and better, road to the capital, for our siege and other trains.

"Accordingly, the two advanced divisions and Shields's brigade marched from Contreras, under the immediate orders of Major-General Pillow, who was now joined by the gallant Brigadier-General Pierce, of his division, personally thrown out of activity, late the evening before, by a severe hurt from the fall of his horse.

"After giving necessary orders on the field, in the midst of prisoners and trophies, and sending instructions to Harney's brigade of cavalry, left at San Augustin, to join me, I personally followed Pillow's command.

"Arriving at Coyoacan, two miles, by a cross road, from the rear of San Antonio, I first detached Captain Lee, engineer, with Captain Kearney's troop 1st dragoons, supported by the rifle regiment, under Major Loring, to reconnoitre that strong point; and next despatched Major-General Pillow, with one of his brigades, (Cadwallader's,) to make the attack upon it, in concert with Major-General Worth on the opposite side.

"At the same time, by another road to the left, Lieutenant Stevens, of the engineers, supported by Lieutenant G. W. Smith's company of sappers and miners, of the same corps, was sent to reconnoitre the strongly fortified church or convent of San Pablo, in the hamlet of Churubusco, one mile off. Twiggs, with one of his brigades, (Smith's, less the rifles,) and Captain Taylor's field battery, were ordered to follow and to attack the convent. Major Smith, senior engineer, was despatched to concert with Twiggs the mode and means of attack, and Twiggs's other brigade (Riley's) I soon ordered up to support him.

"Next I sent Pierce, (just able to keep the saddle,) with his brigade, conducted by Captain Lee, engineer, by a third road, a little farther to our left, to attack the enemy's right and rear, in order to favour the movement upon the convent, and cut off the retreat towards the capital. And, finally, Shields, senior brigadier to Pierce, with the New York and South Carolina volunteers, was ordered to follow Pierce closely, and to take the command of our left wing. All these movements were made with the utmost alacrity by our gallant troops and commanders.

"Finding myself at Coyoacan, from which so many roads conveniently branched, without escort or reserve, I had to advance, for safety, close upon Twigg's rear. The battle now raged from the right to the left of our whole line.

"Learning, on the return of Captain Lee, that Shields, in the rear of Churubusco, was hard pressed, and in danger of being outflanked, if not overwhelmed, by greatly superior numbers, I immediately sent, under Major Sumner, the rifles, (Twigg's reserve,) and Captain Sibley's troop 2d dragoons, then at hand, to support our left, guided by the same engineer.

"About an hour earlier, Worth had, by skilful and daring movements upon the front and right, turned and forced San Antonio; its garrison, no doubt, much shaken by our decisive victory at Contreras.

"The forcing of San Antonio was the second brilliant event of the day.

"Worth's division being soon reunited in hot pursuit, he was joined by Major-General Pillow, who, marching from Coyoacan, and discovering that San Antonio had been carried, immediately turned to the left, according to my instructions, and, though much impeded by ditches and swamps, hastened to the attack of Churubusco.

"The hamlet, or scattered houses bearing this name, presented, besides the fortified convent, a strong field-work, (tête de pont), with regular bastions and curtains, at the head of a bridge over which the road passed from San Antonio to the capital.

"The whole remaining forces of Mexico, (some twenty-seven thousand men,) cavalry, artillery, and infantry, collected from every quarter, were now in, on the flanks, or within supporting distance of those works, and seemed resolved to make a last and desperate stand; for if beaten here, the feebler defences at the gates of the city (four miles off) could not, as was well known to both parties, delay the victors an hour.

"The fortified church or convent, hotly pressed by Twigg, had already held out about an hour, when Worth and Pillow, the latter having with him Cadwallader's brigade, began to manœuvre closely upon the tête de pont, with the convent at half gun-shot to their left. Garland's brigade, (Worth's division,) to which had been added the light battalion under Lieutenant-Colonel Smith, continued to advance in front, and, under the fire of a long line of infantry, off on the left of the bridge; and Clarke, of the same division, directed his brigade along the road, or close by its side. Two of Pillow's and Cadwallader's regiments, the 11th and 14th, supported, and participated in this direct movement; the other, the voltigeurs, was left in reserve. Most of these corps, particularly Clarke's brigade, advancing perpendicularly, were made to suffer much by the fire of the tête de pont, and they would have suffered greatly more by flank attacks from the convent, but for the pressure of Twigg on the other side of that work.

"This well-combined and daring movement at length reached the principal point of attack, and the formidable tête de pont was at once assaulted and carried by the bayonet. Its deep wet ditch was first gallantly crossed by the 8th and 5th infantry, commanded, respectively, by Major Waite and Lieutenant-Colonel Scott, followed closely by the 6th infantry, which had been so much exposed on the road; the 11th regiment, under Lieutenant-Colonel Graham; and the 14th, commanded by Colonel Trousdale. About the same time, the enemy in front of Garland, after a hot conflict of an hour and a half, gave way, in a retreat towards the capital.

"The immediate results of this third signal triumph of the day were, three field-pieces, one hundred and ninety-two prisoners, much ammunition, and two colours taken at the tête de pont.

"Lieutenant J. F. Irons, aid-de-camp to Brigadier-General Cadwallader, a young officer of great merit, and conspicuous in battle on several previous occasions, received, in front of the work, a mortal wound.

"As the concurrent attack upon the convent favoured, physically and morally, the assault upon the tête de pont, so, reciprocally, no doubt, the fall of the latter contributed to the capture of the former. The two works were only some four hundred and fifty yards apart; and as soon as we were in possession of the tête de pont, a captured four-pounder was turned and fired several times upon the convent. In the same brief interval, Lieutenant-Colonel Duncan gallantly brought two of his guns to bear, at a short range, from the San Antonio road, upon the principal face of the work, and on the tower of the church, which, in the obstinate contest, had been often refilled with some of the best sharp-shooters of the enemy.

"Finally, twenty minutes after the tête de pont had been carried by Worth and Pillow, and at the end of a desperate conflict of two hours and a half, the church or convent, — the citadel of the strong line of defence along the rivulet of Churubusco, — yielded to Twiggs's division, and threw out on all sides signals of surrender. The white flags, however, were not exhibited until the moment when the 3d infantry, under Captain Alexander, had cleared the way by fire and bayonet, and had entered the work. Captain J. M. Smith and Lieutenant O. L. Shepherd, both of that regiment, with their companies, had the glory of leading the assault. The former received the surrender, and Captain Alexander instantly hung out from the balcony the colours of the gallant 3d. Major Dimick, with a part of the 1st artillery, serving as infantry, entered nearly abreast with the leading troops.

"Captain Taylor's field battery, attached to Twiggs's division, opened its effective fire, at an early moment, upon the outworks of the convent and the tower of its church. Exposed to the severest fire of the enemy, the captain, his officers and men, won universal admiration; but, at length, much disabled in men and horses, the battery was, by superior orders, withdrawn from the action, thirty minutes before the surrender of the convent.

"Those corps, excepting Taylor's battery, belonged to the brigade of Brigadier-General Smith, who closely directed the whole attack in front, with his habitual coolness and ability; while Riley's brigade, under Captain T. Morris and Lieutenant-Colonel Plympton, vigorously engaged the right of the work and part of its rear. At the moment, the rifles, belonging to Smith's, were detached in support of Brigadier-General Shields on our extreme left; and the 4th artillery, acting as infantry, under Major Gardner, belonging to Riley's brigade, had been left in charge of the camp, trophies, &c., at Contreras. Twiggs's division, at Churubusco, had thus been deprived of the services of two of its most gallant and effective regiments.

"The immediate results of this victory were, the capture of seven field-pieces, some ammunition, one colour, three generals, and one thousand two hundred and sixty-one prisoners, including other officers.

"Captains E. A. Capron and M. J. Burke, and Lieut-tenant S. Hoffman, all of the 1st artillery, and Captain J. W. Anderson and Lieutenant Thomas Easley, both of the 2d infantry, (five officers of great merit,) fell gallantly before this work.

"The capture of the enemy's citadel was the fourth great achievement of our arms in the same day.

"It has been stated that, some two hours and a half before, Pierce's, followed closely by the volunteer brigade, (both under the command of Brigadier-General Shields,) had been detached to our left to turn the enemy's works, to prevent the escape of the garrisons, and to oppose the extension of the enemy's numerous corps from the rear upon and around our left.

"Considering the inferior numbers of the two brigades, the objects of the movement were difficult to accomplish. Hence the reinforcement sent forward a little later.

"In a winding march of a mile around to the right, this temporary division found itself on the edge of an open, wet meadow, near the road from San Antonio to the capital, and in the presence of some four thousand of the enemy's infantry, a little in rear of Churubusco, on that road. Establishing the right at a strong building, Shields extended his left parallel to the road, to outflank the enemy towards the capital. But the enemy extending his right, supported by three thousand cavalry, more rapidly (being favoured by better ground) in the same direction, Shields concentrated the division about a hamlet, and determined to attack in front. The battle was long, hot, and varied; but, ultimately, success crowned the zeal and gallantry of our troops, ably directed by their distinguished commander. Our fifth victory in the same day.

"Shields took three hundred and eighty prisoners, including officers; and it cannot be doubted that the rage of the conflict between him and the enemy, just in the rear of the tête de pont and the convent, had some influence on the surrender of those formidable defences.

"As soon as the tête de pont was carried, the greater part of Worth's and Pillow's forces passed that bridge in rapid pursuit of the flying enemy. These distinguished generals, coming up with Brigadier-General Shields, now also victorious, the three continued to press upon the fugitives to within a mile and a half of the capital. Here, Colonel Harney, with a small part of his brigade of cavalry, rapidly passed to the front, and charged the enemy up to the nearest gate.

"The cavalry charge was headed by Captain Kearney, of the 1st dragoons, having in squadron, with his own troop, that of Captain McReynolds of the 3d; making the usual escort to general head-quarters; but, being early in the day attached for general service, was now under Colonel Harney's orders. The gallant captain, not hearing the recall, that had been sounded, dashed up to the San Antonio gate, sabring, in his way, all who resisted. Of the seven officers of the squadron, Kearney lost his left arm, McReynolds and Lieutenant Lorimer Graham were both severely wounded, and Lieutenant R. S. Ewell, who succeeded to the command of the escort, had two horses killed under him. Major F. D. Mills, of the 15th infantry, a volunteer in this charge, was killed at the gate.

"So terminated the series of events which I have but feebly presented. My thanks were freely poured out, on the different fields, to the abilities and science of generals and other officers, to the gallantry and prowess of all, the rank and file included. But a reward infinitely higher—the applause of a grateful country and government—will, I cannot doubt, be accorded, in due time, to so much merit, of every sort, displayed by this glorious army, which has now overcome all difficulties—distance, climate, ground, fortifications, numbers.

"It has, in a single day, in many battles, as often defeated thirty-two thousand men; made about three thousand prisoners, including eight generals, (two of them ex-presidents,) and two hundred and five other officers; killed or wounded four thousand of all ranks, besides entire corps dispersed and dissolved; captured thirty-seven pieces of ordnance,—more than trebling our siege train and field batteries,—with a large number of small arms, a full supply of ammunition of every kind, &c., &c.

"These great results have overwhelmed the enemy.

"Our loss amounts to one thousand fifty-three—killed, one hundred and thirty-nine, including sixteen officers; wounded, eight hundred and seventy-six, with sixty officers. The greater number of the dead and disabled were of the highest worth. Those under treatment—thanks to our very able medical officers—are generally doing well.

"I regret having been obliged, on the 20th, to leave Major-General Quitman, an able commander, with a part of his division, (the fine 2d Pennsylvania volunteers and the veteran detachment of United States marines,) at our important depot, San Augustin. It was there that I had placed our sick and wounded; also the siege, supply, and baggage trains. If these had been lost, the army would have been driven almost to despair; and considering the enemy's very great excess of numbers, and the many approaches to the depot, it might well have become, emphatically, the post of honour.

"After so many victories, we might, with but little additional loss, have occupied the capital the same evening. But Mr. Trist, commissioner, as well as myself, had been admonished by the best friends of peace—intelligent neutrals and some American residents—against precipitation; lest, by wantonly driving away the government and others, (dishonoured,) we might scatter the elements of peace, excite a spirit of national desperation, and thus indefinitely postpone the hope of accommodation. Deeply impressed with this danger, and remembering our mission, (to conquer a peace,) the army very cheerfully sacrificed to patriotism—to the great wish and want of our country—the éclat that would have followed an entrance, sword in hand, into a great capital. Willing to leave something to this republic, (of no immediate value to us,) on which to rest her pride, and to recover temper, I halted our victorious corps at the gates of the city, (at least for a time,) and have them now cantoned in the neighbouring villages, where they are well sheltered and supplied with all necessaries.

"On the morning of the 21st, being about to take up battering or assaulting positions, to authorize me to summon the city to surrender, or to sign an armistice, with a pledge to enter at once into negotiations for peace, a mission came out to propose a truce. Rejecting its terms, I despatched my contemplated note to President Santa Anna, omitting the summons. The 22d, commissioners were appointed by the commanders of the two armies; the armistice was signed the 23d, and ratifications exchanged the 24th.

"All matters in dispute between the two governments have been thus happily turned over to their plenipotentiaries, who have now had several conferences, and with, I think, some hope of signing a treaty of peace."

The "intelligent neutrals," to whose counsel General Scott refers, were the ambassador and consul-general of Great Britain, and other foreign functionaries, who now interposed to save the city from the horrors of a siege and bombardment. The result was a temporary armistice, on the terms set forth in the following paper:—

"HEAD-QUARTERS OF THE ARMY, }
TACUBAYA, August 24, 1847. }

"GENERAL ORDERS, } No. 262. }

"The following military convention is published for the information and strict government of the American army, its retainers and followers. Any infraction of one or more of the articles of the said convention shall be followed by rigorous punishment.

"The undersigned appointed respectively, the three first by Major-General Winfield Scott, commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States, and the two last by his excellency D. Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna, President of the Mexican republic, and commander-in-chief of its armies, met with full powers, which were duly verified, in the village of Tacubaya, on the 22d day of August, 1847, to enter into an armistice, for the purpose of giving the Mexican government an opportunity of receiving propositions for peace from the commissioner appointed by the president of the United States, and now with the American army, when the following articles were agreed upon:—

"ARTICLE 1. Hostilities shall instantly and absolutely cease between the armies of the United States of America and the United Mexican States, within thirty leagues of the capital of the latter States, to allow time to the commissioner appointed by the United States, and the commissioners to be appointed by the Mexican republic, to negotiate.

"2. This armistice shall continue as long as the commissioners of the two governments may be engaged in negotiations, or until the commander of either of the said armies shall give formal notice to the other of the cessation of the armistice, and for forty-eight hours after such notice.

"3. In the mean time, neither army shall, within thirty leagues of the city of Mexico, commence any new fortification, or military work of offence or defence, or do any thing to enlarge or strengthen any existing work or fortification of that character within the said limits.

"4. Neither army shall be reënforced within the same. Any reënforcements in troops or munitions of war, other than subsistence now approaching either army, shall be stopped at the distance of at least twenty-eight leagues from the city of Mexico.

"5. Neither army, nor any detachment from it, shall advance beyond the line it at present occupies.

"6. Neither army, nor any detachment or individual of either, shall pass the neutral limits established by the last article, except under flags of truce bearing the correspondence between the two armies, or on the business authorized by the next article; and individuals of either army, who may chance to straggle within the neutral limits, shall, by the opposite party, be kindly warned off, or sent back to their own army under flags of truce.

"7. The American army shall not, by violence, obstruct the passage from the open country into the city of Mexico, of the ordinary supplies of food necessary to the consumption of its inhabitants, or the Mexican army within the city; nor shall the Mexican authorities, civil or military, do any act to obstruct the passage of supplies from the city or the country needed by the American army.

"8. All American prisoners of war, remaining in the hands of the Mexican army, and not heretofore exchanged, shall immediately, or as soon as practicable, be restored to the American army against a like number (having regard to rank) of Mexican prisoners captured by the American army.

"9. [Omitted.]

"10. The better to enable the belligerent armies to execute these articles, and to favour the great object of peace, it is further agreed between the parties, that any courier with despatches that either army shall desire to send along the line from the city of Mexico, or its vicinity, to and from Vera Cruz, shall receive a safe-conduct from the commander of the opposing army.

"11. The administration of justice between Mexicans, according to the general and state constitutions and laws, by the local authorities of the towns and places occupied by the American forces, shall not be obstructed in any manner.

"12. Persons and property shall be respected in the towns and places occupied by the American forces. No person shall be molested in the exercise of his profession; nor shall the services of any one be required without his consent. In all cases where services are voluntarily rendered, a just price shall be paid, and trade remain unmolested.

"13. Those wounded prisoners who may desire to remove to some more convenient place for the purpose of being cured of their wounds, shall be allowed to do so without molestation—they still remaining prisoners.

"14. Those Mexican medical officers who may wish to attend the wounded shall have the privilege of doing so, if their services be required.

"15. For the more perfect execution of this agreement, two commissioners shall be appointed, (one by each party,) who, in case of disagreement, shall appoint a third.

"16. This convention shall have no force or effect unless approved by their excellencies the commanders respectively of the two armies, within twenty-four hours, reckoning from 6 o'clock, A. M., of the 22d day of August, 1847.

BENITO QUIJANO."

On the day following the ratification of this convention, Mr. Trist commenced his diplomatic duties by addressing a note to Señor Pacheco, minister of foreign relations, announcing his readiness to enter upon the negotiation of a treaty. This, after some delay, resulted in the appointment of commissioners, to whom Mr. Trist submitted the project of a treaty, which had been prepared at Washington. While this was under discussion, a powerful opposition to every species of negotiation was beginning to be fomented in the city, and in various sections of the country. The enemies of Santa Anna, who were many and powerful, opposed the measure altogether. The deputies to congress, who were summoned to deliberate upon it, refused, for the most part, to attend. Protests against it were sent in from the neighbouring states, and from cliques of the absent deputies, reminding Santa Anna that the law was still unrepealed, which pronounced it treason to open negotiations with the enemy, while he remained upon their soil. The common people were roused to indignation against the Yankees. Their hatred had increased with the success of the American arms. The panic occasioned by those successes, and the steady and irresistible march of the invaders, was beginning to subside, as they moved in and out among them, and saw they were but men. They shouted insultingly as they passed, and even attacked the provision train, as, in accordance with the provisions of the convention, it was receiving supplies in the city.

These difficulties increased as the negotiations advanced. Protests and proclamations came in from every quarter. The president was openly accused of high treason, and articles of impeachment were drawn up and published. The greater part of this opposition arose from parties and factions hostile to Santa Anna, who sought to destroy him, by undermining his influence with the army. So long as that army stood by him, he cared little for his enemies, or for his country. He sought only to establish his own power, and to secure, if possible, the million of dollars which had once been proffered as the price of submission.

Difficulties, also, arose among the negotiators. The demands of the United States were large, covering, from the commencement, all that they have since acquired, and considerably more. They were, for the most part, peremptorily resisted, and counter demands presented, on the part of Mexico, as if she were the conquering party, with full power to dictate her own terms. She proved wholly impracticable, and the negotiations were finally broken off, without coming to any result.

The advantage of this delay was all on the side of the Mexicans. They had gained time to recruit their wasted forces, and strengthen their fortifications, and, despite the provisions of the convention, they had done both industriously. After the battle of Churubusco, the victorious American army might have marched at once into the city, and dictated its own terms. The panic was too great, the rout too complete and overwhelming, to have admitted of any formidable resistance at that time. And it reflects the highest credit upon General Scott, that, in the hope of peace, he should willingly forego such advantages, at such a crisis, and relinquish, for the good of the vanquished, all the éclat of a triumphal entry into their capital. It is true, it cost another hard-fought battle in the end, and the loss of many valuable lives. In a military point of view, it may have been ill judged. But the motive which dictated it is not only above all reproach or suspicion, but demands the admiration of all who can appreciate that noble sentiment of inspiration, "Greater is he that ruleth his spirit than he that taketh a city." The great error of the American commander, in all this matter, was, that he placed confidence in the integrity of Santa Anna—a man whose whole political career had been a mere tissue of duplicity, intrigue, and faithlessness, and whose name will yet come to be a synonyme for treachery. In this, however, the general had the countenance and sympathy, and perhaps the secret instructions, of the president and his cabinet. With the same inane reliance upon the man and his promises, they had opened wide the doors, of which they held the key, and suffered him to enter, who, with all his faults, was the only man in Mexico who could rouse and unite the people, or hope successfully to fight their battles. It would seem, that they were afraid of too easy a victory. They wanted something for the invading army to achieve. They therefore furnished them, at their own cost, a head—a man of immense resources, of great influence with the people, of unscrupulous daring in the assumption of power; a man thoroughly acquainted with the country and the people, and accustomed to lead them like sheep to the slaughter. That, after so many triumphs over this wily foe, when all but his last defence was carried, and he stood at his very gates, with a victorious army panting to enter, General Scott should have supposed that foe honest in proposing a parley, and wishing to negotiate, is certainly far less remarkable than that the cabinet of Washington should have sought him in the cockpits of Havana, proffered a passport, and opened the blockade, at the very time, when, wanting a daring leader, it was certain the Mexicans would forgive the past, and receive him with open arms. The arrangement is a mystery yet to be explained. The ordinary principles of diplomacy, and of war, are at fault in the elucidation. The unchallenged entrance of Paredes, through all the barriers of military occupation and surveillance, at the moment when the popularity and power of Santa Anna were on the wane from so many defeats, is a kindred enigma, which even time, that reveals all things, will probably not explain.

Santa Anna had gained one of his ends—for such a thing as a single purpose he scarcely understood: he had gained time to improve his positions for defence, and to rouse in the people a spirit which he hoped might at length prevail, to drive back the proud invaders. Success in this last attempt would have placed him on the pinnacle of power, and enabled him to crush at once those domestic foes whom he hated and feared far more than the foreign ones. And he might well hope, that, with an army of more than three times the force of that of the Americans, and a population of several hundred thousand, now in their last intrenchments, fighting for their capital, their beloved city, their altars and their hearths, with no possible alternative but victory, or submission to the terms they had just scornfully rejected, they might yet achieve a defence, and, falling upon their constantly diminishing assailants, exterminate them at once. Whatever were his hopes, or those of his people, a renewal of hostilities was determined upon.

The armistice had continued two weeks. On the 6th of September, immediately after the interruption of the negotiations, General Scott informed the Mexican commander that, in view of the repeated violations, on his part, of the terms of the convention, he had full right to consider it at an end, and that, unless full satisfaction were given before noon of the following day, he should act accordingly. Santa Anna's reply was recriminative and defiant, concluding with a high resolve "to repel force by force, with that decision and energy which his high obligations imposed upon him." The armistice was, consequently, at an end.

General Scott had received the impression that there was a foundery in active operation at Molino del Rey, and that a large number of men were employed there in preparing cannon for the Mexican defences. He therefore resolved to make that the first point of attack, hoping, by breaking up the machinery, and stopping the manufacture of cannon, to weaken the enemy essentially in his plans of defence.

The range of strong stone buildings, known as El Molino del Rey, or the Royal Mill, is nearly a mile north of the village of Tacubaya. It is some five hundred yards long, and constructed of massive stone. It forms the western side of an enclosure, which surrounds the castle and grounds of Chapultepec, the castle being about two thirds of a mile from the Mill, overlooking and commanding, from its lofty seat of rock, not only that position, but a large sweep of country on every side of it. The Molino was occupied by a strong corps of troops, under General Leon. The doors, windows, and gateways were strongly barricaded, the walls pierced for musketry, and the roofs surrounded with sand-bag parapets. About five hundred yards on the west was the Casa Mata, a strong stone building, surrounded by a quadrangular bastioned field-work, and occupied by troops of the line, under General Perez. Still farther west, about three hundred yards, was a deep and wide ravine, on the other side of which a corps of Pintos, under General Alvarez, was stationed.

There was a difference of opinion, in the American camp, in reference to the attack upon this position. General Scott regarded Chapultepec as too strong and difficult to be attempted. It would cost too many lives to carry it. And he hoped that, by carrying any of its outposts, and thus showing to the Mexicans his determination to renew and prosecute the war, they would at once resume negotiations for peace. He was therefore resolved to attempt Molino del Rey alone, and, having destroyed whatever of military works it might contain, to retire at once to his then position at Tacubaya. This he ordered to be effected at night by General Worth's division, the attack to be made as soon as it was dark. General Worth, who had caused the ground to be thoroughly reconnoitred, thought the attack should be made at daylight, and that the entire position, including Chapultepec, should be embraced in the plan of operations. He judged from his observations, that the place would be ably defended, and not carried without difficulty and loss, and that it would be far better to follow up the movement upon Molino del Rey, if successful, by an immediate attempt upon the castle to which it led. General Scott consented to change his plan so far as to make the attack by daylight, but peremptorily refused to allow an attempt upon Chapultepec at that time. The result proved that General Worth had not overestimated the strength of the Molino, or the difficulty of the task assigned him. The story of its execution will be given in the words of his own official report:—

“Having, in the course of the 7th, accompanied the general-in-chief on a reconnaissance of the formidable dispositions of the enemy near and around the castle of Chapultepec, they were found to exhibit an extended line of cavalry and infantry, sustained by a field battery of four guns—occupying directly, or sustaining, a system of defences collateral to the castle and summit. This examination gave fair observation of the configuration of the grounds, and the extent of the enemy's force; but, as appeared in the sequel, an inadequate idea of the nature of his defences—they being skilfully masked.

“The general-in-chief ordered that my division, reënforced as before mentioned, should attack and carry those lines and defences, capture the enemy's artillery, destroy the machinery and material supposed to be in the foundry El Molino del Rey; but limiting the operations to that extent. After which, my command was to be immediately withdrawn to its position in the village of Tacubaya.

“A close and daring reconnaissance by Captain Mason of the engineers, made on the morning of the 7th, represented the enemy's lines collateral to Chapultepec to be as follows: His left rested upon and occupied a group of strong stone buildings, called El Molino del Rey, adjoining the grove at the foot of the hill of Chapultepec, and directly under the guns of the castle which crowns its summit. The right of his line rested upon another stone building, called Casa Mata, situated at the foot of the ridge that slopes gradually from the heights above the village of Tacubaya to the plain below. Midway between these buildings was the enemy's field battery, and his infantry forces were disposed on either side to support it. This reconnaissance was verified by Captain Mason and Colonel Duncan, on the afternoon of the same day. The result indicated that the centre was the weak point of the enemy's position; and that his flanks were the strong points, his left flank being the stronger.

“As the enemy's system of defence was connected with the hill and castle of Chapultepec, and as my operations were limited to a specific object, it became necessary to isolate the work to be accomplished, from the castle of Chapultepec and its immediate defences. To effect this object, the following dispositions were ordered: Colonel Garland's brigade to take possession on the right, strengthened by two pieces of Captain Drum's battery, to look to El Molino del Rey, as well as any support of this position from Chapultepec; and also within sustaining distance of the assaulting party and the battering guns, which, under Captain Huger, were placed on the ridge, five or six hundred yards from El Molino del Rey, to batter and loosen this position from Chapultepec. An assaulting party of five hundred picked men and officers, under command of Brevet Major George Wright, 8th infantry, was also posted on the ridge to the left of the battering guns, to force the enemy's centre. The 2d brigade, the command of which devolved on Colonel McIntosh, (Colonel Clarke being sick,) with Duncan's battery, was to take post still farther up the ridge, opposite the enemy's right, to look to our left flank to sustain the assaulting column if necessary, or to discomfit the enemy, (the ground being favourable,) as circumstances might require. Cadwallader's brigade was held in reserve, in a position on the ridge between the battering guns and McIntosh's brigade, and in easy support of either. The cavalry, under Major Sumner, to envelop our extreme left, and be governed by circumstances,—to repel or attack, as the commander's judgment might suggest. The troops to be put in position under cover of the night; and the work to begin as soon as the heavy metal could be properly directed. Colonel Duncan was charged with the general disposition of the artillery. Accordingly, at 3 o'clock in the morning of the 8th, the several columns were put in motion on as many different routes; and when the gray of the morning enabled them to be seen, they were as accurately in position as if posted in midday for review. The early dawn was the moment appointed for the attack, which was announced to our troops by the opening of Huger's guns on El Molino del Rey, upon which they continued to play actively until this point of the enemy's line became sensibly shaken, when the assaulting party, commanded by Wright, and guided by that accomplished officer, Captain Mason of the engineers, assisted by Lieutenant Foster, dashed gallantly forward to the assault. Unshaken by the galling of the musketry and canister that was showered upon them, on they rushed, driving infantry and artillerymen at the point of the bayonet. The enemy's field battery was taken, and his own guns were trailed upon his retreating masses: before, however, they could be discharged, perceiving that he had been dispossessed of his strong position by comparatively a handful of men, he made a desperate effort to regain it. Accordingly his retiring forces rallied and formed with this object. Aided by the infantry, which covered the house-tops, within reach of which the battery had been moved during the night, the enemy's whole line opened upon the assaulting party a terrific fire of musketry, which struck down eleven out of the fourteen officers that composed the command, and non-commissioned officers and men in proportion; including, amongst the officers, Brevet Major Wright, the commander; Captain Mason and Lieutenant Foster, engineers; all severely wounded. This severe shock staggered, for a moment, that gallant band. The light battalion, held to cover Captain Huger's battery, under Captain Smith, and the right wing of Cadwallader's brigade, were promptly ordered forward to support, which order was executed in the most gallant style; the enemy was again routed, and this point of his line carried, and fully possessed by our troops. In the mean time, Garland's brigade, ably sustained by Captain Drum's artillery, assaulted the enemy's left, and, after an obstinate and very severe contest, drove him from his apparently impregnable position, immediately under the guns of the castle of Chapultepec. Drum's section, and the battering guns under Captain Huger, advanced to the enemy's position, and the captured guns of the enemy were now opened on his retreating forces, on which they continued to fire until beyond their reach. While this work was in progress of accomplishment by our centre and right, our troops on the left were not idle. Duncan's battery opened on the right of the enemy's line, up to this time engaged; and the 2d brigade, under Colonel McIntosh, was now ordered to assault the extreme right of the enemy's line. The direction of this brigade soon caused it to mask Duncan's battery, — the fire of which, for the moment, was discontinued; and the brigade moved steadily on to the assault of Casa Mata, which, instead of an ordinary field intrenchment, as was supposed, proved to be a strong stone citadel, surrounded with bastioned intrenchments and impassable ditches.—an old Spanish work, recently repaired and enlarged. When within easy musket range, the enemy opened a most deadly fire upon our advancing troops, which was kept up, without intermission, until our gallant men reached the very slope of the parapet of the work that surrounded the citadel. By this time, a large proportion of the command was either killed or wounded, amongst whom were the three senior officers present — Brevet Colonel McIntosh, Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel Scott, of the 5th infantry, and Major Waite, 8th infantry; the second killed, and the first and last desperately wounded. Still, the fire from the citadel was unabated. In this crisis of the attack, the command was, momentarily, thrown into disorder, and fell back on the left of Duncan's battery, where they rallied. As the 2d brigade moved to the assault, a very large cavalry and infantry force was discovered approaching rapidly upon our left flank, to reënforce the enemy's right. As soon as Duncan's battery was masked, as before mentioned, supported by Andrews's voltigeurs of Cadwallader's brigade, it moved promptly to the extreme left of our line, to check the threatened assault on this point. The enemy's cavalry came, rapidly, within canister range, when the whole battery opened a most effective fire, which soon broke the squadrons, and drove them back in disorder. During this fire upon the enemy's cavalry, Major Sumner's command moved to the front, and changed direction in admirable order, under a most appalling fire from the Casa Mata. This movement enabled his command to cross the ravine immediately on the left of Duncan's battery, where it remained, doing noble service, until the close of the action. At the very moment the cavalry were driven beyond reach, our own troops drew back from before the Casa Mata, and enabled the guns of Duncan's battery to reopen upon this position; which, after a short and well-directed fire, the enemy abandoned. The guns of the battery were now turned upon his retreating columns, and continued to play upon them until beyond reach.

"He was now driven from every point in the field, and his strong lines, which had certainly been defended well, were in our possession. In fulfilment of the instructions of the general-in-chief, the Casa Mata was blown up, and such of the captured ammunition as was useless to us, as well as the cannon moulds found in El Molino del Rey, were destroyed. After which, my command, under the reiterated orders of the general-in-chief, returned to quarters at Tacubaya, with three of the enemy's four guns, (the fourth, having been spiked, was rendered unserviceable,) as also a large quantity of small arms, with gun and musket ammunition, and exceeding eight hundred prisoners, including fifty-two commissioned officers.

"By the concurrent testimony of prisoners, the enemy's force exceeded fourteen thousand men, commanded by General Santa Anna in person. His total loss, killed, (including the 2d and 3d in command, Generals Valdarez and Leon,) wounded, and prisoners, amounts to three thousand, exclusive of some two thousand who deserted after the rout.

"My command, reënforced as before stated, only reached three thousand one hundred men of all arms. The contest continued two hours, and its severity is painfully attested by our heavy loss of officers, non-commissioned officers, and privates, including in the first two classes some of the brightest ornaments of the service."

The American loss in this battle was nearly eight hundred men, killed and wounded, of whom fifty were officers. Not a single post, during the whole war, had been more resolutely and ably defended than El Molino del Rey. It was carried, nevertheless, but at an immense sacrifice of life. And, unfortunately, no advantage was gained by it, except that of proving to the Mexicans that the invading general was determined to prosecute the war, and that no superiority of numbers or position could avail them against the indomitable courage and consummate skill of the Americans. There was no foundry at the Mill. A few useless cannon moulds were destroyed, a large quantity of ammunition was taken, a still larger quantity was destroyed; Casa Mata was blown up, El Molino was dismantled; but Chapultepec remained, frowning from its lofty rock, and bidding defiance to all its enemies. Worth, Pillow, and Cadwallader were eager to pursue the victory to its walls, and carry it by storm. But, restrained by the decided order of the commander-in-chief, they retired under a heavy fire from the castle, and left the field so hardly won to be reoccupied, at his leisure, by the enemy, and to be retaken, at some cost, a few days after.

The Mexicans, instead of being disheartened, were reassured by the result of the battle of Molino del Rey. Supposing Chapultepec to have been the object of the movement, they looked upon the untimely retirement of the assailants as at least a partial defeat, and a clear acknowledgment that the castle was impregnable. In this confidence, they renewed their zeal in the defence, and re-resolved to die in their last intrenchment, sooner than allow their beloved city to be dishonoured by the foot of the hated invader.

Not receiving, as he hoped and expected, new proposals of peace, the American commander now resolved to finish his work by one decisive blow. The city was to be taken. This involved the storming of Chapultepec, and the consequent recovery of El Molino del Rey. Dispositions were immediately made to effect this object on the 13th of September. The result is thus briefly stated in General Scott's official report:—

"The victory of the 8th, at the Molino del Rey, was followed by daring reconnaissances on the part of our distinguished engineers. Their operations were directed principally to the south—towards the gates of the Piedad, San Angel, (Niño Perdido,) San Antonio, and the Paseo de la Viga.

"This city stands on a slight swell of ground, near the centre of an irregular basin, and is girdled with a ditch in its greater extent, (a navigable canal of great breadth and depth,) very difficult to bridge in the presence of an enemy, and serving at once for drainage, custom-house purposes, and military defence; leaving eight entrances or gates, over arches, each of which we found defended by a system of strong works, that seemed to require nothing but some men and guns to be impregnable.

"Outside and within the cross fires of those gates, we found to the south other obstacles but little less formidable. All the approaches near the city are over elevated causeways, cut in many places, (to oppose us,) and flanked on both sides by ditches, also of unusual dimensions. The numerous cross roads are flanked in like manner, having bridges at the intersections, recently broken. The meadows thus checkered are, moreover, in many spots, under water or marshy; for, it will be remembered, we were in the midst of the wet season, though with less rain than usual, and we could not wait for the fall of the neighbouring lakes and the consequent drainage of the wet grounds at the edge of the city—the lowest in the whole basin.

"After a close personal survey of the southern gates, covered by Pillow's division and Riley's brigade of Twiggs's, — with four times our numbers concentrated in our immediate front, — I determined, on the 11th, to avoid that network of obstacles, and to seek, by a sudden inversion to the south-west and west, less unfavourable approaches.

"To economize the lives of our gallant officers and men, as well as to insure success, it became indispensable that this resolution should be long masked from the enemy; and again, that the new movement, when discovered, should be mistaken for a feint, and the old as indicating our true and ultimate point of attack.

"Accordingly, I ordered Quitman's division from Coyoacan to join Pillow, by daylight, before the southern gates, and then that the two major-generals, with their divisions, should, by night, proceed to join me at Tacubaya, where I was quartered with Worth's division. Twiggs, with Riley's brigade, and Captains Taylor's and Steptoe's field batteries, was left in front of those gates to manœuvre, to threaten, or to make false attacks, in order to occupy and deceive the enemy. Twiggs's other brigade was left at supporting distance in the rear, at San Angel, till the morning of the 13th, and also to support our general depot at Mixcoac. The stratagem against the south was admirably executed throughout the 12th, and down to the afternoon of the 13th, when it was too late for the enemy to recover from the effects of his delusion.

"The first step in the new movement was to carry Chapultepec, a natural and isolated mound, of great elevation, strongly fortified at its base, on its acclivities, and heights. Besides a numerous garrison, here was the military college of the republic, with a large number of sub-lieutenants and other students. Those works were within direct gunshot of the village of Tacubaya, and, until carried, we could not approach the city on the west without making a circuit too wide and too hazardous. In the course of the same night, heavy batteries, within easy ranges, were established.

"To prepare for an assault, it was foreseen that the play of the batteries might run into the second day; but recent captures had not only trebled our siege pieces, but also our ammunition; and we knew that we should greatly augment both by carrying the place. I was, therefore, in no haste in ordering an assault before the works were well crippled by our missiles.

"The bombardment and cannonade, under the direction of Captain Huger, were commenced early in the morning of the 12th. Before nightfall, which necessarily stopped our batteries, we had perceived that a good impression had been made on the castle and its outworks, and that a large body of the enemy had remained outside, towards the city, from an early hour, to avoid our fire, and to be at hand on its cessation, in order to reënforce the garrison against an assault. The same outside force was discovered the next morning, after our batteries had reopened upon the castle, by which we again reduced its garrison to the minimum needed for the guns.

"Pillow and Quitman had been in position since early in the night of the 11th. Major-General Worth was now ordered to hold his division in reserve, near the foundery, to support Pillow; and Brigadier-General Smith had just arrived with his brigade from Piedad, to support Quitman. Twiggs's guns, before the southern gates, again reminded us, as the day before, that he, with Riley's brigade and Taylor's and Steptoe's batteries, was in activity, threatening the southern gates, and there holding a great part of the Mexican army on the defensive.

"Worth's division furnished Pillow's attack with an assaulting party of some two hundred and fifty volunteer officers and men, under Captain McKenzie, and Twiggs's division supplied a similar one, commanded by Captain Casey, to Quitman. Each of those little columns was furnished with scaling-ladders.

"The signal I had appointed for the attack was the momentary cessation of fire on the part of our heavy batteries. About 8 o'clock in the morning of the 13th, judging that the time had arrived, by the effect of the missiles we had thrown, I sent an aid-de-camp to Pillow, and another to Quitman, with notice that the concerted signal was about to be given. Both columns now advanced with an alacrity that gave assurance of prompt success. The batteries, seizing opportunities, threw shots and shells upon the enemy over the heads of our men, with good effect, particularly at every attempt to reënforce the works from without to meet our assault.

"Major-General Pillow's approach, on the west side, lay through an open grove, filled with sharp-shooters, who were speedily dislodged; when, being up with the front of the attack, and emerging into open space, at the foot of a rocky acclivity, that gallant leader was struck down by an agonizing wound. The immediate command devolved on Brigadier-General Cadwallader, in the absence of the senior brigadier, Pierce, of the same division — an invalid since the events of August 19. On a previous call of Pillow, Worth had just sent him a reënforcement.

"The broken acclivity was still to be ascended, and a strong redoubt, midway, to be carried, before reaching the castle on the heights. The advance of our brave men, led by brave officers, though necessarily slow, was unwavering, over rocks, chasms, and mines, and under the hottest fire of cannon and musketry. The redoubt now yielded to resistless valor, and the shouts that followed announced to the castle the fate that impended. The enemy were steadily driven from shelter to shelter. The retreat allowed not time to fire a single mine, without the certainty of blowing up friend and foe. Those who, at a distance, attempted to apply matches to the long trains, were shot down by our men. There was death below, as well as above ground. At length the ditch and wall of the main work were reached; the scaling-ladders were brought up and planted by the storming parties; some of the daring spirits first in the assault were cast down, killed or wounded; but a lodgment was soon made; streams of heroes followed; all opposition was overcome, and several of our regimental colours flung out from the upper walls, amidst long-continued shouts and cheers, which sent dismay into the capital. No scene could have been more animating or glorious.

“Major-General Quitman, nobly supported by Brigadier-Generals Shields and Smith, his other officers and men, was up with the part assigned him. Simultaneously with the movement on the west, he had gallantly approached the south-east of the same works over a causeway with cuts and batteries, and defended by an army strongly posted outside, to the east of the works. Those formidable obstacles Quitman had to face, with but little shelter for his troops or space for manœuvring. Deep ditches, flanking the causeway, made it difficult to cross on either side into the adjoining meadows, and these again were intersected by other ditches. Smith and his brigade had been early thrown out to make a sweep to the right, in order to present a front against the enemy’s line, and to turn two intervening batteries, near the foot of Chapultepec. This movement was also intended to support Quitman’s storming parties, both on the causeway. The storming party, now commanded by Captain Paul, carried the two batteries in the road, took some guns, with many prisoners, and drove the enemy posted behind in support. The New York and South Carolina volunteers and the 2d Pennsylvania volunteers, all on the left of Quitman’s line, together with portions of his storming parties, crossed the meadows in front, under a heavy fire, and entered the outer enclosure of Chapultepec just in time to join in the final assault from the west.

“Early in the morning of the 13th, I repeated the orders of the night before to Major-General Worth, to be, with his division, at hand, to support the movement of Major-General Pillow from our left. The latter seems soon to have called for that entire division, standing momentarily in reserve, and Worth sent him Colonel Clarke’s brigade. The call, if not unnecessary, was at least, from the circumstances, unknown to me at the time; for, soon observing that the very large body of the enemy, in the road in front of Major-General Quitman’s right, was receiving reinforcements from the city, (less than a mile and a half to the east,) I sent instructions to Worth, on our opposite flank, to turn Chapultepec with his division, and to proceed, cautiously, by the road at its northern base, in order, if not met by very superior numbers, to threaten or to attack, in rear, that body of the enemy. The movement, it was also believed, could not fail to distract and to intimidate the enemy generally.

“Worth promptly advanced with his remaining brigade, and having turned the forest on the west, and arriving opposite to the north centre of Chapultepec, came up with the troops in the road, under Colonel Trousdale, and aided by a flank movement of a part of Garland’s brigade in taking the one-gun breastwork, then under the fire of Lieutenant Jackson’s section of Captain Magruder’s field battery. Continuing to advance, this division passed Chapultepec, attacking the right of the enemy’s line, resting on that road, about the moment of the general retreat consequent upon the capture of the formidable castle and its outworks.

“Arriving some minutes later, and mounting to the top of the castle, the whole field, to the east, lay plainly under my view.

“There are two routes from Chapultepec to the capital, — the one on the right entering the same gate, Belen, with the road from the south, via Piedad; and the other obliquing to the left, to intersect the great western, or San Cosme road, in a suburb outside of the gate of San Cosme.

“Each of these routes (an elevated causeway) presents a double roadway on the sides of an aqueduct of strong masonry, and great height, resting on open arches and massive pillars, which, together, afford fine points both for attack and defence. The sideways of both aqueducts are, moreover, defended by many strong breastworks at the gates, and before reaching them. As we had expected, we found the four tracks unusually dry and solid for the season.

“Worth and Quitman were prompt in pursuing the retreating enemy, — the former by the San Cosme aqueduct, and the latter along that of Belen. Each had now advanced some hundred yards.

"Deeming it all-important to profit by our successes, and the consequent dismay of the enemy, which could not be otherwise than general, I hastened to despatch, from Chapultepec — first Clarke's brigade, and then Cadwallader's, to the support of Worth, and gave orders that the necessary heavy guns should follow. Pierce's brigade was, at the same time, sent to Quitman, and in the course of the afternoon, I caused some additional siege pieces to be added to his train. Then, after designating the 15th infantry, under Lieutenant-Colonel Howard, — Morgan, the colonel, had been disabled by a wound at Churubusco, — as the garrison of Chapultepec, and giving directions for the care of the prisoners of war, the captured ordnance and ordnance stores, I proceeded to join the advance of Worth, within the suburb, and beyond the turn at the junction of the aqueduct with the great highway from the west to the gate of San Cosme.

"At this junction of roads, we first passed one of those formidable systems of city defences, spoken of above, and it had not a gun! — a strong proof that the enemy had expected us to fall in the attack upon Chapultepec, even if we meant any thing more than a feint; that, in either case, we designed, in his belief, to return and double our forces against the southern gates, — a delusion kept up by the active demonstrations of Twiggs and the forces posted on that side; and that, advancing rapidly from the reduction of Chapultepec, the enemy had not time to shift guns — our previous captures had left him, comparatively, but few — from the southern gates.

"Within those disgarbished works, I found our troops engaged in a street fight against the enemy posted in gardens, at windows, and on house-tops, all flat with parapets. Worth ordered forward the mountain howitzers of Cadwallader's brigade, preceded by skirmishers and pioneers, with pickaxes and crowbars, to force windows and doors, or to burrow through walls. The assailants were soon in an equality of position fatal to the enemy. By 8 o'clock in the evening, Worth had carried two batteries in this suburb. According to my instructions, he here posted guards and sentinels, and placed his troops under shelter for the night. There was but one more obstacle — the San Cosme gate, between him and the great square in front of the cathedral and palace, the heart of the city; and that barrier, it was known, could not, by daylight, resist our siege guns thirty minutes.

"I had gone back to the foot of Chapultepec, the point from which the two aqueducts begin to diverge, some hours earlier, in order to be near that new depot, and in easy communication with Quitman and Twiggs as well as with Worth.

"From this point I ordered all detachments and stragglers to their respective corps, then in advance; sent to Quitman additional siege guns, ammunition, intrenching tools; directed Twiggs's remaining brigade from Piedad, to support Worth, and Captain Steptoe's field battery, also at Piedad, to rejoin Quitman's division.

"I had been, from the first, well aware that the western, or San Cosme, was the less difficult route to the centre and conquest of the capital; and, therefore, intended that Quitman should only manœuvre and threaten the Belen or south-western gate, in order to favor the main attack by Worth, — knowing that the strong defences at the Belen were directly under the guns of the much stronger fortress, called the citadel, just within. Both of these defences of the enemy were also within easy supporting distance from the San Angel (or Niño Perdido) and San Antonio gates. Hence the greater support, in numbers, given to Worth's movement as the main attack.

"Those views I repeatedly, in the course of the day, communicated to Major-General Quitman; but being in hot pursuit, — gallant himself, and ably supported by Brigadier-Generals Shields and Smith, (Shields badly wounded before Chapultepec, and refusing to retire,) as well as by all the officers and men of the column, — Quitman continued to press forward, under flank and direct fires; carried an intermediate battery of two guns, and then the gate, before two o'clock in the afternoon, but not without proportionate loss, increased by his steady maintenance of that position.

"Quitman, within the city, adding several new defences to the position he had won, and sheltering his corps as well as practicable, now awaited the return of daylight under the guns of the formidable citadel, yet to be subdued.

"At about 4 o'clock next morning, September 14, a deputation of the city council waited upon me to report that the federal government and the army of Mexico had fled from the capital some three hours before, and to demand terms of capitulation in favor of the church, the citizens, and the municipal authorities. I promptly replied, that I would sign no capitulation; that the city had been virtually in our possession from the time of the lodgments effected by Worth and Quitman the day before; that I regretted the silent escape of the Mexican army; that I should levy upon the city a moderate contribution, for special purposes; and that the American army should come under no terms, not self-imposed; such only as its own honour, the dignity of the United States, and the spirit of the age, should, in my opinion, imperiously demand and impose.

"At the termination of the interview with the city deputation, I communicated, about daylight, orders to Worth and Quitman to advance slowly and cautiously towards the heart of the city, and to occupy its stronger and more commanding points. Quitman proceeded to the great plaza or square, planted guards, and hoisted the colours of the United States on the national palace, containing the halls of congress and executive apartments of federal Mexico. In this grateful service, Quitman might have been anticipated by Worth, but for my express orders, halting the latter at the head of the Alameda, within three squares of that goal of general ambition. The capital, however, was not taken by any one or two corps, but by the talent, the science, the gallantry, the prowess of this entire army. In the glorious conquest, all had contributed — early and powerfully — the killed, the wounded, and the fit for duty — at Vera Cruz, Cerro Gordo, Contreras, San Antonio, Churubusco, (three battles,) the Molinos del Rey, and Chapultepec; as much as those who fought at the gates of Belen and San Cosme.

"Soon after we had entered, and were in the act of occupying the city, a fire was opened upon us from the flat roofs of the houses, from windows and corners of streets, by some two thousand convicts liberated the night before by the flying government; joined by, perhaps, as many Mexican soldiers, who had disbanded themselves and thrown off their uniforms. This unlawful war lasted more than twenty-four hours, in spite of the exertions of the municipal authorities, and was not put down till we had lost many men, including several officers, killed or wounded, and had punished the miscreants. Their objects were, to gratify national hatred; and, in the general alarm and confusion; to plunder the wealthy inhabitants, particularly the deserted houses. But families are now generally returning; business of every kind has been resumed, and the city is already tranquil and cheerful, under the admirable conduct (with exceptions very few and trifling) of our gallant troops."

The campaign which had been commenced by the advance from Puebla, was brought to a close by the capture and occupation of the city of Mexico. The little army of ten thousand five hundred, which had taken the field on the 7th of August, after having diminished, by sickness and the casualties of battle, more than one third of its effective numbers, on the 14th of September was within the enemy's capital, triumphant. It had marched from Puebla to Mexico, had turned the capital and presented itself in the rear, and had won the city in the battles of Contreras and Churubusco. Every military advantage which it had acquired was surrendered by the convention of Tacubaya to a doubtful prospect of negotiation. If its situation had been dangerous in its first attack, it was still more so, by many fold, when the second was about to be entered upon. Yet, in spite of all these obstacles, it had triumphed repeatedly, both in regaining the advantages which had been sacrificed, and in pursuing those regained, whenever it had been allowed the opportunity. It had fought through a bloody field in search of an uncertain object, but it had not failed to triumph even there, against every disadvantage. Opportunity had been lost, time thrown away, and, finally, it had attacked the strongest point, had carried it, and over such obstacles as are seldom encountered by an invading force, had borne the banner of its country to the palace of the supreme powers of Mexico.

In all these military operations, the unsurpassed valor of the soldiery, and the skill of the officers, had borne the burden which had been imposed, increased as it was by the sacrifice of all advantages, and by the effect of the mistaken confidence in the faith of a man noted for his perfidy, but in none more eminent, in none more successful, than in that by which he practised upon the American government, and the commander-in-chief of the American army.

But, against all untoward circumstances, this little army had now accomplished the mission on which it was sent. It had done more. It had not only "conquered a peace," but a very large piece of Mexico. It occupied and garrisoned, not the capital only, but nearly all the important posts on its various approaches. It held military possession of the country, and could now dictate its own terms of submission.

When the further defence of the capital was abandoned as hopeless, Santa Anna resigned the presidency, and withdrew with the remnant of his army to Guadalupe Hidalgo, resolved, in the impotence of his rage, to keep Mexico under his feet, if he could not conquer her enemies. Without an army he was nothing, and not much with one, except against his own unarmed countrymen. He had now nearly exhausted his resources. Driven from all his defences, on which he had expended so much toil, treasure, and skill, — a fugitive from his capital, with the broken-down remnant of an army, without subsistence, without funds, or the means of obtaining them, except by military exactions from a people whose favour he was so ambitious to win, — what could he now hope to do? He had lost his last opportunity to bargain with the conquerors. He had lost nearly the last chance of intrigue at home. The confidence of the Mexicans in his skill and prowess was gone. He had no resort but, under pretence of annoying the enemy as much as possible, in all his future movements, to keep up a show of patriotism, and thus endeavour to revive his waning popularity, and keep his old rivals in the background. He still hoped to overawe the government to the adoption of his own measures, and thus virtually retain the dictatorship, which, from motives of policy, he had nominally resigned. He, accordingly, ordered a column of three thousand men, under General Herrera, to take position at Queretaro, which had been fixed upon as the temporary seat of government. A portion of his force was disbanded, for want of means to subsist it, and, with the remainder, composed principally of cavalry, Santa Anna marched upon Puebla. The American garrison at this place consisted of five hundred men, under the command of Colonel Childs, and eighteen hundred invalids. Surrounded by a population of eighty thousand Mexicans, and by a country infested with guerillas and banditti, who were excited to frenzy by the events of the war, this little band, though holding possession of the fortresses of the place, was actually for many weeks in a state of siege, and subject to every possible annoyance.

On the 22d September, Santa Anna arrived at Puebla, and was received with acclamations of joy by the citizens, who now hoped to overwhelm and annihilate the garrison. On the 25th, Santa Anna summoned the garrison to surrender, and received a peremptory refusal.* On the 27th, he made a feeble and unsuccessful attempt to carry the fortress by assault, and then withdrew, with all his force, to Huamantla, with a view to annoying, and, if possible, cutting off the reinforcements to the American army, which were continually arriving at Vera Cruz, and marching, column after column, towards the capital, subject, in every defile and mountain pass, to all the annoyances and losses attendant on guerilla warfare. Driven from Huamantla by the unexpected approach of Colonel Lane, with his column, the Mexican forces fell back upon Atlitico, returning again to their former position as soon as Lane had passed, on his way to Puebla. Here the unfortunate general was deprived of his command, by order of the new government, just organized at Queretaro.*

army of eight thousand men, determined to cause the rights of this nation to be respected. God and liberty.

"ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANNA,
General-in-Chief Mexican Army.

"Señor Colonel CHILDS, Commander U. S. Forces in this city."

"I had the honour to receive this day (2 o'clock, P. M.) the note of your excellency, of this date, notifying me that you had taken possession of this city, and 'for the purpose of restoring to full liberty the citizens who have suffered so much from the troops of the United States,' and also offering the garrison certain terms in case they would, in a limited time, abandon the points occupied by the same.

"In regard to the first point, I deem it necessary and just, in vindication of the good name of the military forces of the United States, — which they have earned by the humanity, good order, and discipline which have at all times distinguished their conduct, and more particularly while holding military possession of the city of Puebla, — to deny the imputation conveyed in your excellency's communication; but, on the contrary, would assert that the rights of persons and property have been most scrupulously respected, and maintained to a degree unparalleled in warfare; and would willingly leave the question for the decision of the intelligent and impartial portion of the population of this city, by whom have they suffered most violence, from their own people or from troops of the army of the United States.

"As for the other portion of your excellency's communication, demanding a surrender, within a limited time, of the places held by the troops under my command, I have but this reply to make to your excellency; that having been honoured with the custody and safe-keeping of these places, it is alike my desire and my duty to maintain them to the last, feeling fully confident in the means at my disposal to accomplish that purpose.

"With consideration of high respect, I have the honour to be your excellency's most obedient servant,

"THOMAS CHILDS, Colonel U. S. Army, Civil and Military Governor."

* The note addressed to Santa Anna, on this occasion, by Don Luis de la Rosa, minister of state and war, is so remarkable for its "indirect directness," that it may well be preserved as a model of diplomatic composition.

"His excellency, the señor provisional president of the republic, feeling profoundly his duties to the country; convinced of the necessity of establishing in the nation public morality, and of giving more energy to the discipline of the army, almost extinguished by our civil

* "Having taken possession of this city with the forces under my command, to operate against the points occupied by you, and for the purpose of restoring to full liberty the citizens who have suffered so much from the troops of the United States, I deem it proper, before making any movement, and for the sake of humanity, to intimate to your excellency that you shall have leave, within a limited time, to abandon the places you now occupy in this city, and march out with the honours of war, either to join General Scott, or to proceed to Perote, as may be most convenient for you. But, if this moderate proposition be not accepted by your excellency, I shall, in that case, with the deepest feeling, proceed to act in a military manner, and assault all of your positions, from the consequences of which your troops must suffer, inasmuch as there is in the vicinity of your excellency an

In obedience to this arrangement, Santa Anna retired to Tehuacan, leaving behind him an address to the army, replete with high-sounding protestations of patriotism, and charging the government with great wrong to the country, as well as injustice to himself, in thus displacing him from the command at the very moment, when, after so many disasters, he was about to obtain a triumph over the invaders. "I depart from you," he said, "and from the theatre of war, perhaps to sacrifice myself to the vengeance of my enemies, or to effect an inglorious peace, which I did not wish to grant, because it was repugnant to my conscience."

Volunteers and recruits for the army continued to arrive in considerable numbers at Vera Cruz, until the effective force under command of General Scott was nearly or quite doubled. But they had little to do but sit still. The work of conquest was already achieved. It was now an army of observation only. It sat quietly down, in the rich valley of Mexico, to watch the progress of events, and to give time to the prostrate republic to recover its vitality, and resume the functions of a body politic. The new recruits were distributed to different posts, so as to open and protect a clear line of communication with the coast, which had been seriously obstructed hitherto, for want of numbers sufficient to man the garrisons. With the exception of an occasional brush with a band of guerillas, or a sort of police encounter with a mob of leperos, the newly-arrived aspirants for military honour saw little or nothing of the rough side of war. Such adventures as they had, like that of the gallant Lally, in conducting his train to Puebla through swarms of desperate banditti, belong rather to personal than to national history.

The spectacle is rarely exhibited of a victorious army sitting down in the capital of a subjugated empire, holding possession of all its important fortresses, — its army of defence vanquished and scattered, its government disorganized, its whole population distracted by civil dissensions, — and there quietly awaiting the return of order, fostering the reunion of the social and civil elements, and protecting the reorganization of government, not for the purpose of holding the im-dissensions; desiring, moreover, to manifest to the people of the city of Mexico, and other points now in possession of the enemy, that their lot is not indifferent to his excellency; considering, in fine, that in every well-organized country, the generals of an army answer before a tribunal for the faults which they have committed, and even for the misfortunes which have befallen their campaigns, — has resolved that your excellency deliver up the command of the army," &c. . . . mense advantages its prowess had gained, but of treating for a just and honourable peace, on the same terms, now that it had unlimited power to dictate, which had been offered in the commencement of hostilities. If there is a redeeming feature in this war, if there is one page of its bloody history on which the philanthropist and the Christian may dwell with satisfaction, it is this which displays the humane moderation, the magnanimous forbearance of the conquering chief, as ready, at every step of his proud career of victory, to sheathe the sword, and grant liberal terms of peace, as to advance to new fields of conquest and glory. Men of military talent and experience have reviewed the acts of this war, bringing them all down to the test of the maxims of Napoleon and other merely despotic conquerors. Judging by this standard, and warped by personal or party prejudice, they have severely censured the more than heroic forbearance of General Scott, and the large sacrifices he made, at various times, in the hope of staying the work of death, and reopening negotiations for peace. Not only has his judgment been severely condemned, but his motives have been harshly impugned, and made the subject of sarcastic surmise and heartless innuendo. If, in all his previous career of military renown, he had not always shown the same exalted preference of peace over war, — if, from the beginning, the olive had not been liberally entwined with the laurel in the wreath of his fame, until he had come to be as well known by the title of "pacificator," as by the less enviable one of conqueror, — the imputation, now freely charged against him, of seeking popularity at home, by the mere show of moderation in the battle-fields of Mexico, and attempting to win favour as an office-seeking politician, by a gross dereliction of his duty as a soldier, would be less flagrantly mean and uncharitable. But, in view of his entire history in the service of his country, such insinuations are as paltry and contemptible as they are impolitic and unjust. Party rancor, personal pique, or sympathy with the wounded pride of some disappointed or injured subordinate, may seek, for a time, by such means, to detract from the lofty merit of acts whose motives it is incapable of appreciating. But impartial history will engrave its vindication on enduring tablets. And when the epitaph of the traduced shall be written, it will tell of a man who was no less moderate than brave, no less humane than heroic, no less ready to treat than able to fight, no less prompt to subdue himself than to conquer an enemy.

But there is a reverse to every picture. War is fruitful in extravagant contrasts and painful incongruities. "No man is a hero to his valet-de-chambre." It would seem to be equally true that even a general is no hero to his subordinates. Like the comic after-piece, following the serious drama of the stage, and degrading to mere triflers and buffoons those who just before had appeared in great and imposing characters, the accompaniments and sequels of war serve often only as a foil to the glory which its principal actors have achieved, reducing quite down to the common level of poor humanity men who had just been looked upon as almost sublime in virtue and dignity. The great work of victory has been achieved. The stern requirements of actual warfare have given place to the dull routine of a mere camp life. The scene is changed. The after-piece is a petty family quarrel, in which every man is divided against his fellow. Jealousies, animosities, and bitter criminations take the place of the lofty courtesies of martial etiquette. Officers, on whose conduct the language of commendation had been exhausted in the official reports of yesterday, are to-day arrested and arraigned for some merely technical misdemeanor or oversight. The camp is metamorphosed into a criminal court, its docket as full of censures and complaints as the previous bulletins and reports had been of unqualified gratulation and praise. The war department, in a measure, participates in these personal disputes. The commander-in-chief is suddenly placed under censure, condemned, and displaced from his high command. The whole country, which but now rang with acclamations for the conquering chief, and his brave and able comrades, is rent with divisions and parties, each industriously plucking the plumes from one or other of their late heroes, and magnifying into beams every mote that could be discovered or imagined in their private or official history. Alas for the instability of human applause, and the gratitude of republics! The details of these matters, the wearisome doings of the courts martial, that occupied nearly as much time as the war had done, and consumed no small amount of the national treasure, belong, perhaps, to biography, rather than to history. But the occurrence of such scenes, and the lessons they teach, are within the proper domain of history. They are among the essential elements of war, and show us, not only that "there is but a step between the sublime and the ridiculous," but that war is, in itself and in its accompaniments, hostile to true greatness, and favourable mainly to what is low, and mean, and selfish in man. It cultivates revenge, hatred, pride, cruelty, cunning, jealousy, and every species of insolence and injustice. Its fundamental principle is the false and despotic maxim that "might gives right." It merges all moral distinctions in that of physical power, and triumphs as boastingly when trampling on Poland, Hungary, or Italy, or invading the soil of Mexico, as when resisting oppression at Saratoga or Yorktown, or defending the altars of freedom at Lexington or Bunker' Hill. It cherishes those notions of personal honor, individual importance, and official distinction, which almost compel every man to be jealous of his fellow, and leads to endless disputes, among comrades, about the mere technicalities of a service which professes to have nothing in view but the rights and the glory of the country whose cause it supports.

The voluminous correspondence of the principal actors in this war exhibits, in ludicrous and painful contrast, the greatness and the littleness of human pride — the strength and the weakness of human character. There is no true dignity but in following the maxims of the gospel. To assert among comrades the nice distinctions between meum and tuum, to resent an official injury, to repel a technical insult, may be soldier-like and correct, but it is neither heroic, dignified, nor manly.

It is but justice to remark, in this connection, that the correspondence on the part of the war department is characterized by great ability, dignity, and courtesy, and contrasts favourably with the querulousness and severity of some portions of that of the commanding general. While unjust to him in many respects, and assuming a knowledge of events and of the exigencies of war which he only could be presumed to possess, Mr. Marcy maintained the highest style of diplomatic courtesy in all his communications, and exhibited a knowledge of the whole subject with which he had to do, that was not to be expected of a mere civilian. If political jealousy had not required the cabinet to keep steady hold of the leash, its part in this great drama would have been more worthy of the nation, and more entitled to respect.

As soon as the new government was organized at Queretaro, negotiations were reopened, by Mr. Trist, for the adjustment of all difficulties between the two nations. He had not proceeded far, however, in his preliminaries, when he was suddenly recalled, and his powers as commissioner revoked. He had given offence to the cabinet of Washington by admitting into the convention of Tacubaya a clause which threw a shade of doubt over the title of Texas to all the territory east of the Rio Grande. So flagrant a departure from his instructions was not to be overlooked. He was no longer to be trusted with the high prerogatives of a commissioner. He was recalled, and no substitute provided. Even at this juncture, General Scott was not invested with any authority whatever to make terms of peace. He was simply instructed to transmit to Washington whatever propositions he might receive from the Mexican government, and by no means to relax, or change, in the interim, his "movements, or measures, for carrying on hostilities." With such instructions, General Scott might well have imitated the conduct of the great Macedonian, and wept for another Mexico to conquer. It was already at his feet, suing for peace. Negotiations were happily begun. And, whatever mere diplomatists may say of the propriety of the course, Mr. Trist assumed the responsibility, though deprived of all official authority, to carry them on to their completion. The result was a treaty of peace,* which General Scott also "took the responsibility" of forwarding to Washington. It was received by the government with no little indignation, as well against the general-in-chief, who presumed to transmit the unauthorized document, as against the audacious nondescript, who, when stripped of all power to represent his government, or speak in its behalf, had dared to draw it up, and set his name to it as commissioner plenipotentiary. The treaty was received at Washington on the 20th of February. It was in no way binding on the United States. It was a simple compact between a private citizen of the country and the commissioners of Mexico. But, considering that those commissioners had been duly authorized to act for their own government, and had acted with a full knowledge of Mr. Trist's position, the president regarded the treaty as binding upon Mexico as any unratified treaty could be. Its terms were, for the most part, the same as those contained in the original projet, which was prepared at Washington, and which alone Mr. Trist was authorized to submit. The fact that such a treaty

"BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

"A PROCLAMATION.

"Whereas, a treaty of peace, friendship, limits, and settlement, between the United States of America and the Mexican republic, was concluded and signed at the city of Guadalupe Hidalgo, on the second day of February, one thousand eight hundred and forty-eight, which treaty, as amended by the senate of the United States, and being in the English and Spanish languages, is word for word as follows:—

"In the name of the Almighty God: the United States of America, and the United Mexican States, animated by a sincere desire to put an end to the calamities of the war which unhappily exists between the two republics, and to establish upon a solid basis relations of peace and friendship, which shall confer reciprocal benefits upon the citizens of both, and assure the concord, harmony, and mutual confidence wherein the two people should live, as good neighbours, have for that purpose appointed their respective plenipotentiaries, that is to say, the President of the United States has appointed Nicholas P. Trist, a citizen of the United States, and the President of the Mexican republic has appointed Don Luis Gonzaga Cuevas, Don Bernardo Couto, and Don Miguel Atristain, citizens of the said republic, who, after a reciprocal communication of their respective full powers, have, under the protection of the Almighty God, the author of peace, arranged, agreed upon, and signed the following

"Treaty of Peace, Friendship, Limits, and Settlement, between the United States of America and the Mexican Republic.

"ARTICLE I. There shall be firm and universal peace between the United States of America and the Mexican republic, and between their respective countries, territories, cities, towns, and people, without exception of places or persons.

"ARTICLE II. Immediately upon the signature of this treaty, a convention shall be entered into between a commissioner or commissioners, appointed by the general-in-chief of the forces of the United States, and such as may be appointed by the Mexican government, to the end that a provisional suspension of hostilities shall take place, and that, in the places occupied by the said forces, constitutional order may be reestablished, as regards the political, administrative, and judicial branches, so far as this shall be permitted by the circumstances of military occupation.

"ARTICLE III. Immediately upon the ratification of the present treaty by the government of the United States, orders shall be transmitted to the commanders of their land and naval forces, requiring the latter (provided this treaty shall then have been ratified by the government of the Mexican republic, and the ratifications exchanged) immediately to desist from blockading any Mexican ports; and requiring the former (under the same condition) to commence at the earliest moment practicable, withdrawing all troops of the United States then in the interior of the Mexican republic, to the points that shall be selected by common agreement, at a distance from the seaports not exceeding thirty leagues; and such evacuation of the interior of the republic shall be completed with the least possible delay; the Mexican government hereby binding itself to afford every facility in its power for rendering the same convenient to the troops, on their march and in their new positions, and for promoting a good understanding between them and the inhabitants. In like manner, orders shall be despatched to the persons in charge of the custom-houses, at all ports occupied by the forces of the United States, requiring them (under the same condition) immediately to deliver possession of the same to the persons authorized by the Mexican government to receive it, together with all bonds and evidences of debts for duties on importations and on exportations, not yet fallen due. Moreover, a faithful and exact account shall be made out, showing the entire amount of all duties on imports and on exports collected at such custom-houses, or elsewhere in Mexico, by authority of the United States, from and after the day of the ratification of this treaty by the government of the Mexican republic; and also on account of the cost of collection; and such entire amount, deducting only the cost of collection, shall be delivered to the Mexican government, at the city of Mexico, within three months after the exchange of the ratifications.

"The evacuation of the capital of the Mexican republic by the troops of the United States, in virtue of the above stipulations, shall be completed in one month after the orders there stipulated for shall have been received by the commander of said troops, or sooner, if possible.

"ARTICLE IV. Immediately after the exchange of ratifications of the present treaty, all castles, forts, territories, places, and possessions, which have been taken or occupied by the forces of the United States, during the present war, within the limits of the Mexican republic, as about to be established by the following article, shall be definitely restored to the said republic, together with all the artillery, arms, apparatus of war, munitions, and other public property, which were in the said castles and forts when captured and which shall remain there at the time when this treaty shall be duly ratified by the government of the Mexican republic. To this end, immediately upon the signature of this treaty, orders shall be despatched to the American officers commanding such castles and forts, securing against the removal or destruction of any such artillery, arms, apparatus of war, munitions, or other public property. The city of Mexico, within the inner line of intrenchments surrounding the said city, is comprehended in the above stipulations, as regards the restoration of artillery, apparatus of war, &c.

"The final evacuation of the territory of the Mexican republic, by the forces of the United States, shall be completed in three months from the said exchange of ratifications, or sooner, if possible; the Mexican government hereby engaging, as in the foregoing article, to use all means in its power for facilitating such evacuation, and rendering it convenient to the troops, and for promoting a good understanding between them and the inhabitants.

"If, however, the ratification of this treaty by both parties should not take place in time to allow the embarkation of the troops of the United States to be completed before the commencement of the sickly season at the Mexican ports on the Gulf of Mexico, in such case a friendly arrangement shall be entered into between the general-in-chief of the said troops and the Mexican government, whereby healthy and otherwise suitable places, at a distance from the ports not exceeding thirty leagues, shall be designated for the residence of such troops as may not yet have embarked, until the return of the healthy season. And the space of time here referred to as comprehending the sickly season, shall be understood to extend from the first day of May to the first day of November.

"All prisoners of war, taken on either side, on land or on sea, shall be restored as soon as practicable after the exchange of ratifications of this treaty. It is also agreed, that if any Mexicans should now be held as captives by any savage tribe within the limits of the United States, as about to be established by the following article, the government of the United States will exact the release of such captives, and cause them to be restored to their country.

"ARTICLE V. The boundary line between the two republics shall commence in the Gulf of Mexico, three leagues from land, opposite the mouth of the Rio Grande, otherwise called Rio Bravo del Norte, or opposite the mouth of its deepest branch, if it should have more than one branch emptying directly into the sea, from thence up the middle of that river, following the deepest channel, where it has more than one, to the point where it strikes the southern boundary of New Mexico, thence westwardly along the whole southern boundary of New Mexico (which runs north of the town called Paso) to its western termination; thence northward along the western line of New Mexico until it intersects the first branch of the River Gila, (or, if it should not intersect any branch of that river, then to the point on the said line nearest to such branch, and thence in a direct line to the same;) thence down the middle of the said branch and of the said river, until it empties into the Rio Colorado; thence across the Rio Colorado, following the division line between Upper and Lower California to the Pacific Ocean.

"The southern and western limits of New Mexico, mentioned in this article, are those laid down in the map entitled 'MAP OF THE UNITED MEXICAN STATES, as organized and defined by various acts of the congress of said republic, and constructed according to the best authorities. Revised edition. Published at New York, in 1847, by J. Disturnell.' Of which map a copy is added to this treaty, bearing the signatures and seals of the undersigned plenipotentiaries. And, in order to preclude all difficulty in tracing upon the ground the limit separating Upper from Lower California, it is agreed that the said limit shall consist of a straight line drawn from the middle of the Rio Gila, where it unites with the Colorado, to a point on the coast of the Pacific Ocean, distance one marine league due south of the southernmost point of the port San Diego, according to the plan of said port made in the year 1782, by Don Juan Pantoja, second sailing-master of the Spanish fleet, and published at Madrid in the year 1802, in the Atlas to the voyage of the schooners Sutil and Mexicana, of which plan a copy is hereunto added, signed and sealed by the respective plenipotentiaries.

"In order to designate the boundary line with due precision, upon authoritative maps, and to establish upon the ground landmarks which shall show the limits of both republics, as described in the present article, the two governments shall each appoint a commissioner and a surveyor, who, before the expiration of one year from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty, shall meet at the port of San Diego, and proceed to run and mark the said boundary in its whole course to the mouth of the Rio Bravo del Norte. They shall keep journals and make out plans of their operations; and the result agreed upon by them shall be deemed a part of this treaty, and shall have the same force as if it were inserted therein. The two governments will amicably agree regarding what may be necessary to these persons, and also as to their respective escorts, should such be necessary.

"The boundary line, established by this article, shall be religiously respected by each of the two republics, and no change shall ever be made therein, except by the express and free consent of both nations, lawfully given by the general government of each, in conformity with its own constitution.

"ARTICLE VI. The vessels and citizens of the United States shall, in all times, have a free and uninterrupted passage by the Gulf of California, and by the River Colorado below its confluence with the Gila, to and from their possessions situated north of the boundary line defined in the preceding article; it being understood that this passage is to be by navigating the Gulf of California and the River Colorado, and not by land, without the express consent of the Mexican government.

"If, by the examinations which may be made, it should be ascertained to be practicable and advantageous to construct a road, canal, or railway, which should in whole or in part run upon the River Gila, or upon its right or its left bank, within the space of one marine league from either margin of the river, the governments of both republics will form an agreement regarding its construction, in order that it may serve equally for the use and advantage of both countries.

"ARTICLE VII. The River Gila, and the part of the Rio Bravo del Norte, lying below the southern boundary of New Mexico, being, agreeably to the fifth article, divided in the middle between the two republics, the navigation of the Gila and of the Bravo below said boundary shall be free and common to the vessels and citizens of both countries; and neither shall, without the consent of the other, construct any work that may impede or interrupt, in whole or in part, the exercise of this right; not even for the purpose of favouring new methods of navigation. Nor shall any tax or contribution, under any denomination or title, be levied upon vessels, or persons navigating the same, or upon merchandise or effects transported thereon, except in the case of landing upon one of their shores. If, for the purpose of making said rivers navigable, or for maintaining them in such state, it should be necessary or advantageous to establish any tax or contribution, this shall not be done without the consent of both governments.

"The stipulations contained in the present article shall not impair the territorial rights of either republic within its established limits.

"ARTICLE VIII. Mexicans now established in territories previously belonging to Mexico, and which remain for the future within the limits of the United States, as defined by the present treaty, shall be free to continue where they now reside, or to remove at any time to the Mexican republic, retaining the property which they possess in the said territories, or disposing thereof, and removing the proceeds wherever they please, without their being subjected, on this account, to any contribution, tax, or charge whatever.

"Those who shall prefer to remain in the said territories, may either retain the title and rights of Mexican citizens, or acquire those of citizens of the United States. But they shall be under the obligation to make their election within one year from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty; and those who shall remain in the said territories after the expiration of that year, without having declared their intention to retain the character of Mexicans, shall be considered to have elected to become citizens of the United States.

"In the said territories, property of every kind, now belonging to Mexicans not established there, shall be inviolably respected. The present owners, the heirs of these and all Mexicans who may hereafter acquire said property by contract, shall enjoy with respect to it guarantees equally ample, as if the same belonged to the citizens of the United States.

"ARTICLE IX. The Mexicans who, in the territories aforesaid, shall not preserve the character of citizens of the Mexican republic, conformably with what is stipulated in the preceding article, shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and be admitted at the proper time (to be judged of by the congress of the United States) to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States, according to the principles of the constitution; and, in the mean time, shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property, and secured in the free exercise of their religion without restriction.

"ARTICLE X. [Stricken out.]

"ARTICLE XI. Considering that a great part of the territories which, by the present treaty, are to be comprehended for the future within the limits of the United States, is now occupied by savage tribes, who will hereafter be under the exclusive control of the government of the United States, and whose incursions within the territory of Mexico would be prejudicial in the extreme, it is solemnly agreed that all such incursions shall be forcibly restrained by the government of the United States whensoever this may be necessary; and that when they cannot be prevented, they shall be punished by the said government, and satisfaction for the same shall be exacted all in the same way, and with equal diligence and energy, as if the same incursions were meditated or committed within its own territory, against its own citizens.

"It shall not be lawful, under any pretext whatever, for any inhabitant of the United States to purchase or acquire any Mexican or any foreigner residing in Mexico, who may have been captured by Indians inhabiting the territory of either of the two republics, nor to purchase or acquire horses, mules, cattle, or property of any kind, stolen within Mexican territory by such Indians.

"And in the event of any person or persons, captured within Mexican territory by Indians, being carried into the territory of the United States, the government of the latter engages and binds itself in the most solemn manner, so soon as it shall know of such captives being within its territory, and shall be able so to do through the faithful exercise of its influence and power, to rescue them and return them to their country, or deliver them to the agent or representative of the Mexican government. The Mexican authorities will, as far as practicable, give to the government of the United States notice of such captures; and its agents shall pay the expenses incurred in the maintenance and transmission of the rescued captives; who, in the mean time, shall be treated with the utmost hospitality by the American authorities at the place where they may be; but if the government of the United States, before receiving such notice from Mexico, should obtain intelligence through any other channel of the existence of Mexican captives within its territory, it will proceed forthwith to effect their release and delivery to the Mexican agent as above stipulated.

"For the purpose of giving to these stipulations the fullest possible efficacy, thereby affording the security and redress demanded by their true spirit and intent, the government of the United States will now and hereafter pass, without unnecessary delay, and always vigilantly enforce, such laws as the nature of the subject may require. And finally, the sacredness of this obligation shall never be lost sight of by the said government when providing for the removal of the Indians from any portion of the said territories, or for its being settled by citizens of the United States; but, on the contrary, special care should be taken not to place its Indian occupants under the necessity of seeking new homes, by committing those invasions which the United States has solemnly obliged themselves to restrain.

"ARTICLE XII. In consideration of the extension acquired by the boundaries of the United States, as defined in the fifth article of the present treaty, the government of the United States engages to pay to that of the Mexican republic the sum of fifteen millions of dollars.

"Immediately after this treaty shall have been duly ratified by the government of the Mexican republic, the sum of three millions of dollars shall be paid to the said government by that of the United States, at the city of Mexico, in the gold or silver coin of Mexico. The remaining twelve millions of dollars shall be paid at the same place and in the same coin, in annual instalments of three millions of dollars each, together with interest on the same, at the rate of six per centum per annum. This interest shall begin to run upon the whole sum of twelve millions from the day of the ratification of the present treaty by the Mexican government, and the first of the instalments shall be paid at the expiration of one year from the same day. Together with each annual instalment as it falls due, the whole interest accruing on such instalment from the beginning shall also be paid.

"ARTICLE XIII. The United States engage, moreover, to assume and pay to the claimants all the amounts now due them and those hereafter to become due, by reason of the claims already liquidated and decided against the Mexican republic, under the conventions between the two republics severally concluded on the eleventh day of April, eighteen hundred and thirty-nine, and on the thirteenth day of January, eighteen hundred and forty-three; so that the Mexican republic shall be absolutely exempt, for the future, from all expense whatever on account of the said claims.

"ARTICLE XIV. The United States do furthermore discharge the Mexican republic from all claims of citizens of the United States, not heretofore decided against the Mexican government, which may have arisen previously to the date of the signature of this treaty; which discharge shall be final and perpetual, whether the said claims be rejected or be allowed by the board of commissioners provided for in the following article, and whatever shall be the total amount of those allowed.

"ARTICLE XV. The United States, exonerating Mexico from all demands on account of the claims of their citizens mentioned in the preceding article, and considering them entirely and forever cancelled, whatever their amount may be, undertake to make satisfaction for the same, to an amount not exceeding three and one quarter millions of dollars. To ascertain the validity and amount of those claims, a board of commissioners shall be established by the government of the United States, whose awards shall be final and conclusive: provided, that in deciding upon the validity of each claim, the board shall be guided and governed by the principles and rules of decision prescribed by the first and fifth articles of the unratified convention, concluded at the city of Mexico on the twentieth day of November, one thousand eight hundred and forty-three; and in no case shall an award be made in favour of any claim not embraced by these principles and rules.

"If, in the opinion of the said board of commissioners or of the claimants, any books, records, or documents in the possession or power of the government of the Mexican republic, shall be deemed necessary to the just decision of any claim, the commissioners, or the claimants through them, shall, within such period as congress may designate, make an application in writing for the same, addressed to the Mexican minister for foreign affairs, to be transmitted by the secretary of state of the United States; and the Mexican government engages, at the earliest possible moment after the receipt of such demand, to cause any of the books, records, or documents, so specified, which shall be in their possession or power, (or authenticated copies or extracts of the same,) to be transmitted to the said secretary of state, who shall immediately deliver them over to the said board of commissioners: provided, that no such application shall be made by, or at the instance of, any claimant, until the facts which it is expected to prove by such books, records, or documents, shall have been stated under oath or affirmation.

"ARTICLE XVI. Each of the contracting parties reserves to itself the entire right to fortify whatever point within its territory it may judge proper so to fortify, for its security.

"ARTICLE XVII. The treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation, concluded at the city of Mexico on the fifth day of April, A. D. one thousand eight hundred and thirty-one, between the United States of America and the United Mexican States, except the additional article, and except so far as the stipulations of the said treaty may be incompatible with any stipulation contained in the present treaty, is hereby revived for the period of eight years from the day of the exchange of ratifications of this treaty, with the same force and virtue as if incorporated therein; it being understood that each of the contracting parties reserves to itself the right, at any time after the said period of eight years shall have expired, to terminate the same by giving one year's notice of such intention to the other party.

"ARTICLE XVIII. All supplies whatever for troops of the United States in Mexico, arriving at ports in the occupation of such troops previous to the final evacuation thereof, although subsequently to the restoration of the custom-houses at such ports, shall be entirely exempt from duties and charges of any kind; the government of the United States hereby engaging and pledging its faith to establish, and view, have already been alluded to. Who can estimate them? Its advantages to the United States are thus summed up by the president, in his message to vigilantly to enforce, all possible guards for securing the revenue of Mexico, by preventing the importation, under cover of this stipulation, of any articles other than such, both in kind and quantity, as shall really be wanted for the use and consumption of the forces of the United States during the time they may remain in Mexico. To this end, it shall be the duty of all officers and agents of the United States to denounce to the Mexican authorities at the respective ports any attempt at a fraudulent abuse of this stipulation which they may know of, or may have reason to suspect, and to give to such authorities all the aid in their power with regard thereto; and every such attempt, when duly proved and established by sentence of a competent tribunal, shall be punished by the confiscation of the property so attempted to be fraudulently introduced.

"ARTICLE XIX. With respect to all merchandise, effects, and property whatsoever, imported into ports of Mexico whilst in the occupation of the forces of the United States, whether by citizens of either republic, or by citizens or subjects of any neutral nation, the following rules shall be observed:—

"1st. All such merchandise, effects, and property, if imported previously to the restoration of the custom-houses to the Mexican authorities, as stipulated for in the third article of this treaty, shall be exempt from confiscation, although the importation of the same be prohibited by the Mexican tariff.

"2d. The same perfect exemption shall be enjoyed by all such merchandise, effects, and property, imported subsequently to the restoration of the custom-houses, and previously to the sixty days fixed in the following article for the coming into force of the Mexican tariff at such ports respectively; the said merchandise, effects, and property being, however, at the time of their importation, subject to the payment of duties, as provided for in the said following article.

"3d. All merchandise, effects, and property described in the two rules foregoing shall, during their continuance at the place of importation, and upon their leaving such place for the interior, be exempt from all duty, tax, or impost of every kind, under whatsoever title or denomination. Nor shall they be there subjected to any charge whatsoever upon the sale thereof.

"4th. All merchandise, effects, and property described in the first and second rules, which shall have been removed to any place in the interior whilst such place was in the occupation of the forces of the United States, shall, during their continuance therein, be exempt from all tax upon the sale or consumption thereof, and from every kind of impost or contribution, under whatsoever title or denomination.

"5th. But if any merchandise, effects, or property described in the first and second rules, shall be removed to any place not occupied at the time by the forces of the United States, they shall, upon their introduction into such place, or upon their sale or consumption there, be subject to the same duties which, under the Mexican laws, they would be required to pay in such cases if they had been imported in time of peace, through the maritime custom-houses, and had there paid the duties conformably with the Mexican tariff.

"6th. The owners of all merchandise, effects, or property described in the first and second rules, and existing in any port of Mexico, shall have the right to reship the same, exempt from all tax, impost, or contributions whatever.

"With respect to the metals or other property, exported from any Mexican port whilst in the occupation of the forces of the United States, and previously to the restoration of the custom-houses at such port, no person shall be required by the Mexican authorities, whether general or state, to pay any tax, duty, or contribution upon any such exportation, or in any manner to account for the same to the said authorities.

“ARTICLE XX. Through consideration for the interests of commerce generally, it is agreed, that if less than sixty days should elapse between the date of the signature of this treaty and the restoration of the custom-houses, conformably with the stipulation in the third article, in such case all merchandise, effects, and property whatsoever, arriving at the Mexican ports after the restoration of the said custom-houses, and previously to the expiration of sixty days after the date of the signature of this treaty, shall be admitted to entry; and no other duties shall be levied thereon than the duties established by the tariff found in force at such custom-houses at the time of the restoration of the same. And to all such merchandise, effects, and property, the rules established by the preceding article shall apply.

“ARTICLE XXI. If unhappily any disagreement should hereafter arise between the governments of the two republics, whether with respect to the interpretation of any stipulation in this treaty, or with respect to any other particular concerning the political or commercial relations of the two nations, the said governments, in the name of those nations, do promise to each other that they will endeavor, in the most sincere and earnest manner, to settle the differences so arising, and to preserve the state of peace and friendship in which the two countries are now placing themselves; using, for this end, mutual representation and pacific negotiations. And if, by these means, they should not be enabled to come to an agreement, a resort shall not, on this account, be had to reprisals, aggression, or hostility of any kind, by the one republic against the other, until the government of that which deems itself aggrieved shall have maturely considered, in the spirit of peace and good neighborhood, whether it would not be better that such difference should be settled by the arbitration of commissioners appointed on each side, or by that of a friendly nation. And should such course be proposed by either party, it shall be acceded to by the other, unless deemed by it altogether incompatible with the nature of the difference or the circumstances of the case.

“ARTICLE XXII. If (which is not to be expected, and which God forbid) war should unhappily break out between the two republics, they do now, with a view to such calamity, solemnly pledge themselves to each other and to the world, to observe the following rules; absolutely, where the nature of the subject permits, and as closely as possible in all cases where such absolute observance shall be impossible:—

“I. The merchants of either republic then residing in the other shall be allowed to remain twelve months for those dwelling in the interior, and six months for those dwelling at the seaports, to collect their debts and settle their affairs, during which periods they shall enjoy the same protection, and be on the same footing, in all respects, as the citizens or subjects of the most friendly nations; and, at the expiration thereof, or any time before, they shall have full liberty to depart, carrying off all their effects without molestation or hinderance; conforming therein to the same laws which the citizens or subjects of the most friendly nations are required to conform to. Upon the entrance of the armies of either nation into the territories of the other, women and children, ecclesiastics, scholars of every faculty, cultivators of the earth, merchants, artisans, manufacturers, and fishermen, unarmed and inhabiting unfortified towns, villages, or places, and in general all persons whose occupations are for the common subsistence and benefit of mankind, shall be allowed to continue their respective employments unmolested in their persons. Nor shall their houses or goods be burned or otherwise destroyed, nor their cattle taken, nor their fields wasted, by the armed force into whose power, by the events which we were recently forced with a neighbouring nation, is the demonstration it has afforded of the military strength of our country. Before the late war with of war; they may happen to fall; but if the necessity arise to take any thing from them for the use of such armed force, the same shall be paid for at an equitable price. All churches, hospitals, schools, colleges, libraries, and other establishments for charitable and beneficent purposes, shall be respected, and all persons connected with the same protected in the discharge of their duties, and the pursuit of their vocations.

“II. In order that the fate of prisoners of war may be alleviated, all such practices as those of sending them into distant, inclement, or unwholesome districts, or crowding them into close and noxious places, shall be studiously avoided. They shall not be confined in dungeons, prison-ships, or prisons, nor be put in irons, or bound, or otherwise restrained in the use of their limbs. The officers shall enjoy liberty on their paroles, within convenient districts, and have comfortable quarters; and the common soldiers shall be disposed in cantonments, open and extensive enough for air and exercise, and lodged in barracks as roomy and good as are provided by the party in whose power they are for its own troops. But if any officer shall break his parole by leaving the district so assigned him, or any other prisoner shall escape from the limits of his cantonment, after they shall have been designated to him, such individual, officer, or other prisoner, shall forfeit so much of the benefit of this article as provides for his liberty on parole or in cantonment. And if any officer so breaking his parole, or any common soldier so escaping from the limits assigned him, shall afterwards be found in arms, previously to his being regularly exchanged, the person so offending shall be dealt with according to the established laws of war. The officers shall be daily furnished by the party in whose power they are with as many rations, and of the same articles, as are allowed, either in kind or by commutation, to officers of equal rank in its own army; and all others shall be daily furnished with such ration as is allowed to a common soldier in its own service; the value of all which supplies shall, at the close of the war, or at periods to be agreed upon between the respective commanders, be paid by the other party, on a mutual adjustment of accounts for subsistence of prisoners; and such accounts shall not be mingled with or set off against any others, nor the balance due on them be withheld, as a compensation or reprisal for any cause whatever, real or pretended. Each party shall be allowed to keep a commissary of prisoners, appointed by itself, with every cantonment of prisoners, in possession of the other; which commissary shall see the prisoners as often as he pleases; shall be allowed to receive, exempt from all duties or taxes, and to distribute whatever comforts may be sent to them by their friends; and shall be free to transmit his reports in open letters to the party by whom he is employed.

“And it is declared that neither the pretence that war dissolves all treaties, nor any other whatever, shall be considered as annulling or suspending the solemn covenant contained in this article. On the contrary, the state of war is precisely that for which it is provided; and during which, its stipulations are to be as sacredly observed as the most acknowledged obligations under the law of nature or nations.

“ARTICLE XXIII. This treaty shall be ratified by the president of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the senate thereof, and by the president of the Mexican republic, with the previous approbation of its general congress; and the ratifications shall be exchanged in the city of Washington, or at the seat of government in Mexico, in four months from the date of the signature thereof, or sooner if practicable.

“In faith whereof, we, the respective plenipotentiaries, have signed this treaty of peace, friendship, limits, and settlement, and have hereunto affixed our seals respectively. Done in quintuplicate, Mexico, European and other foreign powers entertained imperfect and erroneous views of our physical strength as a nation, and of our ability to prosecute war, and especially a war waged out of our own country. They saw that our standing army on the peace establishment did not exceed ten thousand men. Accustomed themselves to maintain in peace large standing armies, for the protection of thrones against their own subjects, as well as against foreign enemies, they had not conceived that it was possible for a nation without such an army, well disciplined and of long service, to wage war successfully. They held in low repute our militia, and were far from regarding them as an effective force, unless it might be for temporary defensive operations when invaded on our own soil. The events of the late war with Mexico have not only undeceived them, but have removed erroneous impressions which prevailed to some extent even among a portion of our own countrymen. That war has demonstrated, that upon the breaking out of hostilities not anticipated, and for which no previous preparation had been made, a volunteer army of citizen soldiers equal to veteran troops, and in numbers equal to any emergency, can in a short period be brought into the field. Unlike what would have occurred in any other country, we were under no necessity of resorting to draughts or conscriptions. On the contrary, such was the number of volunteers who patriotically tendered their services, that the chief difficulty was in making selections, and determining who should be disappointed and compelled to remain at home. Our citizen-soldiers are unlike those drawn from the population of any other country. They are composed indiscriminately of all professions and pursuits; of farmers, lawyers, physicians, merchants, manufacturers, mechanics, and labourers; and this, not only among the officers, but the private soldiers in the ranks. Our citizen-soldiers are unlike those of any other country in other respects. They are armed, and have been accustomed from their youth up to handle and use fire-arms; and a large proportion of them, especially in the western and more newly-settled states, are expert marksmen. They are men who have a reputation to maintain at home by their good conduct in the field. They are intelligent, and there is an individuality of character which is found in the ranks of no other army. In battle, each private man, as well as every officer, fights not only for his country, but for glory and distinction among his fellow-citizens when he shall return to civil life.

"The war with Mexico has demonstrated not only the ability of the government to organize a numerous army upon a sudden call, but also to provide it with all the munitions and necessary supplies with despatch, convenience, and ease, and to direct its operations with efficiency. The strength of our institutions has not only been displayed in the valour and skill of our troops engaged in active service in the field, but in the organization of those executive branches which were charged with the general direction and conduct of the war. While too great praise cannot be bestowed upon the officers and men who fought our battles, it would be unjust to withhold from those officers necessarily stationed at home, who were charged with the duty of furnishing the army, in proper time and at proper places, with all the munitions of war and other supplies so necessary to make it efficient, the commendation to which they are entitled. The credit due to this class of our officers is the greater, when it is considered that no army in ancient or modern times was ever better appointed or provided than our army in Mexico. Operating in an enemy's country, removed two thousand miles from the seat of the federal government, its different corps spread over a vast extent of territory, hundreds, and even thousands of miles apart from each other, nothing short of the untiring vigilance and extraordinary energy of these officers could have enabled them to provide the army at all points, and in proper season, with all that was required for the most efficient service.

"And whereas, the said treaty, as amended, has been duly ratified on both parts, and the respective ratifications of the same were exchanged at Queretaro on the thirtieth day of May last, by Ambrose H. Sevier and Nathan Clifford, commissioners on the part of the government of the United States, and by Señor Don Louis de la Rosa, minister of relations of the Mexican republic, on the part of that government,—

"Now, therefore, be it known, that I, James K. Polk, president of the United States of America, have caused the said treaty to be made public, to the end that the same, and every clause and article thereof, may be observed and fulfilled with good faith by the United States and the citizens thereof.

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

"The war with Mexico has thus fully developed the capacity of republican governments to prosecute successfully a just and necessary foreign war with all the vigour usually attributed to more arbitrary forms of government. It has been usual for writers on public law to impute to republics a want of that unity, concentration of purpose, and vigour of execution, which are generally admitted to belong to the monarchical and aristocratic forms; and this feature of popular government has been supposed to display itself more particularly in the conduct of a war carried on in an enemy's territory. The war with Great Britain, in 1812, was, to a great extent, confined within our own limits, and shed but little light on this subject. But the war which we have just closed by an honourable peace evinces, beyond all doubt, that a popular representative government is equal to any emergency which is likely to arise in the affairs of a nation.

"The war with Mexico has developed most strikingly and conspicuously another feature in our institutions. It is that, without cost to the government or danger to our liberties, we have in the bosom of our society of freemen, available in a just and necessary war, virtually a standing army of two millions of armed citizen-soldiers, such as fought the battles of Mexico.

"But our military strength does not consist alone in our capacity for extended and successful operations on land. The navy is an important arm of the national defence. If the services of the navy were not so brilliant as those of the army in the late war with Mexico, it was because they had no enemy to meet on their own element. While the army had opportunity of performing more conspicuous service, the navy largely participated in the conduct of the war. Both branches of the service performed their whole duty to the country. For the able and gallant services of the officers and men of the navy — acting independently as well as in coöperation with our troops — in the conquest of the Californias, the capture of Vera Cruz, and the seizure and occupation of other important positions on the Gulf and Pacific coasts, the highest praise is due. Their vigilance, energy, and skill rendered the most effective service in excluding munitions of war and other supplies from the enemy, while they secured a safe entrance for abundant supplies for our own army. Our extended commerce was nowhere interrupted; and for this immunity from the evils of war, the country is indebted to the navy

"The great results which have been developed and brought to light by this war will be of immeasurable importance in the future progress of our country. They will tend powerfully to preserve us from foreign collisions, and to enable us to pursue uninterruptedly our cherished policy of 'peace with all nations, entangling alliances with none.'

"Occupying, as we do, a more commanding position among nations than at any former period, our duties and our responsibilities to ourselves and to posterity are correspondingly increased. This will be the more obvious when we consider the vast additions which have been recently made to our territorial possessions, and their great importance and value.

"Within less than four years, the annexation of Texas to the Union has been consummated; all conflicting title to the Oregon Territory south of the forty-ninth degree of north latitude, being all that was insisted on by any of my predecessors, has been adjusted; and New Mexico and Upper California have been acquired by treaty. The area of these several territories, according to a report carefully prepared by the commissioner of the general land office from the most authentic information in his possession, and which is herewith transmitted, contains one million one hundred and ninety-three thousand and sixty-one square miles, or seven hundred and sixty-three million five hundred and fifty-nine thousand and forty acres; while the area of the remaining twenty-nine states, and the territory not yet organized into states, east of the Rocky Mountains, contains two million fifty-nine thousand five hundred and thirteen square miles, or thirteen hundred and eighteen million one hundred and twenty-six thousand and fifty-eight acres. These estimates show that the territories recently acquired, and over which our exclusive jurisdiction and dominion have been extended, constitute a country more than half as large as all that which was held by the United States before their acquisition. If Oregon be excluded from the estimate, there will still remain within the limits of Texas, New Mexico, and California, eight hundred and fifty-one thousand five hundred and ninety-eight square miles, or five hundred and forty-five million twelve thousand seven hundred and twenty acres; being an addition equal to more than one third of all the territory owned by the United States before their acquisition; and, including Oregon, nearly as great an extent of territory as the whole of Europe, Russia only excepted. The Mississippi, so lately the frontier of our country, is now only its centre. With the addition of the late acquisitions, the United States are now estimated to be nearly as large as the whole of Europe. It is estimated by the superintendent of the coast survey, in the accompanying report, that the extent of the sea-coast of Texas, on the Gulf of Mexico, is upwards of four hundred miles; of the coast of Upper California, on the Pacific, of nine hundred and seventy miles; and of Oregon, including the Straits of Fuca, of six hundred and fifty miles; making the whole extent of sea-coast on the Pacific one thousand six hundred and twenty miles, and the whole extent on both the Pacific and the Gulf of Mexico two thousand and twenty miles. The length of the coast on the Atlantic, from the northern limits of the United States, around the capes of Florida to the Sabine, on the eastern boundary of Texas, is estimated to be three thousand one hundred miles; so that the addition of sea-coast, including Oregon, is very nearly two thirds as great as all we possessed before; and, excluding Oregon, is an addition of one thousand three hundred and seventy miles; being nearly equal to one half of the extent of coast which we possessed before these acquisitions. We have now three great maritime fronts,—on the Atlantic, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Pacific,—making in the whole an extent of sea-coast exceeding five thousand miles. This is the extent of the sea-coast of the United States, not including bays, sounds, and small irregularities of the main shore, and of the sea islands. If these be included, the length of the shore line of coast, as estimated by the superintendent of the coast survey in his report, would be thirty-three thousand and sixty-three miles.

“It would be difficult to calculate the value of these immense additions to our territorial possessions. Texas, lying contiguous to the western boundary of Louisiana, embracing within its limits a part of the navigable tributary waters of the Mississippi and an extensive sea-coast, could not long have remained in the hands of a foreign power without endangering the peace of our south-western frontier. Her products in the vicinity of the tributaries of the Mississippi must have sought a market through these streams, running into and through our territory; and the danger of irritation and collision of interests between Texas, as a foreign state, and ourselves would have been imminent, while the embarrassments in the commercial intercourse between them must have been constant and unavoidable. Had Texas fallen into the hands, or under the influence and control, of a strong maritime or military foreign power, as she might have done, these dangers would have been still greater. They have been avoided by her voluntary and peaceful annexation to the United States. Texas, from her position, was a natural and almost indispensable part of our territories. Fortunately, she has been restored to our country, and now constitutes one of the states of our confederacy, ‘upon an equal footing with the original states.’ The salubrity of climate, the fertility of soil, peculiarly adapted to the production of some of our most valuable staple commodities, and her commercial advantages, must soon make her one of our most populous states.

“New Mexico, though situated in the interior and without a sea-coast, is known to contain much fertile land, to abound in rich mines of the precious metals, and to be capable of sustaining a large population. From its position, it is the intermediate and connecting territory between our settlements and our possessions in Texas, and those on the Pacific coast.

“Upper California, irrespective of the vast mineral wealth recently developed there, holds at this day, in point of value and importance to the rest of the Union, the same relation that Louisiana did when that fine territory was acquired from France forty-five years ago. Extending nearly ten degrees of latitude along the Pacific, and embracing the only safe and commodious harbors on that coast, for many hundred miles, with a temperate climate and an extensive interior of fertile lands, it is scarcely possible to estimate its wealth until it shall be brought under the government of our laws, and its resources fully developed. From its position, it must command the rich commerce of China, of Asia, of the islands of the Pacific, of Western Mexico, of Central America, the South American States, and of the Russian possessions bordering on that ocean. A great emporium will doubtless speedily arise on the Californian coast, which may be destined to rival in importance New Orleans itself. The depot of the vast commerce which must exist on the Pacific will probably be at some point on the Bay of San Francisco, and will occupy the same relation to the whole western coast of that ocean as New Orleans does to the Valley of the Mississippi and the Gulf of Mexico. To this depot our numerous whale ships will resort with their cargoes, to trade, refit, and obtain supplies. This, of itself, will largely contribute to build up a city, which would soon become the centre of a great and rapidly increasing commerce. Situated on a safe harbour, sufficiently capacious for all the navies as well as the marine of the world, and convenient to excellent timber for ship-building, owned by the United States, it must become our great western naval depot.

"It was known that mines of the precious metals existed to a considerable extent in California at the time of its acquisition. Recent discoveries render it probable that these mines are more extensive and valuable than was anticipated. The accounts of the abundance of gold in that territory are of such an extraordinary character as would scarcely command belief, were they not corroborated by the authentic reports of officers in the public service, who have visited the mineral district, and derived the facts which they detail from personal observation. Reluctant to credit the reports in general circulation as to the quantity of gold, the officer commanding our forces in California visited the mineral district in July last, for the purpose of obtaining accurate information on the subject. His report to the war department of the result of his examination, and the facts obtained on the spot, is herewith laid before congress. When he visited the country, there were about four thousand persons engaged in collecting gold. There is every reason to believe that the number of persons so employed has since been augmented. The explorations already made warrant the belief that the supply is very large, and that gold is found at various places in an extensive district of country.

"Information received from officers of the navy and other sources, though not so full and minute, confirm the accounts of the commander of our military force in California. It appears, also, from these reports, that mines of quicksilver are found in the vicinity of the gold region. One of them is now being worked, and is believed to be among the most productive in the world."

The discovery and partial development of the immense mineral wealth of California, at the very moment when it was passing into the possession of the United States, promised to produce as powerful an effect upon the American mind as that of the New World did upon the Old, when its marvellous riches were exposed by Columbus. From east to west, from north to south, the spirit of emigration moved on the hearts of the people. It seized the old as well as the young. It pervaded city and country, mountain, glen, and valley. It decimated the ranks of every profession. In almost every town and village, throughout the land, adventurers started up, associations were formed, and eager companies, of hopeful, ardent, enthusiastic pioneers, who resolved on seeing for themselves the modern El Dorado. The highways and thoroughfares in every part of the land were alive with the moving multitudes, seeking a place of departure. The wharves of the seaports were thronged with impatient expectants, who were willing to pay any price for a passage, and submit to any privations and hardships by the way, so that, by some means, they could reach the golden shore. Ships were every where in the greatest demand. A system of crowding and packing, second only to that so notorious in the African trade, did not deter or dishearten the adventurers. Band after band they hurried away, some for the short cut by the Isthmus of Panama, some for the dreary and exhausting overland route, and some to double the cape, with all the tedium and discomfort of a five months' voyage. Their name was legion. Inexperienced in travel, uninured to the hardships and privations of a pioneer life, poorly provided with even the necessaries for the voyage, thousands left their homes only to die by the way, or to seize the first opportunity to return. Of two hundred thousand, who are estimated to have gone to California from the United States, about forty thousand have died, and twenty-five thousand returned sick, or discouraged by the hardships of a life of which they had not only no experience, but no idea.

The war in Mexico, while productive of great advantages to the United States, was also fruitful in difficult problems and troublesome political questions. An immense territory had been acquired. It was now to be organized and governed. In effecting this, sectional interests were to be adjusted, and political differences harmonized, the management of which required more tact, wisdom, and true generalship, than the conquest of a world. Every element of discord in the nation was to be stirred up, agitated, and invested with individuality and life. The integrity of the Union was to be threatened, and all the blessings and privileges purchased by the revolution of '76, and secured and consolidated by a career of national prosperity and happiness unparalleled in the history of the world, were to be jeopardized in the strife of party. The insatiable appetite for territory, over which to spread the dominion of slavery, was only to be appeased by the monopoly of every acre of the conquered provinces. No sooner was peace established in Mexico, than the gauntlet was thrown down at Washington, for a three years' war of words.

In his message of December, 1848, the president urged upon congress the immediate establishment of territorial governments, in all the newly-acquired possessions.

"The existing condition of California," said he, "and of that part of New Mexico lying west of the Rio Grande, and without the limits of Texas, imperiously demand that congress should, at its present session, organize territorial governments over them.

"Upon the exchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace with Mexico, on the 30th of May last, the temporary governments which had been established over New Mexico and California by our military and naval commanders, by virtue of the rights of war, ceased to derive any obligatory force from that source of authority; and having been ceded to the United States, all government and control over them under the authority of Mexico had ceased to exist. Impressed with the necessity of establishing territorial governments over them, I recommended the subject to the favourable consideration of congress in my message communicating the ratified treaty of peace, on the 6th of July last, and invoked their action at that session. Congress adjourned without making any provision for their government. The inhabitants, by the transfer of their country, had become entitled to the benefits of our laws and constitution, and yet were left without any regularly-organized government. Since that time, the very limited power possessed by the executive has been exercised to preserve and protect them from the inevitable consequences of a state of anarchy. The only government which remained was that established by the military authority during the war. Regarding this to be a de facto government, and that by the presumed consent of the inhabitants it might be continued temporarily, they were advised to conform and submit to it for the short intervening period before congress would again assemble and could legislate on the subject.

"It is our solemn duty to provide, with the least practicable delay, for New Mexico and California, regularly-organized territorial governments. The causes of the failure to do this at the last session of congress are well known, and deeply to be regretted. With the opening prospects of increased prosperity and national greatness which the acquisition of these rich and extensive territorial possessions affords, how irrational it would be to forego or to reject these advantages, by the agitation of a domestic question which is coeval with the existence of our government itself, and to endanger by internal strifes, geographical divisions, and heated contests for political power, or for any other cause, the harmony of the glorious Union of our confederated states; that Union which binds us together as one people, and which for sixty years has been our shield and protection against every danger. In the eyes of the world, and of posterity, how trivial and insignificant will be all our internal divisions and struggles, compared with the preservation of this Union of the states in all its vigour and with all its countless blessings! No patriot would foment and excite geographical and sectional divisions. No lover of his country would deliberately calculate the value of the Union. Future generations would look in amazement upon the folly of such a course. Other nations of the present day would look upon it with astonishment, and such of them as desire to maintain and perpetuate thrones and monarchical or aristocratical principles will view it with exultation and delight, because in it they will see the elements of faction, which they hope must ultimately overturn our system. Ours is the great example of a prosperous and free self-governed republic, commanding the admiration and the imitation of all the lovers of freedom throughout the world. How solemn, therefore, is the duty, how impressive the call upon us, and upon all parts of our country, to cultivate a patriotic spirit of harmony, of good fellowship, of compromise and mutual concession, in the administration of the incomparable system of government formed by our fathers in the midst of almost insuperable difficulties, and transmitted to us, with the injunction that we should enjoy its blessings and hand it down unimpaired to those who may come after us!

"In view of the high and responsible duties which we owe to ourselves and to mankind, I trust you may be able, at your present session, to approach the adjustment of the only domestic question which seriously threatens, or probably ever can threaten, to disturb the harmony and successful operations of our system.

"The immensely valuable possessions of New Mexico and California are already inhabited by a considerable population. Attracted by their great fertility, their mineral wealth, their commercial advantages, and the salubrity of the climate, emigrants from the older states, in great numbers, are already preparing to seek new homes in these inviting regions."

Pending the settlement of these difficult questions, others of a more ordinary character were to be adjusted. Absorbed as the government and the nation had been in the prosecution of the war, it moved quietly on in the ordinary channels of legislation and business.

The sub-treasury of Mr. Van Buren's administration, which had been repealed at the extra session, in 1841, was revived and reestablished in 1846. In the same year, a warehousing system, arranged and adjusted by Mr. Walker, then secretary of the treasury, was brought forward and adopted. It provided that the duties on all imported goods, wares, or merchandise, should be paid in cash; and that goods upon which the duties were not paid should be taken possession of by the collector, and deposited in public stores at the risk of the owner, and subject at all times to his order, upon the payment of the proper duties and expenses. In case the goods should remain in the storehouse more than one year without the payment of the duties, then they are to be appraised, and sold by the collector at public auction. Within one year after the goods are deposited in the public storehouse, they may be withdrawn and transported to any other port of entry.

Previous to the passage of that act, the warehouse system was in existence, although the laws which regulated it were not so simple and well defined as the bill of 1846. Indeed, the principle was established as early as 1799, and was enlarged or contracted at various periods since the adoption of the constitution, for the benefit of the commercial interest. The effect of the bill is to give an extension of credit to the importer, who would otherwise, under the new system of cash duties, be required to pay the duties upon his merchandise as soon as it was landed.

The subject of internal improvements was another question which vexed the legislation of this period, and called forth an executive veto. To facilitate the vast internal commerce of the country, it was necessary to remove obstructions from many of its rivers, and to improve, in various ways, many of the harbours upon its extended sea and lake coast. To effect these objects in the most unexceptionable manner, representing equally and harmoniously all the interests of every section, a great convention had been held at Chicago. The subject had, also, been thoroughly discussed in the papers; and the people were fully convinced and ready to act. A well-adjusted bill, passed after ample deliberation and discussion, by large majorities of both houses of congress, in 1846, was defeated by the act of the president.

In the following year, another bill, appropriating nearly a million of dollars to the same object, passed both houses by large majorities, and was defeated in the same manner, by an executive veto.

The postal arrangements of the United States underwent large alterations during the administration of Mr. Polk. In imitation of the great English reform, though yet far behind it, the rates of postage were reduced, in 1845, to five cents on every single letter, of half an ounce, for any distance under three hundred miles, and ten cents for any greater distance. This change, which is most acceptable to the people, has more than realized the anticipations of its supporters. It met with great opposition, on the ground that, in a country of such vast extent, and having so much sparsely-occupied territory, the receipts of the department would fall short of its expenses. The result has already proved the futility of this objection; and there can be no doubt that a still further reduction would be followed by a similar result. We look to see the postage reduced to a uniform rate of two cents per half ounce, for all distances. It can be done, beyond a question, without risk to the department. And, even if it could not, the great public benefit would more than justify the experiment. The post-office department is but one branch of the public service, and, when the public good demands it, is as well entitled to an appropriation from the treasury, as the army or the navy. It is an arbitrary maxim, intelligible only to statesmen and legislators, that the post-office department should pay its own expenses. To the common sense of the common people, who here are the true sovereigns, the only rule applicable to the case is that which recognizes the government, in all its departments alike, as a mere agency for the general good, and bound only to consult the greatest good of the greatest number. To require any part of the system to support itself, by taxing the people, while all the other parts are only a tax upon the common treasury, is to make a distinction without a difference.

At the same time that this important step was taken in the reduction of the rates of postage, arrangements were also made for the regular transmission of the mails—to Great Britain, France, Germany, and other foreign countries. Contracts were entered into, by the department, with the principal merchants engaged in the packet lines to various parts of the world, who immediately undertook to carry the arrangement into effect. The result has been, an entire new class of ocean steamers, which are an honour to the country and the age. A noble competition for speed, regularity, and system, in the departure and return of these leviathan carriers, has arisen between the English and American lines, which insures to the public, on both sides of the Atlantic, the best results which ample means, well-directed energy, and a laudable ambition to excel, can achieve.

The claims of American citizens for French spoliations, prior to 1800, were revived at this period. The history of those claims is brief and simple. In consequence of the ready aid which France afforded the United States in the struggle for independence, a treaty was entered into between the two nations, by the terms of which the United States were bound to assist in protecting the French colonies from aggressions. Soon after the adoption of the constitution, and before the government had acquired the means of maintaining a naval warfare, England declared war against France, and attacked her West India possessions. France called upon the United States to fulfil the treaty stipulations, and come to her defence; in other words, to make war upon England. Without a navy, and almost without a treasury, this was impossible. It was deemed wiser and better to break an engagement with an ally, than to involve the country in a fresh war, without any sufficient means of carrying it on. The United States, therefore, abandoned the treaty, as the best choice between two evils. France, in retaliation, made large reprisals upon American commerce, which had then begun to whiten the Atlantic. These spoliations were afterwards ascertained to amount to about ten millions of dollars. Thousands of merchants, just started in a career of prosperity, were ruined, having lost their all at a single blow. Commerce was paralyzed for a time. At the close of the war, an adjustment was attempted between the two nations. The whole subject was ably and thoroughly canvassed, and the result was, a relinquishment, on the part of France, of her claims upon the United States, on condition that the United States should assume and pay the claims of her own citizens against France. This was solemnly agreed to, and France was honourably released from all obligation to make good these heavy spoliations. Having by her own act, and for her own benefit, deprived the sufferers of all right to seek redress from France, it was but common honesty that the United States government should pay the debt out of her own treasury. Her treasury was then exceedingly low. A heavy debt, incurred in the war of the revolution, embarrassed it, and this act of justice to her own citizens was consequently delayed. It has often been revived. Fourteen times a report has been made, by the appropriate committee, in favor of redeeming the national promise. Bill after bill, for this purpose, has passed one house of congress, and been defeated or overlooked in the other. By what show of argument, or pretence of honesty, it has been so long delayed, and so often set aside, it is difficult to imagine. All similar claims have been adjusted and paid, almost without discussion. This alone, seemingly for no other reason than because it is an old one, has been refused. A subsequent claim of precisely the same nature against France has been urged and insisted on, even to an open menace of war in case of further delay. And there can be no room for doubt, that every dollar of this claim, if it had still remained good against the original spoiler, would long since have been enforced at the cannon's mouth. By what system of ethics our American legislators justify their refusal in this case to pay a debt which they voluntarily, and for their own benefit, assumed, and from which, without the consent of the creditors, they released the original debtor, has never been made to appear. During the administration of Mr. Polk, a new attempt was made to do justice to the claimants, who, for half a century, had been seeking redress in vain. A bill was carried through both houses of congress, authorizing the payment of five millions of dollars, in public lands. Though this sum was less than half the original claim, and though the mode of payment was but giving a stone where bread was due, the eager claimants, who had long despaired of even a hearing for their case, were willing to accept it. But they had yet another disappointment to meet. The president vetoed the bill. His only reason for so doing was, that being then at war with a foreign nation, all the resources of the government were required to carry it on; thus not only withholding from those who had grown gray in want a mere acknowledgment of their claim, but making one wrong an apology and pretext for doing another.

The treaty of peace, and the acquisition of a large portion of Mexican territory had not put an end to the war. It had only transferred it from the Mexican to the American soil. Even before peace was "conquered," and territory acquired, a warm party strife arose with reference to the due division of the spoils. The acquisition had been sought by the administration, mainly with a view to the extension of slavery, and the southern interest wished to swallow it all up. This the north felt bound to prevent, if possible, having a sound and immovable position in the fact, that, as slavery had been abolished in Mexico, the territory was then free, and the inhabitants all opposed to a change. The agitation was great, and constantly increasing in violence. It gave rise, in 1846, to the celebrated "Wilmot Proviso," which has not only given a world-wide notoriety to an otherwise undistinguished individual, but furnished an inexhaustible theme for party declamation and bitter personal invective. During the first session of the twenty-ninth congress, a bill was introduced into the house of representatives, appropriating two million dollars for the purpose of defraying any extraordinary expenses which might be incurred in the intercourse between the United States and foreign nations. This appropriation was desired to enable the president to obtain California in any treaty which might be concluded between the two countries. To this bill Mr. David Wilmot, of Pennsylvania, proposed the following proviso:—

"Provided, That, as an express and fundamental condition to the acquisition of any territory from the republic of Mexico by the United States, by virtue of any treaty that may be negotiated between them, and to the use by the executive of the moneys herein appropriated, neither slavery nor involuntary servitude shall ever exist in any part of said territory, except for crime, whereof the party shall first be duly convicted."

This, though sustained in the house, was rejected in the senate, and caused the defeat of the bill. An appropriation of three million dollars, for the same object, was proposed at the subsequent session, to which the same proviso was again attached by the house, and rejected by the senate. The bill, thus amended, was returned to the house, which receded from its position, and passed the appropriation without restriction.

This was but the beginning of a conflict of unparalleled bitterness and severity in the history of America. It destroyed some valuable lives. It threatened more, even in the senate-house. And more than that, it threatened the dissolution of the Union. But it will pass away, and be forgotten,—like one of those blustering wind-clouds, which sweep over the land in summer, having all the fierceness and blackness of a thunder-cloud, but none of its terrific flashes or irresistible bolts.

During the administration of Mr. Polk, two new states were admitted into the Union—Iowa on the 28th of December, 1846, and Wisconsin on the 3d of March, 1847. A territorial government was also established in Oregon in August, 1848. In this the Wilmot Proviso was inserted. An effort was made in the senate to assign, as a reason for this concession, the fact that the country lay north of 36° 30', and thus to recognize, if not to reenact, the Missouri compromise.

But it was unsuccessful. The bill passed, and was approved, with the dreaded clause in full effect. How the president could answer it to his conscience to approve a bill containing a provision, which he, in common with all the south, declared to be flagrantly unconstitutional, it is difficult to comprehend. If slavery has "natural boundaries" and local limits, conscience and the constitution have none. To exclude any institution, or any branch of business, from one section, by legislative enactment, and to hold it treason to the constitution even to attempt the same exclusion in another section, is a puerile evasion of the whole question at issue. The tone and temper of the parties, in this discussion, may be gathered from a brief extract from the speeches of their two great leaders.

Mr. Webster admitted the propriety of the establishment of a territorial government in Oregon, and was willing to vote for this bill as it came from the house. If amended as now proposed, he would not be able to vote for it. He recited the words of the section, and said, the amendment proposed gave a reason for the application of the principle of the ordinance of 1787 to the territory of Oregon. When a single reason was given for any act, it was intended to be inferred that there were no other reasons. The territory of Oregon was above the line of the Missouri compromise. His objection to slavery was irrespective of lines and points of latitude: it took in the whole country and the whole question. He was opposed to it in every shape and in every qualification, and was against any compromise of the question.

Mr. Calhoun said he should vote against the amendment, because he regarded it as ambiguous, and he was against all ambiguity. Again, he opposed it because the north could not be more determined to exclude the south, than he was to resist such exclusion. He would be as firm in maintaining his ground as northern senators were in maintaining theirs. A majority would always be able to carry their views; but here a minority, aided by a few of the majority, attempted to impose on the south restrictions which could not be submitted to.

In July, 1846, the county and town of Alexandria, embracing all that portion of the District of Columbia which lay south of the Potomac, except so much as was covered by buildings belonging to the United States, was retroceded to the state of Virginia.

The election of 1848 was one of deep and pervading interest, and was warmly contested. All the exciting questions which had so recently agitated the country were involved in it. Among them, that of slavery extension was the most absorbing. Mr. Cass, of Michigan, for president, and General Butler, of Georgia, for vice-president, were the democratic candidates; and General Taylor, of Louisiana, for president, and Mr. Fillmore, of New York, for vice-president, were the candidates of the whig party. It is a singular circumstance, in this contest, that the whigs, who, as a party, were opposed to the extension of slavery in the new territories, should have selected for their candidate a slaveholder, from the far south, while the other party selected a man from the free states. It shows strongly their confidence in the men they had respectively chosen, and illustrated the fact, which, in the heat of discussion, is too often overlooked, that northern men are not all ultra abolitionists, nor southern slaveholders all slavery propagandists. The rabid abolitionists are few and far between, at the north. The real lovers of slavery, in the abstract, are not more numerous at the south. Abolish party names, lay aside violent personal and sectional denunciation, and the true majority in the greater part of the Southern States would be found to sympathize more with the northern views, than with those of the champions of their own section, and slavery itself would die of consumption.

The whig candidates were successful, in this contest, by large majorities, and, on the 4th of March, 1849, General Zachary Taylor took the oath of office as president, and Millard Fillmore entered upon his duties as vice-president of the United States.

Mr. Fillmore was born at Summer Hill, Cayuga county, New York, on January 7, 1800, and is, accordingly, now a little over fifty years old. His father was a farmer, in very limited circumstances. The family removed to Aurora, Erie county, in 1819, where the father still carries on a farm of moderate dimensions: the traveller has often passed the modest house where reside the family of the president, in a style not more pretending than is common to thriving farmers of that prosperous district. The narrow means of the father did not permit the bestowal on the son of any other than a most limited common school education. When fifteen years old, he was sent to learn the trade of a clothier, at which he worked for four years, improving all his spare time in reading books from a little library in the village where he lived. At the age of nineteen, he made the acquaintance of Judge Wood, of Cayuga county, who detected the latent talents of the young man, and induced him to study law, for which he generously furnished the means. Mr. Fillmore remained in Judge Wood's office above two years, studying with that industry and perseverance which have distinguished him through life: during this time, he also taught school in the winter months, in order himself to provide for his expenses as far as possible. In 1822, he entered a law office at Buffalo, and passed a year studying and teaching, when he was admitted to the bar, and removed to Aurora, to commence the practice of his profession. In 1826, he married Abigail, the daughter of Rev. Lemuel Powers. Several years were now mainly employed by Mr. Fillmore in diligent judicial studies, and in the limited legal practice of a country town. In 1829, he was elected to the assembly of New York, and for three years (during which time he removed his residence to Buffalo) held a seat in that body. Here he was remarkable for constant devotion to and unwearied industry in his duties. He took a prominent and influential part in the enactment of the law abolishing imprisonment for debt. In 1832, he was elected to the twenty-third congress, and served creditably. In the fall of 1836, he was again returned for the same office, and acted as a member of the committee on elections, in the famous New Jersey "broad-seal" case, and in that capacity established his reputation in the house. He was reelected to the next congress, and now assumed the responsible position of chairman of the committee of ways and means. In the duties of this post, at a trying crisis, he manifested the industry, dignity of bearing, efficient practical talent, and ability to secure the confidence of his colleagues which had before distinguished him. His public reputation perhaps rested more upon the manner in which he filled this post in the twenty-seventh congress, than on any other portion of his career, at the time of his election as vice-president.

After this, resisting the importunities of his friends and the whig convention of his district, Mr. Fillmore returned to Buffalo, to the practice of his profession. In 1844, he was run by the whigs of New York for governor, and was beaten by Silas Wright, at the same time that the so-called Liberty party gave the vote of the state for Polk, Texas, the Mexican war, and the extension of slavery. In 1847, he was elected controller of the state, and removed to Albany to discharge the duties of that office, which he held till February, 1849, when he resigned it, prior to his induction into the vice-presidency.

It was a period of intense sectional animosity and political difficulty, requiring, in the executive and the cabinet, an unusual degree of firmness, moderation, and wisdom. From General Taylor's want of experience in political matters, and of acquaintance with the practical workings of the great machine, it was apprehended some serious mistakes might be made, which would give the opposition a temporary advantage. It was found, however, that he had the qualifications demanded by the crisis. He was eminently characterized by firmness, in which there was no trait of obstinacy, an undeviating integrity of purpose, and a sound practical common sense, which, in great emergencies, is often superior to the largest experience. His course of administration, though brief, reflects credit upon his name. His cabinet was well selected, not only with reference to the ability with which the several departments were filled, but to the wise adjustment and fair representations of the great sectional interests in its composition.

The same spirit of sectional extension, which led to the annexation of Texas, and the dismemberment of Mexico, turned with an evil eye upon "the brightest gem in the crown of Castile,"—the queen of the Antilles. The government which Spain sees fit to exercise over Cuba is not wisely calculated to make her subjects easy, especially in their near vicinity to, and large intercourse with, their free and prosperous neighbours on the north. For many years there has been fomenting, slowly and noiselessly, a spirit of discontent, which only seeks occasion to make it a spirit of revolution. This sentiment has been liberally encouraged by some of the American presses, and largely countenanced and aided by the substantial sympathy of individuals and private associations, in both sections of the country, but more especially at the south.

The great fear of the politicians of the Southern States is, that, in "extending the area of freedom," the area of slavery will lose its relative importance. Hence the deep interest with which many among them have viewed the probable, or possible, future annexation of Cuba. Hence, also, the readiness with which "the sinews of war" have been provided for bands of desperate adventurers, who have sought to make a crisis by actual invasion, and, in a manner, to compel the latent spirit of revolution in the island to a premature eruption.

In August, 1849, President Taylor received information that a large body of men was gathering from various directions on Round Island, in Mobile Bay. They were well provided with arms, &c., and evidently had some secret object in view, as no reasonable account could be given of their coming together in that place. Impressed with the idea, which was well confirmed by information derived from the most reliable sources, that the design of this secret expedition was to make a warlike demonstration on the coast of Cuba, the president ordered a lieutenant of the navy, in a steamer, to proceed to the spot, and disperse them. This was accomplished without resistance, though not without a few rounds of harmless newspaper musketry, at which the president neither flinched nor winked.

The young volcano was smothered, but not quenched. Early in 1850, its rumbling, faint and far, was heard in different parts of the country. Men not suspected of business abroad mysteriously left their homes for parts unknown, and, drawn by some unseen influence, met at some distant point, and found themselves suddenly acquainted. General Lopez, a Spanish officer of some notoriety, seemed to be cognizant of these movements, if not to have the principal direction of them. The president and his officers were watchful and suspicious. But nothing was seen or disclosed from any quarter, to justify the direct interposition of the executive power, till after General Lopez had embarked, with a considerable force, at New Orleans, with a clearance for Chagres. Then it was made known at Washington, that such an armament had been fitted out in the United States, and that, in the opinion of the Spanish minister, it was clearly and unquestionably destined to the invasion of Cuba.

On receiving this information, the president gave instant orders to despatch all the vessels in commission, then within reach of orders, to the coast of Cuba, to prevent, if possible, any hostile movement on the part of the secret expedition. But the order was too late. The buccaneer squadron, consisting of a steamer and two sailing vessels, and comprising about six hundred men, effected a landing at Cardenas.

Cardenas is a small port, containing about twenty-five hundred inhabitants, somewhat more than one hundred miles east of Havana. It is not fortified against an attack from without. The onset was successful. The invaders landed without molestation, and marched immediately to the attack. With trifling resistance, the few soldiers at the command of the governor gave way. Three lives were lost on the part of the Spaniards, and six on that of the aggressors. The town was soon in possession of Lopez, who hoisted the flag of freedom and Cuban independence, and called for a rally. But no one joined his standard. He made preparations for a march upon Matanzas, and promised his men to be master of the island, with all its wealth, in three days. These promises, however, soon began to fade. Instead of a general rush of the inhabitants to join the ranks of insurrection, there was an entire absence of sympathy in the movement. Whether it sprung from fear, and the consciousness that the time had not arrived for such a movement, or from want of confidence in the men and means employed, does not appear. It was probably, to a large extent, the latter. The Cubans were not prepared. The invading general and his secret counsellors had not counted the cost. The government of the island was stronger than they imagined—strong, not, as in our happy land, in the love of its subjects, but in their fears.

The preparations for an advance upon Matanzas were but half completed, when the signs of resistance, on the part of the Cubans, became too serious to be overlooked. General Lopez suddenly countermanded the order, and directed the armament to be reshipped, with all despatch. This done, he reëmbarked with his entire band, and a few prisoners, one of whom was the governor of Cardenas, and stood out to sea. Thus ended the invasion of Cuba—the paltriest piece of open piracy recorded in modern history. To give the enterprise a more perfect title to this distinction, the invading general rifled the treasury of Cardenas, and carried away about fifteen hundred dollars.

California and New Mexico, still under the military government, which the exigencies of war had established, were beginning to be impatient for the enjoyment of civil institutions. The territory of Deseret, or Utah, on the north of California, where the fugitive Mormons had recently pitched their tents, claimed also a shelter under the national ægis. The population and commerce of California had increased with unprecedented rapidity. It had already attained the growth of a sovereign state, and movements were immediately commenced to organize and ask admission to the Union. To watch, and, so far as might be needful, to guide this movement, Hon. Thomas Butler King, of Georgia, an able and honourable man, was commissioned by the president to proceed thither, under secret instructions, as confidential agent of the government. What part he took in the ultimate organization of the government there, or whether any part at all, does not appear. But the president was severely censured, by the opposition, for attempting to interfere in the matter.

New Mexico, also, began to feel that she had outgrown the territorial minority, and had a right to claim the maturity of a state. To this Texas set up a counter claim to her entire territory, contending that they were originally one province, and that, by the treaty with Mexico, she had a right to embrace the whole. Here a question of great difficulty arose. Texas was a slave state. New Mexico was free. And the question of territory, which was comparatively of little importance, became involved with that of the extension and perpetuation of slavery, which was vital to “the peculiar institution” of the south. New Mexico was recognized by the government as a distinct territory, and was held, as such, under military rule, awaiting the action of congress, to establish a republican organization.

Availing themselves of the rights of freemen, the people of these sections assembled in convention, and adopted the necessary measures to secure their political rights. California and New Mexico, adopting each a constitution after the model of the older states, and choosing their senators and representatives, asked immediate admission into the Union, as independent states. Utah organized as a territory, and chose her delegate, to represent her interests in congress. Three applicants were thus found knocking for admission at the door of the Capitol, on the opening of the thirty-first congress. Instead of receiving a cordial welcome as they should have done, from the hands of a people who had expended so much blood and treasure to obtain them, for the sole purpose, as they avowed, of “extending the area of freedom,” they were kept waiting eight long months at the door, and visited, meanwhile, with every species of vituperation and reproach, for having presumed to claim the natural and inalienable right of choosing how their political institutions should be organized, and preferring freedom to slavery. Upon the question of the admission of these states to the Union ensued the most violent and bitter partisan discussion that has ever characterized American legislation. The ardent temper of the south was roused to madness by the attempt, as they argued, to exclude from the new possessions them and their property. It was with their blood and their treasure, in common with that of the free states, that these possessions were purchased; consequently, as they viewed the case, they had a right to carry their institutions and laws there. No power on earth should exclude them. Denunciations the most severe and sweeping were hurled at the representatives and people of the free states. Threats of receding from the Union were liberally indulged in; and all the resources of argument and persuasion, of menace and abuse, of personal invective and political address, were exhausted, in the determined endeavour to force upon the new territories the institution of slavery.

The simple answer to all this was, that the territory was known to be free, and its people opposed to slavery, before it was acquired; that they exercised only a natural right in determining to remain free, and arranging their constitution accordingly; that Louisiana, and Florida, and Texas had exercised the same right in the opposite direction, and that right had been conceded to them, as a matter which they alone had power to control; and that slavery could not be forced upon them, or the door for its introduction thrust open against their will, without a gross violation of the fundamental law of republicanism, which recognizes all sovereignty as residing in the people. The debate was animated, fierce, powerful, and long-continued. It was a war, not of the pygmies only, but of the giants. The two great speeches of the session were those of John C. Calhoun, of South Carolina, and Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts. These comprise the better part of the argument on both sides. Mr. Clay, though far advanced in years, brought all the maturity and vigour of his great mind to bear upon the question. He sought, with Mr. Webster, to allay excitement and conciliate opposing parties. To this end he gave his support to a bill, which, from the heterogeneous elements of which it was composed, received the name of the omnibus, intended to settle, by one decisive vote, all the vexed questions arising out of the great subject of agitation. It provided, 1. For the admission of California, under her own constitution; 2. For organizing territorial governments for New Mexico and Utah, without any provision on the subject of slavery; and, 3. For paying Texas a sum which should be acceptable to her, for relinquishing her claims to a part of New Mexico. These measures were united in one bill, in order to compel the northern members, who were in favour of the admission of California, to waive the Wilmot Proviso in the other measures.

This measure, which was deemed by Mr. Clay and Mr. Webster a fair compromise between the north and the south, engrossed the entire attention of the senate for many weeks. No other business was done. Amendment was piled upon amendment, and speech followed speech, till the combatants were as weary with talking, as the people with hearing, the wordy debate. When, at length, and with exceeding difficulty, it was brought to a vote, it was defeated, and lost.

In the midst of this important debate, and very soon after he had put forth a great and exhausting effort in defence of the "peculiar institutions" and principles of the south, Mr. Calhoun, of South Carolina, was called to his last account. He died at his post, on the 1st of April, 1850, giving his last energies of body and mind to the great interests committed to his trust.

There were so many brilliant and attractive points in Mr. Calhoun's character, — so much personal excellence, simplicity, and purity, such unquestioned genius, and such claims of long and patriotic public service, — that his sudden exit in the midst of his labours, and so soon after a signal public effort, evoked a feeling of sympathy which was quite as general and sincere among northern as among southern men.

Mr. Calhoun was born in the Abbeville district, South Carolina, upon the homestead of his father, Patrick Calhoun, who was born in Ireland. At the age of thirteen, he was placed in an academy at Georgia. At nineteen, he concluded to secure for himself a classical education. At twenty-three, he was graduated at Yale, and immediately entered upon service at the Litchfield law school. In 1807, he was admitted to the bar of South Carolina. In 1808, he was sent to the legislature, where he served two sessions. In 1811, he was sent to congress, where he was placed on the committee on foreign relations, and as chairman after the retirement of Peter B. Porter. He brought in the bill declaring war against Great Britain. He was greatly instrumental in reorganizing the army, reviving the West Point Academy, and in originating the coast survey. He was twice elected vice-president, in 1825 and in 1829.

Mr. Calhoun was seven years in the cabinet, and as many years vice-president. From 1808 to 1850, he has hardly been out of the public service, and in it he has been one of the most conspicuous of our public men, and one who has contributed vastly to the reputation of the country.

The senate presented an imposing spectacle at the time his decease was announced. Mr. Butler, his colleague, rose with evident emotion, and in a solemn, impressive manner, eulogized the deceased in terms which, while they are free from exaggeration, portrayed the outlines of a great and pure statesman. Some of his remarks on Mr. Calhoun's last hours have a deep interest. He said he was conscious of his approaching end, and met death with fortitude and uncommon serenity. He had many admonitions of its approach, and, without doubt, he had not been indifferent to them. With his usual aversion to profession, he said little for effect on the world, and his last hours were an exemplification of his life and character—truth and simplicity.

Mr. Calhoun for some years had been labouring under a pulmonary complaint, and, under its effects, could not have reckoned on a long existence; such was his own conviction. The immediate cause of his death was an affection of the heart. A few hours before he expired, he became sensible of his situation, and when he was unable to speak, his eye and look evinced recognition and intelligence of what was passing. One of the last directions he gave was to a dutiful son, who had been attending him, to put away some manuscripts, which had been written some time before, under his dictation.

Mr. Calhoun was the least dependent man he ever knew; and he had, in an eminent degree, the self-sustaining power of intellect. His last days and his last remarks were an exemplification of this. Mental determination sustained him when all others were in despair. Mr. Butler saw him a few days ago in the senate which he had so long occupied. He saw the struggle of a great mind exerting itself to sustain and overcome the weakness and infirmities of a sinking body. It was the exhibition of a wounded eagle, with his eyes turned to the heavens in which he had soared, but unto which his wings could never carry him again.

Mr. Butler was followed by Mr. Clay in a strain of touching remarks, which thrilled every heart. He had entered the house of representatives the same year with Mr. Calhoun—the year of the declaration of war against the most powerful nation on the globe, and had enjoyed constant intimacy with him ever since. When Mr. Clay alluded to the pregnant moral lesson which this event taught him, and his own proximity to the grave, his voice assumed that peculiar tone of pathos and emotion which at times makes Mr. Clay the most eloquent of men.

As he sat down, Mr. Webster rose, and added a few words of eulogy in a most solemn and impressive manner. He, too, had been a life-long companion in public life of the deceased, and could hardly speak too highly of the exalted genius and worth of him whom they mourned. Mr. W.'s emotions were expressed with exquisite taste and feeling, and there were many eyes suffused with tears.

The scene in the house was scarcely less affecting. Mr. Holmes moved the accustomed marks of respect, in a speech of some length and great eloquence, and Mr. Winthrop followed in his happiest manner. Mr. Venable detailed, in simple language, some of the closing scenes, in a manner that affected all.

Pending this great discussion, the warm supporters of slavery at the south had succeeded in carrying the agitation so far, as to propose a southern convention, to meet at Nashville, Tennessee, for the purpose of considering what measures should be adopted, to preserve the national, or rather, the sectional equilibrium. The rapid growth of the free states was gradually undermining the power of the south, and rendering it impossible for her longer to hold the entire predominance in the administration of the federal government. Forty-eight years, out of sixty, the slave states had monopolized the entire executive control, and with it, had carried all the power and patronage of the government. By this means, they had seldom failed in carrying any of their favorite measures, or bringing in new states to their aid, whenever it became necessary to overbalance the advance of the free states. The newly-acquired territory was now free. Should it be suffered to remain so, the slave interest would be thrown into a hopeless minority, and consequently be in danger of utter annihilation. To prevent this, and save the darling institution from the ruthless hands of the abolitionists, it was proposed to recede from the Union altogether, and establish a southern confederacy. This was the end of the Nashville convention, which, in case of the admission of new states opposed to slavery, was to devise and promulgate measures of defence for the south. It contemplated either an absolute withdrawal from the Union, or a sort of imperium in imperio, in which, while enjoying the general advantages of the Union, they should resist and nullify any such legislation as they might disapprove. In the same spirit, the government of Texas assumed to forestall the action of congress in respect to her claim to the whole of New Mexico. She not only asserted her right, as one beyond a doubt, but declared her determination to enforce it at the point of the bayonet, and in spite of any decision to the contrary, on the part of the powers at Washington. The militia was ordered out. The governor issued a strong proclamation, and the movement of open collision seemed close at hand. It was suspended, however, by the decided tone and action of the president, who was resolved, at all hazards, to maintain the integrity of the government, and hold the constitution unimpaired.

Just at this crisis, when all the firmness and decision of the executive were required to balance, and hold in check, not only the volcanic elements of popular and sectional parties throughout the country, but the disorganizing tendencies of the coördinate branches of government, the hand of death was suddenly laid upon the president, and he was called from his high station and arduous duties, to render an account of his stewardship. After an illness of a few days only, General Taylor died, at Washington, on the 9th of July, 1850, in the sixty-sixth year of his age. The impression produced upon the national mind was deep and solemn: the country mourned the loss of a brave soldier, and all parties believed that their late president was an honest man.

It was a spectacle of which Americans might well be proud, to see the supreme power of one of the mightiest nations on earth passing quietly from the dead to the living; not by hereditary descent, but by virtue of the sovereign will of the people, designating, but a few months before, the proper succession. No convulsion, no agitation, no pageantry attended the transfer. Every thing moved on as before. Not even the ceremony of induction, beyond the simple taking of an oath to sustain the constitution. This done, with solemn dignity, and Millard Fillmore was president of the United States.

Mr. Fillmore succeeded to the cares and responsibilities, as well as to the honours, of the chief magistracy. The complicated duties of the office, made doubly arduous by the exciting questions then agitating and convulsing the body politic, demanded, at this crisis, not only the wisdom of an experienced statesman, but the courage and firmness of an old soldier. The factious and reckless hoped to gain an advantage by the change. They counted on a comparatively easy victory over the mere civilian, where, but now, they had begun to despair of accomplishing any thing with the hardy veteran, who had "never surrendered," and never been beaten. But they reckoned without their host. The first act of the new president showed clearly that he was a man of calm purpose and decision. The attitude assumed by Texas was boldly and manfully met by a proclamation, which left no doubt on any mind that the supreme law would be sustained and executed, at any cost. The able, temperate, but firm letter of Mr. Webster,* the

* DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, August 5, 1850. }

To his Excellency P. H. BELL, Governor of Texas :

SIR: A letter addressed by you to the late president of the United States, and dated on the 14th of June last, has, since his lamented decease, been transferred to the hands of his successor, by whom I am directed to address to you the following answer:—

In that letter you say that, by the authority of the legislature of Texas, the executive of that state, in February last, despatched a special commissioner, with full power and instructions to extend the civil jurisdiction of that state over the unorganized counties of El Paso, Worth, Presidio, and Santa Fé, situated upon its north-western limits; and that the commissioner has reported to you, in an official form, that the military officers employed in the service of the United States, stationed at Santa Fé, interposed adversely with the inhabitants to the fulfilment of his object, by employing their influence in favour of the establishment of a separate state government east of the Rio Grande, and within the rightful limits of the state of Texas. You also transmit a copy of the proclamation of Colonel John Munroe, acting under the orders of the government of the United States, under the designation of civil and military governor of the territory of New Mexico, and respectfully request the president to cause you to be informed whether or not this officer has acted in this matter under the orders of his government, and whether his proclamation meets with the approval of the president of the United States.

In the events which have occurred, the president hardly knows whether your excellency would naturally expect an answer to this letter from him. His predecessor in office, to whom it was addressed, and under whose authority and direction the proclamation of Colonel Munroe was issued, is no more; and at this time, that proclamation, whatever may be regarded as its true character, has ceased to have influence or effect. The meeting of the people of New Mexico, by their representatives, which it invited, is understood to have taken place, although this government has as yet received no official information of it.

Partaking, however, in the fullest degree, in that high respect which the executive government of the United States always entertains towards the governors and the governments of the states, the president thinks it his duty, nevertheless, to manifest that feeling of respect by acknowledging and answering your letter. And this duty, let me assure your excellency, has been so long delayed only by uncontrollable circumstances, and is now performed at the earliest practicable moment, after the appointment of those heads of departments, and their acceptance of office, with whom it is usual, on important occasions, for the president of the United States to advise.

In answer, therefore, to your first interrogatory, viz., whether Colonel Munroe, in issuing the proclamation referred to, acted under the orders of this government, the president directs me to state that Colonel Munroe's proclamation appears to have been issued in pursuance or in consequence of an order or letter of instructions given by the late secretary of war, under the authority of the late president, to Lieutenant-Colonel McCall. Of this order, which bears date on the 19th of November, 1849, your excellency was undoubtedly informed at the date of your letter. A full and accurate copy, however, is attached to this communication. Colonel McCall is therein instructed, that if the people of New Mexico, for whom congress had provided no government, should manifest any wish to take any steps to establish a government for themselves, and apply for an admission into the Union, it will be his duty, and the duty of others with whom he is associated, not to thwart, but to advance, their wishes. This order does not appear to authorize any exertion of military authority, or of any official or even personal interference to control, or affect in any new secretary of state, to the governor of Texas, if it did not put an end to the controversy, demolished every show of argument by which the opposition had sought to prosecute it. The country was satisfied with the decision. The factionists were driven to desperation, and even talked loudly of impeaching the way, the primary action of the people in the formation of a government, nor to permit any such interference by subordinate officers. Colonel McCall and his associates were not called upon to take a lead in any measures, or even to recommend any thing as fit to be adopted by the people. Their whole duty was confined to what they might be able to perform, subordinate to the wishes of the people. In this matter it was evidently contemplated that they were to act as the agents of the inhabitants, and not as officers of this government. It must be recollected that the only government then existing in the territory was a quasi military government; and as congress has made no provision for the establishment of any form of civil government, and as the president doubtless believed that, under these circumstances, the people had a right to frame a government for themselves, and submit it to congress for its approval, the order was a direction that the then existing military government should not stand in the way of the accomplishment of the wishes of the people, nor thwart those wishes, if the people entertained them, for the establishment of a free, popular, republican, civil government, for their own protection and benefit. This is evidently the whole purpose and object of the order. The military officer in command, and his associates, were American citizens, acquainted with the forms of civil and popular proceedings, and it was expected they would aid the inhabitants of the territory, by their advice and assistance, in their proceedings for establishing a government of their own. There is no reason to suppose that Colonel Munroe, an officer as much distinguished for prudence and discretion as for gallant conduct in arms, meant to act, or did act, otherwise than in entire subordination and subserviency to the will of the people among whom he was placed. He was not authorized to do, nor does the president understand him as intending to do, any thing whatever in his military character, nor to represent in any way the wishes of the executive government of the United States.

To judge intelligently and fairly of these transactions, we must recall to our recollection the circumstances of the case as they then existed.

Previous to the war with Mexico, which commenced in May, 1846, and received the sanction of congress on the 13th of that month, the territory of New Mexico formed a department or state of the Mexican republic, and was governed by her laws.

General Kearney, acting under orders from this government, invaded this department with an armed force; the governor fled at his approach, and the troops under his command dispersed, and General Kearney entered Santa Fé, the capital, on the 18th of August, 1846, and took possession of the territory in the name of the United States. On the 22d of that month he issued a proclamation to the inhabitants, stating the fact that he had taken possession of Santa Fé, at the head of his troops, and announcing "his intention to hold the department with its original boundaries, (on both sides of the Del Norte,) and under the name of New Mexico."

By that proclamation he promised to protect the inhabitants of New Mexico in their persons and property, against their Indian enemies, and all others; and assured them that the United States intended to provide for them a free government, when the people would be called upon to exercise the rights of freemen in electing their own representatives to the territorial legislature. On the same day he established a territorial constitution by an organic law, which provided for executive, legislative, and judicial departments of the government; president. It ended in talk, however, as did also the great debate in congress upon the omnibus, which, after lumbering all the avenues of legislation for more than six months, and raising such a dust as had never been seen in Washington, was upset and dashed in pieces, not for want of a skilful and able driver, but defined the right of suffrage, and provided for trial by jury, and at the same time established a code of laws. The constitution declared that "the country heretofore known as New Mexico shall be known hereafter and designated as the territory of New Mexico, in the United States of America;" and the members of the lower house of the legislature were apportioned among the counties established by the decree of the department of New Mexico, of June 17, 1844, which counties, it is understood, included all the territory over which Texas has lately attempted to organize counties and establish her own jurisdiction.

On the 22d of December, 1846, a copy of this constitution and code was transmitted by President Polk to the house of representatives, in pursuance of a call on him by that body. In the message transmitting the constitution, he says, that "Portions of it purport to establish and organize a permanent territorial government over the territory, and to impart to its inhabitants political rights which, under the constitution of the United States, can be enjoyed, permanently, only by citizens of the United States. They have not been approved and recognized by me. Such organized regulations as have been established in any of the conquered territories for the security of our conquest, for the preservation of order, for the protection of the rights of the inhabitants, and for depriving the enemy of the advantages of these territories while the military possession of them by the forces of the United States continues, will be recognized and approved."

Near four years have now elapsed since the quasi military government was established by military authority, and received, with the exceptions mentioned, the approval of President Polk. In the mean time, a treaty of peace has been concluded with Mexico, by which a boundary line was established that left this territory within the United States, by treaty, what we had before acquired by conquest. The treaty, in perfect accordance with the proclamation of General Kearney, declared that the Mexicans remaining in this territory should be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and be admitted at the proper time, (to be judged of by the congress of the states,) to an enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States, according to the principles of the constitution; "and in the mean time should be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property, and secured in the free exercise of their religion without restriction."

Thus it will be perceived that the authority of the United States over New Mexico was the result of conquest; and the possession held of it, in the first place, was of course a military possession. The treaty added the title by cession to the already existing title by successful achievements in arms. With the peace there arose a natural expectation that, as early as possible, there would come a civil government to supersede the military. But until some such form of government should come into existence, it was matter of absolute necessity that the military government should continue, as otherwise the country must fall into absolute anarchy. And this has been the course generally, in the practice of civilized nations, when colonies or territories have been acquired by war, and their acquisition confirmed by treaty.

The military government, therefore, existing in New Mexico at the date of the order, existed there of inevitable necessity. It existed as much against the will of the executive government of the United States, as against the will of the people. The late president had adopted the opinion, that it was justifiable in the people of the terri-from a certain top-heaviness in its structure, and the unexpected roughness of the road.

The loss of this bill was not so severely felt, even by some of its warmest advocates, as would have been supposed from the zeal with which they contended for it, and the time and labour they bestowed upon it. Its defeat and abandonment were not, as they predicted, a signal for agitations, disunion, and war. The several measures, embraced in its ample drapery, were subsequently digested into separate bills, and passed into party. But as it is the right of all to petition congress for any law which it may constitutionally pass, this people were in the exercise of a common right when they formed their constitution, with a view of applying to congress for admission as a state; and as he thinks the act can prejudice no one, he feels bound to approve of the conduct of Colonel Munroe, in issuing the proclamation.

I am directed, also, to state that in the president's opinion it would not be just to suppose that the late president desired to manifest any unfriendly attitude or aspect towards Texas or the claims of Texas. The boundary between Texas and New Mexico was known to be disputed; and it was equally well known that the executive government of the United States had no power to settle that dispute. It is believed that the executive power has not wished — it certainly does not now wish — to interfere with that question, in any manner whatever, as a question of title.

In one of his last communications to congress, — that of the 17th of June last, — the late president repeated the declaration that he had no power to decide the question of boundary, and no desire to interfere with it; and that the authority to settle that question resided elsewhere. The object of the executive government has been, as I believe, and as I am authorized to say it certainly now is, to secure the peace of the country; to maintain, as far as practicable, the state of things as it existed at the date of the treaty; and to uphold and preserve the rights of the respective parties as they were under the solemn guarantee of the treaty, until the highly interesting question of boundary should be finally settled by competent authority. This treaty, which is now a supreme law of the land, declares, as before stated, that the inhabitants shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property, and secured in the free exercise of their religion. It will, of course, be the president's duty to see that this law is sustained, and the protection which it guarantees made effectual — and this is the plain and open path of executive duty, in which he proposes to tread.

Other transactions of a very grave character are alluded to, and recited in your excellency's letter. To those transactions I am now directed not more particularly to advert, because the only questions propounded by you respect the authority under which Colonel Munroe acted, and the approval or disapproval of his proclamation. Your excellency's communication and the answer will be immediately laid before congress, and the president will take that occasion to bring to its notice the transactions alluded to above.

It is known to your excellency that the questions growing out of the acquisition of California and New Mexico, and among them the highly important one of the boundary of Texas, have steadily engaged the attention of both houses of congress for many months, and still engage it, with intense interest. It is understood that the legislature of Texas will be shortly in session, and will have the boundary question also before it. It is a delicate crisis in our public affairs, not free certainly from possible dangers; but let us confidently trust that justice, moderation, patriotism, and the love of the Union, may inspire such counsels, both in the government of the United States and that of Texas, as shall carry the country through these dangers, and bring it safely out of them all. And with renewed assurances of the continuance of mutual respect and harmony in the great family of states,

I have the honour to be, with entire regard,

Your excellency's most obedient servant,

DANIEL WEBSTER, Secretary of State.

Secondly, you ask whether the proclamation of Colonel Munroe meets with the approval of the president of the United States?

To determine this question, it is necessary to look at the object of the proclamation, and the effect of the proceedings had under it. If the object was to assume the authority to settle the disputed boundary with Texas, then the president has no hesitation in saying such object does not meet his approbation, because he does not believe that the executive branch of this government, or the inhabitants of New Mexico, or both combined, have any constitutional authority to settle that question. That belongs either to the judicial department of the federal government, or to the concurrent action by agreement of the legislative departments of the governments of the United States and Texas. But it has been sufficiently shown that Colonel Munroe could have had no such object, and that his intention was merely to act in aid of the people in forming a state constitution, to be submitted to congress. Assuming then that such a constitution has been formed, what is its effect upon the disputed boundary? If it compromises the rights of either party to that question, then it does not meet the president's approbation, for he deems it his duty to leave the settlement of that question to the tribunal to which it constitutionally belongs. It is sufficient for him that this boundary is in dispute; that the territory east of the Rio del Norte seems to be claimed in good faith both by Texas and New Mexico, or rather, by the United States. Whatever might be his judgment in regard to their respective rights, he has no power to decide upon them, or even to negotiate in regard to them; and, therefore, it would be improper for him to express any opinion. The subject matter of dispute is between the United States and Texas, and not between the inhabitants of New Mexico and Texas. If those people should voluntarily consent to come under the jurisdiction of Texas, such consent would not bind the United States, or take away their title to the territory. So, on the other hand, if they should voluntarily claim the title for the United States, it would not deprive Texas of her rights, whatever those rights may be. They can only be affected by her own acts, or a judicial decision. The state constitution formed by New Mexico can have no legal validity until it is recognized and adopted by the law-making power of the United States. Until that is done, it has no sanction, and can have no effect upon the rights of Texas, or of the United States, to the territory in dispute. And it is not to be presumed that congress will ever give its sanction to that constitution, without first providing for the settlement of this boundary. Indeed, no government, either territorial or state, can be formed for New Mexico without providing for the settling this boundary. Hence he regards the formation of this state constitution as a mere nullity. It may be regarded, indeed, as a petition to congress to be admitted as a state; but, until congress shall grant the prayer of such petition by legal enactments, it affects the rights of neither for it, and the time and labour they bestowed upon it. Its defeat and abandonment were not, as they predicted, a signal for agitations, disunion, and war. The several measures, embraced in its ample drapery, were subsequently digested into separate bills, and passed into

party. But as it is the right of all to petition congress for any law which it may constitutionally pass, this people were in the exercise of a common right when they formed their constitution, with a view of applying to congress for admission as a state; and as he thinks the act can prejudice no one, he feels bound to approve of the conduct of Colonel Munroe, in issuing the proclamation.

I am directed, also, to state that in the president's opinion it would not be just to suppose that the late president desired to manifest any unfriendly attitude or aspect towards Texas or the claims of Texas. laws. California was admitted as an independent state, with a constitution prohibiting involuntary slavery within her territories. Texas was paid ten millions of dollars for relinquishing her doubtful claim to a portion of New Mexico. New Mexico and Utah were provided with territorial governments,* and a bill was passed to enforce the arrest and recovery, in the free states, of slaves escaping, or having escaped, from the south.

* THE BOUNDARIES. — As the newly-acquired territory is at length definitely parcelled out and arranged, it may be well to state the boundaries of each separate jurisdiction. First, we have the boundary between Texas and New Mexico. It is believed that Texas will readily assent to it.

It begins at the intersection of the 100th parallel of longitude with latitude $36^{\circ} 30'$, and thence runs due west on said parallel of latitude to longitude 103° ; thence south along said meridian of longitude to latitude 32° ; thence west along said parallel of latitude to the Rio Grande; thence southerly down the Rio Grande to the Gulf of Mexico.

Territory of New Mexico. — Beginning at a point in the Colorado River, where the boundary line with the republic of Mexico crosses the same; thence eastwardly with the said boundary line to the Rio Grande; thence following the main channel of said river to the parallel of the thirty-second degree of north latitude; thence east with said degree to its intersection with the one hundred and third degree of longitude west of Greenwich; thence north with said degree of longitude to the parallel of the thirty-eighth degree of north latitude; thence west with said parallel to the summit of the Sierra Madre; thence south with the crest of said mountains to the thirty-seventh parallel of north latitude; thence west with said parallel to its intersection with the boundary line of the state of California.

Territory of Utah. — Bounded on the west by the state of California;

on the north by the territory of Oregon; on the east by the summit of the Rocky Mountains; on the south by latitude 37° .

The acts of congress, providing for the organization of those territories, expressly stipulate that when admitted into the Union as states, they shall be admitted with or without slavery, as their constitutions may prescribe at the time of their admission. They may each be divided into two or more territories, should congress so determine; or any portion of either or both of them may be attached to any other state or territory of the United States, according to the judgment of the same authority.

State of California. — Bounded on the north by (latitude 42°) Oregon territory, on the west by the Pacific Ocean, on the south by Mexico, and on the east as follows, viz.: beginning at the intersection of latitude 42° with longitude 120° , thence running southerly along said meridian of longitude to latitude 39° ; thence south-easterly in a straight line to the River Colorado, at the point where it intersects latitude 35° ; thence down the middle of the channel of said river to the Mexican boundary.

Thus it will be seen that the state of California occupies all the Pacific coast from Oregon to Mexico, some eight hundred miles, with an average breadth of probably two hundred and fifty miles. The territory of Utah lies between the state of California and the territory of New Mexico, but extends southward only to latitude 37° . South of that parallel, the territory of New Mexico extends to the state of California. Utah is therefore bounded south and east by New Mexico.

FROM FILLMORE TO PIERCE.

BOOK VI.

THE administration of Mr. Fillmore, as was intimated at the close of the last chapter, was commenced under circumstances of great embarrassment. The high and deserved popularity of General Taylor with the masses of the people rendered it a difficult and hazardous experiment for any one to occupy his seat. The agitating subjects which, at that time, engrossed the attention of the Congress and the people, arousing the strongest sectional jealousies and party animosities, made it especially difficult for a northern man to stand at the helm and attempt to guide the ship of state. There were breakers on all sides, and wreckers on all the reefs, eagerly watching for their shares of the salvage, or the monopoly of the plunder. A few violent and unreasonable agitators at the north, and a few equally violent and unreasonable agitators at the south, had, for many years, been laboring to disturb the harmony and arrest the progress of "the model republic." The number of these Marplots, on each side of the line, was exceedingly small, but each believed the other a legion, and invincible, except on the sole ground of a dissolution of the union—a consummation equally desired by the abolitionists at the north and the secessionists at the south. Par nobile fratrum.

General Taylor's last illness was of very short duration. He was but a few days withdrawn from his public duties, and but a few hours regarded as dangerously ill, before the scene of his earthly honors and duties was closed forever. Mr. Fillmore was taken by surprise. With no time for reflection, or preparation for its high responsibilities, he found himself suddenly raised to the chief magistracy. To add to the embarrassments growing out of the slavery agitation, and the bitter sectional jealousies already arrayed on both sides, all the members of the cabinet immediately tendered their resignation. Though this was done from no want of confidence in the new president, or of sympathy with his political views, but simply from a desire to leave him more entirely free to mark out his own course, and select his own advisers, it nevertheless greatly enhanced the difficulties of his position. It was immediately seized upon, by the opposition, as an indication that he could not rely upon the entire strength of General Taylor's friends to sustain his administration. To them it offered a slight hope of a division in the whig ranks. And Mr. Fillmore could not certainly know that it did not foreshadow such a division, or at least intimate a want of confidence in the ability of a northern man to rally and retain the entire strength of the party then in the ascendant.

It was a question of no small delicacy and difficulty, but requiring an immediate decision, whether these resignations should be returned, and the former cabinet be requested to retain their places, or a new one be appointed. The "omnibus" bill was still under discussion in the Senate, its ultimate fate shrouded in dread uncertainty. To this bill it was understood that General Taylor's cabinet was opposed; while Mr. Fillmore concurred in its main features, and was inclined to favor its adoption, as a measure of peace. Feeling it necessary that he should have a cabinet to sustain him in that course, if called upon to pursue it, he decided to select a new one. This was arranged as follows:—

DANIEL WEBSTER, of Massachusetts, Secretary of State; THOMAS CORWIN, of Ohio, Secretary of the Treasury; CHARLES M. CONRAD, of Louisiana, Secretary of War; WILLIAM A. GRAHAM, of North Carolina, Secretary of the Navy; ALEXANDER H. STUART, of Virginia, Secretary of the Interior; JOHN J. CRITTENDEN, of Kentucky, Attorney General; NATHAN K. HALL, of New York, Postmaster General.

When the omnibus bill was brought to a vote in the Senate, it was rejected by a majority vote, and thus the apple of discord was again thrown down to the political athletes. To many of the best men on both sides of the question it was a great disappointment. Mr. Clay had given to this measure all his heart, and had expended upon it all his yet undecayed energies. Mr. Calhoun had fallen at his post, in the very act of defending the southern intrenchments of slavery against the inevitable and crushing advance of freedom and justice. And now, as the master spirits were passing away, the conflict was to be commenced de novo. A new plan of operations was to be devised, a new disposition of forces arranged, and a new leader found for the ultra south. California was still standing at the door of the Union, knocking for admission, its boundaries self-defined, its constitution self-formed, and hostile to slavery. It was a bitter pill to the south, that this dearly-bought extension of area should so soon, contrary to all their designs and purposes in securing it, prove an enlargement of the "area of freedom." They were resolved to resist her admission, hoping, by delay, to bring about a change of policy, and the ultimate admission of slavery. But they had no solid grounds for a refusal. Their opposition was purely technical. The only argument they could urge against her admission was, that her application was premature,—that she had not gone through the usual pupilage of a territorial government, and consequently had not had a fair opportunity to test the comparative advantages of freedom and slavery. They were afraid of a free giant springing, full grown, to birth. They wanted to have a hand in his nursing and education, and to keep him in leading strings, till, shorn of his strength by the demoralizing influences of slavery, they could put out his eyes, bind him with their own fetters, and set him to grinding in the prison house of a system, which makes slaves equally of the servant and the served.

This agitating question was complicated with another of no slight moment and difficulty. Utah and New Mexico were preparing to follow the example of California, by claiming a place in the great constellation of states, the former wishing admission as a territory, the latter as a state. To this last Texas set up a strong and angry opposition. She claimed New Mexico as a part of her own territory, and resolved to resist any effort for an independent organization even at the point of the bayonet. This she did on the sole ground that, as a Mexican province, she was originally entitled to all the country lying east of the Rio Grande, including Santa Fé. Her sages forgot that, in coming into the Union, she had defined her own boundaries, and was received as a whole, and not as a maimed member. The question, like every other, which touches the confines of slavery, was rife with danger to the peace and harmony of the Union. Texas called out her militia, to compel the submission of New Mexico; but the expedition was captured by the New Mexicans, who resolutely resisted any amalgamation or connection with that State, or with the institution of slavery. In respect to the latter, their negotiators, while arranging the terms of the treaty which was to cede their territory to the United States, had said that a proposal to establish the Inquisition there would not excite more abhorrence than that which now attempted to bring back, upon them the curse of slavery, from which they had, by great efforts and sacrifices, long since delivered themselves.

To crush this outbreak of civil war in the southwest, the strong arm of the national government was immediately interposed. The treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo clearly required that the citizens of New Mexico "should be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property, and in the free exercise of their religion, until Congress should provide for their becoming citizens of the United States." In the exercise of his constitutional duty, "to take care that this treaty should be faithfully executed," the president immediately ordered the requisite military force, and munitions of war, to be forwarded to New Mexico, to protect her against her pugnacious and over-grasping neighbor. Deeming the danger of a collision imminent, he brought the matter before Congress, on the 6th of August, in a special message, in which he urged, in the strongest manner, a speedy settlement of the controversy. This led to a new effort in Congress, and resulted in a series of measures, now universally known as the compromise acts of 1850. By these acts California was admitted as a state, with a constitution forbidding slavery. The boundary line between Texas and New Mexico was defined and established; New Mexico and Utah were organized as territories; Texas was allowed $10,000,000 in offset for her assumed claim on New Mexico; the slave trade in the District of Columbia was abolished; and provision was made, by a special and stringent law, for the more effectual recovery of fugitive slaves. This latter bill, in the view of its authors and advocates, was based on a palpable requirement of the constitution, being a simple reenactment, with due forms of law, of the second section of its fourth article. In their eagerness to revive and strengthen that section, however, they seem to have lost sight of the sanctity of the habeas corpus privilege, as guaranteed in the ninth section of the first article. Such, at least, is the view entertained by many of the most eminent statesmen.

History, to be reliable and useful, must be impartial. It is incumbent, therefore, that a measure of so great importance as this, involving so many and opposite interests, and arousing so strongly the passions and prejudices of contending factions, should be coolly considered, and carefully judged in the light of all the circumstances bearing upon the case at the time of its enactment. This is essential to a just appreciation of President Fillmore's position and conduct in reference to it. A brief résumé of the facts and arguments employed in its defence will therefore be attempted.

At the period of the formation of the constitution of the United States, in 1787, slavery existed in most of the states of the Union, as well as in all the English and French colonies. The necessity was then universally felt of making some provision for the surrender of such slaves as might escape from one state to another. This was regarded not only as a matter of common justice to the master, but as the only means by which peace and harmony could be maintained among the several states. It was, accordingly, by the unanimous consent of the convention that the following provision was incorporated into the second section of the fourth article of the constitution: "No person held to service or labor in one state, under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in consequence of any law or regulation therein, be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered up on claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due." The same article of the constitution provided for the rendition of fugitives from justice, and conferred on Congress the sole power of prescribing "by general laws the manner in which the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings" of one state "should be proved" and made efficient in another. In pursuance of these provisions, an act was passed, February 12, 1793, and approved by President Washington, prescribing the manner in which fugitive slaves should be claimed and given up. By this law, the owner of the slave was authorized to seize or arrest the fugitive, and take him before a judge of the United States Courts, or any magistrate of a county, city, or town corporate, wherein the slave was arrested, and, upon proof, to the satisfaction of such judge or magistrate, that the person so arrested did, under the laws of the state from which he fled, owe service to the person claiming him, it was made the duty of such judge, or magistrate, to give a certificate thereof to the claimant, which certificate was declared to be a sufficient warrant for removing the fugitive to the state from which he had fled.

Subsequent to the adoption of the constitution, and the passage of this law to enforce it, a strong anti-slavery sentiment sprang up in the Northern States, pervading those which had retained the system after assuming the character of states, as well as those which had previously abolished it. This led, in a few years, to the abolition and prohibition of slavery and involuntary servitude in all those states, and to the enactment, in several of them, of state laws, prohibiting the state officers from assisting to execute these laws of Congress. It was also conceded by the highest authority, (see Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, Sec. 1756,) that Congress had overstepped the limit of its powers in requiring this service from state officers over whom it could have no control. The consequence of these decisions was, that there were no persons authorized to execute these laws, except the judges of the United States Courts. These were so few in number, so far separated, and so much occupied with the appropriate duties of their offices, that they were scarcely accessible to claimants, or able to give any attention to their claims when presented. The law was, therefore, found to be insufficient to secure the end for which it was framed, and consequently fell into disuse.

A case strikingly illustrating this weakness of the law occurred in Pennsylvania, in 1839. A slave from Maryland, escaped into that state, was pursued by the agent of her master, arrested, and brought before a justice of the peace, who declined to take cognizance of the matter, or to grant the certificate necessary to warrant her extradition. Thereupon the agent took the law into his own hands, seized the slave, and carried her back to her master. He was then duly indicted, under the Pennsylvania law, for kidnapping, and, upon trial, convicted of that crime. The case was then carried before the Supreme Court of the United States, where the judgment was reversed, and the doctrine clearly promulgated that no state law could deprive the owner of the right to seize his runaway slave, even without process, and to compel his return to servitude.

This decision was made in 1843. In the mean time, since the adoption of the constitution, and the passage of the law of 1793, a half century, with all its mighty changes, had passed over the land. From a struggling infant, the confederated republic had grown to the stature and conscious power of a giant. The original thirteen states had grown to more than double that number, and the original differences, which had required the combined wisdom, sagacity, and patriotism of the race of sages and heroes who achieved independence, to harmonize into a system acceptable to all, had grown with their growth and strengthened with their strength, and had been rendered increasingly bitter by frequent partisan and sectional discussions, and in some instances by local laws, which seemed to repudiate the right and trample upon the privileges guarantied by the constitution. At times, the agitation was vehement and menacing; and it cannot be denied that, in view of the compact into which they had entered, there was fault on both sides. There were fanatics at the north and at the south, violent, reckless, noisy agitators, who deemed nothing sacred but their own right to dictate and rule. If laws were passed or resolutions made public among the free states which were subversive of the right of slaveholders to what they claimed as property, retaliatory laws were enacted, and inflammatory resolutions passed at the south, utterly denying the ordinary rights of citizenship to certain classes of northern freemen, and not only menacing, but actually executing, summary vengeance, without the form of trial, upon any suspected persons passing into their territories. In Congress, the slave power was always in the ascendant. Of the sixty-two years then passed since the organization of the government, it had been administered fifty years by southern presidents, and only twelve by northern, and one of the latter was avowedly a "northern man with southern principles." This naturally provoked the jealousy of the north, more especially as they regarded the prevalent legislation decidedly inimical to their sectional interests, and always conducive to the predominance of their rivals. Moreover, while the most entire freedom of speech, and of the press, was guarantied to all, and granted to all at the north, it was a matter of martyrdom to speak or write, at the south, in derogation of her peculiar institution. These statements might be illustrated by many thrilling incidents — by stormy debates, by angry discussions, by vehement declamations in Congress, and in legislative halls, and by imprisonment without charge or suspicion of crime, and summary execution, without form of law, or apology for trial.

In addition to these things, immense accessions of territory had been made at a vast expenditure, and all on the side of the south. Louisiana, Florida, Texas, California, had been purchased at a cost of more than 50,000,000 of dollars, besides an expensive and destructive war. Several tribes of Indians had been violently uprooted from their ancient domains, which solemn treaties had guarantied to them forever, and removed to remote positions, at great expense. All this had been done at the instance and for the benefit of the south. And yet the south demanded more. Extension, extension, was still the cry, but never a word of extension in any direction which would enure to the well being of freedom.

It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that, as the free states, by continual immigration from Europe, and by the natural tendency to growth and healthy development, increased in population and power, they should resist these perpetual encroachments, and feel a growing indisposition to aid the slaveholder in recovering his fugitives.

On the other hand, it cannot be denied, that, whatever may have been the wrongs intended or produced by their local laws and customs, the south was entitled, under the constitution, to some protection against this species of loss. If that protection involves a moral wrong, it is the misfortune, and not the fault, of the constitution. It could never have been formed without it. It probably will not survive any serious attempt to abrogate it. There it stands, clear and unmistakable. And, however aggravating the aggressions of southern policy, however distasteful and offensive to northern ideas of freedom its local laws or individual actions, no man, whether president, senator, or representative, who had solemnly sworn to sustain the constitution, could fail to admit that the claim of the south, for a surrender of "fugitives from labor" should, by some means, be provided for. But how should it be done, so as not to magnify, rather than diminish, the difficulties already existing? Hoc opus, hic labor est.

The period at which our history has arrived was a crisis in this great political question, a culminating point in the progress of American slavery. The large accession just made of territory on the Pacific and in Central America would, it was generally supposed, greatly increase the political importance of the south, so as entirely to overbalance the recent growth of freedom in the north-west.

The sudden appearance of California at the door of Congress, asking admission into the Union as a free state, and the open and defiant repugnance of New Mexico to the attempt of Texas to fasten the "peculiar institution" upon her, were alarming symptoms of a serious disappointment in their calculations, and tended greatly to complicate the position of parties, by giving an unexpected weight to the northern views. Instead of taking a merely partisan advantage of this acquisition, however, the moderate, or conservative portion of the north, which has always constituted a large majority, made use of it to secure a compromise, which should guaranty mutual advantages to both sides. Of this compromise the fugitive slave law formed a part. Its object was merely to provide for the proper carrying into effect of the provisions of the constitution above quoted, by designating suitable officers to execute the law, and prescribing "the manner in which the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of one state should be proved and made efficient in another." To this, the north, by its representatives and president, assented, in offset for the advantage gained by the admission of California, and the abolition of the slave marts in the District of Columbia. It is not improbable that Mr. Fillmore would have preferred to gain these without the necessity of reviving and reanimating this old law. But he had no choice. They were all passed by Congress, and placed before him for approval. As sworn to sustain the constitution, he, on the advice of the attorney general, to whom the question was referred, deemed it his duty to sanction the bill, and make it a law, by his signature. The law of 1793 was still as binding as ever, and the decision of the Supreme Court in 1843, above alluded to, had confirmed it. That law was manifestly defective in its details, and demanded amendment. It did not provide a sufficient number of United States officers, authorized and required to execute it. It made no provision for the legal arrest of the fugitive, except by the claimant himself. It furnished no effective means of resisting the enemies of the law in their efforts to rescue the slave from his owner. It was also further deficient in defining the kind of proof necessary to justify, on the part of the magistrate, a certificate for the surrender of the slave.

These defects were intended to be remedied by the new law, which provided for the appointment of a suitable number of commissioners, having concurrent jurisdiction, in these cases, with the judges of the United States courts. Process for the arrest of the fugitive was to be executed by the marshal of the district in which the arrest was to be made, who was empowered to call to his assistance the requisite aid to enforce the process. Proofs might be taken by a court in the state from which the fugitive had fled, to establish these facts — that he owed service, and that he had fled from it. In case resistance to his removal was apprehended, the commissioner was authorized to direct the marshal to see him safely returned to bondage.

In considering the details of this law, after it was presented to him for his signature, the president had some doubt, in his own mind, whether the provision which declared the certificate of the magistrate final, and that the persons executing it should not be molested by any process issued by any court, might not be an infringement of that clause of the constitution which declares that "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended," unless when, in cases of rebellion or invasion, the public safety may require it. These doubts were removed by the opinion of the attorney general, but they still exist in the minds of a great majority of the northern people. Notwithstanding this, however, the law would, in most cases, have been faithfully executed — the great mass of the people of the country, being a law-abiding people, were fast yielding to its requirements a loyal, though unwilling, respect — if a new project of slave extension and slave tyranny had not been suddenly started, and precipitately driven through, by which the Missouri compromise of 1820 was ruthlessly repealed. From the date of that bill, the execution of the fugitive slave law became impossible in most of the free states, except under such an array of civil and military force as metamorphosed the court into a Star Chamber, and the surrounding city, or country, into a theatre of civil war. This repeal, it will be remembered, took place under the administration of General Pierce.

The passage of the "compromise acts" was vigorously resisted by a powerful minority in both houses of Congress, sustained by all the anti-slavery feeling in the country. The excitement ran very high, and it required the utmost power of the south, aided by the best talent of the north, and the undisguised favor of the administration, to carry through the obnoxious measures, which required any and all northern men, under heavy penalties and fear of imprisonment, to assist in capturing and restoring a fugitive from slavery—an act which any respectable slaveholder would feel it a disgrace to perform, except in the case of his own slaves. In some of the northern cities the opposition to this law was exceedingly violent, and threatened the most serious consequences. At Boston, in Massachusetts, Syracuse, in New York, and Christiana, in Pennsylvania, the law was openly resisted by the populace, and the captured fugitives rescued from the hands of the marshals, and effectually shielded from further pursuit. In some places the conflict assumed a very alarming aspect, and several lives were sacrificed in the popular determination to resist the tyrannical application of an odious law. Mr. Fillmore did all in his power to carry out faithfully the provisions of the law. He issued a special proclamation, calling upon the officers to do their duty fearlessly, and cautioning all persons from interposing any obstacles thereto. The rioters were prosecuted before the courts, with all the force of the government to sustain the prosecutions; but such was the state of public sentiment on the all-engrossing subject, that it was almost impossible to find a jury, in any part of the country, who could be induced to bring in a verdict of guilty. One such verdict was rendered at Syracuse, under peculiar circumstances, but death stepped in and claimed the victim before sentence was pronounced.

It was claimed by the advocates of these measures, and strongly hoped by the friends of peace and order throughout the country, that they would quiet the prevailing agitation on the subject of slavery, and effectually exclude that subject from future congressional discussions. The admission of California as a free state, and the abolition of the slave mart in the District of Columbia, were enough, it was thought, to satisfy the anti-slavery demands of the north; while the south received its portion in a $10,000,000 bonus to slavery in Texas, and a national guaranty for the return of their fugitive slaves. No effort was wanting to make this arrangement satisfactory to both sections. The administration gave it the whole weight of its influence, and pledged to its rigid enforcement the entire civil and military force at its disposal. But neither political patronage nor executive power could make slave-catching either popular, or, to any great extent, possible, in the free states. The idea was abhorrent to the settled convictions and most cherished principles of the people. It was an invasion of their own soil with some of the worst and most hateful features of the slave code—the denial of a trial by jury, the suspension of habeas corpus, the non-admission of slave testimony, and the irresponsibility of the judges to the people. In addition to this, the entire odium and burden of the process was thrown upon the citizens of the free states, while all the expenses of the pursuit, the prosecution, and the recovery, were paid from the national treasury, to which the free states are by far the largest contributors. In a majority of cases the execution of the law was prevented or evaded by popular interposition; and, whenever it was executed, the expenses exceeded many times—often many hundred times—the value of the slave recovered.

Notwithstanding these difficulties, and the violence with which the abolitionists waged the war with this enactment, the majority of the northern people endeavored to acquiesce in the compromises, and to regard them as a final settlement of all sectional difficulties. They hoped for peace, for a reasonable respite from agitation. As a whole, they resolved to stand by the president, in the position he had taken, and overcome their own prejudices, as he had overcome his, to sustain the majesty of the law. And, though the calm conservatism of the majority was scarcely a match for the fiery and determined energy of the resisters, and though, in special cases and in some sections of the country, it would have been impossible for the law to secure its victim, it is quite certain that the north would never have repudiated any part of the compromise, so long as it should be held sacred by the pro-slavery party.

Mr. Fillmore, being called suddenly to the presidency in the midst of a session of Congress, had no immediate opportunity to declare himself on the great questions of the day, or to foreshadow the policy of his administration. He took occasion, therefore, in his annual message, at the opening of the short session of Congress, in December, 1850, to expound at some length the general principles by which he would be governed, and to recommend some specific objects which, in his view, demanded the immediate action of Congress.

One of the most prominent of these objects was the reduction of the inland postage on letters. This reform, already successfully inaugurated in Great Britain, was loudly demanded from every quarter of the United States, but especially from the north, and the people were now ripe for the experiment. Strong objections were urged, on the ground that so great a reduction would bankrupt the department, and make it a charge upon the treasury. But the measure was carried against all objections, and provision made to supply from the treasury any deficiency in the receipts of the department.

For the greater safety of the public buildings and records in Washington, and for the improvement of the health of the city, Mr. Fillmore also recommended that Congress should provide for an abundant supply of water from the Falls of the Potomac. This suggestion was adopted, the necessary surveys were ordered, and the works are now advancing rapidly towards completion, by which an ample supply of good water will be secured.

Other measures brought forward under the sanction of this administration, and illustrative of the expansive views and practical wisdom of the president, were—the establishment of an agricultural bureau; the improvement of rivers and harbors, by which the facilities of internal commerce would be greatly increased; the establishment of an asylum for disabled and destitute seamen; a moderate but permanent tariff; a restoration of specific duties for the prevention of fraud, with a just discrimination in favor of American industry; a line of communication with the Pacific; a provision for settling disputed land titles in California; an extension of the land laws over newly acquired territories, with suitable provisions to prevent a monopoly of the auriferous mineral lands; a law to increase the efficiency of the army and navy, by providing for retiring from active service of such officers as had become superannuated; a board of commissioners for the adjustment of private claims against the government; and, finally, “an adherence to the adjustment by the compromise measures, until time and experience should demonstrate the necessity for further legislation to guard against evasion or abuse.” As Congress was then constituted, a large majority of both houses being politically opposed to the president, it was scarcely to be hoped that all these wise and prudent measures, involving long contested principles and questions of party strife, would be consummated at that time. Those which had no party bearing, and which could not be met except upon their simple merits, were duly considered and acted upon. The demand for justice to disabled and destitute seamen, by the establishment of an asylum for their relief, was responded to; and the preliminary measures adopted for carrying it into effect. The institution, which is to be conducted on a liberal scale, is situated in Harrodsburgh, Kentucky, and is already in an advanced state of progress. It will open for the reception of patients at an early period.

As several of the subjects recommended in this first message of Mr. Fillmore are among those which have divided the two political parties of the country, and called forth the ablest disputants on both sides and on all occasions, and as the measures so recommended were defeated by a majority opposed to the views of the administration, it seems only just that we should allow the president to speak for himself in proposing and expounding those views.

On the tariff he thus argued: “All experience has demonstrated the wisdom and policy of raising a large portion of revenue for the support of the government from duties on goods imported. The power to lay these duties is unquestionable, and its chief object, of course, is to replenish the treasury. But if, in doing this, an incidental advantage may be gained by encouraging the industry of our own citizens, it is our duty to avail ourselves of that advantage.

“A duty laid upon an article which cannot be produced in this country—such as tea or coffee—adds to the cost of the article, and is chiefly or wholly paid by the consumer. But a duty laid upon an article which may be produced here, stimulates the skill and industry of our own country to produce the same article, which is brought into the market in competition with the foreign article, and the importer is thus compelled to reduce his price to that at which the domestic article can be sold, thereby throwing a part of the duty upon the producer of the foreign article. The continuance of this process creates the skill and invites the capital which finally enable us to produce the article much cheaper than it can be procured from abroad, thereby benefiting both the producer and the consumer at home. The consequence of this is, that the artisan and the agriculturist are brought together, each affords a ready market for the produce of the other, and the whole country becomes prosperous; and the ability to produce every necessary of life renders us independent in war as well as in peace.

“A high tariff can never be permanent. * * * What the manufacturer wants is uniformity and permanency. * * * To effect this all duties should be specific, wherever the nature of the article is such as to admit of it. Ad valorem duties fluctuate with the price, and offer strong temptations to fraud and perjury. Specific duties, on the contrary, are equal and uniform in all ports, and at all times, and offer a strong inducement to the importer to bring the best article, as he pays no more duty upon that than upon one of inferior quality."

In reference to appropriations for internal improvements, he said, "I entertain no doubt of the authority of Congress to make appropriations for leading objects in that class of public works. This authority I suppose to be derived chiefly from the power of regulating commerce with foreign nations and among the states, and the power of laying and collecting imposts. Where commerce is to be carried on, and imposts collected, there must be ports and harbors, as well as wharves and custom houses. If ships laden with valuable cargoes approach the shore, or sail along the coast, lighthouses are necessary at suitable points for the protection of life and property. Other facilities and securities for commerce and navigation are hardly less important; and those clauses of the constitution, to which I have referred, have received, from the origin of the government, a liberal and beneficial construction. Not only have lighthouses, buoys, and beacons been established, and floating lights maintained, but harbors have been cleared and improved, piers constructed, and even breakwaters for the safety of shipping, and sea walls to protect harbors from being filled and rendered useless by the action of the ocean, have been erected at very great expense. And this construction of the constitution appears the more reasonable from the consideration that if these works, of such evident importance and utility, are not to be accomplished by Congress, they cannot be accomplished at all. By the adoption of the constitution the several states voluntarily parted with the power of collecting duties on imposts in their own ports; and it is not to be expected that they should raise money by internal taxation, direct or indirect, for the benefit of that commerce, the revenues derived from which do not, either in whole or in part, go into their own treasuries. Nor do I perceive any difference between the power of Congress to make appropriations for objects of this kind on the ocean, and the power to make appropriations for similar objects on lakes and rivers, wherever they are large enough to bear on their waters an extensive traffic. The magnificent Mississippi and its tributaries, and the vast lakes of the north and north-west, appear to me to fall within the exercise of the power as justly and as clearly as the ocean and the Gulf of Mexico. It is a mistake to regard expenditures judiciously made for these objects as expenditures for local objects. The position, or site, of the work would be necessarily local; but its utility is general. A ship canal around the Falls of St. Mary of less than a mile in length, though local in its construction, would yet be national in its purpose and benefits, as it would remove the only obstruction to a navigation of more than a thousand miles, affecting several states, as well as our commercial relations with Canada. So, too, the breakwater at the mouth of the Delaware is erected not for the exclusive benefit of the states on the bay and river of that name, but for that of the whole coastwise navigation of the United States, and, to a considerable extent also, of foreign commerce. If a ship be lost on the bar at the entrance of a southern port, for want of sufficient depth of water, it is very likely to be a northern ship; and if a steamboat be sunk in any part of the Mississippi, on account of its channel not having been properly cleared of obstructions, it may be a boat belonging to either of eight or ten states. I may add, as somewhat remarkable, that among all the thirty-one states there is none that is not, to a greater or less extent, bounded on the ocean, or the Gulf of Mexico, or one of the great lakes, or some navigable river.

"In fulfilling our constitutional duties on this subject, as in carrying into effect all other powers conferred by the constitution, we should consider ourselves as deliberating and acting for one and the same country, and bear constantly in mind that our regard and our duty are due not to a particular part only, but to the whole."

Such are the right reasonings of far-sighted political sagacity on two long and severely-controverted topics, which nothing but the physical might of a mere political majority has ever been able to answer or resist. And, strange as it may seem, though the history of American commerce perfectly illustrates and confirms the truth and profitableness of one set of views, and the fallacy and destructive tendency of the other, it has never been possible to obtain for "the American system" a fair experimental trial. The slave power, which has dictated and controlled the entire foreign policy of the country, has opposed it with unbroken front, always finding a party of impracticables in the free states to aid them in breaking down home industry, and fettering the internal commerce of the states.

A bill making appropriation for the improvement of rivers and harbors, in accordance with the recommendation of the president, passed the House of Representatives, and was favored by a majority of the Senate. It was defeated, however, by a well-drilled minority, who, talking against time, on the very last day of the session, spun out the discussion till the expiring hour of Congress, and thus prevented a vote. This ruse — which is resorted to on all occasions by the (so called) democratic party, whose fundamental principle is, that the majority must always govern — is deemed little short of high treason if attempted by the opposing party.

The Capitol being found insufficient for the convenient accommodation of the government, an appropriation was made at this session to extend it according to such plan as might be approved by the president. Having adopted a plan by which the original building would be more than doubled in size, by the addition of two extensive wings, the work was immediately commenced, and the corner stone laid by the president, on the 4th of July, amid a large concourse of people. Mr. Webster made one of his eloquent addresses on this occasion.

Not satisfied with the inglorious issue of his first piratical invasion of Cuba, General Lopez — whose cowardly retreat and “hair-breadth ’scape” are themes of merriment with the ladies of Key West, to whom the flying filibusters appealed for protection — had now organized another buccaneering expedition, which, like the former, sailed in open day from New Orleans, aided and abetted by many prominent persons there, and plainly connived at by the collector of the port — for which he was removed from office. Rumors of this project, which, for some time, were rife in the community, assumed at length so much of substance and form, that the president deemed it necessary to interpose his constitutional power to prevent it. Accordingly, on the 25th of April, 1851, he issued a proclamation, reciting a portion of the neutrality law bearing upon the subject, and warning all persons of the consequences of such an infringement of that law. He also made such disposition of the naval force at his command as seemed best calculated to arrest these treasonable movements, and save the honor of the government. Whatever effect this might have had to delay proceedings, it did not effectually arrest them. Preparations were proceeded with cautiously, through the summer, until on the 4th of August, when the ill-fated expedition sailed. Its result was no less inglorious, and far more unfortunate, than that of the preceding one. A landing was effected at Playtas, about sixty miles from Havana, on the night of the 11th of August. Between four and five hundred men were involved in this expedition — most of them young and ill informed. The main body of them, under command of General Lopez, proceeded inland at once, and took possession of a small village, some eighteen miles from the coast. The remainder were left behind to bring up the baggage, as soon as means of transportation could be found. Having made all necessary arrangements, and taken up their line of march, they had proceeded about twelve miles, when, on the morning of the 13th, they were attacked by a body of Spanish troops. A bloody conflict ensued. Those of the invaders who escaped death in this conflict retreated to the shore, where about fifty of them found boats, in which they put out to sea. They were, however, intercepted among the islands by a Spanish steamer cruising on the coast, captured, and carried into Havana; where, after a summary military trial, they were condemned and executed as pirates on the 16th. The main body, under Lopez, was attacked on the 24th, and put to rout. Lopez escaped, but was captured in the mountains some days after, and executed on the 1st of September. Many of his followers were killed, or died of hunger and fatigue; and the rest, some one hundred and seventy in number, were made prisoners. Of these, several were pardoned on the intercession of friends. About one hundred and sixty of them were sent to Spain, but were subsequently, by the clemency of the queen, at the urgent request of the president, permitted to return to their homes.

The president, in his annual message to Congress, thus comments upon “this illegal and ill-fated expedition:” “Too severe a judgment can hardly be passed by the indignant sense of the community upon those, who, being better informed themselves, have led away the ardor of youth and ill-directed love of political liberty.” He also expresses the hope “that the interposition of the government to procure the release of such citizens of the United States, engaged in this unlawful enterprise, as are now in confinement in Spain, may not be considered as affording any ground of expectation that government would hereafter feel itself under any obligation to intercede for the liberation or pardon of such persons as are flagrant offenders against the law of nations and the laws of the United States.”

In addition to the strong inherent tendency of slavery to extend its area, there were at this period some peculiar elements at work in America which favored designs of this character. The disbanding of the Mexican army had thrown upon the community a vast number of idle, demoralized men, who were ready for any plausible expedition which promised excitement, glory, or plunder. The discovery of rich deposits of gold in California, while it offered a vent for a portion of this restless and explosive material, greatly aggravated the difficulty by unsettling the minds of an immense number of those who had remained at home, and arousing, on every side, a spirit of almost reckless adventure. The calm, even course of industry and patient endeavor for the support of life and the accumulation of wealth was abandoned by thousands in all sections of the country. The regular channels of business were, to some extent, interrupted and broken up, and the whole country seemed running wild in the chase of golden phantoms. To afford exercise to some part of this restless spirit, and divert the reckless from further marauding expeditions against peaceful neighbors, it seemed good to the president to suggest and open new objects of public interest, and new fields of individual enterprise. With this view, he proposed the fitting out of exploring expeditions to foreign countries, which should add to our geographical knowledge, extend our commerce, and increase our facilities of communication with distant parts of our own country and the world. One of the first and principal objects of this class was, to secure a shorter and convenient route to California; and great efforts were made to negotiate the Tehuantepec route through Mexico, and the Nicaragua route through Central America.

Japan, the recluse of the Northern Pacific, also attracted attention, and invited an effort to initiate her into the community of nations. The ostensible motive for present action in this quarter was found in the fact that several American sailors had been shipwrecked, cast upon the shores of Japan, and there treated with great severity. Information of their unhappy condition having been communicated to Commodore Geisinger, then cruising in the Pacific, he despatched the United States ship Preble, Commander James Glynn, to demand their release and bring them away. This service was ably and manfully performed, and an impression made upon the Japanese government that the United States of America could not be trifled with. Having fulfilled his benevolent mission, and returned to the United States, Commander Glynn addressed a letter to the president, recommending an early and a vigorous effort to draw or drive Japan from her unsocial position, and to obtain, in some part of her territory, a depot for our Pacific steamers. The following extract will fully explain the design of the letter, and the subsequent action of the government:—

“WASHINGTON, June 10, 1851.

“SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith, in writing, by your direction, the substance of my remarks to you a few days since upon the project of opening an intercourse between the United States and the empire of Japan. Soon a commercial treaty between the two countries will be demanded by our people; and already a depot to stop at in Japan is absolutely necessary for the accommodation of a line of steamships contemplated to be established between California and China. These arrangements must be effected soon or late, and if not peaceably, then by force; the progress of civilization demands them, and every humane man must desire that the necessary changes in the relations existing between the two governments should be effected with as little violence as possible, and also with as little delay.

“The present appears a favorable time for entering upon a negotiation with Japan. Recent occurrences have attracted the attention of the two countries towards each other; but as yet there has been no unkind feeling grown into existence between the two people. It is important that advantage should be taken of this favorable condition of things, which cannot, reasonably, be anticipated to continue much longer, at least on our part, where our interests are so largely involved in greater accommodation for our commerce; where a claim so reasonable in itself is met by arbitrary prohibition; where might and right are resisted by imbecility and injustice. * * *

“Having taken precautionary measures to make friends of those who might have it in their power to injure our cause, the next thing is to select a proper bearer of the communication—for on him will depend, in a great degree, the result of this first attempt to change the foreign policy of Japan. He should be a man of matured judgment, and of ready tact to comprehend and to extricate himself from any unpleasant position he might find himself suddenly and unexpectedly placed in while negotiating with a people so peculiarly situated, and a government so peculiarly constituted as is that of Japan. He should have patience to sustain himself under trying circumstances not designed to annoy him, and spirit to repel every attempt to exact from him any humiliating act of ceremonial deference to the native authorities; he should be a naval officer, knowing what a man-of-war could be made to do under any circumstances, and what he should do with her in an unexpected emergency, or in an unlooked-for turn in the character of the negotiation. While he is the peaceful bearer of a friendly letter, he should be studying the best mode of conducting hostile operations against the empire, if they should ever be deemed necessary by his government; and with this object he should, if possible, get into the country, claiming the right to deliver in person his letter to the highest functionary of the local government to whom it may be directed."

Designs of opening a communication with Japan had been seriously entertained for many years. Mr. Livingston, secretary of state under General Jackson, issued a commission to that effect to Mr. Edmund Roberts, then United States commissioner in China. But it was so restricted in its instructions, and in the means of commanding respect, that its execution was never attempted.

In 1845, Commodore Biddle was instructed to "hold his squadron at the disposal of the commissioner, in case he should incline to make the effort of gaining access to Japan; and if the commissioner declined so to do, himself to persevere in the design; yet not in such a manner as to excite a hostile feeling, or a distrust of the government of the United States."

In pursuance of these instructions, Commodore Biddle, in the United States ship Columbus, proceeded to the Bay of Yedo, where he anchored on the 20th of July, 1846. He was, however, entirely unsuccessful in his endeavors to open the desired negotiations. The edict issued for the purpose of explaining the reasons of this refusal contained the following very decided declarations: "It will be of no use to renew the attempt, as all applications of the kind, however numerous they may be, will be steadily rejected." "The emperor positively refuses the permission you desire. He earnestly advises you to depart immediately, and to consult your own safety by not appearing again upon our coast."

Notwithstanding these peremptory repulses, Mr. Fillmore resolved on another and a determined effort to secure an object so important to the increasing commerce in the Pacific, and particularly to the protection due to American seamen shipwrecked on those coasts. The latter was to be demanded as a right, and secured at any cost; the former to be insisted upon by all arguments consistent with a due regard to the rights of Japan as an independent nation. With these views, the following instructions were given to Commodore Aulick:—

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
"WASHINGTON, June 10, 1851.

"SIR: The moment is near when the last link in the chain of oceanic steam navigation is to be formed. From China and the East Indies to Egypt, thence through the Mediterranean and Atlantic Ocean to England, thence again to our happy shores, and other parts of this great continent; from our own ports to the southernmost part of the isthmus that connects the two western continents; and from its Pacific coast, north and southwards, as far as civilization has spread, the steamers of other nations and of our own carry intelligence, the wealth of the world, and thousands of travellers.

"It is the president's opinion that steps should be taken at once to enable our enterprising merchants to supply the last link in that great chain which unites all nations of the world by the early establishment of a line of steamers from California to China. In order to facilitate this enterprise it is desirable that we should obtain from the Emperor of Japan permission to purchase from his subjects the necessary supplies of coal which our steamers, on their out and inward voyages, may require. The well-known jealousy with which the Japanese empire has, for the last two centuries, rejected all overtures from other nations to open its ports to their vessels, embarrasses all new attempts to change the exclusive policy of that country.

"The interests of commerce, and even those of humanity, demand, however, that we should make another appeal to the sovereign of that country, in asking him to sell to our steamers, not the manufactures of his artisans, or the results of the toil of his husbandmen, but a gift of Providence, deposited, by the Creator of all things, in the depths of the Japanese Islands for the benefit of the human family.

"By the president's direction I now transmit to you a letter to the Emperor of Japan, (with an open copy,) which you are to carry to Yedo, his capital, in your flagship, accompanied by as many vessels of the squadron under your command as may conveniently be employed in this service. A Chinese translation of this letter will be furnished to you by the United States legation at Canton, or sent to your anchorage at Hong Kong or Macao.

"At one of the latter places you will probably meet with a national vessel, detached by the commodore of the squadron in the Pacific, (as you will perceive by the enclosed copy of a correspondence between this and the navy department,) to carry to you a number of shipwrecked Japanese mariners, who were some time ago picked up at sea by the bark Auckland. These men you will take with you to Yedo, and deliver them over to the officers of the emperor, giving them, through your interpreter, the assurance that the American government will never fail to treat with kindness any of the natives of Japan whom misfortune may bring to our shores, and that it expects similar treatment of such of its own citizens who may be driven on the coasts of Japan.

"The letter of the president to the Emperor of Japan you will deliver to such of his high officers as he may appoint for the purpose of receiving it. To them you will also explain the main object of your visit.

"Mineral coal is so abundant in Japan that the government of that country can have no reasonable objection to supply our steamers, at fair prices, with that great necessary of commerce. One of the eastern ports of Nippon would be the most desirable place for this purpose. Should, however, the government of Japan persist in following out its system of exclusiveness, you might, perhaps, induce them to consent to the transportation of the coal, by their own vessels, to a neighboring island, easy of access, where the steamers could supply their wants—avoiding thus the necessity of an intercourse with any large number of the people of the country.

"It is considered important that you should avail yourself of every occasion to impress upon the Japanese officers with whom you will be brought in contact, that the government of the United States does not possess any power over the religion of its own citizens, and that there is, therefore, no cause to apprehend that it will interfere with the religion of other countries.

"The president, although fully aware of the great reluctance hitherto shown by the Japanese government to enter into treaty stipulations with any foreign nation,—a feeling which it is sincerely wished that you may be able to overcome,—has thought it proper, in anticipation of this latter favorable contingency, to invest you with full power to negotiate and sign a treaty of amity and commerce between the United States and the empire of Japan.

"I transmit, herewith, the act of the president clothing you with that power, as also copies of the treaty between the United States and China, with Siam, and with Muscat, which may, to a certain extent, be of use to you as precedents. It is important that you should secure to our vessels the right to enter one or more of the ports of Japan, and there to dispose of their cargoes, either by sale or by barter, without being subjected to extravagant port charges; and even more important is it that the government of Japan should bind itself to protect American sailors and property which may be wrecked on their shores. The second article of our treaty with Muscat, and the fifth article of our treaty with Siam, embrace these objects.

"Every treaty has to be submitted to the Senate for ratification, as you are aware. In consideration of the great distance between the two countries, and unforeseen difficulties, it would be prudent, should you succeed in effecting the object proposed, to fix the period for the exchange of the ratifications at three years.

"I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

"DANIEL WEBSTER.

"COMMODORE JOHN H. AULICK, &c., &c."

"President of the United States to the Emperor of Japan.

"MILLARD FILLMORE, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, TO HIS IMPERIAL MAJESTY THE EMPEROR OF JAPAN.

"GREAT AND GOOD FRIEND: I send you this letter by an envoy of my own appointment, an officer of high rank in his country, who is no missionary of religion. He goes by my command to bear to you my greeting and good wishes, and to promote friendship and commerce between the two countries.

"You know that the United States of America now extend from sea to sea; that the great countries of Oregon and California are parts of the United States; and that from these countries, which are rich in gold, and silver, and precious stones, our steamers can reach the shores of your happy land in less than twenty days.

"Many of our ships will now pass in every year, and some, perhaps, in every week, between California and China; these ships must pass along the coasts of your empire; storms and winds may cause them to be wrecked on your shores; and we ask and expect from your friendship and your greatness kindness for our men, and protection for our property. We wish that our people may be permitted to trade with your people; but we shall not authorize them to break any laws of your empire.

"Our object is friendly commercial intercourse, and nothing more. You have many productions which we should be glad to buy; and we have productions which might suit your people.

"Your empire hath a great abundance of coal; this is an article which our steamships, in going from California to China, must use. They would be glad that a harbor in your empire should be appointed to which coal might be brought, and where they might always be able to purchase it.

"In many other respects commerce between your empire and our country would be useful to both. Let us consider well what new interests arise from these recent events which have brought our two countries so near together, and what purposes of friendship, amity, and intercourse they ought to inspire in the breasts of those who govern both countries. Farewell.

"Given under my hand and seal, at the city of Washington, the 10th day of May, 1851, and [L. s.] of the independence of the United States the seventy-fifth.

"By the President.

"D. WEBSTER, Secretary of State."

"M. FILLMORE.

This commission was subsequently transferred to Commodore Perry, who was sent out with an independent fleet, and clothed with full powers of negotiation. The mission was conducted with great ability and complete success. The same jealousy and watchfulness, which had foiled all previous attempts to open negotiations with the emperor, characterized the movements of the officials on his first arrival. Every obstacle was thrown in the way of his communication with the shore. But conscious of power, and of a just right to demand a hearing, at least so far as the protection of shipwrecked seamen was concerned, Commodore Perry went boldly forward, passed into the forbidden harbor, cast anchor in a safe and convenient place, and insisted peremptorily on having his communication presented to the emperor, and duly answered. Prudent as well as courageous, and courteous as well as determined, he coolly and kindly persisted in his demands till immemorial usage and Japanese obstinacy gave way, and the objects of his important mission were entirely accomplished. The details of this arrangement belong rather to the history of the subsequent administration than to that of Mr. Fillmore; but thus much is due to him, under whose auspices and instructions the successful mission was originated.

While this matter was in progress, an exploring expedition was sent to the Chinese Seas, under command of Captain Ringgold, with a view to securing safe and convenient depots for coal for steamers employed in the Pacific trade, and other safeguards and facilities for the widely-extending commerce and enterprise of the states.

Efforts were also made to open to American enterprise and commerce the immense and almost unexplored territories of the interior of South America. A favorable opportunity seemed to be afforded on the expulsion of Rosas from Buenos Ayres, and efforts were immediately made to negotiate treaties of amity and commerce with the new authorities, which would have the effect to invite American adventurers to the rich and extensive regions of the La Plata and its confluent. Investigations were also made into the character and facilities of the country watered by the Amazon and its branches; and treaties were formed with Brazil, Uruguay, Costa Rica, and Peru.

Under the strong conviction, derived from the gold washings of the rivers of Africa, that the mountains from which they take their rise would be found rich in metalliferous ore, and offer an inviting field for the enterprise of the free colored people of the states, and an inducement to them to emigrate to the land of their fathers, Lieutenant Lynch was sent thither on an exploring expedition, the results of which yet remain to be known.

The guano trade of the Pacific islands, the monopoly of which was claimed by Peru, had now become very important, and an object of envy to American adventurers. In respect to the Islands of Lobos, a difference of opinion arose between Mr. Webster, then secretary of state, and the Peruvian minister at Washington. The latter claimed them, peremptorily, as the property of Peru, and occupied by Peruvian subjects; while the former denied the right of Peru altogether, "considering them as desert islands, which had been discovered by a captain in the American service," and therefore asserting officially that "the government of the United States would protect all her subjects who might go to those islands for the purpose of taking guano." In pursuance of these views, authority was given to American citizens to send to the Lobos Islands for guano without recognizing or submitting to any right on the part of Peru to demand payment therefor; and instructions were issued to the American squadron in the Pacific to protect all such enterprises. This order was afterwards recalled, or rather suspended, in consideration of new and plausible evidence presented by the Peruvian government of a presumptive title to the jurisdiction of those islands. The matter may be regarded as not fully settled, though the pacific policy of the United States leaves no ground of apprehension that the good understanding between the two governments will be disturbed by a question of so little importance.

During the presidency of General Taylor, a confidential agent of the government had been sent to Europe to examine and report upon the condition and prospects of the people of Hungary during their memorable, but unfortunate struggle for independence. This fact having transpired, the attention and jealousy of Austria were aroused, and her chargé d'affaires at Washington was instructed to remonstrate against so unprecedented and dangerous an interference in the political concerns of monarchical Europe. An animated diplomatic correspondence ensued. A severe lecture on international courtesy was read to the American secretary, which was probably expected to annihilate him, and to bring the nation on its knees. Mr. Webster, however, survived the attack, and soon satisfied the world, if not the Austrian chargé, that the United States government fully comprehended its position, and that remonstrances of this nature, from whatever quarter they might come, were a very unprofitable kind of diplomacy.

"Chevalier J. G. Hulsemann to the Secretary of State.

"AUSTRIAN LEGATION,

"WASHINGTON, September 30, 1850.

"The undersigned, chargé d'affaires of his majesty the Emperor of Austria, has been instructed to make the following communication to the secretary of state:—

"As soon as the imperial government became aware of the fact that a United States agent had been despatched to Vienna, with orders to watch for a favorable moment to recognize the Hungarian republic, and to conclude a treaty of commerce with the same, the undersigned was directed to address some confidential, but pressing representations to the cabinet of Washington against that proceeding, which is so much at variance with those principles of international law so scrupulously adhered to by Austria, at all times, and under all circumstances, towards the United States. In fact, how is it possible to reconcile such a mission with the principle of non-intervention so formally announced by the United States as the basis of American policy, and which had just been sanctioned with so much solemnity by the president in his inaugural address of March 5, 1849? Was it in return for the friendship and confidence which Austria had never ceased to manifest towards them that the United States became so impatient for the downfall of the Austrian monarchy, and even sought to accelerate that event by the utterance of their wishes to that effect? Those who did not hesitate to assume the responsibility of sending Mr. Dudley Mann on such an errand, should, independently of considerations of propriety, have borne in mind that they were exposing their emissary to be treated as a spy. It is to be regretted that the American government was not better informed as to the actual resources of Austria, and her historical perseverance in defending her just rights. A knowledge of those resources would have led to the conclusion that a contest of a few months' duration could neither have exhausted the energies of that power nor turned aside its purpose to put down the insurrection. Austria has struggled against the French revolution for twenty-five years. The courage and perseverance which she exhibited in that memorable contest have been appreciated by the whole world.

"To the urgent representations of the undersigned, Mr. Clayton answered that Mr. Mann's mission had no other object in view than to obtain reliable information as to the true state of affairs in Hungary by personal observation. This explanation can hardly be admitted; for it says very little as to the cause of the anxiety which was felt to ascertain the chances of the revolutionists. Unfortunately, the language in which Mr. Mann's instructions were drawn gives us a very correct idea of their scope. This language was offensive to the imperial cabinet; for it designates the Austrian government as an iron rule, and represents the rebel chief Kossuth as an illustrious man; while improper expressions are introduced in regard to Russia, the intimate and faithful ally of Austria. Notwithstanding these hostile demonstrations, the imperial cabinet has deemed it proper to preserve a conciliatory deportment, making ample allowance for the ignorance of the cabinet of Washington on the subject of Hungarian affairs, and its disposition to give credence to the mendacious rumors which are propagated by the American press. This extremely painful incident, therefore, might have been passed over without any written evidence being left on our part in the archives of the United States, had not General Taylor thought proper to revive the whole subject by communicating to the Senate, in his message of the 18th of last March, the instructions with which Mr. Mann had been furnished on the occasion of his mission to Vienna. The publicity which has been given to that document has placed the imperial government under the necessity of entering a formal protest, through its official representative, against the proceedings of the American government, lest that government should construe our silence into approbation, or toleration even, of the principles which appear to have guided its action, and the means it has adopted.

"In view of all these circumstances the undersigned has been instructed to declare that the imperial government totally disapproves, and will always continue to disapprove, of those proceedings, so offensive to the laws of propriety, and that it protests against all interference in the internal affairs of its government. Having thus fulfilled his duty, the undersigned considers it a fortunate circumstance that he has it in his power to assure the secretary of state that the imperial government is disposed to cultivate relations of friendship and good understanding with the United States—relations which may have been momentarily weakened, but which could not again be seriously disturbed without placing the cardinal interests of the two countries in jeopardy.

"The instructions for addressing this communication to Mr. Clayton reached Washington at the time of General Taylor's death. In compliance with the requisitions of propriety, the undersigned deemed it his duty to defer the task until the new administration had been completely organized—a delay which he now rejoices at, as it has given him the opportunity of ascertaining from the new president himself, on the occasion of the reception of the diplomatic corps, that the fundamental policy of the United States, so frequently proclaimed, would guide the relations of the American government with other powers. Even if the government of the United States were to think it proper to take an indirect part in the political movements of Europe, American policy would be exposed to acts of retaliation, and to certain inconveniences, which could not fail to affect the commerce and the industry of the two hemispheres. All countries are obliged, at some period or other, to struggle against internal difficulties; all forms of government are exposed to such disagreeable episodes; the United States have had some experience in this very recently. Civil war is a possible occurrence every where; and the encouragement which is given to the spirit of insurrection and of disorder most frequently falls back upon those who seek to aid it in its developments in spite of justice and wise policy.

"The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to renew to the secretary of state the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

"HULSEMANN.

"TO THE HON. DANIEL WEBSTER,
"Secretary of State of the United States."

"The Secretary of State to Mr. Hulsemann.

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
"WASHINGTON, December 21, 1850.

"The undersigned, secretary of state of the United States, had the honor to receive, some time ago, the note of Mr. Hulsemann, chargé d'affaires of his majesty the Emperor of Austria, of the 30th September. Causes, not arising from any want of personal regard for Mr. Hulsemann, or of proper respect for his government, have delayed an answer until the present moment. Having submitted Mr. Hulsemann's letter to the president, the undersigned is now directed by him to return the following reply:—

"The objects of Mr. Hulsemann's note are, first, to protest, by order of his government, against the steps taken by the late president of the United States to ascertain the progress and probable result of the revolutionary movements in Hungary; and, secondly, to complain of some expressions in the instructions of the late secretary of state to Mr. A. Dudley Mann, a confidential agent of the United States, as communicated by President Taylor to the Senate on the 28th of March last.

"The principal ground of protest is founded on the idea, or in the allegation, that the government of the United States, by the mission of Mr. Mann, and his instructions, has interfered in the domestic affairs of Austria, in a manner unjust or disrespectful towards that power. The president's message was a communication made by him to the Senate, transmitting a correspondence between the executive government and a confidential agent of its own. This would seem to be itself a domestic transaction—a mere instance of intercourse between the president and the Senate, in the manner which is usual and indispensable in communications between the different branches of the government. It was not addressed either to Austria or Hungary; nor was it any public manifesto, to which any foreign state was called on to reply. It was an account of its transactions communicated by the executive government to the Senate, at the request of that body—made public, indeed, but made public only because such is the common and usual course of proceeding; and it may be regarded as somewhat strange, therefore, that the Austrian cabinet did not perceive, that, by the instructions given to Mr. Hulsemann, it was itself interfering with the domestic concerns of a foreign state—the very thing which is the ground of its complaint against the United States.

“This department has, on former occasions, informed the ministers of foreign powers that a communication from the president to either house of Congress is regarded as a domestic communication, of which, ordinarily, no foreign state has cognizance; and, in more recent instances, the great inconvenience of making such communications subjects of diplomatic correspondence and discussion has been fully shown. If it had been the pleasure of his majesty the Emperor of Austria, during the struggles in Hungary, to have admonished the provisional government, or the people of that country, against involving themselves in disaster by following the evil and dangerous example of the United States of America in making efforts for the establishment of independent governments, such an admonition from that sovereign to his Hungarian subjects would not have originated here a diplomatic correspondence. The president might, perhaps, on this ground, have declined to direct any particular reply to Mr. Hulsemann’s note; but, out of proper respect for the Austrian government, it has been thought better to answer that note at length—and the more especially as the occasion is not unfavorable for the expression of the general sentiments of the government of the United States upon the topics which that note discusses.

“A leading subject in Mr. Hulsemann’s note is that of the correspondence between Mr. Hulsemann and the predecessor of the undersigned, in which Mr. Clayton, by direction of the president, informed Mr. Hulsemann ‘that Mr. Mann’s mission had no other object in view than to obtain reliable information as to the true state of affairs in Hungary by personal observation.’ Mr. Hulsemann remarks, that ‘this explanation can hardly be admitted; for it says very little as to the cause of the anxiety which was felt to ascertain the chances of the revolutionists.’ As this, however, is the only purpose which can with any appearance of truth be attributed to the agency,—as nothing whatever is alleged by Mr. Hulsemann to have been either done or said by the agent inconsistent with such an object,—the undersigned conceives that Mr. Clayton’s explanation ought to be deemed not only admissible, but quite satisfactory. Mr. Hulsemann states, in the course of his note, that his instructions to address his present communication to Mr. Clayton reached Washington about the time of the lamented death of the late president, and that he delayed, from a sense of propriety, the execution of his task until the new administration should be fully organized—‘a delay which he now rejoices at, as it has given him the opportunity of ascertaining from the new president himself, on the occasion of the reception of the diplomatic corps, that the fundamental policy of the United States, so frequently proclaimed, would guide the relations of the American government with other powers.’ Mr. Hulsemann also observes, that it is in his power to assure the undersigned ‘that the imperial government is disposed to cultivate relations of friendship and good understanding with the United States.’ The president receives this assurance of the disposition of the imperial government with great satisfaction; and, in consideration of the friendly relations of the two governments, thus mutually recognized, and of the peculiar nature of the incidents by which their good understanding is supposed by Mr. Hulsemann to have been for a moment disturbed or endangered, the president regrets that Mr. Hulsemann did not feel himself at liberty wholly to forbear from the execution of instructions which were of course transmitted from Vienna without any foresight of the state of things under which they would reach Washington. If Mr. Hulsemann saw in the address of the president to the diplomatic corps satisfactory pledges of the sentiments and the policy of this government in regard to neutral rights and neutral duties, it might perhaps have been better not to bring on a discussion of past transactions. But the undersigned readily admits that this was a question fit only for the consideration and decision of Mr. Hulsemann himself; and although the president does not see that any good purpose can be answered by reopening the inquiry into the propriety of the steps taken by President Taylor to ascertain the probable issue of the late civil war in Hungary, justice to his memory requires the undersigned briefly to restate the history of those steps, and to show their consistency with the neutral policy which has invariably guided the government of the United States in its foreign relations, as well as with the established and well-settled principles of national intercourse and the doctrines of public law.

"The undersigned will first observe that the president is persuaded his majesty the Emperor of Austria does not think that the government of the United States ought to view with unconcern the extraordinary events which have occurred, not only in his dominions, but in many other parts of Europe, since February, 1848. The government and people of the United States, like other intelligent governments and communities, take a lively interest in the movements and the events of this remarkable age, in whatever part of the world they may be exhibited. But the interest taken by the United States in those events has not proceeded from any disposition to depart from that neutrality towards foreign powers which is among the deepest principles and the most cherished traditions of the political history of the Union. It has been the necessary effect of the unexampled character of the events themselves, which could not fail to arrest the attention of the contemporary world, as they will doubtless fill a memorable page in history. But the undersigned goes further, and freely admits, that, in proportion as these extraordinary events appeared to have their origin in those great ideas of responsible and popular governments on which the American constitutions themselves are wholly founded, they could not but command the warm sympathy of the people of this country.

"Well-known circumstances in their history — indeed their whole history — have made them the representatives of purely popular principles of government. In this light they now stand before the world. They could not, if they would, conceal their character, their condition, or their destiny. They could not, if they so desired, shut out from the view of mankind the causes which have placed them, in so short a national career, in the station which they now hold among the civilized states of the world. They could not, if they desired it, suppress either the thoughts or the hopes which arise in men's minds, in other countries, from contemplating their successful example of free government. That very intelligent and distinguished personage, the Emperor Joseph II., was among the first to discern this necessary consequence of the American revolution on the sentiments and opinions of the people of Europe. In a letter to his minister in the Netherlands, in 1787, he observes, that 'it is remarkable that France, by the assistance which she afforded to the Americans, gave birth to reflections on freedom.' This fact, which the sagacity of that monarch perceived at so early a day, is now known and admitted by intelligent powers all over the world. True, indeed, it is, that the prevalence on the other continent of sentiments favorable to republican liberty is the result of the reaction of America upon Europe; and the source and centre of this reaction has doubtless been, and now is, in these United States. The position thus belonging to the United States is a fact as inseparable from their history, their constitutional organization, and their character, as the opposite position of the powers composing the European alliance is from the history and constitutional organization of the governments of those powers. The sovereigns who form that alliance have not unfrequently felt it their right to interfere with the political movements of foreign states, and have, in their manifestoes and declarations, denounced the popular ideas of the age in terms so comprehensive as of necessity to include the United States and their forms of government. It is well known that one of the leading principles announced by the allied sovereigns after the restoration of the Bourbons, is, that all popular or constitutional rights are holden no otherwise than as grants and indulgences from crowned heads. 'Useful and necessary changes in legislation and administration,' says the Laybach Circular of May, 1821, 'ought only to emanate from the free will and intelligent conviction of those whom God has rendered responsible for power. All that deviates from this line necessarily leads to disorder, commotions, and evils far more insufferable than those which they pretend to remedy.' And his late Austrian majesty Francis I. is reported to have declared, in an address to the Hungarian Diet in 1820, that 'the whole world had become foolish, and, leaving their ancient laws, were in search of imaginary constitutions.' These declarations amount to nothing less than a denial of the lawfulness of the origin of the government of the United States, since it is certain that that government was established in consequence of a change which did not proceed from thrones or the permission of crowned heads. But the government of the United States heard these denunciations of its fundamental principles without remonstrance or the disturbance of its equanimity. This was thirty years ago.

"The power of this republic at the present moment is spread over a region one of the richest and most fertile on the globe, and of an extent in comparison with which the possessions of the house of Hapsburg are but as a patch on the earth's surface. Its population—already twenty-five millions—will exceed that of the Austrian empire within the period during which it may be hoped that Mr. Hulsemann may yet remain in the honorable discharge of his duties to his government. Its navigation and commerce are hardly exceeded by the oldest and most commercial nations; its maritime means and its maritime power may be seen by Austria herself in all seas where she has ports, as well as it may be seen, also, in all other quarters of the globe. Life, liberty, property, and all personal rights, are amply secured to all citizens, and protected by just and stable laws; and credit, public and private, is as well established as in any government of continental Europe. And the country, in all its interests and concerns, partakes most largely in all the improvements and progress which distinguish the age. Certainly the United States may be pardoned, even by those who profess adherence to the principles of absolute governments, if they entertain an ardent affection for those popular forms of political organization which have so rapidly advanced their own prosperity and happiness, and enabled them in so short a period to bring their country and the hemisphere to which it belongs to the notice and respectful regard—not to say the admiration—of the civilized world. Nevertheless, the United States have abstained at all times from acts of interference with the political changes of Europe. They cannot, however, fail to cherish always a lively interest in the fortunes of nations struggling for institutions like their own. But this sympathy, so far from being necessarily a hostile feeling towards any of the parties to these great national struggles, is quite consistent with amicable relations with them all. The Hungarian people are three or four times as numerous as the inhabitants of these United States were when the American revolution broke out. They possess, in a distinct language, and in other respects, important elements of a separate nationality, which the Anglo-Saxon race in this country did not possess. And if the United States wish success to countries contending for popular constitutions and national independence, it is only because they regard such constitutions and such national independence not as imaginary, but as real blessings. They claim no right, however, to take part in the struggles of foreign powers in order to promote these ends. It is only in defence of his own government and its principles and character that the undersigned has now expressed himself on this subject. But when the United States behold the people of foreign countries, without any such interference, spontaneously moving towards the adoption of institutions like their own, it surely cannot be expected of them to remain wholly indifferent spectators.

"In regard to the recent very important occurrences in the Austrian empire, the undersigned freely admits the difficulty which exists in this country, and is alluded to by Mr. Hulsemann, of obtaining accurate information. But this difficulty is by no means to be ascribed to what Mr. Hulsemann calls—with little justice, as it seems to the undersigned—'the mendacious rumors propagated by the American press.' For information on this subject, and others of the same kind, the American press is, of necessity, almost wholly dependent upon that of Europe; and if 'mendacious rumors' respecting Austrian and Hungarian affairs have been any where propagated, that propagation of falsehoods has been most prolific on the European continent, and in countries immediately bordering on the Austrian empire. But, wherever these errors may have originated, they certainly justified the late president in seeking true information through authentic channels. His attention was first particularly drawn to the state of things in Hungary by the correspondence of Mr. Stiles, chargé d'affaires of the United States at Vienna. In the autumn of 1848 an application was made to this gentleman on behalf of Mr. Kossuth, formerly minister of finance for the kingdom of Hungary by imperial appointment, but, at the time the application was made, chief of the revolutionary government. The object of this application was to obtain the good offices of Mr. Stiles with the imperial government with a view to the suspension of hostilities. This application became the subject of a conference between Prince Schwarzenberg, the imperial minister for foreign affairs, and Mr. Stiles. The prince commended the considerateness and propriety with which Mr. Stiles had acted, and, so far from disapproving his interference, advised him, in case he received a further communication from the revolutionary government in Hungary, to have an interview with Prince Windischgratz, who was charged by the emperor with the proceedings determined on in relation to that kingdom. A week after these occurrences, Mr. Stiles received, through a secret channel, a communication signed by L. Kossuth, President of the Committee of Defence, and countersigned by Francis Pulsky, Secretary of State. On the receipt of this communication Mr. Stiles had an interview with Prince Windischgratz, 'who received him with the utmost kindness, and thanked him for his efforts towards reconciling the existing difficulties.' Such were the incidents which first drew the attention of the government of the United States particularly to the affairs of Hungary; and the conduct of Mr. Stiles, though acting without instructions, in a matter of much delicacy, having been viewed with satisfaction by the imperial government, was approved by that of the United States.

"In the course of the year 1848 and the early part of 1849 a considerable number of Hungarians came to the United States. Among them were individuals representing themselves to be in the confidence of the revolutionary government; and by these persons the president was strongly urged to recognize the existence of that government. In these applications, and in the manner in which they were viewed by the president, there was nothing unusual; still less was there any thing unauthorized by the law of nations. It is the right of every independent state to enter into friendly relations with every other independent state. Of course, questions of prudence naturally arise in reference to new states brought by successful revolutions into the family of nations; but it is not to be required of neutral powers that they should await the recognition of the new government by the parent state. No principle of public law has been more frequently acted upon within the last thirty years by the great powers of the world than this. Within that period eight or ten new states have established independent governments within the limits of the colonial dominions of Spain on this continent; and in Europe the same thing has been done by Belgium and Greece. The existence of all these governments was recognized by some of the leading powers of Europe, as well as by the United States, before it was acknowledged by the states from which they had separated themselves. If, therefore, the United States had gone so far as formally to acknowledge the independence of Hungary, although, as the result has proved, it would have been a precipitate step, and one from which no benefit would have resulted to either party, it would not, nevertheless, have been an act against the law of nations, provided they took no part in her contest with Austria. But the United States did no such thing. Not only did they not yield to Hungary any actual countenance or succor; not only did they not show their ships of war in the Adriatic with any menacing or hostile aspect, but they studiously abstained from every thing which had not been done in other cases in times past, and contented themselves with instituting an inquiry into the truth and reality of alleged political occurrences. Mr. Hulsemann incorrectly states — unintentionally, certainly — the nature of the mission of this agent when he says that 'a United States agent had been despatched to Vienna with orders to watch for a favorable moment to recognize the Hungarian republic, and to conclude a treaty of commerce with the same.' This, indeed, would have been a lawful object; but Mr. Mann's errand was, in the first instance, purely one of inquiry. He had no power to act, unless he had first come to the conviction that a firm and stable Hungarian government existed. 'The principal object the president has in view,' according to his instructions, 'is to obtain minute and reliable information in regard to Hungary in connection with the affairs of adjoining countries, the probable issue of the present revolutionary movements, and the chances we may have of forming commercial arrangements with that power favorable to the United States.' Again, in the same paper, it is said, 'The object of the president is to obtain information in regard to Hungary and her resources and prospects, with a view to an early recognition of her independence and the formation of commercial relations with her.' It was only in the event that the new government should appear, in the opinion of the agent, to be firm and stable, that the president proposed to recommend its recognition.

"Mr. Hulsemann, in qualifying these steps of President Taylor with the epithet of 'hostile,' seems to take for granted that the inquiry could, in the expectation of the president, have but one result, and that favorable to Hungary. If this were so, it would not change the case. But the American government sought for nothing but truth; it desired to learn the facts through a reliable channel. It so happened, in the chances and vicissitudes of human affairs, that the result was adverse to the Hungarian revolution. The American agent — as was stated in his instructions to be not unlikely — found the condition of Hungarian affairs less prosperous than it had been, or had been believed to be. He did not enter Hungary, nor hold any direct communication with her revolutionary leaders. He reported against the recognition of her independence because he found that she had been unable to set up a firm and stable government. He carefully forbore, as his instructions required, to give publicity to his mission; and the undersigned supposes that the Austrian government first learned its existence from the communications of the president to the Senate.

“Mr. Hulsemann will observe from this statement that Mr. Mann’s mission was wholly unobjectionable, and strictly within the rule of the law of nations, and the duty of the United States as a neutral power. He will accordingly feel how little foundation there is for his remark, that ‘those who did not hesitate to assume the responsibility of sending Mr. Dudley Mann on such an errand, should, independently of considerations of propriety, have borne in mind that they were exposing their emissary to be treated as a spy.’ A spy is a person sent by one belligerent to gain secret information of the forces and defences of the other, to be used for hostile purposes. According to practice, he may use deception, under the penalty of being lawfully hanged if detected. To give this odious name and character to a confidential agent of a neutral power, bearing the commission of his country, and sent for a purpose fully warranted by the law of nations, is not only to abuse language, but also to confound all just ideas, and to announce the wildest and most extravagant notions, such as certainly were not to have been expected in a grave diplomatic paper; and the president directs the undersigned to say to Mr. Hulsemann that the American government would regard such an imputation upon it by the cabinet of Austria as that it employs spies, and that in a quarrel none of its own, as distinctly offensive, if it did not presume, as it is willing to presume, that the word used in the original German was not of equivalent meaning with ‘spy’ in the English language, or that in some other way the employment of such an opprobrious term may be explained. Had the imperial government of Austria subjected Mr. Mann to the treatment of a spy, it would have placed itself without the pale of civilized nations; and the cabinet of Vienna may be assured, that, if it had carried, or attempted to carry, any such lawless purpose into effect in the case of an authorized agent of this government, the spirit of the people of this country would have demanded immediate hostilities to be waged by the utmost exertion of the power of the republic, military and naval.

“Mr. Hulsemann proceeds to remark, that ‘this extremely painful incident, therefore, might have been passed over, without any written evidence being left on our part in the archives of the United States, had not General Taylor thought proper to revive the whole subject by communicating to the Senate, in his message of the 18th [28th] of last March, the instructions with which Mr. Mann had been furnished on the occasion of his mission to Vienna. The publicity which has been given to that document has placed the imperial government under the necessity of entering a formal protest, through its official representative, against the proceedings of the American government, lest that government should construe our silence into approbation, or toleration even, of the principles which appear to have guided its action, and the means it has adopted.’ The undersigned reasserts to Mr. Hulsemann, and to the cabinet of Vienna, and in the presence of the world, that the steps taken by President Taylor, now protested against by the Austrian government, were warranted by the law of nations, and agreeable to the usages of civilized states. With respect to the communication of Mr. Mann’s instructions to the Senate, and the language in which they are couched, it has already been said — and Mr. Hulsemann must feel the justness of the remark — that these are domestic affairs, in reference to which the government of the United States cannot admit the slightest responsibility to the government of his imperial majesty. No state, deserving the appellation of independent, can permit the language in which it may instruct its own officers in the discharge of their duties to itself to be called in question, under any pretext, by a foreign power. But, even if this were not so, Mr. Hulsemann is in an error in stating that the Austrian government is called an ‘iron rule’ in Mr. Mann’s instructions. That phrase is not found in the paper; and in respect to the honorary epithet bestowed in Mr. Mann’s instructions on the late chief of the revolutionary government of Hungary, Mr. Hulsemann will bear in mind that the government of the United States cannot justly be expected, in a confidential communication to its own agent, to withhold from an individual an epithet of distinction of which a great part of the world thinks him worthy, merely on the ground that his own government regards him as a rebel. At an early stage of the American revolution, while Washington was considered by the English government as a rebel chief, he was regarded on the continent of Europe as an illustrious hero. But the undersigned will take the liberty of bringing the cabinet of Vienna into the presence of its own predecessors, and of citing for its consideration the conduct of the imperial government itself. In the year 1777 the war of the American revolution was raging all over these United States; England was prosecuting that war with a most resolute determination, and by the exertion of her military means to the fullest extent. Germany was at that time at peace with England; and yet an agent of that Congress which was looked upon by England in no other light than that of a body in open rebellion was not only received with great respect by the ambassador of the empress queen at Paris, and by the minister of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, who afterwards mounted the imperial throne, but resided in Vienna for a considerable time — not, indeed, officially acknowledged, but treated with courtesy and respect; and the emperor suffered himself to be persuaded by that agent to exert himself to prevent the German powers from furnishing troops to England to enable her to suppress the rebellion in America. Neither Mr. Hulsemann nor the cabinet of Vienna, it is presumed, will undertake to say that any thing said or done by this government in regard to the recent war between Austria and Hungary is not borne out, and much more than borne out, by this example of the imperial court. It is believed that the Emperor Joseph II. habitually spoke in terms of respect and admiration of the character of Washington, as he is known to have done of that of Franklin; and he deemed it no infraction of neutrality to inform himself of the progress of the revolutionary struggle in America, or to express his deep sense of the merits and the talents of those illustrious men who were then leading their country to independence and renown. The undersigned may add, that, in 1781, the courts of Russia and Austria proposed a diplomatic congress of the belligerent powers, to which the commissioners of the United States should be admitted.

“Mr. Hulsemann thinks that in Mr. Mann’s instructions improper expressions are introduced in regard to Russia; but the undersigned has no reason to suppose that Russia herself is of that opinion. The only observation made in those instructions about Russia is, that she ‘has chosen to assume an attitude of interference; and her immense preparations for invading and reducing the Hungarians to the rule of Austria — from which they desire to be released — give so serious a character to the contest as to awaken the most painful solicitude in the minds of Americans.’ The undersigned cannot but consider the Austrian cabinet as unnecessarily susceptible in looking upon language like this as a ‘hostile demonstration.’ If we remember that it was addressed by the government to its own agent, and has received publicity only through a communication from one department of the American government to another, the language quoted must be deemed moderate and inoffensive. The comity of nations would hardly forbid its being addressed to the two imperial powers themselves. It is scarcely necessary for the undersigned to say that the relations of the United States with Russia have always been of the most friendly kind, and have never been deemed by either party to require any compromise of their peculiar views upon subjects of domestic or foreign polity, or the true origin of governments. At any rate, the fact that Austria, in her contest with Hungary, had an intimate and faithful ally in Russia, cannot alter the real nature of the question between Austria and Hungary, or in any way affect the neutral rights and duties of the government of the United States, or the justifiable sympathies of the American people. It is, indeed, easy to conceive that favor towards struggling Hungary would not be diminished, but increased, when it was seen that the arm of Austria was strengthened and upheld by a power whose assistance threatened to be, and which in the end proved to be, overwhelmingly destructive of all her hopes.

“Towards the conclusion of his note, Mr. Hulsemann remarks, that ‘if the government of the United States were to think it proper to take an indirect part in the political movements of Europe, American policy would be exposed to acts of retaliation, and to certain inconveniences, which would not fail to affect the commerce and the industry of the two hemispheres.’ As to this possible fortune, this hypothetical retaliation, the government and people of the United States are quite willing to take their chances, and abide their destiny. Taking neither a direct nor an indirect part in the domestic or intestine movements of Europe, they have no fear of events of the nature alluded to by Mr. Hulsemann. It would be idle now to discuss with Mr. Hulsemann those acts of retaliation which he imagines may possibly take place at some indefinite time hereafter. Those questions will be discussed when they arise; and Mr. Hülsemann and the cabinet at Vienna may rest assured that, in the mean time, while performing with strict and exact fidelity all their neutral duties, nothing will deter either the government or the people of the United States from exercising, at their own discretion, the rights belonging to them as an independent nation, and of forming and expressing their own opinions, freely and at all times, upon the great political events which may transpire among the civilized nations of the earth. Their own institutions stand upon the broadest principles of civil liberty; and, believing those principles and the fundamental laws in which they are embodied to be eminently favorable to the prosperity of States,—to be, in fact, the only principles of government which meet the demands of the present enlightened age,—the president has perceived with great satisfaction that, in the constitution recently introduced into the Austrian empire, many of these great principles are recognized and applied, and he cherishes a sincere wish that they may produce the same happy effects throughout his Austrian Majesty's extensive dominions that they have done in the United States.

"The undersigned has the honor to repeat to Mr. Hülsemann the assurance of his high consideration.

"DANIEL WEBSTER."

Allusion has already been made to a demonstration of jealousy, on the part of Austria, on account of the interest taken by the American people and government in the effort of Hungary to shake off the yoke of the Hapsburgs. This sentiment received a new and stronger impulse in the following year.

Kossuth, the able and illustrious Magyar chief, having arrived in the country towards the close of the year 1851, was every where hailed with acclamations of welcome, and listened to by admiring millions, in his masterly advocacy of the cause he represented. The people every where sympathized in his desire and request for active intervention in favor of republican freedom in Europe. The government, on the contrary, bound by precedent and traditional maxims of political prudence, carefully abstained from any action which could by any means lead to "entangling alliances" in the old world, or awaken suspicion, on the part of the despoticisms there, that substantial encouragement, or material aid, would be proffered, or given, to the revolutionary spirit which threatened the stability of their thrones. The matter was earnestly discussed in Congress, and in the legislative halls of the states, and ready active intervention in behalf of struggling freedom was ably and urgently advocated by many of the most eminent and influential men in the country. Members of the cabinet, senators, judges, legislators, and persons in all ranks and stations were loud in their encomiums of the exalted character and services of Kossuth, and liberal in their expressions of sympathy with him and his cause. He was received with public, civic, and military honors in all the principal cities and towns through which he passed, was escorted from place to place with the honors of a conqueror, and fêted every where, as if he were the nation's guest. At Washington, he was assigned an honorary seat in the Capitol during the session of Congress, and invited to a public dinner got up by private subscription, at which most of the leading men of both houses of Congress were present. On this, as on similar occasions, throughout the country, he addressed the people in advocacy of the cause of the oppressed people of Europe, and was freely responded to by men of all parties and from all sections. It was here that Daniel Webster, then secretary of state, gave him, in his capacity of a private citizen, the right hand of fellowship, and proclaimed his entire and cordial sympathy with the cause he represented. This speech gave great offence to the Austrian representative, Chevalier Hülsemann, who had been all but annihilated in his official controversy with "the great secretary," some months before. He now renewed the onset by calling Mr. Webster to account for the revolutionary sentiments uttered in his speech at the Kossuth dinner. Accustomed to entire freedom of thought and speech, as a private individual, the secretary paid no attention to the call. This only offended the chevalier's dignity the more. Annoyed, at the same time, by the freedom with which the public press discussed him and his affairs, he appealed personally to the president, which was contrary to all diplomatic usage and courtesy. Finding no satisfaction from any quarter, and worsted in every conflict with the constitutional Hercules, he petulantly withdrew from the country, and remained absent until after Mr. Webster's decease—a commendable exhibition of "the better part of valor," which, if earlier made, would have saved him no little mortification. The following correspondence will more fully illustrate this ridiculous episode in diplomacy.

"The Chevalier Hulsemann to the Secretary of State.

"AUSTRIAN LEGATION,
"WASHINGTON, April 29, 1852.

"MR. SECRETARY OF STATE: On my return from Havana, very lately, I found that the moment had arrived for carrying out the intentions of my government in regard to my official relations with the government of the United States. The secretary of state has not thought proper to reply to the note, which I deemed it my duty to address him, under date of December 13, relative to the reception and military honors which had been paid to Kossuth by the federal authorities.

"The secretary of state had induced me to hope that my interviews with him at the department of state would no longer be commented upon in a style of derision, in certain newspapers of Baltimore and Philadelphia. These assurances, which had been given me in writing even, were immediately burlesqued in those very sheets, and have only led to fresh virulent attacks, which have been continued in a journal very largely circulated in New Orleans; and during my passage through that city, I was made the subject of demonstrations of an extremely disagreeable character.

"I thought it my duty then (the 21st of November last) to inform the president of these improprieties, so singularly countenanced; and thereupon the secretary of state declared to me, (on the 28th of November) that henceforth his intercourse with me must be exclusively in writing.

"On the 7th of January last, the secretary of state thought it fit to deliver publicly, and in the presence of Kossuth, a revolutionary address, in which he openly held out encouragement to Hungary, spurring her on to a new rebellion, and formally proposed a toast for the speedy emancipation of that kingdom. This demonstration partook of so strange a character, it was so much at variance with the most common international courtesy, and the positive promises you had given me at the department of state, that I thought it incumbent on me to apply at once to the highest authority of the republic, in order to ascertain whether the address in question imbodyed the sentiment of the government of the United States.

"I consider myself fortunate in being able to say that the imperial government, approving of the step I had taken, has fully appreciated the declaration the president thought proper to make to me, on the 12th of January last, in favor of maintaining friendly relations between Austria and the United States.

"These verbal assurances have not been followed since by any action on the part of the secretary of state in order to corroborate, officially, the declaration of the president, and to effect a satisfactory reconciliation.

"After having specified with a great deal of caution the hostile proceedings of the secretary of state, and after having demonstrated the false and disagreeable position which has been the result of such proceedings, I think it my duty to declare, from motives of propriety very palpable, that my government could not allow me to remain here any longer, to continue an official intercourse with the principal promoters of the much to be lamented Kossuth episode.

"I avail myself of this occasion to tender my respectful thanks to the president for his invariably obliging conduct towards me. M. August Belmont, consul general of Austria in New York, will continue to perform his functions until further orders.

"Please to accept, Mr. Secretary of State, the expression of my distinguished consideration.

"HULSEMANN.

"TO HON. DANIEL WEBSTER,
"Secretary of State of the United States."

"Mr. Hunter to the Chevalier Hulsemann.

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
"WASHINGTON, May 3, 1852.

"SIR: Your communication to the secretary of state of the 29th ult., announcing your intention to leave the United States, and stating that Mr. August Belmont, the consul general of Austria, at New York, will continue in the discharge of his functions until further orders, has been received.

"In reply, I have the honor to inform you that Mr. Belmont is well known to the secretary of state, as a gentleman of much respectability; any communication which it may be proper for him to address to the department in his official character will be received with entire respect. I avail myself of this occasion to offer to you, sir, the assurance of my high consideration.

"W. HUNTER,
"Acting Secretary.

"TO CHEVALIER HULSEMANN, &c., &c., Austria."

"The Secretary of State to Mr. McCurdy.

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
"WASHINGTON, June 8, 1852.

"SIR: I transmit a copy of a note of the 29th April last, addressed to me by the Chevalier Hulsemann, announcing his intention of returning to Austria. This note reached me in Baltimore, I being then bound on a visit to Massachusetts, from which I have now lately returned. On receiving it, I directed Mr. Hunter to return the answer, a copy of which is also herewith enclosed.

"It is obvious from the tenor of all his recent communications to this department, that the Chevalier Hulsemann's experience in the diplomatic service of his government has not instructed him accurately in the nature and limits of his official functions, and that, notwithstanding his long residence in this country, he is quite uninformed as to the character of our institutions and the responsibilities of public men in the United States, for their acts or their sentiments in a private capacity in regard to foreign powers.

"The Chevalier Hulsemann came hither in 1838, as secretary of legation under the highly accomplished Baron de Maréscall, who was accredited as envoy extraordinary of his imperial majesty. Ever since the retirement of that gentleman he has acted as chargé d'affaires, but, so far as we are aware, without any regular commission from his government. It is certain that he has never been accredited to this department by the Austrian minister for foreign affairs.

"The Chevalier Hulsemann, it appears, has yet to learn that no foreign government or its representative can take just offence at any thing which an officer of this government may say in his private capacity. Official communications only are to be regarded as indicating the sentiments and views of the government of the United States. If those communications are friendly in their character, the foreign government has no right or reason to infer that there is any insincerity in them, or to point to other matters as showing the real sentiments of the government.

"You will see from the Chevalier Hulsemann's note that he made an appeal to the president against what he calls newspaper improprieties, and unofficial remarks of the head of this department. The president, actuated by a benevolent desire to preserve unimpaired the friendly relations between the two governments, waived ceremony, and unofficially listened to his remarks. In pursuing this course, however, he by no means intended to allow the Chevalier Hulsemann to suppose that he was not well aware of his official position. The Chevalier Hulsemann should know that a charge d'affaires, whether regularly commissioned or acting as such without commission, can hold official intercourse only with the department of state. He has no right even to converse with the president on matters of business, and may consider it as a liberal courtesy that he is presented to him at all. I take it for granted that if you should imagine the Austrian minister for foreign affairs had offended you, you would claim no right of appeal to the emperor. Although usually we are not rigid in these matters, yet a marked disregard of ordinary forms implies disrespect to the government itself.

"I shall not, of course, notice the specific subjects of complaint of Chevalier Hulsemann. Whatever is personal to him must be allowed to pass without observation. You are at liberty to read this despatch to the Austrian minister for foreign affairs.

"I am, sir, respectfully your obedient servant,

"DANIEL WEBSTER.

"C. J. McCURDY, &c., &c., Vienna."

About this period another effort was made, from another quarter, to obtain the official intervention of the American government in the political affairs of Europe. This was in the form of a petition from the Irish citizens, of whom there were many thousands in the states, requesting the president to solicit from the British crown a pardon for Smith O'Brien and his associates, who were then under conviction for high treason, for the part they took in the Irish rebellion. This was evidently a political move, intended for effect at home rather than abroad. The president understood it as such, and, while he would not have shrunk, as an individual, from any service which humanity might reasonably have demanded from him, respectfully declined to interfere officially in the matter.

In November, 1851, "a little cloud, no bigger than a man's hand," but such a one as wars are often made out of, darkened the political horizon on the side towards Great Britain.

The American steamer Prometheus, the property of the American Atlantic and Pacific Ship Canal Company, having on board some five hundred passengers, being about to leave the harbor of San Juan de Nicaragua, or Greytown, was boarded by a police force, and served with a process of attachment on the ship and captain, for certain charges claimed as port dues, which the captain refused to pay. Thereupon, the English brig of war Express, lying in the harbor, immediately got under weigh, made sail for the steamer, and, when within a quarter of a mile of her fired a shot over her forecabin, and a few minutes afterwards another over her stern, which passed so near that the force of the ball was distinctly felt by several persons on board. The captain of the steamer then sent a boat on board the brig to inquire the cause of the firing. The captain of the brig replied, that it was to protect the authorities of Greytown in their demands; that, if the steamer did not immediately anchor, he would fire a bombshell into her; and he ordered his guns to be loaded with grape and canister shot. The steamer then proceeded to the anchorage and anchored. The brig anchored very near the steamer, sent a boat on board the latter with orders that the fires should be extinguished, and to say that an officer would be sent to see that this was done. The authorities then came on board, the amount demanded was paid under protest, and the steamer was permitted to proceed to sea.

This matter being duly represented to the American government, an explanation on the part of Great Britain was promptly demanded. Immediately upon receipt of official intelligence of the facts in the case, her majesty's government entirely disavowed the proceeding of the commander of the Express, as an act of violence and an infraction of treaty engagements.

During the presidency of Mr. Fillmore a very important question between the government of the United States and that of Great Britain underwent a thorough examination, in an able and voluminous diplomatic correspondence, the results of which have since been realized in a reciprocity treaty with the British North American colonies, and the favorable adjustment of the fisheries on the Banks of Newfoundland, and the waters adjacent thereto.

The Congress of 1851-2, in pursuance of a suggestion of the president, passed a bill for the erection of a Lunatic Asylum in the city of Washington, and appropriated $100,000 to carry it into effect. In the course of the same year, the site was selected, plans adopted, and the work commenced.

* HENRY CLAY, born in Hanover county, Virginia, on the 12th of April, 1777, died at Washington, District of Columbia, on the 28th of June, 1852, aged 75 years. He was the son of a poor Baptist clergyman, John Clay, who died when Henry was but five years old, leaving seven children to the care of a most excellent mother, who married again ten years afterwards, and removed to Kentucky. Henry remained some years in Virginia, and at fourteen years of age was employed in a small store in Richmond, whence he was soon transferred to a law office, where he attracted the notice of Chancellor Wythe. He left Richmond in 1797, with a license to practise law, and emigrated to Lexington, Kentucky, where he opened an office as a lawyer, and, though poor and friendless, rapidly acquired an extensive and lucrative practice. He was very soon attracted to

The second session of the 31st Congress was marked by one of those solemn and impressive events which twice before had stirred the heart of Congress and of the nation to its centre, silencing all conflicts, harmonizing all opinions, and mingling all voices in eulogy over fallen greatness, and mourning for national loss. As Adams and Calhoun, after a long life of public service, had fallen at their posts, spending their last breath in the service of their country, and lying down to die under the dome of the Capitol, so fell, in his turn, their noble compeer, Henry Clay, his last expiring energies devoted to the interests of a country he had honored no less than he had loved. His health had been long declining, and he had not been able to take much active part in the duties of the session. He had come to Washington, in the faint hope that, weak as he was, his influence might avail something to the public weal, which was dearer to him than his own personal repose or comfort. He died on the 28th of June, 1852, a little before the hour of noon.

Congress was just meeting as the news of his decease sped over Washington. The fact was simply announced on either floor, and an adjournment, therefore, moved and carried. The next day was devoted to eulogies and appointments for the funeral. The ashes of the great commoner were committed to the charge of a strong committee of members of each house, and so conveyed through Baltimore, Philadelphia, Trenton, New York, Albany, Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati, &c., &c., to Lexington, and there deposited in the tomb at Ashland which Mr. Clay had previously provided. There let them rest forever, and thither let reverent steps be turned from every quarter of our Union, to gaze on the earth enfolding the dust which once enshrined the wise legislator, the fearless orator, the fervent patriot, and the unpretending champion of justice, truth, and humanity.*

the political arena by the agitation preceding the exchange of a territorial for a state government, in which he bore an active part, distinguishing himself by his public efforts in favor of affixing a constitutional limit to the existence of slavery in the embryo state. Defeated on this point, he embarked most heartily in the cause of the party then mustering under the banner of Thomas Jefferson, in opposition to the alien and sedition acts of John Adams's administration. Here he had the popular current on his side, Kentucky being almost unanimous in its adhesion to Mr. Jefferson and the republican party.

His first public station was that of representative in the state legislature, to which he was nominated and elected while absent from the county. He served two years in the assembly, and was, in 1806,

The quadrennial election of 1852 was one which, though it moved the country to its centre as usual, illustrated beautifully the peaceful supremacy of the ballot box. The number of candidates for the presidency was unusually large, and public sentiment was chosen by the two houses to fill a short vacancy in the Senate of the United States, where he took his seat on the 29th of December, 1806, serving but a single term, in which he proposed a resolve looking to a comprehensive system of internal improvement by the Federal government, which passed the Senate with only three dissenting voices.

The next summer he was chosen again to the state legislature, where he served two years more, submitting a series of resolves approving the embargo and the general course of President Jefferson, which were adopted in the house by a vote of sixty-four to one. He also introduced a resolve proposing that each member should clothe himself entirely in American fabrics, which likewise prevailed, but was so acrimoniously denounced as to involve him in a duel with its chief antagonist, Mr. Humphrey Marshall, in which both combatants were slightly wounded.

Mr. Clay returned to the United States Senate in December, 1809, having been again elected to fill a vacancy; and again distinguished himself by his efforts in favor of the encouragement of home manufactures. He spoke and voted in favor of assuming the River Perdidó as the true line between Louisiana and Florida, in opposition to the pretensions of Spain; and at the following session earnestly opposed the recharter of the first United States Bank. He remained in the Senate but two sessions, but left it with a reputation as a debater and legislator which few have attained so early in life.

In 1811 he was for the first time elected to the House of Representatives, whereof he was, on its assembling, chosen speaker by a large majority. He was one of the master spirits of the majority by which war with Great Britain was urged upon President Madison, and finally carried. He remained in the house as a leading advocate of war measures, having been rechosen speaker on the assembling of a new Congress in May, 1813, until January 19, 1814, when he resigned in order to proceed to Europe as one of five commissioners to negotiate a treaty of peace — meeting the British commissioners first at Gottingen, and afterwards at Ghent, where a peace was signed on the 18th of December, 1814, though the battle of New Orleans, which practically closed the war, was fought three weeks afterwards. Mr. Clay remained some months in Europe, returning in September, 1815, to learn that he had been unanimously reelected to Congress some weeks before. When Congress assembled, in December, he was rechosen speaker by a nearly unanimous vote.

The labors of that Congress were necessarily arduous. The war had disordered the finances, and deranged the industry of the country, leaving every thing in chaos. Congress proceeded to readjust the tariff with avowed regard to the encouragement of home manufactures, and to charter a new national bank, both with the hearty concurrence of Mr. Clay, who frankly confessed that the experience of the war had convinced him that such an institution was desirable, and even necessary, and to this opinion he evermore adhered. The same Congress passed a bill increasing the compensation of members of both houses, which excited great dissatisfaction, and defeated most of those who stood for reelection. Mr. Clay was, therefore, warmly opposed, for the first time in several years, but defeated his opponent, (John Pope,) after a severe and animated struggle.

Mr. Clay remained a member of the house, and its speaker, up to the 4th of March, 1825, save a short period when pecuniary embarrassments, caused by the failure of a friend for whom he was a heavy so divided between them, that any choice by the people seemed utterly hopeless.

The democratic national convention assembled at Baltimore on the 1st of June, and after a vehement struggle between the partisans of General Cass, of indorser, constrained him to resign, and devote his attention to his private affairs. Returning to the next Congress, he was forthwith chosen speaker, by a large majority, over Mr. P. P. Barbour, of Virginia, who had been elected in his absence. He signalized himself, throughout these ten years, by his earnest and persistent advocacy of protection to home industry, national internal improvement, the recognition of South American and Greek independence, &c. The fierce excitement which overspread the country upon the question of admitting Missouri into the Union as a slave state, with a constitution peculiarly offensive to the free north, was finally calmed by his exertions, the constitution modified, and the state admitted, though by a very small majority. He succeeded in carrying through the house a more protective tariff bill in 1820, but it was lost in the Senate; and in 1824 a similar bill was piloted by him through the house, (one hundred and seven to one hundred and two,) which was concurred in by the Senate, and thus became a law.

In 1824 five candidates for president were presented — Messrs. John Quincy Adams, Andrew Jackson, William H. Crawford, Henry Clay, and John C. Calhoun. The latter soon withdrew, and became a candidate for vice president, throwing his own strength into the Jackson scale. Mr. Crawford had been nominated by a meagre congressional caucus, and was thereupon commended as the regular republican candidate. The anti-caucus votes in the northern states were mainly concentrated on Mr. Adams; in the south and west on General Jackson. Mr. Clay was much the youngest of the candidates remaining in nomination, and received only the votes of Ohio, Kentucky, Missouri, and four from New York — thirty-seven in all. Six more would have carried him into the house, over which he presided, and where his popularity was unbounded. As it was, the constitutional candidates were Messrs. Adams, Jackson, and Crawford — the latter prostrate by a disease which soon after closed his mortal career. Mr. Clay and his friends were obliged to choose between Messrs. Adams and Jackson, neither of them personally acceptable to Mr. Clay, and the latter at bitter feud with him on account of Mr. Clay's unsparing denunciation of his course in invading Florida and capturing its chief posts without authority. Mr. Clay decided in favor of Mr. Adams, as he had months before informed Lafayette that he should do if compelled to choose between him and Jackson: so Lafayette testified in a letter to Mr. Clay written in 1832.

Mr. Clay's choice, and the consequent election of Adams, were deeply resented by the partisans of the disappointed candidates; and the acceptance of the office of secretary of state by the speaker (who bade adieu to the house on the 3d of March, 1825, never to return as a member) was made the pretext for a concerted outcry of "bargain and corruption" against him and the new president. The supporters of Jackson, Crawford, and Calhoun coalesced to form an opposition, which embarrassed Mr. Adams's administration throughout, controlled the action of Congress, and elected General Jackson president in 1828 by a large majority. Mr. Calhoun was rechosen vice president, and Mr. Clay retired to private life.

Mr. Clay was returned to the United States Senate in December, 1831, after an absence of more than twenty years, having been elected over Colonel Richard M. Johnson. He there advocated internal improvement, the recharter of the United States Bank, and a distribu-

Michigan, Mr. Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, Judge Douglass, of Illinois, Governor Marcy, of New York, and some other less prominent names, finally united in nominating General Franklin Pierce, of New Hampshire, for president, and Hon. William Rufus

King, of Alabama, for vice president. The first nomination was a surprise to the country and the world, General Pierce having never been named before for such a distinction, or made in any way so conspicuous as to be thought of in connection with it.

slavery, and improve the market for slaves; while New York and other states hostile to that policy were lost to Mr. Clay by the anti-Texas votes thrown away on James G. Birney. Mr. Polk received one hundred and seventy electoral votes, Mr. Clay one hundred and five. New York alone would have changed the result; and her electors were secured to Polk by a plurality of five thousand one hundred and six, while more than fifteen thousand votes were squandered on the Birney abolition ticket.

The annexation of Texas was the first result of Mr. Polk's election, accomplished even before he had nominally assumed the reins of government. The marching of troops down to the Rio Grande, in the heart of a Mexican province, and the consequent breaking out of hostilities, speedily and naturally followed. The protective tariff of 1842, under which the country had steadily and rapidly increased in industry, prosperity, and wealth, was overthrown, and the present ad valorem revenue tariff enacted in its stead — a tariff under which we are this day running in debt to Europe at least fifty millions per annum for iron and fabrics which we should have made for ourselves had the tariff of 1842 been left undisturbed. For whatever of disaster and demoralization has resulted or shall result from the career of aggression and lust of dominion on which the United States have now entered, the initial cause may be found in the defeat of Henry Clay in the presidential contest of 1844.

Mr. Clay remained in the Senate, where he proposed and carried the tariff compromise of 1834, and put forth his utmost exertions in opposition to the removal of the deposits, specie circular, and other arbitrary measures of General Jackson, but without success. In 1836 he was rechosen to the Senate, but was not a candidate for president. General Harrison received most of the anti-Jackson votes, but Mr. Webster took that of Massachusetts, and those of Georgia and Tennessee were thrown for Judge White, of Tennessee. Mr. Van Buren was elected by a majority over all; but the commercial disasters which speedily ensued rendered his administration a stormy one, with a dubious ascendancy in Congress. Mr. Clay's name, in connection with the presidency, was presented to the whig national convention which met at Harrisburg in December, 1839, and a very large plurality of the delegates favored his nomination; but a majority finally united on General Harrison, who was elected over Mr. Van Buren in November ensuing by a very great majority.

Mr. Clay still kept his seat in the Senate, and was its master spirit during the greater part of the memorable twenty-seventh Congress. The two successive bills chartering a new national bank, the bankrupt law, land distribution, &c., received his ardent support; and he was among the first to denounce the duplicity and treachery of the calamity whom the death of General Harrison had elevated to the presidency. On the 31st of March, 1842, believing that there was no further need of his remaining in the public service, he took a formal and affecting farewell of the Senate, and returned to his home, in Kentucky. He spent the two following winters in the south, mainly at New Orleans, returning in the spring of 1844 to the Southern Atlantic States, and writing from Raleigh, North Carolina, a letter in which he took ground strongly against the annexation of Texas — a measure then pending before the Senate on a treaty negotiated under the auspices of President Tyler and his foreign secretary, John C. Calhoun. Mr. Clay was unanimously nominated for president by the whig national convention which assembled at Baltimore in May, and the nomination was received with enthusiasm by the whigs of the Union. It was not destined, however, to be successful. The democratic national convention met at the same place four weeks later, and proceeded to throw over Mr. Van Buren, whom a majority of its members were pledged to support, and finally, after a stormy sitting or two, nominated James K. Polk, of Tennessee, formerly speaker of the house, a man of very moderate ability, but a fair stump speaker, of good personal character, and an unhesitating champion of annexation and every kindred measure. Mr. Van Buren had sealed his own doom by taking ground against annexation. Mr. Polk carried most of the Southern States, on the assumption that the acquisition of Texas would strengthen the power of slavery, and improve the market for slaves; while New York and other states hostile to that policy were lost to Mr. Clay by the anti-Texas votes thrown away on James G. Birney. Mr. Polk received one hundred and seventy electoral votes, Mr. Clay one hundred and five. New York alone would have changed the result; and her electors were secured to Polk by a plurality of five thousand one hundred and six, while more than fifteen thousand votes were squandered on the Birney abolition ticket.

The annexation of Texas was the first result of Mr. Polk's election, accomplished even before he had nominally assumed the reins of government. The marching of troops down to the Rio Grande, in the heart of a Mexican province, and the consequent breaking out of hostilities, speedily and naturally followed. The protective tariff of 1842, under which the country had steadily and rapidly increased in industry, prosperity, and wealth, was overthrown, and the present ad valorem revenue tariff enacted in its stead — a tariff under which we are this day running in debt to Europe at least fifty millions per annum for iron and fabrics which we should have made for ourselves had the tariff of 1842 been left undisturbed. For whatever of disaster and demoralization has resulted or shall result from the career of aggression and lust of dominion on which the United States have now entered, the initial cause may be found in the defeat of Henry Clay in the presidential contest of 1844.

Mr. Clay deprecated and condemned the war on Mexico throughout, and on the 13th of November, 1847, made a speech at Lexington, urging the abandonment of all projects of conquest, and the withdrawal of our armies from Mexico, as an earnest of our desire for peace. His recommendations were warmly responded to by the great mass of the whigs, and doubtless did much to hasten the negotiation of a treaty the following autumn. Meantime, his own most promising and beloved son, Henry Clay, Jr., had been killed at the battle of Buena Vista, as Lieutenant Colonel of the Kentucky regiment, February 22, 1847.

Four months thereafter, Mr. Clay, who had always been a believer in the Christian religion, and had often borne impressive testimony to its divine origin, united with the Protestant Episcopal church in Lexington, and received the rite of baptism.

During the winter and spring of 1848, Mr. Clay's name was again presented in connection with the whig nomination for the presidency, and was very warmly hailed by the great mass of the people; but the leading politicians, believing that the prejudice against him in the minds of a majority of the voters, however unjust, was rooted and invincible, were generally in favor of nominating General Taylor, who was accordingly selected as the whig standard bearer by the national convention which met at Philadelphia. General Taylor received one hundred and eleven votes on the first ballot to ninety-seven for Mr. Clay, and some eighty for General Scott, Mr. Webster, and others. General Taylor gained on every ballot till the fourth, when he was nominated by a decisive majority. Mr. Clay, considering that General Taylor had given no clear assurance of his devotion to whig principles, and had never consented to abide the choice of the convention, could not feel justified in rendering him an active support, but he peremptorily refused to allow his own name to be used in opposition.

Kentucky revised her state constitution in 1849, and Mr. Clay

The whig national convention was also held at Baltimore, on the 17th of the same month, having three prominent and highly distinguished candidates, President Fillmore, of New York, Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts, and General Winfield Scott, of made another effort to ingraft on it a gradual emancipation of slaves, but was again baffled.

Mr. Clay was reelected to the Senate in December, 1848, by the legislature of Kentucky, by a vote nearly or quite unanimous. He did not take his seat at the March session, called to act on General Taylor's appointments, but the opening of the regular session found him, despite his advanced age, erect, buoyant, and active, to an extent which few young men could exceed. His labors, through that long and memorable session, were unsurpassed, and his attempts to effect a compromise or adjustment of the perilous questions respecting slavery in the territories, the admission of California, &c., though baffled at the outset, were ultimately crowned with success. On the merits of these measures, taken as a whole, we here express no opinion; but that Mr. Clay believed in the existence of an imperative necessity for some such adjustment, and urged it under the impulse of an ardent patriotism, we cannot consider doubtful.

Mr. Clay served through the following session, (closing the thirty-first Congress,) urging upon Congress the duty of further protection to home industry, and making a gallant but unsuccessful struggle for the passage of a river and harbor improvement bill. He was defeated in this, not by votes, but by parliamentary strategy — by talking against time, until the session had been talked to death. He went home to Kentucky in the spring, remained at Ashland, in feeble health, through the warm season, and in December returned to Washington to die. His health was so broken and evidently failing that he scarcely took his seat in the Senate at all, and was soon obliged to keep his room, and ultimately his bed. Finally, after a protracted struggle between the native vigor of his constitution and the relentless progress of disease, his mortal career was closed by death a little before noon on the 28th of June, 1852.

* That President Fillmore and his secretary, Webster, should be candidates at the same time, while maintaining relations of cordial friendship and political confidence, may appear strange and inconsistent. It was owing, however, to the distracted state of the party, and neither of them felt at liberty to withdraw in favor of the other, lest a further distraction should ensue.

The following letter will explain Mr. Fillmore's position and views. It was written prior to the assembling of the convention, and placed in the hands of one of his friends, a delegate to the convention, to be read before that body whenever it should appear that its presentation could further the interests of the whig party. The letter was not read, because the opportunity contemplated did not, in the judgment of those who held it in custody, arise. But it stands an equally noble testimony now, for its patriotic author. Its sentiments are worthy of the man who has served his country with an administration only second to Washington's, — if second to that, — and they are all, in manliness, that we could desire from any man.

"WASHINGTON, June 10, 1852.

"To the President of the National Whig Convention.

"SIR: This communication will be presented to you, and through you to the delegated wisdom of the whig party over which you preside, by the Hon. George R. Babcock, who represents in your body the congressional district in which I reside.

"I trust that I shall be pardoned by the convention for adverting

New Jersey. The canvass was earnest and prolonged, and resulted in the nomination of General Scott for the presidency, and William A. Graham, of North Carolina, for vice president.*

The free soil democrats, who assembled in conven-briefly to the course which I have pursued and the causes which have induced it, as a means of explaining why I have selected this time and mode of making this communication.

"All must recollect that when I was so suddenly and unexpectedly called to the exalted station which I now occupy, by the death of my lamented and illustrious predecessor, there was a crisis in our public affairs full of difficulty and danger. The country was agitated by political and sectional passions and dissensions, growing out of the slavery and territorial questions then pending, and for which Congress had as yet been able to agree upon no measure of compromise and adjustment.

"The Union itself was threatened with dissolution, and patriots and statesmen looked with apprehension to the future. In that feeling I participated most profoundly. The difficulties and dangers which surrounded us were calmly but anxiously surveyed. I was oppressed by a sense of the great responsibilities that rested upon me, and sincerely distrusted my ability to sustain them in a manner satisfactory and useful to the country. But I was bound to make the attempt; and to do it with any hope of success, I felt it necessary to discard every personal consideration, and devote myself to the difficult task before me with entire singleness of heart.

"To prepare and strengthen myself for this task, I endeavored to lay aside, as far as practicable, every merely selfish consideration — to banish from my mind every local or sectional prejudice — and to remember only that I was an American citizen, and the magistrate of the American republic, bound to regard every portion and section of it with equal justice and impartiality. That I might do this the more effectually, I resolved within myself not to seek a reelection.

"Thus prepared, I entered upon the discharge of my official duties, with a determination to do every thing in my power to aid in the settlement of those dangerous controversies. Fortunately for our favored country, a majority in both houses of Congress, rising above mere party and personal considerations, nobly and patriotically devoted themselves to the great work of pacification. The constitutional advisers whom I had called to my aid, and to whose fidelity, talents, and patriotism the country is chiefly indebted for any benefit it may have received from my administration, with a unanimity and zeal worthy of every commendation, cordially gave their countenance and influence to the legislative department, in perfecting and adopting those healing measures of compromise, to which upon their passage I felt bound, by every consideration of public duty, to give my official approval. These laws being enacted, my constitutional duty was equally plain, to 'take care that they were faithfully executed.' But this I found the most painful of all my official duties. Nevertheless, I resolved to perform it, regardless of all consequences to myself; and in doing so, I determined to know no north and no south — and no friends but those who sustained the constitution and laws — and no enemies but those who opposed them.

"The gratifying result of this policy is before you and the country. The angry strife which for a time threatened to array state against state, and brother against brother, and deluge our happy land with fraternal blood, and desolate it with fire and sword, has fortunately passed away. The surging billows of sectional agitation are calmed, and the public mind is fast settling down to its accustomed tion at Pittsburg in August, had also several candidates, but, with little division of sentiment, nominated John P. Hale, of New Hampshire, for president, and George W. Julian, of Indiana, for vice president.

The campaign was an earnest and active one, and resulted in the success of the democratic candidates by very large majorities.

The death of Daniel Webster, which occurred at Marshfield, October 24, 1852, was the great absorbing event of this period. Endeared as he was to his family and friends, the loss to them was far less than to the public. It was, in the broadest sense of the phrase, a national calamity.

His health had failed during the summer from his severe public labors, and from the insidious progress channels, and will soon renew its wonted devotion to the constitution and the Union.

"Availing myself of this happy change, I had determined, when the present Congress met, to announce to the public, in my annual message, my previous resolution not to suffer my name to come before the national convention for a nomination. I accordingly prepared a paragraph to that effect, but was finally persuaded to strike it out, lest it might have an unfavorable influence upon the then pending election in Virginia. After that had passed, I concluded to withdraw my name by a published address to the people, and prepared one accordingly; but this coming to the knowledge of some of my friends, they represented to me that my withdrawal at that time would not only endanger the perpetuity of those measures which I deemed so essential to the peace and welfare of the country, but would sacrifice many friends who had stood by my administration in the dark and perilous crisis through which it had so recently passed. The first was an appeal to my patriotism, and the second to my gratitude. I could resist neither, and therefore yielded to their request, and consented that my name should remain where it was, until time should show, as I presumed it would, that its further use could neither benefit them nor the cause which we all had so much at heart. It was, however, distinctly understood that I could not consent to use any efforts to procure a nomination, but if one were freely and voluntarily tendered I should not be at liberty to decline it.

"The embarrassing question now presents itself, Who is to determine when the use of my name can no longer benefit my friends or our common cause? To assume to decide this myself, in advance of the convention, without consultation with those who have so generously sustained me, might be deemed by them unjust. To consult them is utterly impracticable, and to suffer my name to go into a contest for the nomination is contrary to my original intention, and utterly repugnant to my feelings. I have, therefore, without consultation with any one, felt justified in assuming the responsibility of authorizing and requesting Mr. Babcock, either before or after any vote may be taken in the convention, and whenever he shall be satisfied that I have discharged my duty to my friends and the country, to present this letter, and withdraw my name from the consideration of the convention.

"I trust that my friends will appreciate the necessity which compels me to act without consulting them. I would cheerfully make any personal sacrifice for their sakes or for the good of my country, but I have nothing to ask for myself. I yielded with sincere relucof an obscure disease in the liver, of long standing, but now accelerated by the shock received by the overturning of his carriage a few months previous.

His death was that of a philosopher and a Christian, or more appropriately that of a Christian philosopher, for while his transcendent intellect remained clear and strong to the last moment, mastering and controlling every subject it had to do with, his thoughts and regards were almost wholly centred upon the great themes of religion, and his own future life. The following, which he dictated to a friend about a fortnight before his death, with a request that it should be inscribed on his monument, may be taken as a summary of his dying thoughts.

tance to their entreaties to suffer my name to remain before the public as a possible candidate. I knew that it placed me in a false position. I foresaw that it would subject me to the base imputation of seeking a nomination, and of using the patronage of the government to obtain it, and then to the mortifying taunts from the same malignant source of having been defeated. But, conscious of my own integrity, I cheerfully consented to encounter all this, rather than that my friends should feel that I was indifferent, either to them or the cause; and I am most happy to avail myself of this occasion to return my sincere thanks, and to express the grateful emotions of my heart, to those friends of the country who have so generously and so nobly stood by the constitution and the Union, during the perilous scenes through which we have just passed. My sincere prayer is, that their country may cherish and reward them according to their merits.

"I hope and trust that my withdrawal may enable the convention to unite harmoniously upon some more deserving candidate; one who, if elected, may be more successful in winning and retaining the confidence of the party to which he is attached than I have been. Divided as we were, upon my accession to the presidency, on questions of vital importance, it was impossible for me to pursue a course which would satisfy all. I have not attempted it. I have sought more anxiously to do what was right than what would please; and I shall feel no disappointment at finding that my conduct has, in the estimation of a majority of the convention, rendered me an unavailable candidate. But it should at all times be a subject of felicitation to any man that he has been enabled to serve his country by sacrificing himself. This is a consequence which neither he nor his friends have any cause to regret; and I hope mine will view it in that light.

"For myself, permit me to add, I have no further aspirations. I feel that I have enjoyed much more of public honors than I deserved, and I shall soon retire from this exalted station with infinitely more satisfaction than I entered upon it, and with a heart grateful for the confidence which my countrymen have reposed in me — grateful for the indulgence with which they have received my humble efforts to serve them, and anxious only that they may be better served by my successor, and that our glorious Union and free institutions may be perpetual.

"I have the honor to be, sir,

"Your fellow-citizen and ob't. serv't,

"MILLARD FILLMORE."

“‘LORD, I BELIEVE; HELP THOU MINE UNBELIEF.’—Philosophical argument, especially that drawn from the vastness of the universe, in comparison with the apparent insignificance of this globe, has sometimes shaken my reason for the faith which is in me; but my heart has always assured and reassured me, that the gospel of Jesus Christ must be a divine reality. The Sermon on the Mount cannot be a merely human production. This belief enters into the depth of my conscience. The whole history of man proves it. — Daniel Webster.”

Mr. Everett has remarked, that “the bright developments of Mr. Webster’s public character, in a long

* DANIEL WEBSTER was born in Salisbury, New Hampshire, on the 18th of January, 1782. His great-great grandfather, Thomas Webster, migrated from Norfolk, England, and settled in Hampton, New Hampshire, in 1656, nearly two centuries ago. Ebenezer Webster, father of Daniel, born in 1739, was a pioneer in Salisbury, served with credit in the Rangers during the old French war, and in our revolutionary struggle fought at White Plains, and led a company gallantly in the battle of Bennington. After our independence was secured, he was chosen representative, senator, and finally a judge of common pleas, which office he held from 1791 to 1805. He died in 1806, aged sixty-seven.

Daniel Webster was cradled in poverty and early inured to labor, walking two miles and a half to common school in winter, and working on his father’s farm in summer. When fourteen, he was sent to the famous “Phillips Academy,” in Exeter, New Hampshire, and the next year to Dartmouth College, where he graduated with honor, taught an academy at Fryeburg, Maine, one year, and then betook himself to the study of law, first in Salisbury, and then in Boston, in the office of Christopher Gore, afterwards governor of Massachusetts; was admitted to the bar in 1805; practised a short time in Boscawen, New Hampshire; removing thence, in 1807, to Portsmouth, was married next year to Grace Fletcher, of Hopkinton, New Hampshire, by whom he had four children, of whom but one (Fletcher) survives him. The mother died suddenly, while on her way with her husband to Washington, late in 1827.

Mr. Webster remained nine years in Portsmouth, and there acquired an extensive practice and an enviable reputation. In 1812 he was for the first time a candidate for office, being nominated for Congress by the federalists of New Hampshire, and elected after a most vehement contest. (The state then chose its members by general ticket.) Though never before a member of a legislative body, he rose at once to a high rank among parliamentary debaters. He opposed the invasion of Canada, and all schemes of aggression and conquest, ardently advocated the enlargement of our navy, and the prosecution of the war on the ocean, but condemned the policy which had involved the country in hostilities, and urged an early peace. His house, with all its contents, was destroyed by fire during his absence at Washington, in January, 1814. He removed to Boston in August, 1816. His fame as a jurist was greatly increased by his defence of Dartmouth College against the assumptions of the legislature of New Hampshire to alter and modify its charter at pleasure—a claim which was sustained by the courts of New Hampshire, but overruled by the United States Supreme Court, on Mr. Webster’s argument, in March, 1818.

life of service, are wrought into the annals of the country. “Whoever shall write the history of the United States for the last forty years will write the life of Daniel Webster, and whoever writes the life of Daniel Webster, as it ought to be written, will write the history of the Union from the time he took a leading part in its concerns.” This is not mere eulogy, or the partial judgment of a friend. It is the sentiment of the world, and has been fully illustrated in the present history by the copious allusions we have been compelled to make to his exalted public services. A brief outline of a mind so gifted, and a life so useful, is necessary to complete our endeavor to do justice to this portion of the national history.*

He devoted himself assiduously to the law in Boston, refusing invitations to embark in politics, but serving as an elector of president, and then as member of the state constitutional convention, until, in 1822, he was persuaded to stand for Congress, and elected by a large majority. He took his seat in December, 1823, and immediately signalized himself by a proposition and speech looking to the recognition of Greece as an independent nation. He made, at the same session, the ablest free trade argument ever presented to Congress. It was overborne, however, by the speech of Mr. Clay in favor of protection, and the tariff bill of 1824 became a law. Mr. Webster was reelected without opposition in 1824, and would have been returned in 1826, but he was that year elected to the United States Senate, where he took his seat in January, 1828.

His speeches against Hayne, in 1829, on the right of a state to nullify an act of Congress, were the greatest intellectual achievements of his life. They may be said to have practically settled the question, so that, though nullification has since been threatened, no danger remains that it will ever be in earnest attempted.

Mr. Webster remained in the Senate till March 4, 1841, and was a leading participator in the discussions growing out of the attempted recharter of the United States Bank, tariff compromise of 1834, the removal of the deposits, the specie circular, the expunging resolution, &c. From an original free trader, he became a warm and impressive advocate of protection to home industry, regarding the policy of the country as settled by the acts of 1824 and 1828, and the interests thereby called into existence justly entitled to legislative support. He therefore opposed the tariff compromise of 1834, which nevertheless prevailed.

Upon General Harrison’s election to the presidency, Mr. Webster was called to the post of secretary of state, which he continued to hold after General Harrison’s death and Mr. Tyler’s accession, until late in 1842. During this time he negotiated with Lord Ashburton the treaty of Washington, by which the north-eastern boundary of Maine was settled. After retiring from the cabinet, he remained in private life till 1845, when he was again chosen to the Senate, on the retirement of Mr. Choate. He spoke, in 1846, in favor of the Oregon boundary treaty; in 1848, against the claim of the south to extend slavery into the new territories; and on the 7th of March, 1850, in favor of the adjustment of the territorial and slavery dispute by compromise, wherein the Wilmot proviso should be surrendered by the north as needless and irritating. He afterwards signalized himself by a zealous advocacy of the fugitive slave law.

Mr. Webster was first proposed for president in 1836, when Massachusetts gave him her electoral vote, but was seconded by no other

Mr. Webster was a great writer, an eminent lawyer, and a preëminent statesman. The talents requisite for eminence in any one of these departments do not necessarily fit a man for eminence, or even distinction, in another. They are rarely associated in one person. Mr. Webster was distinguished and peerless in all, and as such stands almost without a parallel in history.

From the commencement of his career, the two great functions of lawyer and statesman were constantly and most ably sustained together. An eminent leader in public affairs, and expected to be always foremost in every conflict, he was at the same time the acknowledged head of the American bar. A laborious and most successful devotee to his chosen profession, a safe counsellor, a powerful advocate, a manly but terrible opponent, a profound thinker, a thorough and diligent student of every case he undertook, rapid in his decisions, yet cautious in examining every point of evidence, comprehensive and far reaching in his views, bold and confident of a position once taken, with an open, manly, masterly address, and a logical force such as only comes from ascertained truth and absolute conviction,—he was seldom successfully opposed, and never vanquished. His lucid statement of his case, in which he was unrivalled, was often in itself an argument and a triumph. In his addresses to the jury he was frank, manly, and direct, never appealing to passion or prejudice, but always, and with convincing power, to reason and conscience. By the simple majesty of his manner, and the honest directness and force of his own inward convictions, conveyed in terms of studied clearness, he wrought an almost instant persuasion in his favor, and easily carried with him to the end the convinced and captivated judgment of his hearers. He could not argue a bad cause. "His mental vision was too penetrating and comprehensive, his logic too uncompromising, his perception of truth too clear, and his love of it too instinctive, to fit him as the champion of error." Where his convictions led the way, he was the mightiest of the mighty, and led all judgments captive. His arguments were often no less instructive to the court than convincing to the jury, and much of the prevailing law of the land is due to him as its ablest and best expounder. He touched no subject which he did not fully elucidate. To this end he always said precisely enough, and never a word too much. His ideas were so luminous, and his expression of them so full and clear, that they never needed to be repeated or reënfined. He never dallied with unimportant facts, or points of inferior magnitude, nor attempted to divert attention from the real merits of his case by irrelevant side issues. His reading was extensive, almost universal, though some of the "scholars" affect to underrate him in this respect. His learning was vast, accurate, and perfectly at command. His judgment was clear and controlling. His taste was refined, exalted, severe. His imagination was rich, almost to the height of genius, but ever subordinate to truth and reason. His illustrations were always and studiously luminous, and never merely ornamental. Of mere rhetorical flourishes he was totally ignorant. They would have encumbered the majestic march of his argument, as the drapery of the court or the saloon would encumber the progress of an army.

Mr. Webster's great field, even in the department of law, was that in which it verges towards and rests upon fundamental and constitutional law. His profound mind could rest only in first principles. He penetrated to the heart of the science, and was master of its deepest and most abstruse mysteries. "It was a fortunate—may we not say a providential?—circumstance, that the growth of the country began to devolve upon the Supreme Court of the United States the consideration of this class of questions just at the time when Mr. Webster, in his ripe manhood state. In 1848 his name was submitted to the whig national convention at Philadelphia, but his vote never reached thirty. In 1852 his name was again submitted to the whig national convention at Baltimore; but his highest vote on any ballot was thirty-three. It is understood that one hundred and six southern votes were ready to be cast for him whenever they would secure his nomination; but the opportunity was never presented.

In 1850, on the accession of Mr. Fillmore to the presidency, Mr. Webster was called again to the first place in the cabinet, which he continued to hold till his death. He left Washington in ill health during the summer of 1852, and retired to his country residence at Marshfield, Massachusetts, and soon after met with a severe injury by being thrown from a wagon. His health continued to decline until, on the 21st of October, his illness was felt to be dangerous, from which time he rapidly sank until his death, which occurred on Sunday morning, October 24, at a little before three o'clock. His last hours were irradiated by penitence, prayer, and the consolations of Christian faith and hope.

Thus lived and died the greatest man, intellectually, that America has yet produced—her most chaste and cogent orator, and her most accomplished and thoroughly qualified statesman. His Plymouth Rock and Bunker Hill orations, his replies to Hayne, and letter to Hulsemann, will live while our language is spoken, and the American people will do honor to his genius, his understanding, and his patriotism.

was able to give them the benefit of his extraordinary powers of argument and analysis. Previous to the Dartmouth College case, in 1818, not many important constitutional questions had come before the court; and since that time, the great lawyer, who then broke upon it with so astonishing a blaze of learning and logic, has exerted a commanding influence in shaping that system of constitutional law — almost a supplementary constitution — which has contributed so much to our happiness and prosperity.

"In the discussion of constitutional questions, the mind of this great man found a most congenial employment. Here, books, cases, and precedents are of comparatively little value. We must ascend to first principles, and be guided by the light of pure reason. Geometry itself hardly leads the mind into a region of more abstract and essential truth. In these calm heights of speculation and analysis, the genius of Mr. Webster moved with natural and majestic sweep.

"Mr. Webster's argument in the Dartmouth College case stands out among his other arguments, as his speech in reply to Hayne among his other speeches. No better argument has been spoken in the English tongue in the memory of any living man." Judge Story thus described the effect he then produced upon the court: "For the first hour we listened to him with perfect astonishment, for the second hour with perfect delight, and for the third hour with perfect conviction." It is not too much to say that he entered the court on that day a comparatively unknown name, and left it with no rival but Pinckney.

Of the speech in reply to Mr. Hayne, Judge Sprague, who was in the Senate at the time, has said, "A great vital question of constitutional law was by that speech settled as completely and irrevocably as it could have been by the greatest minds in the highest judicial tribunals.

"Mr. Webster evidently felt the magnitude of the occasion, and a consciousness that he was more than equal to it. On no other occasion, though I have heard him a hundred times, have I seen him so thoroughly aroused. Yet when he commenced, and throughout the whole, he was perfectly self-possessed and self-controlled. Never was his bearing more lofty, his person more majestic, his manner more appropriate and impressive.

"The value of that speech cannot be measured, without a just appreciation of our constitution and of republican government. Nullification had become formidable. It had been practically adopted in high places, and was sustained by several states and some of the ablest minds of the south, and was daily gaining strength as the offspring of the resolutions of '98. By this single effort that deadly heresy was prostrated and crushed forever.

"No speech, ancient or modern, has, within the same time, convinced so many minds, and produced so great and salutary results. It was not addressed merely to the enlightened and reflecting audience around him, but to this great reading nation, and to the civilized world. If the doctrines of General Hayne had prevailed, this Union would have been shattered into fragments; but Mr. Webster and his doctrines have triumphed, and our Union remains in all its magnificence and beneficence."

Mr. Webster's public career commenced with his election to Congress, from the city of Boston, in 1822. From that time till his death, with an interval of only two years, he was constantly in the public service, as representative, senator, or secretary of state.

Mr. Webster was a statesman in the largest and noblest sense of the word. He was no politician. He sought not his own, but his country's good. He had no narrow, sectional, or partisan views. "He knew no north, no south, no east, no west. His great mind and patriotic heart embraced the whole land, with all its interests and all its claims. No public man ever earned more fully the title of a national, an American statesman."

As a writer, but especially as a public speaker, Mr. Webster had no equal at home or abroad. He has been compared to Burke; but he is less elaborate, and far more massive, majestic, and enduring, yet never deficient in graceful flow or appropriate ornament. His political speeches are marked by a peculiar sagacity and a depth of practical wisdom which belong only and always to master minds. Yet with all his mighty reach of thought, his almost prophetic forecast, his comprehensive view of all the remoter bearings of his theme, and his instinctive perception of the inevitable conclusion, he easily and powerfully carried the common mind along with him; for his logic was as clear as it was compact, as simple and natural as it was vigorous and conclusive. He became so thoroughly master of his subject, that he easily and necessarily mastered his audience. "His occasional discourses and his diplomatic writings would alone make a great reputation." The latter are models of unqualified excellence, cautious yet firm, bold, decided, and full of energy, yet perfectly courteous, frank, and fair. Like the gallant knight in the tournament, he scorns to ask, and manfully refuses to yield, any thing that is not clearly and unquestionably right. In fact he seems to demand nothing, but to make the right so clear that it is yielded of necessity and without a demand. It is doubted if there are any "modern compositions which, in form and substance, embody so much of what we understand by the epithet Roman. Such, indeed, we may imagine the state papers of the Roman Senate to have been, in the best days of the republic."

The more than royal mind of this majestic man was fitly tenanted in a frame of massive and commanding proportions. He bore the unmistakable impress of greatness in his personal appearance. His figure was large, but admirably symmetrical. His head was capacious and finely developed, with a noble amplitude of brow, which betokened the largest possession of the reflective and rational faculties. The deep overhanging eyebrow gave to the dark, penetrating, eagle eye beneath, a commanding intensity of power, which none who approached him failed to recognize and acknowledge. Take him all in all, "he was probably the grandest looking man of his time."

In his private relations Mr. Webster commanded the confidence and respect and won the affection of all who knew him. He was a kind husband, an indulgent father, a dutiful, exemplary son, a generous friend, and an excellent neighbor. He had many friends, but no enemies. Even among his strongest political opponents, he was held in the highest esteem and regard — a sentiment which he amply repaid by cherishing no personal political animosities himself. His great southern antagonist, Mr. Calhoun, with whom he was brought into most direct collision, was always a personal friend, and remarked, towards the close of his life, that, of all the leading men of the day, "there was not one whose political course had been more strongly marked by a strict regard to truth and honor than Mr. Webster's." It was in this spirit of true greatness that Mr. Webster gave his last directions to Mr. Everett respecting a new edition of his works, to be issued under the editorial supervision of that gentleman. "My friend," said he, "I wish to perpetuate no feuds. I have lived a life of strenuous political warfare. I have sometimes, though rarely, and that in self-defence, been led to speak of others with severity. I beg you, where you can do it without wholly changing the character of the speech, and thus doing essential injustice to me, to obliterate every trace of personality of this kind. I should prefer not to leave a word that would give unnecessary pain to any honest man, however opposed to me." In the same magnanimous spirit he lent some of his best and most gigantic efforts to support what he deemed a correct position of an administration of which he was the ablest and most dreaded opposer. Of this character was his mighty conflict with Hayne, sustaining the views and determinations of General Jackson, and enabling his administration easily and effectually to crush the outbreaking spirit of nullification. In the same spirit he uttered his great speech of the 7th of March, defending and advocating the compromise measures of 1850, and thereby sacrificing and knowingly sacrificing, a large portion of well-earned popularity at the north.

Mr. Webster's greatness was so unmatched and unapproachable, and so nobly free from even the semblance of arrogance or presumption, that it was always and every where admitted, not only without jealousy, but with cordial and profound delight. Mr. Fillmore always took a generous pleasure in speaking of him, on all appropriate occasions, as the right arm of his administration, his best and perfect reliance in all the complicated difficulties of the high office he was called to fill.

Mr. Webster was an ardent lover of nature, the open volume of whose works he studied with great delight. An enthusiastic sportsman, an amateur agriculturist, a passionate admirer of animal life and beauty, as well as of natural scenery, he spent in the country all the time he could spare from the arduous and engrossing cares of public life, and enjoyed in retirement infinitely more than office, station, or power was capable of conferring.

At the opening of the thirty-second Congress, President Fillmore reiterated such of his former recommendations as had not been acted upon, urging especially a modification of the tariff, the establishment of an agricultural bureau, and appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors. On the latter subject he succeeded so far in overcoming the hostility of its opponents as to procure the passage of a bill for the construction of a canal around the Falls of St. Mary. This work has been prosecuted with great success, and is now in such a state of progress towards completion, that it will be opened to navigation early in the coming spring, (1855.)*

The frequent attempts which had been made by various parties to gain forcible possession of the Island of Cuba, and revolutionize its government, and the manifest inability of Spain, alone and unassisted, to defend the coveted colony against any thing like a serious invasion, induced the governments of Great Britain and France, early in 1852, to propose to that of the United States to become a party with them to a tripartite convention, in virtue of which the three powers should severally and collectively disclaim, now and for the future, all intention to obtain possession

* The following letter from a correspondent of the Utica Herald will give some idea of this great national work, and illustrate the absurdity of the opposition to internal improvements:—

"The waters of Lake Superior find their way into Lake Huron through St. Mary's River. This river is about sixty-three miles long; at some places spreading out into little lakes, at others, rushing through narrow rapids or winding around beautiful islands. Its entire length is navigable by vessels drawing eight feet of water up to within one mile of Lake Superior. At this point navigation is arrested by the falls—the 'Sault' of the river.

"These falls or rapids are best described by saying that they are somewhat like the rapids of Niagara, but instead of rushing into an abyss, gradually subsiding into the quiet flow of a broad river, so that steamboats may run into the very foot of the rapids, and the frail bark canoe of the adventurous and skilful half-breed dash far up among them in pursuit of the white fish. These rapids are broken up into several different channels, and among them are scattered little islands, such as you see at Niagara, and like them bristling with cedars in all possible attitudes.

"At this point, on the American side, is the little village of the Sault—an old settlement in the State of Michigan, founded by the Jesuits about two centuries ago. It has evidently seen and felt nothing of the great progress which has been building up cities and states. Here is to be seen the native owner of the soil and the half-breed, (a cross of the French and Indian blood) and here, too, are the shops of the full-blooded Yankee, who buys and sells bead and birch bark work and white fish. On the British side of the river is the agency of the Hudson Bay Company—an old-fashioned building, looking as firm and substantial as the company itself.

"Above these rapids, and where Lake Superior empties into the river, may be seen a few steamers, which have been hauled over land from below.

"Hitherto vessels which have come from Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit, and Chicago, to the Sault, have been compelled to unload there and return, while the goods destined for Lake Superior have been drawn by horse power over a railroad to the upper end of the rapids, and then loaded on the few vessels which have been hauled into the lake. Thus the waters of the largest fresh water lake in the world, whose shores are loaded with mineral wealth, more desirable than the gold of California, have been locked up from the trade of New York, Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, and Wisconsin, by less than a mile of rapids. To remedy this, Congress offered to the State of Michigan 750,000 acres of land, if she would construct a ship canal around these rapids; and the State of Michigan has contracted to give these lands, free of taxation, for five years, to Erastus Corning of the Island of Cuba, and bind themselves to discountenance all attempts to that effect, on the part of any power or individual whatever. This invitation was promptly declined by the president, for reasons assigned in the correspondence, and accompanied with the strongest assurances that the United States not only "entertained no designs against Cuba," but "would regard its incorporation into the Union, at the present time, as fraught with serious peril."

In his annual message to Congress of this year, the president gave expression to the following views, as those which he supposed to prevail in the public mind: "Were this island comparatively destitute of and others, in consideration that they build the canal by the 19th of May next.

"This is now completed, or so nearly so that it is not amiss to speak of it as finished. The contract time in which to do the work was so short that it was supposed impossible, and many anticipated an application to the legislature for an extension of time; but the contractors have already done more than they contracted to do, and the opening of navigation next spring will open seventeen hundred miles of new coast to our trade.

"It is an interesting and important question, what state will reap the largest harvest from the opening of this wide mineral world; Michigan or Illinois, Detroit or Chicago, New York or Ohio, Buffalo or Cleveland? Detroit has apparently the advantage, but Chicago intends to win it from her if possible. The work is, in every sense, a national one; national in its objects, and in size and style superior to any of its kind on this continent.

"The locks are supposed to be the largest in the world. You can most readily judge of their size when I tell you that the main building of the steam cotton factory in West Utica could be placed in either of them, and the gates closed upon it without touching it; that the City Hall in the Park in the city of New York, if it is, as I understand, two hundred and sixteen feet in length, might have one hundred and thirty feet added to it, and still be locked through; that the combined length of the two sides and wings of the two locks together is nearly one third of a mile in length, all of solid masonry, twenty-five feet high, ten feet thick at the base, with buttresses six feet in width at every twelve feet, all faced with cut white limestone, equal if not superior to the best of this state. The gates of these locks are each forty feet wide, or twice as wide as an entire lock on the Erie Canal. Each gate is suspended and held in place like a suspension bridge, weighing many tons, and yet moved with ease by the strength of one man.

"The canal is one hundred feet wide at top of water, and one hundred and fifteen feet wide at top of its banks. The depth of water in it is twelve feet. The main body of the canal is excavated through rock, and walled up with such slope walls as the Erie Canal cannot boast of. To protect this work large caisson gates are thrown across the canal above and below locks, supported by strong and handsome masonry.

"There is no instance on record in which land appropriated by the general government has been so honestly applied or made to accomplish so much.

"The work has been accomplished in an unprecedentedly short time, and in the face of difficulties which no ordinary energy or capital could have overcome."

inhabitants, or occupied by a kindred race, I should regard it, if voluntarily ceded by Spain, as a most desirable acquisition. But under existing circumstances I should look upon its incorporation into our Union as a very hazardous measure. It would bring into the confederacy a population of a different national stock, speaking a different language, and not likely to harmonize with the other members. It would probably affect in a prejudicial manner the industrial interests of the south; and it might revive those conflicts of opinion between the different sections of the country which lately shook the Union to its centre, and which have been so happily compromised."

The following correspondence, commenced by the representatives of England and France with Mr. Webster, and concluded after his death by Mr. Everett, on the part of the United States, will present the subject in all its bearings, and explain the precise position in which it now stands.

From the preceding summary it will be seen that the brief and peaceful administration of Mr. Fillmore was by no means barren or uneventful. It was a period of marked progress in some of the great principles of constitutional government. It was an administration of distinguished ability and power, as well as of great purity and moral weight. And Mr. Fillmore descended from the exalted station to which he was so unexpectedly raised, with the entire confidence and respect of all parties. Many even of those who opposed on political grounds his election as vice president, would have cordially supported him had he been a candidate for reelection to the presidency.

"John F. Crampton, Esq., to the Hon. Daniel Webster.

"WASHINGTON, July 8, 1852.

"SIR: In reply to the note which I had the honor of addressing to you on the 23d of April last, communicating to you a project for a convention respecting the Island of Cuba, together with a copy of the instructions with which I have been furnished in regard to this matter by her majesty's principal secretary of state for foreign affairs, you addressed to me a note, dated the 29th of April last, by which you assured me that the subject of the communication I had made would be taken into consideration by the president of the United States, and would receive his serious attention.

"Two months have, however, now elapsed; and it may therefore now be proper that I should request you to enable me to inform her majesty's government of the views and intentions of the government of the United States in regard to the proposition which I had the honor of addressing to you, and by which the government of the United States is invited to join her majesty's government and the government of France in a declaration, which the two latter governments have agreed to make, of a renunciation on their part of all intention of becoming possessed, under whatever circumstances and by whatever means, of the Island of Cuba. I would also avail myself of this opportunity to recall your attention to the verbal remarks which, together with the minister of France, I submitted to your consideration in support of the proposal, in the conversation which the Count de Sartiges and myself had the honor of holding with you on that subject. These remarks were, I trust, calculated to place the matter in its true point of view, and to remove any misapprehension which might arise, in whatever quarter, in regard to the acts or to the language of any of the three governments in relation to it.

"And first in respect to the right of possession and sovereignty. The Island of Cuba is a province of Spain by the clearest of all titles—discovery and uninterrupted possession. Spain is determined to preserve her dominion over the province; and the Spanish subjects who inhabit it show no disposition to sever their connection with the mother country. This right of possession cannot be disputed, nor has it been disputed; and it gives me satisfaction to remark that the government of the United States has on all occasions professed its respect for the validity of the title. It is not, consequently, the simple acknowledgment of the validity of this title which her majesty's government propose by the declaration which they desire to make simultaneously and in concert with the governments of the United States and of France. The object of her majesty's government is to guard against future contingencies, and to put an end to a state of things far from satisfactory as regards the friendly relations of Spain with other powers respecting Cuba, and of great delicacy as it affects the relations of the principal maritime powers between themselves.

"There is at the present time an evident tendency in the maritime commerce of the world to avail itself of the shorter passages from one ocean to another offered by the different routes existing or in contemplation across the isthmus of Central America. The Island of Cuba, of considerable importance in itself, is so placed geographically that the nation which may possess it, if the naval forces of that nation should be considerable, might either protect or obstruct the the commercial routes from one ocean to the other. Now, if the maritime powers are, on the one hand, out of respect to the rights of Spain, and from a sense of her international duty, bound to dismiss all intention of obtaining possession of Cuba, so, on the other hand, are they obliged, out of consideration for the interests of their own subjects or citizens, and the protection of the commerce of other nations, who are all entitled to the use of the great highways of commerce on equal terms, to proclaim and assure, as far as in them lies, the present and future neutrality of the Island of Cuba. Great Britain has omitted no opportunity of manifesting in regard to Cuba her respect for the sovereign rights of Spain, and her disinterestedness in regard to the present and the future political position of that important colony. France has, by acts of the same nature, evinced similar sentiments and views; and the United States themselves have, on several occasions, declared that they could not acquiesce in the cession of Cuba to a European power. This declaration of the United States partakes of the same nature as that which Great Britain and France propose to the American government to embody in an official act — with this difference, however, that the British and French governments, while they declare that they would not acquiesce in the cession of Cuba to any maritime power, also declare that they entirely renounce all views upon that island, both now and hereafter, for themselves. I do not doubt that the government of the United States is actuated by the same motives, in making its declaration, which have impelled the British and French governments to make theirs. The word ‘European,’ however, in juxtaposition with the word ‘power,’ might justify, on the part of the latter two governments, some doubt as to the signification of the declaration of the United States; and it might be thought that the United States, while by their declaration they exclude other nations from profiting by the chances of future possible events, have not debarred themselves by that declaration from availing themselves of such events. Between powers such as Great Britain, the United States, and France, it could never be intended to give to political acts or language any other meaning than that which those acts or that language would clearly convey. A concurrence by the United States in the joint declaration, the project of which I had the honor of communicating to you on the 23d of April last, would prevent the possibility of the misapprehension to which I have alluded; and the true signification of the declarations made by England, the United States, and France, would thus be exactly defined. It is highly desirable, for the reasons which I have given above, that the question of the future position of Cuba should be definitively determined; and it is desirable that this determination should assure the permanent neutrality of the island, among others, for the following reasons: —

“You are, no doubt, aware that British and French subjects, as well as the French government, are, on different accounts, creditors of Spain for large sums of money. The expense of keeping up an armed force in the Island of Cuba of 25,000 men is heavy, and obstructs the government of Spain in the efforts which they make to fulfil their pecuniary engagements. By putting an end to the state of apprehension which is the cause of those armaments, we should increase to Spain the means of meeting those engagements. This consideration is, no doubt, applicable more particularly to Spain, to England, and to France. But there are others which apply more generally to the commercial interests of all nations, and especially to the commercial interests of the United States, which are greater than those of any other nation in Cuba. One of these considerations is, that, in the present state of things, we cannot reasonably expect Spain to take any measure towards lowering her tariff at Havana — a tariff, the high rates of which are a subject of complaint in the United States; and this circumstance has not unfrequently been put forward as an excuse for unauthorized aggressions against the Spanish authorities in the island. But if, by the guaranty of quiet possession which the proposed declaration of the great maritime powers would confer, Spain should be enabled to diminish her military force in Cuba, she might probably be induced to relieve foreign commerce there from the charges which now press upon it; and of this foreign commerce, as I have already observed, the United States have by far the largest share.

“In conclusion, the project of a convention which I have had the honor of presenting to you consists of a single article, and has but two objects in view — the one, a mutual renunciation of the future possession of Cuba; the other, an engagement to cause this renunciation to be respected. Both of these objects seem to have been matters which have already attracted the attention of the American government. Decisive measures, indeed, for the preservation of the sovereignty of Cuba to Spain have been contemplated by the government of the United States on several occasions. Among others, at the time when a report was in circulation (although without foundation) that a Spanish general intended retiring to Cuba, and there declaring himself independent of Spain, under the protection of one of the great maritime powers, the government of the United States did not hesitate to offer to the Spanish government the assistance of their forces, both naval and military, in resisting any such attempt.

"On the present occasion, Great Britain and France do not propose to the United States to do more in concert with them than the United States themselves offered to do alone on the occasion I allude to; for the project of a convention which I have had the honor of submitting to you proposes that the three contracting powers should engage themselves to 'discountenance and prevent, as far as in them lies,' &c., and consequently would not engage any one of the three governments to do more than their respective constitutions may authorize. This will, it is hoped, facilitate the adoption by the government of the United States of the project, and enable the government of the United States, by associating themselves with those of Great Britain and France in this important declaration, to secure the future tranquillity of the commerce of the world in those seas, to discourage illegal enterprises against Cuba, and to draw closer the bonds of amity which bind the United States to Great Britain, as well as to France and Spain.

"I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to you, sir, the assurance of my high consideration.

"JOHN F. CRAMPTON."

The letter of the French minister was of precisely the same import, and Mr. Everett's answer was addressed to that gentleman.

"Mr. Everett to the Comte de Sartiges.

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

"WASHINGTON, December 1, 1852.

"SIR: You are well acquainted with the melancholy circumstances which have hitherto prevented a reply to the note which you addressed to my predecessor on the 8th of July.

"That note, and the instruction of M. de Turgot of the 31st of March, with a similar communication from the English minister, and the projet of a convention between the three powers relative to Cuba, have been among the first subjects to which my attention has been called by the president.

"The substantial portion of the proposed convention is expressed in a single article in the following terms: 'The high contracting parties hereby severally and collectively disclaim, now and for hereafter, all intention to obtain possession of the Island of Cuba; and they respectively bind themselves to discountenance all attempt to that effect on the part of any power or individuals whatever.'

"'The high contracting parties declare, severally and collectively, that they will not obtain or maintain for themselves, or for any one of themselves, any exclusive control over the said island, nor assume nor exercise any dominion over the same.'

"The president has given the most serious attention to this proposal, to the notes of the French and British ministers accompanying it, and to the instructions of M. de Turgot and the Earl of Malmesbury, transmitted with the project of the convention; and he directs me to make known to you the view which he takes of this important and delicate subject.

"The president fully concurs with his predecessors, who have on more than one occasion authorized the declaration referred to by M. de Turgot and Lord Malmesbury, that the United States could not see with indifference the Island of Cuba fall into the possession of any other European government than Spain; not, however, because we should be dissatisfied with any natural increase of territory and power on the part of France or England. France has, within twenty years, acquired a vast domain on the northern coast of Africa, with a fair prospect of indefinite extension. England, within half a century, has added very extensively to her empire. These acquisitions have created no uneasiness on the part of the United States.

"In like manner, the United States have, within the same period, greatly increased their territory. The largest addition was that of Louisiana, which was purchased from France. These accessions of territory have probably caused no uneasiness to the great European powers, as they have been brought about by the operation of natural causes, and without any disturbance of the international relations of the principal states. They have been followed, also, by a great increase of mutually beneficial commercial intercourse between the United States and Europe.

"But the case would be different in reference to the transfer of Cuba from Spain to any other European power. That event could not take place without a serious derangement of the international system now existing, and it would indicate designs in reference to this hemisphere which could not but awaken alarm in the United States.

"We should view it in somewhat the same light in which France and England would view the acquisition of some important island in the Mediterranean by the United States, with this difference, it is true: that the attempt of the United States to establish themselves in Europe would be a novelty, while the appearance of a European power in this part of the world is a familiar fact. But this difference in the two cases is merely historical, and would not diminish the anxiety which, on political grounds, would be caused by any great demonstration of European power in a new direction in America.

"M. de Turgot states that France could never see with indifference the possession of Cuba by any power but Spain, and explicitly declares that she has no wish or intention of appropriating the island to herself; and the English minister makes the same avowal on behalf of his government. M. de Turgot and Lord Malmesbury do the government of the United States no more than justice in remarking that they have often pronounced themselves substantially in the same sense. The president does not covet the acquisition of Cuba for the United States; at the same time, he considers the condition of Cuba as mainly an American question. The proposed convention proceeds on a different principle. It assumes that the United States have no other or greater interest in the question than France or England; whereas it is necessary only to cast one's eye on the map to see how remote are the relations of Europe, and how intimate those of the United States with this island.

"The president, doing full justice to the friendly spirit in which his concurrence is invited by France and England, and not insensible to the advantages of a good understanding between the three powers in reference to Cuba, feels himself, nevertheless, unable to become a party to the proposed compact, for the following reasons:—

"It is, in the first place, in his judgment, clear (as far as the respect due from the executive to a coördinate branch of the government will permit him to anticipate its decision) that no such convention would be viewed with favor by the Senate. Its certain rejection by that body would leave the question of Cuba in a more unsettled position than it is now. This objection would not require the president to withhold his concurrence from the convention if no other objection existed, and if a strong sense of the utility of the measure rendered it his duty, as far as the executive action is concerned, to give his consent to the arrangement. Such, however, is not the case.

"The convention would be of no value unless it were lasting: accordingly its terms express a perpetuity of purpose and obligation. Now, it may well be doubted whether the constitution of the United States would allow the treaty-making power to impose a permanent disability on the American government for all coming time, and prevent it, under any future change of circumstances, from doing what has been so often done in times past. In 1803 the United States purchased Louisiana of France; and in 1819 they purchased Florida of Spain. It is not within the competence of the treaty-making power in 1852 effectually to bind the government in all its branches; and, for all coming time, not to make a similar purchase of Cuba. A like remark, I imagine, may be made even in reference both to France and England, where the treaty-making power is less subject than it is with us to the control of other branches of the government.

"There is another strong objection to the proposed agreement. Among the oldest traditions of the federal government is an aversion to political alliances with European powers. In his memorable farewell address, President Washington says, 'The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop.' President Jefferson, in his inaugural address in 1801, warned the country against 'entangling alliances.'

This expression, now become proverbial, was unquestionably used by Mr. Jefferson in reference to the alliance with France of 1778—an alliance, at the time, of incalculable benefit to the United States; but which, in less than twenty years, came near involving us in the wars of the French revolution, and laid the foundation of heavy claims upon Congress, not extinguished to the present day. It is a significant coincidence, that the particular provision of the alliance which occasioned these evils was that under which France called upon us to aid her in defending her West Indian possessions against England. Nothing less than the unbounded influence of Washington rescued the Union from the perils of that crisis, and preserved our neutrality.

“But the president has a graver objection to entering into the proposed convention. He has no wish to disguise the feeling that the compact, although equal in its terms, would be very unequal in substance. France and England, by entering into it, would disable themselves from obtaining possession of an island remote from their seats of government, belonging to another European power, whose natural right to possess it must always be as good as their own—a distant island in another hemisphere, and one which by no ordinary or peaceful course of things could ever belong to either of them. If the present balance of power in Europe should be broken up, if Spain should become unable to maintain the island in her possession, and France and England should be engaged in a death struggle with each other, Cuba might then be the prize of the victor. Till these events all take place, the president does not see how Cuba can belong to any European power but Spain.

“The United States, on the other hand, would, by the proposed convention, disable themselves from making an acquisition which might take place without any disturbance of existing foreign relations, and in the natural order of things. The Island of Cuba lies at our doors. It commands the approach to the Gulf of Mexico, which washes the shores of five of our states. It bars the entrance of that great river which drains half the North American continent, and with its tributaries forms the largest system of internal water communication in the world. It keeps watch at the doorway of our intercourse with California by the Isthmus route. If an island like Cuba, belonging to the Spanish crown, guarded the entrance of the Thames and the Seine, and the United States should propose a convention like this to France and England, those powers would assuredly feel that the disability assumed by ourselves was far less serious than that which we asked them to assume.

“The opinions of American statesmen at different times, and under varying circumstances, have differed as to the desirableness of the acquisition of Cuba by the United States. Territorially and commercially it would, in our hands, be an extremely valuable possession. Under certain contingencies it might be almost essential to our safety. Still, for domestic reasons, on which, in a communication of this kind, it might not be proper to dwell, the president thinks that the incorporation of the island into the Union at the present time, although effected with the consent of Spain, would be a hazardous measure; and he would consider its acquisition by force, except in a just war with Spain, (should an event so greatly to be deprecated take place,) as a disgrace to the civilization of the age.

“The president has given ample proof of the sincerity with which he holds these views. He has thrown the whole force of his constitutional power against all illegal attacks upon the island. It would have been perfectly easy for him, without any seeming neglect of duty, to allow projects of a formidable character to gather strength by connivance. No amount of obloquy at home, no embarrassments caused by the indiscretions of the colonial government of Cuba, have moved him from the path of duty in this respect. The captain general of that island, an officer apparently of upright and conciliatory character, but probably more used to military command than the management of civil affairs, has, on a punctilio in reference to the purser of a private steamship, (who seems to have been entirely innocent of the matters laid to his charge,) refused to allow passengers and the mails of the United States to be landed from a vessel having him on board. This certainly is a very extraordinary mode of animadverting upon a supposed abuse of the liberty of the press by the subject of a foreign government in his native country. The captain general is not permitted by his government, three thousand miles off, to hold any diplomatic intercourse with the United States. He is subject in no degree to the direction of the Spanish minister at Washington; and the president has to choose between a resort to force, to compel the abandonment of this gratuitous interruption of commercial intercourse, (which would result in war,) and a delay of weeks and months, necessary for a negotiation with Madrid, with all the chances of the most deplorable occurrences in the interval—and all for a trifle, that ought to have admitted a settlement by an exchange of notes between Washington and the Havana. The president has, however, patiently submitted to these evils, and has continued faithfully to give to Cuba the advantages of those principles of the public law under the shelter of which she has departed, in this case, from the comity of nations. But the incidents to which I allude, and which are still in train, are among many others which point decisively to the expediency of some change in the relations of Cuba; and the president thinks that the influence of France and England with Spain would be well employed in inducing her so to modify the administration of the government of Cuba as to afford the means of some prompt remedy for evils of the kind alluded to, which have done much to increase the spirit of unlawful enterprise against the island.

“That a convention such as is proposed would be a transitory arrangement, sure to be swept away by the irresistible tide of affairs in a new country, is, to the apprehension of the president, too obvious to require a labored argument. The project rests on principles applicable, if at all, to Europe, where international relations are, in their basis, of great antiquity, slowly modified, for the most part, in the progress of time and events; and not applicable to America, which, but lately a waste, is filling up with intense rapidity, and adjusting on natural principles those territorial relations which, on the first discovery of the continent, were in a good degree fortuitous.

“The comparative history of Europe and America, even for a single century, shows this. In 1752, France, England, and Spain, were not materially different in their political position in Europe from what they now are. They were ancient, mature, consolidated states, established in their relations with each other and the rest of the world—the leading powers of Western and Southern Europe. Totally different was the state of things in America. The United States had no existence as a people; a line of English colonies, not numbering much over a million of inhabitants, stretched along the coast. France extended from the Bay of St. Lawrence to the Gulf of Mexico, and from the Alleghanies to the Mississippi; beyond which, westward, the continent was a wilderness, occupied by wandering savages, and subject to a conflicting and nominal claim on the part of France and Spain. Every thing in Europe was comparatively fixed; every thing in America provisional, incipient, and temporary, except the law of progress, which is as organic and vital in the youth of states as of individual men. A struggle between the provincial authorities of France and England for the possession of a petty stockade at the confluence of the Monongahela and Alleghany, kindled the seven years' war; at the close of which the great European powers, not materially affected in their relations at home, had undergone astonishing changes on this continent. France had disappeared from the map of America, whose inmost recesses had been penetrated by her zealous missionaries and her resolute and gallant adventurers; England had added the Canadas to her transatlantic dominions; Spain had become the mistress of Louisiana, so that, in the language of the Archbishop of Mexico, in 1770, she claimed Siberia as the northern boundary of New Spain.

“Twelve years only from the treaty of Paris elapsed, and another great change took place, fruitful of still greater changes to come. The American revolution broke out. It involved France, England, and Spain in a tremendous struggle; and at its close the United States of America had taken their place in the family of nations. In Europe, the ancient states were restored substantially to their former equilibrium; but a new element, of incalculable importance in reference to territorial arrangements, is henceforth to be recognized in America.

“Just twenty years from the close of the war of the American revolution, France, by a treaty with Spain,—of which the provisions have never been disclosed,—possessed herself of Louisiana, but did so only to cede it to the United States; and in the same year Lewis and Clark started on their expedition to plant the flag of the United States on the shores of the Pacific. In 1819 Florida was sold by Spain to the United States, whose territorial possessions in this way had been increased threefold in half a century. This last acquisition was so much a matter of course that it had been distinctly foreseen by the Count Aranda, then prime minister of Spain, as long ago as 1783.

"But even these momentous events are but the forerunners of new territorial revolutions still more stupendous. A dynastic struggle between the Emperor Napoleon and Spain, commencing in 1808, convulsed the Peninsula. The vast possessions of the Spanish crown on this continent, — viceroyalties and captain generalships, filling the space between California and Cape Horn, — one after another asserted their independence. No friendly power in Europe, at that time, was able, or, if able, was willing, to succor Spain, or aid her to prop the crumbling buttresses of her colonial empire. So far from it, when France, in 1823, threw an army of one hundred thousand men into Spain to control her domestic politics, England thought it necessary to counteract the movement by recognizing the independence of the Spanish provinces in America. In the remarkable language of the distinguished minister of the day, in order to redress the balance of power in Europe, he called into existence a new world in the west — somewhat overrating, perhaps, the extent of the derangement in the old world, and not doing full justice to the position of the United States in America, or their influence on the fortunes of their sister republics on this continent.

"Thus, in sixty years from the close of the seven years' war, Spain, like France, had lost the last remains of her once imperial possessions on this continent. The United States, meantime, were, by the arts of peace and the healthful progress of things, rapidly enlarging their dimensions and consolidating their power.

"The great march of events still went on. Some of the new republics, from the effect of a mixture of races, or the want of training in liberal institutions, showed themselves incapable of self-government. The province of Texas revolted from Mexico by the same right by which Mexico revolted from Spain. At the memorable battle of San Jacinto, in 1836, she passed the great ordeal of nascent states, and her independence was recognized by this government, by France, by England, and other European powers. Mainly peopled from the United States, she sought naturally to be incorporated into the Union. The offer was repeatedly rejected by Presidents Jackson and Van Buren, to avoid a collision with Mexico.

At last the annexation took place. As a domestic question, it is no fit subject for comment in a communication to a foreign minister; as a question of public law, there never was an extension of territory more naturally or justifiably made.

"It produced a disturbed relation with the government of Mexico; war ensued, and in its results other extensive territories were, for a large pecuniary compensation on the part of the United States, added to the Union. Without adverting to the divisions of opinion which arose in reference to this war, as must always happen in free countries in reference to great measures, no person surveying these events with the eye of a comprehensive statesmanship can fail to trace in the main result the undoubted operation of the law of our political existence. The consequences are before the world. Vast provinces, which had languished for three centuries under the leaden sway of a stationary system, are coming under the influences of an active civilization. Freedom of speech and the press, the trial by jury, religious equality, and representative government, have been carried by the constitution of the United States into extensive regions in which they were unknown before. By the settlement of California, the great circuit of intelligence round the globe is completed. The discovery of the gold of that region — leading, as it did, to the same discovery in Australia — has touched the nerves of industry throughout the world. Every addition to the territory of the American Union has given homes to European destitution and gardens to European want. From every part of the United Kingdom, from France, from Switzerland and Germany, and from the extremest north of Europe, a march of immigration has been taken up, such as the world has never seen before. Into the United States — grown to their present extent in the manner described — but little less than half a million of the population of the old world is annually pouring, to be immediately incorporated into an industrious and prosperous community, in the bosom of which they find political and religious liberty, social position, employment, and bread. It is a fact which would defy belief, were it not the result of official inquiry, that the immigrants to the United States from Ireland alone, besides having subsisted themselves, have sent back to their kindred, for the three last years, nearly five millions of dollars annually; thus doubling in three years the purchase money of Louisiana.

"Such is the territorial development of the United States in the past century. Is it possible that Europe can contemplate it with an unfriendly or jealous eye? What would have been her condition in these trying years but for the outlet we have furnished for her starving millions?

"Spain, meantime, has retained of her extensive dominions in this hemisphere but the two islands of Cuba and Porto Rico. A respectful sympathy with the fortunes of an ancient ally and a gallant people, with whom the United States have ever maintained the most friendly relations, would, if no other reason existed, make it our duty to leave her in the undisturbed possession of this little remnant of her mighty transatlantic empire. The president desires to do so; no word or deed of his will ever question her title or shake her possession. But can it be expected to last very long? Can it resist this mighty current in the fortunes of the world? Is it desirable that it should do so? Can it be for the interest of Spain to cling to a possession that can only be maintained by a garrison of twenty-five or thirty thousand troops, a powerful naval force, and an annual expenditure for both arms of the service of at least twelve millions of dollars? Cuba, at this moment, costs more to Spain than the entire naval and military establishment of the United States costs the federal government. So far from being really injured by the loss of this island, there is no doubt that, were it peacefully transferred to the United States, a prosperous commerce between Cuba and Spain, resulting from ancient associations and common language and tastes, would be far more productive than the best contrived system of colonial taxation. Such, notoriously, has been the result to Great Britain of the establishment of the independence of the United States. The decline of Spain from the position which she held in the time of Charles V. is coeval with the foundation of her colonial system; while within twenty-five years, and since the loss of most of her colonies, she has entered upon a course of rapid improvement unknown since the abdication of that emperor.

"I will but allude to an evil of the first magnitude: I mean the African slave trade, in the suppression of which France and England take a lively interest—an evil which still forms a great reproach upon the civilization of Christendom, and perpetuates the barbarism of Africa, but for which, it is to be feared, there is no hope of a complete remedy while Cuba remains a Spanish colony.

"But, whatever may be thought of these last suggestions, it would seem impossible for any one who reflects upon the events glanced at in this note to mistake the law of American growth and progress, or think it can be ultimately arrested by a convention like that proposed. In the judgment of the president, it would be as easy to throw a dam from Cape Florida to Cuba, in the hope of stopping the flow of the Gulf Stream, as to attempt, by a compact like this, to fix the fortunes of Cuba 'now and for hereafter;' or, as expressed in the French text of the convention, 'for the present as for the future,' (pour le present comme pour l'avenir,) that is, for all coming time. The history of the past—of the recent past—affords no assurance that twenty years hence France or England will even wish that Spain should retain Cuba; and a century hence, judging of what will be from what has been, the pages which record this proposition will, like the record of the family compact between France and Spain, have no interest but for the antiquary.

"Even now the president cannot doubt that both France and England would prefer any change in the condition of Cuba to that which is most to be apprehended, viz., an internal convulsion which should renew the horrors and the fate of San Domingo.

"I will intimate a final objection to the proposed convention. M. de Turgot and Lord Malmesbury put forward, as the reason for entering into such a compact, 'the attacks which have lately been made on the Island of Cuba by lawless bands of adventurers from the United States, with the avowed design of taking possession of that island.' The president is convinced that the conclusion of such a treaty, instead of putting a stop to these lawless proceedings, would give a new and powerful impulse to them. It would strike a death blow to the conservative policy hitherto pursued in this country toward Cuba. No administration of this government, however strong in the public confidence in other respects, could stand a day under the odium of having stipulated with the great powers of Europe, that in no future time, under no change of circumstances, by no amicable arrangement with Spain, by no act of lawful war, (should that calamity unfortunately occur,) by no consent of the inhabitants of the island, should they, like the possessions of Spain on the American continent, succeed in rendering themselves independent, in fine, by no overruling necessity of self-preservation, should the United States ever make the acquisition of Cuba.

“For these reasons, which the president has thought it advisable, considering the importance of the subject, to direct me to unfold at some length, he feels constrained to decline respectfully the invitation of France and England to become parties to the proposed convention. He is persuaded that these friendly powers will not attribute this refusal to any insensibility on his part to the advantages of the utmost harmony between the great maritime states on a subject of such importance. As little will Spain draw any unfavorable inference from this refusal; the rather, as the emphatic disclaimer of any designs against Cuba on the part of this government, contained in the present note, affords all the assurance which the president can constitutionally, or to any useful purpose, give of a practical concurrence with France and England in the wish not to disturb the possession of that island by Spain.

“I avail myself, sir, of this opportunity to assure you of my distinguished consideration.

“EDWARD EVERETT.”

CHAPTER I.

President Pierce. — Inauguration and Inaugural Address. — The Vice-President. — Cabinet and Diplomatic Appointments. — Pacific Railroad. — Expeditions under President Fillmore. — Lord John Russell and Cuba. — Letter from Honorable Edward Everett. — Release of Martin Koszta. — New York Crystal Palace Exhibition.

FRANKLIN PIERCE, the fourteenth president, was born at Hillsborough, New Hampshire, November 23d, 1804, and was, therefore, at the time of his election to the presidency, forty-eight years of age. His father was a soldier in the revolutionary war, who, at the first call to arms, had left his plough and enlisted in the patriot cause, being present at the battle of Bunker Hill, and returning only at the end of the war, after seven years' absence. General Pierce was educated at Bowdoin College, in Maine, where he graduated in 1824. He commenced the study of law with the late Judge Woodbury, and afterwards pursued his studies at the law school in Northampton, Massachusetts, and with the late Judge Parker of that state. When first admitted to practice at the bar he gained little distinction, and preferred the excitement of political life to the duller business of country practice. He enlisted warmly in the presidential canvass of that time, in favor of General Jackson.

In 1829, Franklin Pierce was elected a member of the legislature of his state, and served in that capacity four years, during the two latter being speaker of the house. He was elected a member of Congress in 1833. In that place he did not attain to a very prominent position; his speeches were few, and not remarkable for eloquence or power. He was, however, a staunch supporter of the policy of his party, and he labored zealously to carry out the measures of General Jackson's administration. While in the lower house of Congress, "he took that stand on the slavery question, from which he has never since swerved a hair's breadth. He fully recognized, by his votes and by his voice, the rights pledged to the South by the constitution,"—a position which in after years was duly acknowledged by the South, with the nomination for the presidency.

After serving four years in the house of representatives, Mr. Pierce was elected to the United States senate in 1837, at the commencement of Mr. Van Buren's administration. The senate at that time numbered many of the ablest statesmen who have adorned the annals of our country, and among such men, it could hardly be expected that Mr. Pierce, who was the youngest member of that body, should occupy a very conspicuous position. He was, however, esteemed by his political friends as one of the staunchest of their number, and as a tactician and party champion his ability was acknowledged by even the veteran leaders. After one term of service in the senate, in 1842, Mr. Pierce voluntarily retired from public life, and gave his attention to his profession. He had already achieved a reputation as an advocate, by his occasional efforts at the bar during his public life, so that on his retirement from the senate he entered at once upon a large practice, and soon attained to eminence in his profession, his services being in demand on all the important trials which occurred in the state. An offer of the appointment to a vacancy in the United States senate, and a place in the cabinet of Mr. Polk, as attorney general, could not withdraw him from the extensive practice in which he was then engaged.

The war with Mexico, however, drew Mr. Peirce from private life, and when the army was increased by the addition of several new regiments, he was appointed to the 9th, or New England, regiment. He shortly after received the commission of brigadier-general, and proceeded to Vera Cruz, where he took command of his brigade, which was to reënforce the army of General Scott, then on its march to the capital. The command of General Pierce, while on the march to join General Scott, was attacked at the National Bridge, and met with some other slight obstructions; but it reached the main army in time to participate in the battles that took place in the neighborhood of Mexico. At the battle of Contreras, General Pierce, early in the contest, received severe injuries by the fall of his horse; but he continued on the field through that day and night, and was at the head of his column the next, when the battle was continued. In the battle of Cherubusco, which followed, he still led his brigade, though suffering from his injuries, until, while at the head of the column and under a severe fire, he fainted from pain and exhaustion. The estimation in which General Scott held the services of General Pierce was shown by the appointment of the latter as one of the commissioners to arrange the terms of the armistice, which was proposed by Santa Anna. Subsequently he was engaged with his command in the battle of Molino del Rey, and would have been in the last battle of the war, Chapultepec, had he not been taken so ill that he could not leave the quarters of General Worth, to which he was obliged to retire before the fight commenced.

At the close of the war, General Pierce resigned his commission, and resumed the practice of his profession in New Hampshire, and he remained in this position until nominated for the presidency. This nomination, as has been already intimated, was one which occasioned some surprise to the country, as General Pierce's name had not been mentioned much in connection with that office, except among the shrewder managers of the party. It was, however, for the party, a safe nomination, and resulted in success.

The inauguration of President Pierce took place March 4th, 1853. His cabinet was named and confirmed a few days after his inauguration, and was composed as follows:—

Secretary of State,	Wm. L. Marcy, of N. Y.
“ “ the Treasury,	James Guthrie, of Ky.
“ “ the Interior,	Rob't McClelland, of Mich.
“ “ War,	Jefferson Davis, of Miss.
“ “ the Navy,	James C. Dobbin, of N. C.
Postmaster-General,	James Campbell, of Penn.
Attorney-General,	Caleb Cushing, of Mass.

The vice-president, elected with President Pierce, was Honorable William R. King, of Alabama, who had served for more than thirty years, almost continuously, in Congress, or in other prominent positions, and was much respected for his pure character, wisdom, and experience. He did not, however, live to enter upon the duties of the station to which he had been chosen. His health was failing at the time of the election, and he was seeking its restoration in Cuba at the time of the inauguration of the new administration. But, on the 2d of March, in order to provide against any question of succession which might arise in the event of a vacancy in the presidency, Congress passed an act authorizing the oath of office to be administered to him while abroad. This was accordingly done at the Ariadne estate, near Matanzas, in Cuba, on the 24th of March, 1853. Mr. King's health continued to decline, and he had barely sufficient strength to reach his home in Alabama, where he died on the 18th of April.

Some of the principal diplomatic appointments, subsequently made, were, —

James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, to Great Britain.

Thomas H. Seymour, of Connecticut, to Russia.

James Gadsden, of South Carolina, to Mexico.

Pierre A. Soulé, of Louisiana, to Spain.

Solon Borland, of Arkansas, to Central America.

Peter D. Vroom, of New Jersey, to Prussia.

William Trousdale, of Tennessee, to Brazil.

Few administrations have come into power under more favorable circumstances than that of President Pierce. The country had passed through the severe political struggle arising from the acquisition of new territories, and culminating in the compromises of 1850, and after the presidential canvass, which was also an exciting one, the people seemed to desire repose from this sort of contests, and were disposed to look with favor upon the course of the new administration. His inaugural address and his first annual message, therefore, in their allusions to this state of things, afforded much satisfaction, and a strong hope that, the agitation having ceased, the aim of the government, in all its departments, would be directed to its legitimate purposes — the promotion of the varied interests of the whole country. In his inaugural address President Pierce declared, "that to every theory of society or of government, whether the offspring of feverish ambition or of morbid enthusiasm, calculated to dissolve the bonds of law and affection which unite us, I shall oppose a ready and stern resistance."

The compromise measures of 1850 he held to be strictly constitutional, and to be unhesitatingly carried into effect, — that they are to be respected and obeyed, not with a reluctance encouraged by abstract opinions as to their propriety in a different state of society, but cheerfully, and according to the decisions of the tribunal to which their exposition belongs.

The views expressed on the part of the administration, and acquiescence on the part of the people of all sections, in the present position of the great questions which had agitated them, indicated that years of peace might ensue, and men hoped that while the country advanced in material prosperity a better feeling would eventually lead to a more friendly and satisfactory solution of old difficulties. Subsequent events, however, proved that these hopes were delusive.

The president, in his inaugural, also expressed his views in regard to subjects of interest to the nation, thus in some degree indicating the policy to be pursued by his administration. On the subject of extended territory, multiplication of states, and increased population, which had been in earlier days regarded with some forebodings, he believed that experience had shown that these apprehensions were unfounded, and he declared, "The policy of my administration will not be controlled by any timid forebodings of evil from expansion. Indeed, it is not to be disguised, that our attitude as a nation, and our position on the globe, render the acquisition of certain possessions, not within our jurisdiction, eminently important for our protection, if not, in the future, essential for our preservation of the rights of commerce and the peace of the world. Should they be obtained, it will be through no grasping spirit, but with a view to obvious national interest and security, and in a manner entirely consistent with the strictest observance of national faith."

He said, further, that the policy of our country ought to be eminently peaceful, and with the neighboring nations on our continent we should cultivate kindly and fraternal relations, while, on the other hand, we should avoid becoming entangled in the politics of Europe. In this connection President Pierce declared, that "the rights, security, and repose of this confederacy, reject the idea of interference or colonization, on this side of the ocean, by any foreign power, beyond present jurisdiction, as utterly inadmissible." The other topics of the address were, for the most part, such as may be usually found in such a document,—the relations of the government to the people, of the states to the Federal Union, of office holders to the administration, etc., in which the political views of the party are set forth with such moderation and modifications as may satisfy friends and not exasperate foes. As a whole, the inaugural was acceptable to the country, and, as before stated, a season of domestic peace and progress was anticipated.

Shortly before the close of the session of Congress in March, 1853, an appropriation of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars was made to defray the expenses of surveys of various routes for a railroad from the Mississippi to the Pacific—an object which had received the encouragement of Mr. Fillmore's administration. For these surveys six parties were organized by the war department, to explore four main routes; they were early in the field, and were completely organized for a thorough exploration. The first, under the command of Governor I. I. Stevens, was to survey the line of the forty-seventh parallel, or what is termed the northern route. The second, under the command of Captain J. W. Gunnison, took the line of the thirty-eighth, thirty-ninth, and forty-first parallels. Captain Gunnison, however, with two of his officers, was killed by the Indians, and Captain E. G. Beckwith succeeded to his command. The third party, under Captain A. W. Whipple, took the line of the thirty-fifth parallel. The fourth party, under Lieutenant R. S. Williamson, surveyed the California portion of the routes to San Francisco. The fifth and sixth, under Captain J. Pope and Lieutenant J. G. Parke, surveyed the thirty-second parallel, or southern route. These surveys were made with efficiency, and valuable geological, zoological, and botanical collections were made. The reports of these several expeditions, though tardy in their preparation and apparently of little practical importance, so far as their original object was concerned, have added much to the geography and natural history of the regions explored.

It may be proper here to allude to several other expeditions which were initiated and organized under President Fillmore, whose administration thus did much to develop the resources of our own country, and to open others to its commerce. The expedition to Japan, under Commodore Perry, has already been alluded to, and its results will be mentioned hereafter. Besides this, expeditions were sent to explore the valley of the Amazon, to explore the La Plata and the Paraguay and Parana Rivers far into the interior of South America, and a party was also sent to explore the Red River, and the country which it drains, while other similar works of minor importance were also encouraged.

The letter of Mr. Everett, then secretary of state, rejecting the proposal made by France and England for a tripartite treaty relative to the Island of Cuba, (page 560,) called out a letter from Lord John Russell in reply to the positions taken by Mr. Everett. The letter was a despatch to Mr. Crampton, the British minister at Washington, and was subsequently laid before the government, but was not considered as demanding any reply. In it his lordship says, —

“The object of the argument, introduced by Mr. Everett with so much preparation, and urged with so much ability, is clearly to procure the admission of a doctrine, that the United States have an interest in Cuba, to which Great Britain and France cannot pretend. If the object of the United States is simply to prevent Cuba from falling into the hands of any European power, the convention proposed would secure that end. But if it is intended to maintain that Great Britain and France have no interest in the maintenance of the present status of Cuba, and that the United States alone have a right to a voice in that matter, the British government at once refuses to admit such a claim. Her possessions in the West Indies, to say nothing of the interests of Mexico and other friendly states, give Great Britain an interest in the question which she cannot forego: and France has similar interests, which she will doubtless urge at the proper time.”

The distinguished minister then endeavors to controvert the arguments and weaken the positions of Mr. Everett, the force of which appears to have been felt by the British ministry. In conclusion, he says, “While fully admitting the right of the United States to reject the proposal, Great Britain must at once resume her entire liberty, and upon any occasion that may call for it, be free to act singly or in conjunction with other powers, as to her may seem fit.”

Although this despatch did not seem to require any further discussion of the question on the part of the government, (the administration apparently taking the same position as that of its predecessor on this question,) Mr. Everett took occasion to reply, individually, to

Lord John Russell; and as his letter relates to a subject of importance, and serves to enforce his former arguments, the following extracts are not out of place in these pages: —

“BOSTON, September 17, 1853.

“MY LORD: Your despatch of the 16th February last to Mr. Crampton has lately appeared in our public papers. As it is in reality, if not in form, a reply to my letter of the 1st December, 1852, on the subject of Cuba, I regret that it was not prepared and sent before my retirement from the department of state. But though I must now do it as a private individual, I feel as if it were to some extent my duty to answer it. I shall endeavor to do so in a manner consistent with my sincere respect for your public character, and a lively recollection of your personal kindness during my residence in England.

“Before remarking on the contents of your letter, I will observe that, though it contains some courteous expressions, its tone is, upon the whole, not quite as conciliatory as might have been expected, considering that my letter of the 1st December was altogether respectful and friendly towards the two powers, both in form and in substance. I have heard that in presenting this correspondence to parliament you indulged ‘in some sarcastic remarks,’ but I have not seen any report of them. Your despatch is not free from a shade of sarcasm in one or two sentences. This I shall endeavor to avoid in reply, not that it would be difficult to follow you into that field, but because I cannot think that an encounter of wits between us would be an edifying spectacle, or one which would promote any desirable national object.

“You say, that in my letter of the 1st December I entered into ‘arguments not required by the simple nature of the question before me;’ and the length of my letter has been complained of in other quarters. The question propounded to us was certainly in one sense simple, as every question is that can be answered 'Yes' or 'No.' But how various, complicated, and important the interests and relations involved in it! Besides, the organ of every government must be the only judge of the proper length and relevancy of his replies to the communications of foreign powers. * *

"You say that 'it occurs to her Majesty's government to ask for what purpose are these arguments introduced with so much preparation and urged with so much ability;' and you answer the question in the following manner: 'It would appear that the purpose, not fully avowed, but hardly concealed, is to procure the admission of a doctrine, that the United States have an interest in Cuba, to which Great Britain and France cannot pretend.'

"Here a little unintentional injustice is done to my letter, in which it is distinctly stated, more than once, for reasons set forth at length and very partially controverted by you, that the government of the United States considered the condition of Cuba 'as mainly an American question,' in which they had a very deep interest, and you a very limited one. Not only was no attempt whatever made to conceal this doctrine, but it was fully avowed and reasoned out in my letter of the 1st December, 1852. * * *

"But though the United States certainly consider that they have 'an interest in the condition of Cuba, to which Great Britain and France cannot pretend,' it is not, either in my letter, nor in any other American state paper within my recollection, assumed that Great Britain and France have 'no interest in the maintenance of the present statu quo, and that the United States alone have a right to a voice in the matter.' Our doctrine is, not that we have an absolutely exclusive interest in the subject, but that we have a far deeper and more immediate interest than France or England can possibly lay claim to. A glance at the map, one would think, would satisfy every impartial mind of this truth.

"In order to establish for France and England an equal interest with the United States in the condition of Cuba, you say, 'Great Britain is in possession, by treaty, of the Island of Trinidad, which in the last century was a colony of Spain. France was in possession at the commencement of this century of Louisiana by voluntary cession of Spain.' It is true that Spain was compelled by France to cede Trinidad to Great Britain by the treaty of Amiens. If, while this cession was in agitation, — as it was for some time, — the United States and any other neutral power (if there was any other) had exerted themselves to defeat it, and had invited you and France to bind yourselves by a perpetual compact never to acquire it, the interference, I apprehend, would have been regarded as worse than gratuitous. I cannot see why we have not as good a right to obtain, if we can, from Spain, the voluntary cession of Cuba, as you had to accept the compulsory cession of Trinidad, which is, by position and strength, the Cuba of the south-eastern Antilles.

"France was, as you say, at the beginning of this century, in possession of Louisiana, by the voluntary cession of Spain. This possession, however, (nominal at best,) did not take place till seven months after France had sold Louisiana to the United States for eighty millions of francs, and it lasted only from the 30th November to the 20th December, 1803. The object of France in acquiring Louisiana, was to reestablish herself in the interior of this country — an object, I need not say, as menacing to your North American possessions as to the United States. Is it possible you can think such a possession of Louisiana for such a purpose a sufficient ground on the part of France for interfering with our relations with Cuba? May she, a European power, without consulting us, obtain from Spain, in 1800, a cession of half the habitable portion of North America, — a cession which threw her for fifteen hundred miles on our western frontier, and not only shut us out from the Pacific, but enabled her to close the Mississippi; and is it so very unreasonable in us to decline her invitation to bind ourselves for all time not to accept the cession of an island which lies within thirty-five leagues of our coast? Does she even derive her right thus to control our relations with Cuba in 1853 from her twenty days' possession of Louisiana in 1803? What can be clearer than that whatever right accrued to her from that three weeks' possession (which was a mere ceremonial affair, to give form to the transfer of the province to the United States) must have passed to us by that transfer, followed by our actual possession and occupation for half a century? * * *

"The expeditions to which you allude, as calculated to excite the 'reprobation of every civilized state,' were discountenanced by the president in every constitutional and legal way. The utmost vigilance was at all times employed, but, unhappily for the adventurers themselves, without effect. In this there is matter neither for wonder nor reproach. The territory of the United States is but little less than the whole of Europe; while their population is not quite equal to that of the United Kingdom, and their standing military force small, and scattered over an immensely extensive frontier. Our government, like that of England, is one of law; and there is a great similarity between the laws of the two countries which prohibit military expeditions against the possessions of friendly powers. In fact your foreign enlistment act of 1819 was admitted by Mr. Canning to have been founded in part on our neutrality law of the preceding year. Of the two, I believe our laws are the more stringent; but it is somewhat difficult to enforce them in both countries.

"These expeditions, got up in the United States by a Spanish general, and supposed to indicate a lawless disposition on the part of the American people, comprised a very small number of persons, some of whom were foreigners, enjoying the same freedom of action in the United States, that refugees from every part of the continent enjoy in England. The same reproach which is cast upon us for these expeditions is, at this moment, cast upon England by the continental powers. Events which have occurred in London since your despatch was written, strikingly illustrate the difficulty and the risk, under constitutional governments, of preventing abuses of that hospitality which it is the privilege and boast of such governments to extend to all who seek it.

"There is, no doubt, widely prevalent in this country a feeling that the people of Cuba are justly disaffected to the government of Spain. A recent impartial French traveller, M. Ampère, confirms this impression. All the ordinary political rights enjoyed in free countries are denied to the people of that island. The government is, in principle, the worst form of despotism, namely, absolute authority delegated to a military viceroy, and supported by an army from abroad. I speak of the nature of the government, and not of the individuals by whom it is administered; for I have formed a very favorable opinion of the personal character of the present captain-general, as of one or two of his predecessors. Of the bad faith and the utter disregard of treaties with which this bad government is administered, your committees on the slave trade have spoken plainly enough at the late session of parliament. Such being the state of things in Cuba, it does not seem to me very extraordinary or reproachful, that, throughout the United States, a handful of misguided young men should be found ready to join a party of foreigners, headed by a Spanish general, who was able to persuade them, not as you view it, 'by armed invasion to excite the obedient to revolt and the tranquil to disturbance,' but, as they were led to believe, to aid an oppressed people in their struggle for freedom. There is no reason to doubt that there are, at this moment, as many persons, foreigners as well as natives, in England, who entertain these feelings and opinions as in the United States; and if Great Britain lay at a distance of one hundred and ten miles from Cuba, instead of thirty-five hundred, you might not, with all your repressive force, find it easy to prevent a small steamer, disguised as a trading vessel, from slipping off from an outpost in the night, on an unlawful enterprise. The expedition of General Torrijos, in 1831, as far as illegality is concerned, is the parallel of that of General Lopez. It was fitted out in the Thames, without interruption till the last moment, and though it then fell under the grasp of the police, its members succeeded in escaping to Spain, where, for some time, they found shelter at Gibraltar. It is declared, in the last number of the Quarterly Review, to be 'notorious, that associations have been formed in London for the subversion of dynasties with which England is at peace; that arms have been purchased and loans proposed; that "central committees" issue orders from England, and that Messrs. Mazzini and Kossuth have established and preside over boards of regency for the Roman States and Hungary, and for the promotion of revolution in every part of the world.' I have before me a list, purporting to be taken from a Prussian police gazette, of fifteen associations of continental refugees organized in London, and now in action, for the above-mentioned purposes. * * *

"Consider, too, the recent antecedents of the powers that invite us to disable ourselves to the end of time from the acquisition in any way of this natural appendage to our continent. France, within the present century, to say nothing of the acquisition of Louisiana, has wrested a moiety of Europe from its native sovereigns; has possessed herself, by force of arms, and at the time greatly to the discontent of England, of six hundred miles of the northern coast of Africa, with an indefinite extension into the interior; and has appropriated to herself one of the most important insular groups of the Pacific. England, not to mention her other numerous recent acquisitions in every part of the globe, has, even since your despatch of the 16th February was written, annexed half of the Burman empire to her overgrown Indian possessions, on grounds — if the statements in Mr. Cobden's pamphlet are to be relied upon — compared with which the reasons assigned by Russia for invading Turkey are respectable.

"The United States do not require to be advised of 'the utility of those rules for the observance of international relations, which for centuries have been known to Europe by the name of the law of nations.' They are known and obeyed by us under the same venerable name. Certain circumstances in our history have caused them to be studied more generally and more anxiously here than in Europe. From the breaking out of the wars of the French revolution to the year 1812, the United States knew the law of nations only as the victims of its systematic violation by the great maritime powers of Europe. For these violations on the part of England, prior to 1794, indemnification was made under the seventh article of Jay's treaty. For similar injuries on the part of France, we were compelled to accept an illusory set-off, under the convention of 1800. A few years only elapsed, before a new warfare upon our neutral rights was commenced by the two powers. One hundred millions at least of American property were swept from the seas, under the British orders in council, and the French Berlin and Milan decrees. These orders and decrees were at the time reciprocally declared to be in contravention of the law of nations by the two powers themselves, each speaking of the measures of the other party. In 1831, after the generation of the original sufferers had sunk under their ruined fortunes to the grave, France acknowledged her decrees to have been of that character, by a late and partial measure of indemnification. For our enormous losses under the British orders in council, we not only never received indemnification, but the sacrifices and sufferings of war were added to those spoliations on our commerce and invasion of our neutral rights which led to its declaration. Those orders were at the time regarded by the Lansdownes, the Barings, the Broughams, and the other enlightened statesmen of the school to which you belong, as a violation of right and justice as well as of sound policy; and within a very few years the present distinguished lord chief justice, placed by yourself at the head of the tribunals of England, has declared that 'the orders in council were grievously unjust to neutrals, and it is now generally allowed, that they were contrary to the law of nations and our own municipal law!'

"That I call, my Lord, to borrow your expression, 'a melancholy avowal' for the chief of the jurisprudence of a great empire, though highly creditable for the candor with which it is made. Acts of its sovereign authority, countenanced by its parliament, rigidly executed by its fleets on every sea, enforced in the courts of admiralty by a magistrate whose learning and eloquence are among the modern glories of England, persisted in till the lawful commerce of a neutral and kindred nation was annihilated, and pronounced, by the highest legal authority of the present day, contrary not merely to the law of nations, but your own municipal law!

"Under these circumstances, the government and people of the United States, who have never committed or sanctioned a violation of the law of nations against any other power, may well think it out of place, that they should be instructed by an English minister in 'the utility of those rules which for centuries have been known to Europe by the name of the law of nations.' * * *

"You will not, I hope, misapprehend the spirit in which this letter is written. As an American citizen, I do not covet the acquisition of Cuba, either peaceably or by force of arms. When I cast my thoughts back upon our brief history as a nation, I certainly am not led to think that the United States have reached the final limits of their growth, or, what comes to very much the same thing, that representative government, religious equality, the trial by jury, the freedom of the press, and the other great attributes of our Anglo-Norman civilization are never to gain a further extension in this hemisphere. I regard the inquiry, under what political organization this extension is to take place, as a vain attempt to penetrate the inscrutable mysteries of the future. It will, if we are wise, be under the guidance of our example; I hope it will be in virtue of the peaceful arts, by which well-governed states extend themselves over unsettled or partially settled continents. My voice was heard at the first opportunity, in the senate of the United States, in favor of developing the almost boundless resources of the territory already in our possession, rather than seeking to enlarge it by aggressive wars. Still I cannot think it reasonable — hardly respectful — on the part of England and France, while they are daily extending themselves on every shore and in every sea, and pushing their dominions, by new conquests, to the uttermost ends of the earth, to call upon the United States to bind themselves, by a perpetual compact, never, under any circumstances, to admit into the Union an island which lies at their doors, and commands the entrance into the interior of their continent.

"I remain, my Lord, with the highest respect, faithfully yours,

"EDWARD EVERETT."

An event which caused considerable excitement, in the summer of 1853, was the seizure of Martin Koszta by the Austrian officials at Smyrna, and his subsequent release through the bold measures of Captain Ingraham, of the United States ship St. Louis. Koszta was an Hungarian by birth, who was one of the exiles from that country after its unsuccessful struggle for independence in 1848-9, and came to this country in 1850. After remaining here about two years he made declaration of his intention of becoming a citizen of the United States, and returned to Turkey on private business of a temporary character, claiming the protection of the government as a naturalized American citizen. While at Smyrna, and under the letter of safe conduct of the American consul, he was forcibly seized by some tools of the Austrian government, and carried on board an Austrian brig of war lying in the harbor, where he was confined in irons. The American consul at Smyrna and the American minister at Constantinople interfered in behalf of the prisoner, but without avail, and it had become known in Smyrna that there was a design on the part of the Austrians to convey him to Trieste, within the dominions of their emperor. But fortunately, just at that juncture, the United States ship St. Louis, Captain Ingraham, came into the harbor of Smyrna, and after making due inquiry into the state of affairs, Captain Ingraham took measures to secure the release of the prisoner, who claimed the protection of his flag. He found that there was evidence of bad faith on the part of the Austrians; for while he was inquiring into the justice of Koszta's claim to American protection, they were preparing to hurry him away clandestinely. He therefore placed his ship alongside of the Austrian brig, with his guns shotted, and fully prepared to enforce his demand that the prisoner should be given up by a certain hour. This bold position settled the matter. Koszta was delivered into the custody of the French consul-general, by agreement, to await the settlement of the affair by the two governments, and he was subsequently released and returned to the United States. This affair was the subject of diplomatic correspondence between the Austrian minister, Chevalier Hulseman, and Mr. Marcy, in which the former, who had been before so completely overwhelmed by Mr. Webster, was again wholly discomfited. The purpose shown by the American government, to protect all who could claim American nationality, was hailed with pleasure throughout the country, and sent a thrill to many a heart among the liberals of Europe.

Another event of the year 1853, which may be worthy of chronicling, was the opening of a great "Exhibition of the Industry of all Nations," at the Crystal Palace in New York. This exhibition was of a similar character to the "World's Fair" in London two years before, though not on quite so extensive a scale. The "palace," however, was a handsome structure, and afforded accommodations for a very large exhibition. At the opening, the president of the United States with his cabinet, the earl of Ellesmere, Sir Charles Lyell, and other distinguished gentlemen from Europe, were present. It was an exhibition of very great interest, and during the several months that it was open was visited by thousands, and undoubtedly produced many good results by encouraging the sciences, fine arts, and mechanic arts of the country.

CHAPTER II.

Thirty-third Congress. — President's Message. — Sectional Agitation. — Kansas-Nebraska Bill. — Mr. Douglas. — Excitement on the Question. — Missouri Compromise. — Colonel Benton. — Mr. Douglas's Amendment adopted, and Missouri Compromise declared void. — Emigration to Kansas. — Emigrant Aid Societies. — Governors of Kansas and Nebraska. — Missouri Border War. — Election Frauds.

THE thirty-third Congress assembled in December, 1853. Senator Atchison, who, according to custom, had been chosen president of the senate previous to the preceding 4th of March, occupied the chair made vacant by the death of Vice-President King, and Mr. Linn Boyd was chosen speaker of the house of representatives. President Pierce's message discussed at considerable length the various questions of foreign and domestic policy which concerned the country, taking in some instances positions quite opposed to those of the preceding administration, as was expected. On the subject of sectional agitation, which seemed to have subsided to a great extent, the president wrote as follows : —

“ It is no part of my purpose to give prominence to any subject which may properly be regarded as set at rest by the deliberate judgment of the people. But while the present is bright with promise, and the future full of demand and inducement for the exercise of active intelligence, the past can never be without useful lessons of admonition and instruction. If its dangers serve not as beacons, they will evidently fail to fulfil the object of a wise design. When the grave shall have closed over all who are now endeavoring to meet the obligations of duty, the year 1850 will be recurred to as a period filled with anxious apprehension. A successful war had just terminated. Peace brought with it a vast augmentation of territory. Disturbing questions arose, bearing upon the domestic institutions of one portion of the confederacy, and involving the constitutional rights of the states. But, notwithstanding differences of opinion and sentiment, which then existed in relation to details and specific provisions, the acquiescence of distinguished citizens, whose devotion to the Union can never be doubted, has given renewed vigor to our institutions, and restored a sense of repose and security to the public mind throughout the confederacy. That this repose is to suffer no shock during my official term, if I have power to avert it, those who placed me here may be assured. The wisdom of men who knew what independence cost — who had put all at stake upon the issue of the revolutionary struggle — disposed of the subject to which I refer in the only way consistent with the union of these states, and with the march of power and prosperity which has made us what we are. It is a significant fact, that from the adoption of the constitution until the officers and soldiers of the revolution had passed to their graves, or, through the infirmities of age and wounds, had ceased to participate actively in public affairs, there was not merely a quiet acquiescence in, but a prompt vindication of, the constitutional rights of the states. The reserved powers were scrupulously respected. No statesman put forth the narrow views of casuists to justify interference and agitation, but the spirit of the compact was regarded as sacred in the eye of honor, and indispensable for the great experiment of civil liberty, which, environed by inherent difficulties, was yet borne forward in apparent weakness by a power superior to all obstacles. There is no condemnation which the voice of freedom will not pronounce upon us, should we prove faithless to this great trust. While men inhabiting different parts of this vast continent can no more be expected to hold the same opinions, or entertain the same sentiments, than every variety of climate or soil can be expected to furnish the same agricultural products, they can unite in a common object and sustain common principles essential to the maintenance of that object. The gallant men of the south and the north could stand together during the struggle of the revolution ; they could stand together in the more trying moment which succeeded the clangor of arms. As their united valor was adequate to all the trials of the camp and dangers of the field, so their united wisdom proved equal to the greater task of founding, upon a deep and broad basis, institutions which it has been our privilege to enjoy, and will ever be our most sacred duty to sustain. It is but the feeble expression of a faith strong and universal, to say that their sons, whose blood mingled so often upon the same fields during the war of 1812, and who have more recently borne in triumph the flag of the country upon a foreign soil, will never permit alienation of feeling to weaken the power of their united efforts, nor internal dissensions to paralyze the great arm of freedom, uplifted for the vindication of self-government."

The hopes cherished by these sentiments, however, seemed doomed to a speedy disappointment. Early in the session sectional agitation was again aroused by the course of a leading member of the administration party. Mr. Douglas reported a bill to establish the territorial government of Nebraska, and subsequently a modified bill for the establishment of two territories, Nebraska and Kansas. That bill was designed to recognize the right of the people of the territory to settle the question of slavery for themselves, and it extended over the new territories the constitution and laws of the United States, "except the eighth section of the act for the admission of Missouri into the Union." That section provided that slavery should not exist in any new state or territory north of 36° 20' north, the southern boundary of Missouri. By this new bill that section which was known as the Missouri compromise was declared to have been "superseded by the principles of the legislation of 1850, commonly called the compromise measures." The purpose of this portion of the bill was more distinctly stated in a subsequent amendment offered by Mr. Douglas, to the effect that the Missouri compromise, being "inconsistent with the principles of non-intervention by Congress with slavery in the states and territories as recognized by the legislation of 1850, commonly called 'The Compromise Measures,' is hereby declared inoperative and void, it being the true intent and meaning of this act, not to legislate slavery into any territory or state, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the constitution of the United States."

Then commenced a sectional storm more serious than any which had preceded it. It followed close upon the declarations of President Pierce that the harmony of the states should not be disturbed. In its inception, however, the Kansas act was not an administration measure; but in the course of events the administration became committed to its support, as a party measure. The bill was strenuously opposed in Congress, and as earnestly supported, for several months before it finally passed. Senators Chase of Ohio and Sumner of Massachusetts, with several members of the house of representatives, issued an address to the country, denouncing the measure in the strongest terms, "as a gross violation of a sacred pledge; as a criminal betrayal of precious rights; as part and parcel of an atrocious plot to exclude from a vast unoccupied region emigrants from the old world, and free laborers from our own states, and to convert it into a dreary region of despotism, inhabited by masters and slaves." Counter addresses and speeches were also circulated, especially at the south. The public mind throughout the country soon became aroused to the importance of the measure, and inflamed with the feelings which naturally grew out of a discussion of this kind. The argument, common to most of the opponents of the bill, that the repeal of the Missouri compromise was a breach of faith on the part of the slave states, a violation of a sacred compact, was pressed with great vigor and ability, both in and out of Congress; a very large number of the members of both houses speaking upon the subject, and the press being filled with heated discussion.

But arguments and discussion did not avail much. The men who had made the compromise, and who had looked upon it in the light of a compact, had for the most part passed away, and those now upon the stage regarded it only as an expedient of the time when it was adopted. There were some, however, who still regarded the Missouri compromise — what it really was intended to be — as a law of more than ordinary force, and as, in truth, a solemn compact between the free and the slave states. Among these was Colonel Benton, who had entered public life at the time of the compromise, and who still adhered to it as one of the three great measures by which the Union had been formed and its harmony preserved, — the first being the ordinance of 1787, and the second the federal constitution. Colonel Benton, now a member of the house of representatives, and nearly or quite the last of the generation of statesmen which succeeded the men of the revolution, protested ably against the passage of the act. But neither his earnestness nor the eloquence of others could stay the current which carried the administration party and southern Whigs for the new measure. The amendment offered by Mr. Douglas, which declared the Missouri compromise inoperative and void, was adopted in the senate by a vote of thirty-five to nine, and the bill subsequently passed by a vote of thirty-seven to fourteen. Later in the session the bill, with an amendment allowing aliens to vote, was passed by the house by a vote of one hundred and thirteen to one hundred, but not till after a most determined struggle against it, and on one occasion a session of thirty-six consecutive hours, during which the minority availed themselves of all possible parliamentary tactics to prevent the passage of the bill without a full opportunity for debate. The majority were obliged to yield on that point, but they also resorted to similar means to prevent amendments, and to secure the passage of the bill in the desired form. The senate, after some debate, agreed to the amended bill, and so the new policy with regard to the territories was inaugurated. From this time the new territory of Kansas became the centre of interest in political affairs. It was the border ground on which the policy or principle of “popular sovereignty” was to be tested. By the Missouri compromise slavery had been excluded from it, although alongside of Missouri. Now it was open for a struggle between the free state and slave state settlers.

While the Kansas and Nebraska bill was being debated in Congress and exercising the public mind throughout the country, as a matter of course preparations were made for emigrating to the new territories. Parties of emigrants were organized in many of the western states, and were ready to enter the territories so soon as spring should permit. At this time, too, in view of the increased emigration — already immense — from the Atlantic states to the west, emigrant aid societies were formed. The first of these societies was formed in Massachusetts, and this was soon followed by others in Connecticut, New York, and other states. The object was to assist emigrants by reducing their travelling expenses, protecting them from imposition, and advising them with regard to the location of their claims, etc. This was done by organizing companies of emigrants, who were conducted by agents of the aid societies. Unquestionably the emigrant aid societies directed their attention, more particularly to the settlement of Kansas with free state settlers, and were the offspring of the new policy, which, in truth, invited to a race between the northern and southern emigrants. The organization of the societies at the north led to similar movements in the slave states, where emigration was organized to some extent on the principle ascribed to the northern societies — that of forcing their institutions upon the new territories.

Soon after the passage of the act, Francis Burt, of South Carolina, was appointed the first governor of Nebraska, and A. H. Reeder, of Pennsylvania, the first governor of Kansas. The governments were duly organized, and the contest, which had raged at the Capitol, was transferred to the new territories. Nebraska, the more northern and less attractive of the two, at first received the tide of emigration from the free states; but the more inviting plains and climate of Kansas, with the prospect of making it a free state, and perhaps love of adventure, induced many who had first gone to Nebraska to proceed to Kansas. Soon it became apparent that Kansas would be the scene of the struggle between free and slave labor, and emigrants went there as well from political reasons as on account of its greater natural advantages.

But before the tide of emigration had begun to flow from the older states, citizens of Missouri, residing along the border of that state, entered Kansas, took claims, held meetings in which they took action as settlers in the new territory, and in favor of establishing slavery there, and then returned to their homes, leaving a few men to take care of their interests. These acts on the part of citizens of Missouri were by no means few or limited, and possessing the advantages of neighborhood, and, in many cases, of influence at Washington, they were enabled to set up their claims to many of the most valuable tracts of land in the territory, as soon as treaties with the Indians had opened them to the white settlers.

Governor Reeder arrived in Kansas in October, 1854. In the following month an election was held for the choice of a delegate to Congress. At this election a large number of the people of the border counties in Missouri went over the boundary and voted at the various precincts. Mr. Whitfield, a gentleman nominated in Missouri, was elected, and it appeared at a subsequent investigation by a committee in Congress, that the illegal votes from Missouri considerably exceeded the whole number of legal votes of the territory. The proceedings at this election served to exasperate the free state settlers and their friends in the states, and the animosities of the conflicting parties in Kansas and throughout the country became more and more aroused as charges and recriminations followed. And thus the settlers entered upon their first winter in Kansas, subjected to the rigors of a civil contest as well as of the season.

CHAPTER III.

Mexican Boundary. — Gadsden Treaty. — Relations with Spain. — Black Warrior Affair. — Scheme for Annexation of Cuba. — Fillibustering Expedition. — Mr. Soulé, Minister to Spain. — His Course. — Ostend Conference. — Reciprocity Treaty with Great Britain. — Presidential Vetoes. — Results of Expedition to Japan. — Treaty. — Central American Affairs. — Bombardment of Greytown. — Southern Commercial Convention. — Supposed Schemes to extend Slavery. — Party Changes. — "Know Nothings."

THE boundary line between the United States and Mexico had not, up to the first session of the thirty-third Congress, (1853-4,) been settled satisfactorily, under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. There had been a difference of opinion between the commissioner and surveyor on the part of the United States, with regard to the initial point on the Rio Grande, the former fixing it considerably farther north than the latter. This was considered a mistake by the government, and the Mexicans taking a still more northern boundary, a dispute arose upon this and some other matters between the two governments. The minister appointed to Mexico by President Pierce, Mr. Gadsden, had received special instructions, with a view to a settlement of the matters in dispute. He succeeded in negotiating a treaty which added a large territory to the United States. The treaty as negotiated was very much modified by the senate when submitted to that body; the area of territory to be annexed to the United States being diminished, and the sum to be paid by the United States for this territory, and in consideration of being released from the obligation to protect the Mexican frontier from the Indians, being reduced to ten million dollars instead of twenty million dollars.

The boundary between the two republics, retaining the old line between the two Californias, was established by this treaty as follows: "Beginning in the Gulf of Mexico, three leagues from land, opposite the mouth of the Rio Grande, as provided in the fifth article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo; thence, as defined in said article up the middle of that river to the point where the parallel of $31^{\circ} 47'$ north latitude crosses the same; thence due west one hundred miles; thence south to the parallel of $31^{\circ} 20'$ north latitude; thence along the said parallel of $31^{\circ} 20'$ to the one hundred and eleventh meridian of longitude west of Greenwich; thence in a straight line to a point on the Colorado River twenty English miles below the junction of the Gila and Colorado Rivers; thence up the middle of said River Colorado until it intersects the present line between the United States and Mexico." This line added to the United States a territory much exceeding many of the Atlantic states in area, and subsequently, the inhabitants thereof petitioned that it might be set off from New Mexico and erected into a new territory under the name of Arizona. The request, however, was not granted, on the ground that the population was so small there was no necessity for a new territorial government. This treaty also partially conceded a grant for a railroad route across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, made provision for the payment of claims, and secured other privileges to the citizens of the United States. The treaty, however, even in its modified form, and the bill appropriating the ten million dollars to carry it into effect, were not passed without considerable debate.

The relations between the United States and Spain were somewhat disturbed, in the spring of 1854, by a new difficulty at Havana. The steamer Black Warrior, on her way from New Orleans to New York, touched as usual at Havana to leave and receive passengers. This steamer had previously aroused some suspicions, probably without much cause, on the part of the Cuban authorities, and on this occasion, finding some cotton on board, although her manifest certified she had no cargo, they declared the cargo confiscated. The owners represented that it was not usual to name in the manifest any cargo not intended for Havana, and that this case had only been according to repeated precedents. They also claimed the right of twelve days' time to correct any error in the manifest; but this was refused, and the commander of the steamer hauled down his flag and abandoned the vessel to the Spanish authorities. This affair at once aroused the indignation of the people of the United States, and in the Southern States the excitement was intense for a time. It was demanded that the neutrality laws should be suspended, so far as Spain was concerned; and had such action been taken, an overwhelming force of volunteers would soon have been organized to make a descent upon Cuba. Some very strong speeches were made in Congress in favor of this or any other mode of seizing Cuba, and thus removing at once the source of many troubles. But Congress was occupied much with the important domestic questions which agitated the country, and did not act in haste. Some time after the occurrence of the Black Warrior affair, Senator Sli-dell, of Louisiana, introduced a resolution authorizing the president to suspend the operation of the neutrality laws, so far as Spain is concerned, whenever in his judgment such a measure should be expedient. This resolution, supported as it was by a speech, which expressed strong sentiments against the supposed attempts of France and England to secure the abolition of slavery in Cuba, and in favor of annexing the island to the United States, excited no little attention, both at home and abroad, especially as at this time Mr. Soulé was pressing our demands for redress against the government at Madrid, and probably with some vehemence. The resolution was referred to the committee on foreign relations; but before any action was taken upon the subject, lawless men in some parts of the country were preparing to carry out the idea which Mr. Slidell's resolution suggested, and the president was obliged to issue a proclamation against the attempts which were being made to organize and fit out "a military expedition for the invasion of Cuba." This proclamation, and the instructions given to the civil and military officers, together, perhaps, with the remembrance of the fate of Lopez, had the effect to prevent another foolhardy descent upon the coveted island. But it was still hoped by some that the relations between the two governments would become so unfriendly, that such attempts would soon not only not be forbidden, but encouraged. Such a hope, perhaps, received some encouragement from the character and known sentiments of Mr. Soulé, the American minister at Madrid. Prior to his departure from the United States he addressed a company of Cuban exiles in New York, when he expressed himself in the strongest terms of sympathy with their cause, and avowed himself in favor of annexing Cuba, and of doing every thing in his power which became the dignity of the United States to secure the result desired. At Madrid, Mr. Soulé pressed the American claims for indemnity with much warmth, and was charged with rendering himself obnoxious in other ways to the Spanish government. He also had a serious misunderstanding with the secretary of the legation, which did not in its exposé add much to the credit of American diplomacy at the court of Madrid. After a visit to England, the French government prohibited him from entering France, having, it was said, taken offence at some of his acts which expressed sympathy with revolutionary schemes. This prohibition was the cause of some diplomatic correspondence, and the order was subsequently modified so as to permit Mr. Soulé to pass through France, but not to make any sojourn there. It was hoped on the one hand, and feared on the other, that the mission of such a diplomatist at Madrid would precipitate matters so as to lead to the acquisition of Cuba, either by conquest or purchase. But such a result was not brought about at this time.

It appears, however, that the subject of the acquisition of Cuba was seriously entertained by the administration; and while Mr. Soulé was envoy to Spain, a conference was held between Mr. Buchanan, envoy to England, Mr. Mason, envoy to France, and Mr. Soulé, pursuant to certain confidential instructions sent to them by the administration. This conference, known as the "Ostend conference," was held at Ostend, in Belgium, and subsequently at Aix-la-Chapelle, in Prussia. The various subjects of difficulty between the United States and Spain relative to Cuba were considered, and the result appears in the following despatch to the secretary of state, signed by the several ministers above named. This document proposed and advocated the acquisition of Cuba. The internal condition of the country, however, appears to have prevented any earnest attempt to carry out the proposition, even if the administration was ready to assume the responsibility of such a measure.

Mr. Soulé to Mr. Marcy.

"UNITED STATES LEGATION TO SPAIN, }
LONDON, October 20, 1854. }

"SIR: Herewith I have the honor to transmit to you a joint communication from Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Mason, and myself, embodying the result of our deliberations on the subject about which we had been desired to confer together.

"The issues, with reference to which we were instructed to express our judgment, were of too momentous an import not to tax all the discernment and discretion in our power; and it was with a deep sense of solemn responsibility that we entered upon the duties which had been assigned to us.

"May we have accomplished our task in a manner not unworthy of the great object for which it was conferred on us!

"My colleagues have had a full view of the difficulties and dangers which the question presents; and you will see that they have not hesitated to join me in the expression of sentiments according strikingly with the intimations repeatedly thrown out in your despatches to me.

"I do not know if we shall be found sufficiently explicit in the language through which we have attempted to convey our impressions; I trust, however, that it will be found sufficiently free from ambiguity to leave no room even for a doubt as to its true meaning.

"The question of the acquisition of Cuba by us is gaining ground as it grows to be more seriously agitated and considered. Now is the moment for us to be done with it; for if we delay its solution, we will certainly repent that we let escape the fairest opportunity we could ever be furnished with of bringing it to a decisive test.

"Present indications would seem to encourage the hope that we may come to that solution peaceably.

"But if it were otherwise — if it is to bring upon us the calamity of a war — let it be now, while the great powers of this continent are engaged in that stupendous struggle which cannot but engage all their strength, and tax all their energies, as long as it lasts, and may, before it ends, convulse them all.

"Neither England nor France would be likely to interfere with us.

"England could not bear to be suddenly shut out of our market; and see her manufactures paralyzed, even by a temporary suspension of her intercourse with us.

"And France, with the heavy task now on her hands, and when she so eagerly aspires to take her seat as the acknowledged chief of the European family, would have no inducement to assume the burden of another war, nor any motive to repine at seeing that we took in our keeping the destinies of the new world, as she will soon have those of the old.

"I close this despatch in haste, as I have no time left me to carry it further.

"Mr. McRae leaves for Liverpool within a few minutes. I intrust to him details which could not have easily found a place here, nor in the other despatch. He will impart to you what of my mind I am not able to pour out in these lines.

"Respectfully yours,

"PIERRE SOULÉ.

"Hon. WILLIAM L. MARCY, Secretary of State, &c."

Joint Communication from Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Mason, and Mr. Soulé.

"AIX-LA-CHAPELLE, October 18, 1854.

"SIR: The undersigned, in compliance with the wish expressed by the president in the several confidential despatches you have addressed to us, respectively, to that effect, have met, in conference, first at Ostend, in Belgium, on the 9th, 10th, and 11th inst., and then at Aix-la-Chapelle, in Prussia, on the days next following, up to the date hereof.

"There has been a full and unreserved interchange of views and sentiments between us, which we are most happy to inform you has resulted in a cordial coincidence of opinion on the grave and important subjects submitted to our consideration.

"We have arrived at the conclusion, and are thoroughly convinced, that an immediate and earnest effort ought to be made by the government of the United States to purchase Cuba from Spain at any price for which it can be obtained, not exceeding the sum of dollars.

"The proposal should, in our opinion, be made in such a manner as to be presented through the necessary diplomatic forms to the Supreme Constituent Cortes about to assemble. On this momentous question, in which the people both of Spain and the United States are so deeply interested, all our proceedings ought to be open, frank, and public. They should be of such a character as to challenge the approbation of the world.

"We firmly believe that, in the progress of human events, the time has arrived when the vital interests of Spain are as seriously involved in the sale, as those of the United States in the purchase, of the island, and that the transaction will prove equally honorable to both nations.

"Under these circumstances we cannot anticipate a failure, unless possibly through the malign influence of foreign powers who possess no right whatever to interfere in the matter.

"We proceed to state some of the reasons which have brought us to this conclusion, and, for the sake of clearness, we shall specify them under two distinct heads:—

"1. The United States ought, if practicable, to purchase Cuba with as little delay as possible.

"2. The probability is great that the government and Cortes of Spain will prove willing to sell it, because this would essentially promote the highest and best interests of the Spanish people.

"Then, 1. It must be clear to every reflecting mind that, from the peculiarity of its geographical position, and the considerations attendant on it, Cuba is as necessary to the North American republic as any of its present members, and that it belongs naturally to that great family of states of which the Union is the providential nursery.

"From its locality it commands the mouth of the Mississippi, and the immense and annually increasing trade which must seek this avenue to the ocean.

"On the numerous navigable streams, measuring an aggregate course of some thirty thousand miles, which disembogue themselves through this magnificent river into the Gulf of Mexico, the increase of the population within the last ten years amounts to more than that of the entire Union at the time Louisiana was annexed to it.

"The natural and main outlet to the products of this entire population, the highway of their direct intercourse with the Atlantic and the Pacific states, can never be secure, but must ever be endangered, whilst Cuba is a dependency of a distant power, in whose possession it has proved to be a source of constant annoyance and embarrassment to their interests.

"Indeed, the Union can never enjoy repose, nor possess reliable security, as long as Cuba is not embraced within its boundaries.

"Its immediate acquisition by our government is of paramount importance, and we cannot doubt but that it is a consummation devoutly wished for by its inhabitants.

"The intercourse which its proximity to our coasts begets and encourages between them and the citizens of the United States, has, in the progress of time, so united their interests and blended their fortunes, that they now look upon each other as if they were one people, and had but one destiny.

"Considerations exist which render delay in the acquisition of this island exceedingly dangerous to the United States.

"The system of immigration and labor lately organized within its limits, and the tyranny and oppression which characterize its immediate rulers, threaten an insurrection at every moment which may result in direful consequences to the American people.

"Cuba has thus become to us an unceasing danger, and a permanent cause of anxiety and alarm.

"But we need not enlarge on these topics. It can scarcely be apprehended that foreign powers, in violation of international law, would interpose their influence with Spain to prevent our acquisition of the island. Its inhabitants are now suffering under the worst of all possible governments — that of absolute despotism, delegated by a distant power to irresponsible agents, who are changed at short intervals, and who are tempted to improve the brief opportunity thus afforded to accumulate fortunes by the basest means.

"As long as this system shall endure, humanity may in vain demand the suppression of the African slave trade in the island. This is rendered impossible whilst that infamous traffic remains an irresistible temptation and a source of immense profit to needy and avaricious officials, who, to attain their ends, scruple not to trample the most sacred principles under foot.

"The Spanish government at home may be well disposed, but experience has proved that it cannot control these remote depositaries of its power.

"Besides, the commercial nations of the world cannot fail to perceive and appreciate the great advantages which would result to their people from a dissolution of the forced and unnatural connection between Spain and Cuba, and the annexation of the latter to the United States. The trade of England and France with Cuba would, in that event, assume at once an important and profitable character, and rapidly extend with the increasing population and prosperity of the island.

"2. But if the United States, and every commercial nation, would be benefited by this transfer, the interests of Spain would also be greatly and essentially promoted.

"She cannot but see what such a sum of money as we are willing to pay for the island would effect in the development of her vast natural resources.

"Two thirds of this sum, if employed in the construction of a system of railroads, would ultimately prove a source of greater wealth to the Spanish people than that opened to their vision by Cortez. Their prosperity would date from the ratification of the treaty of cession.

"France has already constructed continuous lines of railways from Havre, Marseilles, Valenciennes, and Strasbourg, via Paris, to the Spanish frontier, and anxiously awaits the day when Spain shall find herself in a condition to extend these roads through her northern provinces to Madrid, Seville, Cadiz, Malaga, and the frontiers of Portugal.

"This object once accomplished, Spain would become a centre of attraction for the travelling world, and secure a permanent and profitable market for her various productions. Her fields, under the stimulus given to industry by remunerating prices, would teem with cereal grain, and her vineyards would bring forth a vastly increased quantity of choice wines. Spain would speedily become, what a bountiful Providence intended she should be, one of the first nations of continental Europe — rich, powerful, and contented.

"Whilst two thirds of the price of the island would be ample for the completion of her most important public improvements, she might, with the remaining forty millions, satisfy the demands now pressing so heavily upon her credit, and create a sinking fund which would gradually relieve her from the overwhelming debt now paralyzing her energies.

"Such is her present wretched financial condition, that her best bonds are sold upon her own Bourse at about one third of their par value; whilst another class, on which she pays no interest, have but a nominal value, and are quoted at about one sixth of the amount for which they were issued. Besides, these latter are held principally by British creditors, who may, from day to day, obtain the effective interposition of their own government for the purpose of coercing payment. Intimations to that effect have been already thrown out from high quarters, and unless some new source of revenue shall enable Spain to provide for such exigencies, it is not improbable that they may be realized.

"Should Spain reject the present golden opportunity for developing her resources, and removing her financial embarrassments, it may never again return.

"Cuba, in its palmiest days, never yielded her exchequer, after deducting the expenses of its government, a clear annual income of more than a million and a half of dollars. These expenses have increased to such a degree as to leave a deficit chargeable on the treasury of Spain to the amount of six hundred thousand dollars.

"In a pecuniary point of view, therefore, the island is an encumbrance, instead of a source of profit, to the mother country.

"Under no probable circumstances can Cuba ever yield to Spain one per cent. on the large amount which the United States are willing to pay for its acquisition. But Spain is in imminent danger of losing Cuba, without remuneration.

"Extreme oppression, it is now universally admitted, justifies any people in endeavoring to relieve themselves from the yoke of their oppressors. The sufferings which the corrupt, arbitrary, and unrelenting local administration necessarily entails upon the inhabitants of Cuba, cannot fail to stimulate and keep alive that spirit of resistance and revolution against Spain, which has, of late years, been so often manifested. In this condition of affairs it is vain to expect that the sympathies of the people of the United States will not be warmly enlisted in favor of their oppressed neighbors.

"We know that the president is justly inflexible in his determination to execute the neutrality laws; but should the Cubans themselves rise in revolt against the oppression which they suffer, no human power could prevent citizens of the United States and liberal-minded men of other countries from rushing to their assistance. Besides, the present is an age of adventure, in which restless and daring spirits abound in every portion of the world.

"It is not improbable, therefore, that Cuba may be wrested from Spain by a successful revolution; and in that event she will lose both the island and the price which we are now willing to pay for it — a price far beyond what was ever paid by one people to another for any province.

"It may also be remarked that the settlement of this vexed question, by the cession of Cuba to the United States, would forever prevent the dangerous complications between nations, to which it may otherwise give birth.

"It is certain that, should the Cubans themselves organize an insurrection against the Spanish government, and should other independent nations come to the aid of Spain in the contest, no human power could, in our opinion, prevent the people and government of the United States from taking part in such a civil war in support of their neighbors and friends.

"But if Spain, deaf to the voice of her own interest, and actuated by stubborn pride and a false sense of honor, should refuse to sell Cuba to the United States, then the question will arise, What ought to be the course of the American government under such circumstances?

"Self-preservation is the first law of nature, with states as well as with individuals. All nations have, at different periods, acted upon this maxim. Although it has been made the pretext for committing flagrant injustice, as in the partition of Poland, and other similar cases which history records, yet the principle itself, though often abused, has always been recognized.

"The United States have never acquired a foot of territory except by fair purchase, or, as in the case of Texas, upon the free and voluntary application of the people of that independent state, who desired to blend their destinies with our own.

"Even our acquisitions from Mexico are no exception to this rule, because, although we might have claimed them by the right of conquest in a just war, yet we purchased them for what was then considered by both parties a full and ample equivalent.

"Our past history forbids that we should acquire the Island of Cuba without the consent of Spain, unless justified by the great law of self-preservation. We must, in any event, preserve our own conscious rectitude and our own self-respect.

"Whilst pursuing this course we can afford to disregard the censures of the world, to which we have been so often and so unjustly exposed.

"After we shall have offered Spain a price for Cuba far beyond its present value, and this shall have been refused, it will then be time to consider the question, Does Cuba, in the possession of Spain, seriously endanger our internal peace and the existence of our cherished Union?

"Should this question be answered in the affirmative, then, by every law, human and divine, we shall be justified in wresting it from Spain if we possess the power; and this upon the very same principle that would justify an individual in tearing down the burning house of his neighbor if there were no other means of preventing the flames from destroying his own home.

"Under such circumstances we ought neither to count the cost nor regard the odds which Spain might enlist against us. We forbear to enter into the question, whether the present condition of the island would justify such a measure. We should, however, be recreant to our duty, be unworthy of our gallant forefathers, and commit base treason against our posterity, should we permit Cuba to be Africanized and become a second St. Domingo, with all its attendant horrors to the white race, and suffer the flames to extend to our own neighboring shores, seriously to endanger or actually to consume the fair fabric of our Union.

"We fear that the course and current of events are rapidly tending towards such a catastrophe. We, however, hope for the best, though we ought certainly to be prepared for the worst.

"We also forbear to investigate the present condition of the questions at issue between the United States and Spain. A long series of injuries to our people have been committed in Cuba by Spanish officials, and are unredressed. But recently a most flagrant outrage on the rights of American citizens and on the flag of the United States was perpetrated in the harbor of Havana, under circumstances which, without immediate redress, would have justified a resort to measures of war in vindication of national honor. That outrage is not only unatoned, but the Spanish government has deliberately sanctioned the acts of its subordinates, and assumed the responsibility attaching to them.

"Nothing could more impressively teach us the danger to which those peaceful relations it has ever been the policy of the United States to cherish with foreign nations are constantly exposed than the circumstances of that case. Situated as Spain and the United States are, the latter have forborne to resort to extreme measures.

"But this course cannot, with due regard to their own dignity as an independent nation, continue; and our recommendations, now submitted, are dictated by the firm belief that the cession of Cuba to the United States, with stipulations as beneficial to Spain as those suggested, is the only effective mode of settling all past differences, and of securing the two countries against future collisions.

"We have already witnessed the happy results for both countries which followed a similar arrangement in regard to Florida.

"Yours, very respectfully,

"JAMES BUCHANAN,

"J. Y. MASON,

"PIERRE SOULÉ.

"HON. WILLIAM L. MARCY, Secretary of State."

During this year (1854) another treaty was negotiated between the United States and Great Britain, providing for commercial reciprocity between the states and the British provinces. This treaty opened the British fisheries, with the exception of those of Newfoundland, to American fishermen, and gave the British fishermen a right to participate in American fisheries as far as the thirty-sixth degree of north latitude. It also provided for free commerce between the provinces and the United States, in flour, breadstuffs, fruits, fish, lumber, animals, and many other articles in an unmanufactured state. Further provisions were made for free navigation of rivers, and an effort towards a reciprocal opening of canals. This treaty was required to be ratified by the several provincial legislatures, which was promptly done, and the requisite steps were taken to carry out its provisions. Advantages were reaped on both sides, but it has generally been considered that, from the nature of the case, the British provinces have been the greatest gainers. Nevertheless, at a much more recent date, they have proposed to lay a tariff on many articles received through the United States under the reciprocity treaty, with a view of encouraging the commerce of their own ports. This policy, if carried out, of course ends the reciprocity so far, and may lead to an abrogation of the treaty entirely.

Among the acts passed by the thirty-third

Congress, at its first session, was one granting ten million acres of the public lands to the several states for the benefit of the indigent insane. This bill was vetoed by the president, who expressed at length his objections to its provisions. He denied that the constitution conferred any power on the general government to make such appropriations, and considered that it would be a dangerous precedent, and would lead to a reversal of the true theory of the government. He feared, moreover, that if Congress were thus to assume the offices of charity which properly belong to the local authorities, the several states, instead of relying on their own resources for such objects, would become suppliants for the bounty of the federal government, and that the fountains of charity would thus be dried up at home. He objected, further, that the public lands are held for the common benefit of the several states, and that they are also pledged for the payment of certain portions of the public debt. He therefore was opposed to the principle of the bill, both on the ground of right and expediency.

Another bill which passed through both houses of Congress was one making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works of internal improvement. This bill, which passed at the close of the session, was also vetoed by the president, but he did not give his reasons for so doing until the next session, when he sent a message to Congress on this subject. In this message the president expressed his strong opposition to any internal improvements by the federal government, and his vetoes showed that he was disposed to adhere to a strict construction of the powers of Congress to make appropriations for any thing beyond the wants of the government.

The expedition to Japan, under Commodore Perry, which had sailed in 1852, for the purpose of attempting to open that country to American commerce, as mentioned in a preceding book, (page 533,) succeeded in accomplishing its purpose. Commodore Perry arrived in the Japanese waters, with quite a formidable squadron, in the summer of 1853, when, with much formality, for the purpose of impressing the Japanese, he delivered the president's letter to officers appointed to receive it. Having done this he left, with the declaration that he should return for a reply, and to accomplish his mission by negotiating a treaty. The next winter he accordingly returned to the Bay of Yedo with his squadron, and met certain Japanese commissioners who were appointed to confer with him. He then received an answer from the imperial government in reply to the president's letter, and subsequently (March 31, 1854) negotiated a treaty of amity, which was the first step towards opening this hitherto secluded country to the western nations. The following is the reply to the president's letter, which is important as being the first step on the part of the Japanese government towards acceding to the wishes of "outside" nations:—

Translation of Answer to the Letter of the President to the Emperor of Japan.

"The return of your excellency as ambassador of the United States to this empire has been expected, according to the letter of his majesty the president, which letter your excellency delivered last year to his majesty the emperor of this empire.

"It is quite impossible to give satisfactory answers at once to all the proposals of your government, as it is most positively forbidden by the laws of our imperial ancestors; but for us to continue attached to the ancient laws, seems to misunderstand the spirit of the age; however, we are governed now by imperative necessity.

"At the visit of your excellency last year to this empire, his majesty, the former emperor, was sick, and is now dead. Subsequently, his majesty, the present emperor, ascended the throne; the many occupations in consequence thereof are not yet finished, and there is no time to settle other business thoroughly. Moreover, his majesty, the new emperor, at the accession to the throne, promised to the princes and high officers of the empire to observe the laws. It is therefore evident that he cannot now bring about any alteration in the ancient laws.

"Last autumn, at the departure of the Dutch ship, the superintendent of the Dutch trade in Japan was requested to inform your government of this event, and a reply in writing has been received.

"At Nagasaki arrived recently the Russian ambassador to communicate a wish of his government. He has since left the said place, because no answer would be given to any nation that might communicate similar wishes. However, we admit the urgency of, and shall entirely comply with, the proposals of your government concerning wood, water, provisions, and the saving of ships and their crews in distress. After being informed which harbor your excellency selects, the harbor shall be prepared; which preparation, it is estimated, will take about five years. Meanwhile, a commencement can be made with the coal at Nagasaki by the next Japanese first month, (Sio-goots) [16th of February, 1855.]

"Having no precedent with respect to coal, we request your excellency to furnish us with an estimate, and, upon due consideration, this will be complied with, if not in opposition to our laws. What do you understand by provisions, and how much coal?

"Finally, any thing ships may be in want of, that can be furnished from the productions of this empire, shall be supplied; the prices of merchandise and articles of barter to be fixed by Kurakawa Kahei and Morgama Yenoske.

After settling the points before mentioned, the treaty can be concluded and signed at the next interview.

"Seals attached by order of the high gentlemen.
MORGAMA YENOSKE."

The treaty was negotiated on the basis of the treaty between the United States and China. It opened certain ports in Japan, to a certain extent, for American vessels, and secured to Americans certain privileges not previously enjoyed by any foreigners in the way of obtaining supplies of provisions, water, and coal. Although no great advantages were to be derived immediately from this treaty, it is probably the foundation of increasing and important benefits in the future. Russia, France, and England, encouraged by the success of the American expedition, followed in the same course, and negotiated similar treaties. More recently, important concessions have been obtained by new treaty engagements negotiated by Mr. Townsend Harris, the United States consul and diplomatic agent in Japan, who has also aided the English in securing a favorable treaty.

A less satisfactory expedition was that of the United States ship Cyane, which the government considered it necessary to send to San Juan del Norte, or Greytown, in Nicaragua, to punish the inhabitants or rulers for certain offences against the property and rights of the "Transit Company"—a company composed of Americans, but organized under authority from the Nicaraguan government, for the transportation of passengers across the isthmus. In anticipation of the establishment of this route, a considerable number of adventurers had settled in the old Spanish town at the mouth of the River San Juan, and at first claiming allegiance to the pretended sovereign of the Mosquito territory, afterwards assumed an independent position. They claimed juris-isdiction over Punta Arenas, a place on the opposite side of the river, where the depot of the Transit Company was located, and which was held by a title from the Nicaraguan government. The company resisted the claim, and thereupon a petty warfare and robbery was commenced by the people, and, perhaps, by the authorities of Greytown, as the town was now called. These things had proceeded to such a pass, that the interposition of the government was deemed necessary to protect the lives and property of American citizens. There appeared, however, to be a difficulty in dealing with this affair, as the people of Greytown held no allegiance to any established government of which the United States could claim indemnity for losses or security in the future. They stood before the world as it were upon "sufferance," and were regarded by the United States government as a band of marauders, to be treated as outlaws. Whether this conclusion was just, we cannot here decide; but acting on this judgment, the government sent the sloop-of-war Cyane to support a demand that the people of Greytown should repair the injuries done to the citizens of the United States, and make apology for an insult which they had offered to the United States minister to Nicaragua. The demand was made, and the commander of the Cyane made every exertion to obtain an adjustment, without resorting to extreme measures; but his efforts failed. He then took measures to guard against a loss of life, and bombarded the town, almost or wholly destroying its buildings, and a considerable amount of property. This transaction was the subject of complaint on the part of some foreign powers, the property of whose subjects, it was alleged, was destroyed by the bombardment. These complaints, however, were satisfactorily disposed of by Mr. Marcy, who argued that the people, or authorities of Greytown, were the parties liable for the losses.

The assembling of a convention of delegates from several of the southern states, at Charleston, in April, 1854, is an event which should be recorded, rather on account of the expectations of those interested, than of any important results which have as yet followed. It was held for the purpose of devising measures to promote the interests and independence of the slaveholding section of the Union. The project of a railroad to the Pacific by a southern route was the principal topic of discussion, and the opinion of the convention was that such a road ought to be constructed by the Southern States. Resolutions were also adopted in favor of acquiring the right to navigate the River Amazon, of promoting manufactures in the south, and of opening direct commercial intercourse with Europe; the object of all being to make the Southern States independent of the Northern States. Since that time several similar conventions have been held for the same purpose, and various interests of the Southern States have been discussed, even to a reopening of the slave trade. The conventions have all passed resolutions in favor of measures to promote the prosperity and independence of the slaveholding states, but the practical results have not been very manifest.

It was perhaps the language used in the Charleston convention, as well as by the southern press, together with the Cuban invasions which were known to be attempted, and other events of the year, and the recent repeal of the Missouri compromise, that induced the opponents of the latter measure in Congress, in a protest which they issued subsequent to its passage, to ascribe that passage to a scheme which "looked to a wider extension of slavery — to the annexation of Cuba and portions of Mexico at any cost, whether of money or blood — to a war with England, France, and Spain, and an alliance with Russia — to the immediate annexation of the eastern portion of St. Domingo, with a view to the ultimate conquest of the whole island — to an alliance with Brazil, and the extension of slavery in the valley of the Amazon — and, finally, to the withdrawal of the slaveholding states from the Union, and the establishment of a separate empire in the central regions of the continent." This protest was assailed with ridicule and severity by representatives of the Southern States. Whether such schemes were widely considered or not, the results have not been altogether realized, though it is by no means improbable that some such designs really occupied the minds of a few.

The year 1854 was a memorable one in the history of parties in the United States, and some most unexpected revolutions took place, in which a new party, popularly styled "Know Nothings," succeeded to the power held by the Whigs or Democrats in different states and cities. Ten or twelve years before this, a strong sentiment of opposition to political action by persons of foreign birth had grown up, especially in some of the large cities. This feeling led to some serious collisions between native citizens and foreigners, and riot and bloodshed followed. A Native American party was organized, and in some places, as in Philadelphia, partially succeeded for a time. But issues of more general interest to the country, and of more pressing consequence, overshadowed this question, which affected directly only portions of the country, and the Native American party gradually resolved into its original elements. But the elements still existed, and it seems that it was only necessary that an opportunity should offer for them to be more effectually organized. The decay and dissolution of one of the great parties of the country — the Whigs — in consequence of its defeat in the presidential election of 1852, and the rise of questions on which it was divided, offered an opportunity for such a reorganization of the Native American party, and it was improved in a most remarkable manner. One or more secret orders of Americans already existed, and it was upon the basis of such secret societies that the new party was built up. Its cardinal principles were Americanism and Protestantism — that “Americans shall rule America,” and that this rule should exclude the influence of any other power, political or ecclesiastical. It was not difficult to find supporters among a people who really cherished both these sentiments at heart; and when, too, the indefinable charm of secrecy was thrown over the movement it succeeded beyond all precedent. It was essentially democratic in some respects, and despotic and aristocratic in others; in the former character it appealed to the middling interest and laboring portion of the community, while in the latter it was enabled to carry forward its purposes more effectually. The organization, once fairly begun, extended very rapidly over almost the whole country. Its strength was known only to the members of the party, and so secretly were its operations carried on, that the other political parties knew but little about it, except that it existed and was rumored to be strong in numbers. The party first made itself felt at municipal elections in several of the states, where it triumphed in a manner which overwhelmed its opponents with surprise and consternation. In the state elections it next appeared, and carried several of the states in a manner equally surprising, and in some instances with unprecedented majorities. It is to be regretted that the peaceful contest of the ballot-box was in some cases attended with riot and bloodshed.

Although this new American party was composed, in part, of those who had before acted with the Democratic party, the mass of it would appear to have been those who had previously acted with the Whigs, and, in some of the states, with the Free-soil party. Its position, therefore, on the slavery question, was adverse to that of the Democratic party, and, in some parts of the Union, the party was fully committed to strong “Free-soil” sentiments. The general result of the elections in 1854–55 was the choice of a small majority of American and Free-soil or Republican members of the house of representatives in the next Congress, as well as of state officers. The Whigs who had supported the repeal of the Missouri compromise passed at once, or by degrees, into the Democratic party, and the old Whig party, as such, lost its organization, and almost entirely disappeared from the political field.

CHAPTER IV.

Thirty-third Congress, second Session. — Financial Prosperity. — Honor to General Scott. — Presidential Vetoes. — French Spoliation Bill. — American Diplomacy in Europe. — Kinney’s Expedition to Central America. — Kansas. — Population. — Election Frauds and Violence. — Governor Reeder. — Course of the Legislature. — Code of Laws. — Removal of Governor Reeder. — Governor Shannon. — Delegate to Congress. — Topeka Convention. — Leavenworth Convention. — Exasperation and Collisions among Settlers. — Invasion from Missouri. — Danish Sound Dues. — Dr. Kane’s Arctic Expedition. — Return of the Resolute.

WHILE parties were yet in a transition state, the second session of the thirty-third Congress was held. Whatever the condition of affairs in the United States in other respects, at this time, its finances were in a flourishing state. The president’s message stated that the available resources for the year were nearly ninety-five millions five hundred thousand dollars; the ordinary expenditures, fifty-one millions eighteen thousand two hundred and forty-nine dollars; payment on the public debt, twenty-four millions three hundred and thirty-six thousand three hundred and eighty dollars; leaving a balance in the treasury of twenty millions one hundred and thirty-seven thousand nine hundred and sixty-seven dollars. The public debt remaining unpaid was about forty-five millions dollars, payable at different periods within fourteen years. The receipts from the tariff continued to be so large that, when possible, the public debt had been redeemed in advance of its maturity, and the prospective income promised to exceed, by many millions, the wants of an economical administration of the government—an embarrassment which nations do not often experience.

The proceedings of Congress at this session do not require special mention. There were, in the debates, occasional discussions of some warmth in relation to the repeal of the Missouri compromise, and the condition of affairs in Kansas; but the state of parties in the country was so changed from the previous year, and so unsettled, that quiet generally prevailed, and no measure, involving the principles in which so much interest was felt, was brought in to renew and continue the agitation.

Among the measures adopted was one which paid a well-deserved honor to that distinguished soldier, General Winfield Scott. A joint resolution was passed by Congress, authorizing the president to confer the title of lieutenant-general by brevet, in a single instance, for distinguished services. This title was conferred on General Scott, whom Congress and the nation intended to be thus justly honored. The title took effect from the time of the close of the Mexican war, and carried with it the pay and emoluments from that time. Another measure of some importance which was adopted, was the establishment of a Court of Claims, for the purpose of hearing and adjudicating claims against the government, the report of the court going to Congress for final action. Another reorganized the diplomatic and consular service, fixing the salaries of ministers according to the grade of their mission, and giving consuls fixed salaries instead of fees. A retired list in the navy was provided for, and four regiments were added to the army.

At this session President Pierce again exercised the veto power, in two instances. A bill calculated to do tardy justice to many honest and some suffering claimants was passed, authorizing the establishment of a commission to investigate and pay the losses sustained by American citizens from French spoliation on American commerce. These claims had been before Congress for a long time, and several times, when it was supposed they were about to be allowed, some failure occurred which deferred their hopes. The government had assumed the payment of the claims, in its negotiations with the French government, and it seemed but just to those who had suffered that they should be promptly paid. The chief argument urged against the payment of the claims was, that they had passed into the hands of other parties in many cases, and often for a trifling consideration. This, however, was not the case universally, and the fact, that in the course of many years necessity had obliged some sufferers to part with their claims, proved only that the payment should have been made long before. This bill, which had, after long trial, passed both houses of Congress, was vetoed by the president, and failing to receive the requisite two-thirds vote on the question of passing it over the veto, the long-pressed claims remained unsatisfied, notwithstanding the treasury was overflowing. The other bill which failed to receive the executive approval was one to increase the annual appropriation to the Collins line of steamers for mail service. But this bill, with an amendment which retained to Congress the right to discontinue the allowance on giving six months' notice, was appended to the naval appropriation bill, and in this way passed both houses and became a law.

It was on the last day of the session, March 3, 1855, that the president transmitted to Congress the correspondence relating to Cuba and claims against Spain, including the Ostend conference, which we have given in a previous page. Had this subject come before Congress earlier in the session, it would probably have elicited a spirited debate, involving a discussion of the extension of slave territory as well as the policy of annexing a population so different from that of the United States.

It may be stated here that American diplomacy had not been idle in other parts of Europe, during the preceding year. Mr. Buchanan was endeavoring to make a settlement of the misunderstanding which had arisen between the United States and England, in relation to Central American affairs. Negotiations had been proceeding in Denmark with a view to secure the abolition of the "Sound dues." The war between the western powers and Russia had afforded an opportunity to propose conventions with the several powers of Europe, embracing the rule that "free ships make free goods," and also that neutral property, other than contraband, on board enemies' ships, should be exempt from confiscation. Russia had promptly entered into such a convention; England and France announced their purpose to observe it in the present war; some of the smaller powers assented to the doctrine as just, without forming any treaty; and Prussia accepted it with an addition that privateering should be abolished—a proposition not agreed to by our government. Although the rule was not adopted by all the powers, it is quite probable that it will in time enter into the international code as a settled principle. In Central America, an emigrating expedition organized by a Colonel Kinney and others, and designed to settle in that part of Nicaragua known as the Mosquito Coast and claimed to belong to the Mosquito king, but also claimed by Nicaragua, was the occasion of some diplomatic correspondence. It was not, however, an affair which really concerned the government at that stage, and hardly enters into the history of this country. Nor was diplomacy at rest in the Sandwich Islands, where a treaty for the annexation of the islands to the United States was framed, with some prospect of its being carried to a successful result; but the king dying, his successor ordered a discontinuance of negotiations, and the project was not consummated.

After the adjournment of Congress, public attention was soon directed to affairs in Kansas, where an election of members of the territorial legislature took place on the 30th of March. A census was taken, by order of the governor, in January, when it appeared that there were eight thousand five hundred and one inhabitants in the territory, exclusive of Indians. Of these, five thousand one hundred and twenty-eight were males, and three thousand three hundred and seventy-three females; and three thousand four hundred and sixty-nine were minors, and there were two thousand nine hundred and five voters. At the time of the election the number of voters was probably somewhat increased by the arrival of new settlers, but it is not probable that the number exceeded three thousand five hundred. There were, however, six thousand three hundred and twenty votes cast, and all the persons elected, both to the council and the house of representatives, with one exception in each branch, were the candidates of the pro-slavery party, and some of them residents of Missouri. It was apparent from the vote, as well as from the events and proceedings of the day, that the election was fraudulent, and the subsequent investigations of a committee of the house of representatives in Congress revealed the extent of the fraud. It appeared that about five thousand illegal votes were cast, nearly or quite all of which were given by citizens or residents of Missouri, who entered the territory a day or two before the election, and left it again a day or two after it. The congressional committee, in their report, say,—

"By an organized movement, which extended from Andrew County in the north to Jasper County in the south, and as far eastward as Boone and Cole Counties, companies of men were arranged in regular parties, and sent into every council district in the territory, and into every representative district but one. The numbers were so distributed as to control the election in each district. They went to vote, and with the avowed purpose of making Kansas a slave state. They were generally armed and equipped, carried with them their own provisions and tents, and so marched into the territory. The details of this invasion, from the mass of testimony taken by your committee, are so voluminous, that we can here state but the leading facts elicited."

The facts thus elicited were, that the invaders took possession of the polls, and by threats and violence prevented legitimate voters from exercising their privilege; or the latter, in some cases, finding the polls in the possession of armed Missourians, refused to participate in the election. The details of the fraudulent and riotous proceedings in many of the voting precincts were stated by the committee, and were proved by a large number of witnesses, of all parties, residents of Missouri as well as of Kansas.

This violation of the rights of actual settlers aroused the greatest indignation throughout the territory, and the flame soon spread through the country. The frauds were so apparent, that the elections might have been set aside in nearly all the districts, had there been time to contest them and to present the facts. But four days only being allowed for the presentation of protests, and the territory being so large, it was impossible to take the necessary steps and get the evidence before the governor within that time. Protests were sent in from six districts, however, and the frauds were so proven that new elections were ordered. In Leavenworth there was another "invasion," but in the other districts the free state party had a large majority of the votes.

During this period there were many scenes of violence in the territory, the pro-slavery party — mostly residents of Missouri — being determined to drive out the free state settlers and make Kansas a slave state. If, subsequently, parties of the free state men also committed outrages, such a course is without doubt to be attributed to the violence and bloodshed with which they were assailed from the beginning by the men who were known throughout the land as "border ruffians."

Governor Reeder rendered himself obnoxious to the pro-slavery party by refusing certificates of election in the cases where frauds had been proved, and they resolved that the new election should be held void. The governor visited the east after the elections, and on his return he was assailed by one of the leading men of that party in a very violent manner, and from this time he was held of no account by the party which controlled the legislature. When the legislature assembled, they ousted the several members chosen at the second election, and gave their places to the members fraudulently elected at the first election. They also expelled the only free state member of the council, elected at the first election, and gave the seat to his competitor; and the free state member of the house then resigned. They had been convened by the governor at Pawnee, but they passed a bill adjourning to the Shawnee Mission, a place but one mile from the Missouri line. This bill was vetoed by the governor, but was passed over the veto by a two-thirds vote. The governor then declared the legislature dissolved by the act of removal, as in his opinion the organic act vested the power of fixing the seat of government in the governor. But the legislature adjourned, notwithstanding the arguments of the governor, and at the Shawnee Mission they proceeded to legislate.

This work was accomplished by taking a great part of the Missouri code, with additional provisions, more stringent, substituting the word "territory" for "state" wherever necessary, — and this, in some cases, by a separate bill. In this way, in the course of a comparatively short session, they passed a code of laws which made a large volume, equalling in bulk the revised codes of some of the older states. Among the acts passed were such as these: giving the right to vote to any man, without regard to residence, on the payment of one dollar, and taking oaths to support the Kansas act and the fugitive slave law; requiring all officers to take the same oaths; making all county and local officers elective by the legislature instead of the people; forbidding the teaching of negroes to read, and the holding of religious meetings of negroes, unless a sheriff, constable, or county justice should be present; forbidding any person who was conscientiously opposed to holding slaves, or who did not admit the right to hold slaves in the territory, from acting as a juror in any case connected with slavery; prescribing the penalty of death for inciting rebellion among the slaves, by speaking, writing, or printing, or for enticing or assisting any slave to escape from his master; with other similar provisions, designed to establish slavery in the territory, and to bear oppressively upon the free state settlers. The legislature concluded its labors by sending a memorial to the president requesting him to remove Governor Reeder.

This request was seconded by persons of influence with the administration, and charges affecting the official integrity of the governor were presented. Whether these charges were well founded or not, it was clear that the governor was not coöperating with the party which sympathized with the administration, and he was removed. After a brief season, in which Mr. Woodson, the territorial secretary, was acting governor, Wilson Shannon, of Ohio, was appointed as Governor Reeder's successor.

Such legislation as that adopted by the territorial legislature naturally aroused great indignation among the actual settlers of the territory, and many of those who had emigrated from Missouri, and who had at first sympathized with the pro-slavery party, took ground against these acts, and sided with the free state men. A mass convention was held at Lawrence, where resolutions were adopted repudiating the action of a legislature which had been imposed upon the territory by the people of Missouri. A convention of settlers from all parts of the territory was subsequently held, where similar resolutions were adopted, and the people were called upon to unite in the resistance of usurpation, even by force of arms, if necessary. Ex-Governor Reeder was nominated for delegate to Congress, to be voted for in October. But to guard against another "invasion," which should prevent a proper expression of the wishes of the actual settlers, as well as to repudiate the law requiring test oaths of voters, it was resolved to vote on the 9th of October, and to abstain from voting on the 1st, the day fixed by the territorial legislature for the election. The result was, that Mr. Whitfield was elected on the 1st, and Mr. Reeder on the 9th; but it was claimed that the latter received a larger vote than the former, and was the choice of a very large majority of the actual inhabitants of the territory. It was for the national house of representatives to decide which was entitled to the seat.

It should be observed that the free state men who thus organized against the pro-slavery party of Missourians, were by no means "abolitionists," but men who felt that it was for the interest of free white labor, and for the interest of Kansas, that slavery should be excluded from the territory. They repudiated the charge of abolitionism, and in one of their resolutions expressed a determination that no negro, bond or free, should be brought into the state. They also claimed, as American citizens and under the organic act, the right to make laws for themselves, and not to have obnoxious laws imposed upon them by the people of a neighboring state. Whatever may have been the mistakes they made, or the violent proceedings alleged against some of them, they rightfully organized on the principles just named.

At the same time that Ex-Governor Reeder was elected to Congress, the free state men chose delegates to attend a convention for the purpose of framing a state constitution, with the view of applying to Congress for admission into the Union. This convention was held at Topeka, in the latter part of October, 1855. It was composed of men of all shades of political opinion, and coming from every part of the Union, but they were united in a common purpose to make Kansas a free state. There was considerable ability, and every variety of character there, and the members, bringing together the principles and ideas of the constitutions of the states from which they had emigrated, succeeded in framing a constitution which would compare favorably with that of any western state. It provided that slavery should not exist in the state, but permitted those slaves then in the territory to be held in it till July 4th, 1857. Provisions were made for education, and for an elective judiciary, with the other provisions for the organization and choice of the state government. Two addenda were also made, to be submitted as separate articles to the vote of the people. One of these was a provision for a free banking system, and the other was a resolution of instructions to the first legislature, requiring them to pass a law to exclude free blacks from the state. The latter provision was adopted as an illustration that the free state men were not the "abolitionists" they were charged with being by their opponents.

Soon after the Topeka convention, the pro-slavery party held a convention at Leavenworth, at which Governor Shannon presided, and was one of the principal speakers. This convention was styled a "law and order" convention, as it was in favor of supporting and enforcing the laws passed by the legislature at the Shawnee Mission. The course of the free state men was condemned in the strongest terms, and the Topeka convention was called a treasonable assembly, which, if recognized by Congress, would lead to civil war.

Undoubtedly the opponents of the free state settlers looked upon Kansas as, of right, belonging to the slaveholding portion of the Union. The repeal of the Missouri compromise was regarded by them as intended to open this territory unquestionably to slavery, and any thing which was done to make it a free state, even the mere emigration of free state settlers, was considered by them as an invasion of their rights. Many of these men were, without doubt, honest in their opinions, but their rough mode of dealing with affairs, and the exciting character of the question at issue, carried them to extremes in their determination to protect their assumed rights, and they resorted to violence in order to defeat, dishearten, and drive out the free state settlers.

While men of both parties thus became exasperated on political issues, there were frequent collisions in relation to claims of lands, and in case the disputants were on different sides of the great question, the quarrels became violent, and ended in many cases in bloodshed. But even here it is only justice to say, that the violence was commenced and was carried to the greatest extremes by those who contended that slavery was of right to be established in the territory. They were, for the most part, men more accustomed to such proceedings than were the free state settlers. It was one of these collisions, in which a free state man was shot, that led by degrees to a state of civil war. A prisoner arrested by one of the sheriffs of the legislature at the Shawnee Mission, upon the charge of having some connection with the original difficulty, was rescued, as it was alleged, by a party of free state men. The sheriff called on the governor and the governor called out the militia. This led to a great excitement on the borders of Missouri, and those who had been so ready to cross over the border to vote, were equally ready to go over and fight. They entered the territory in considerable numbers, were duly enrolled, and marched on Lawrence, the headquarters of those who "resisted the laws." They encamped about the town as if about to attack it, and the free state settlers — as nearly all the people of Lawrence were — prepared to resist them; but fortunately there was no armed collision. Governor Shannon was present, and after a time "peace was restored," and, by the governor's orders, the "invading army" retired. But the irritation remained on both sides. The free state settlers felt that their rights were to be protected only by their own strength and resolution, and their opponents were by no means satisfied with the part they had played in the recent demonstration. Governor Shannon came out of the affair not much respected by either party. Matters were in this unsatisfactory state when the thirty-fourth Congress assembled.

The negotiations with Denmark, alluded to on a previous page, in relation to the "Sound dues," not having accomplished any thing satisfactory, the president, in the spring of 1855, gave notice to the Danish government that the treaty of commerce which recognized the right to levy these dues, would be terminated at the expiration of a year, and that the right would no longer be admitted by the United States. The Danish government endeavored to have the time postponed, in view of the unsettled condition of Europe, but the notification was not withdrawn. This action on the part of the United States led to more active negotiations on the part of other powers with Denmark, with a view to bring the matter to an early settlement, the negotiations to that end having been pending for a long time.

An event which may well be recorded in the history of our country, was the return, in October of this year, (1855,) of Dr. Kane and his surviving companions, who, in 1853, had sailed for the Arctic seas in search of some trace of the long missing Sir John Franklin. Dr. Kane had been an officer in the previous American expedition in search of the lost explorers, and he responded to the last appeal of Lady Franklin for a search for some trace of her husband's party. It was believed, too, that a part of the crew of the British ship might yet be living among the Esquimaux, and without the means of escaping from the regions of ice. The vessel was furnished through the liberality of Mr. Grinnell, a New York merchant, who had also furnished the vessels of the preceding expedition. It received the favor of, and some aid from, the government, by which Dr. Kane, who was a surgeon in the navy, was authorized to take command, under the orders of the navy department. The crew of the vessel consisted of only seventeen persons, and were selected for their qualifications for this service. Sailing from New York, May 31, 1853, the expedition was frozen in, September 10, at the most northerly point on the coast of Greenland which had been reached. There the party passed the winter, enduring the most intense cold, but keeping up health and spirits, through the care, energy, and prudence of the noble commander. The next summer was spent in exploring, and the most northerly point ever reached on this continent was attained, and signs of an open polar sea were discovered. The succeeding winter was of greater severity than the first, and, the party perhaps not being so well prepared to endure the hardships to which they were exposed, their sufferings were terrible. Nothing but the indomitable will and energy of their leader carried the party through the severities of that winter. It would have been impossible for them to have endured another winter, and Dr. Kane, therefore, in the succeeding summer, determined to abandon his vessel, still frozen in the ice, and to attempt to reach the Danish settlements by means of sledges and open boats. His strong will and skill, aided by the hearty coöperation of his men, made the attempt successful, and they reached the most northern Danish settlements early in August, having travelled thirteen hundred miles in eighty-one days. In the mean time much anxiety was felt at home for the intrepid explorers, and the government despatched Lieutenant Hartstene, with a bark and small steamer, in search of them. This relief expedition fortunately fell in with the returning party at the Danish settlement, and brought them home, three of the party having died in the Arctic regions. The return of Dr. Kane and his party was hailed with joy throughout the country, and was a subject of much congratulation in England.*

Near the close of 1855, another event connected with the search for Sir John Franklin occurred, with which the country subsequently became connected through the government, thus making it a matter of national history. The captain of a New London whaler brought into that port the British bark Resolute, belonging to the expedition sent out by the British government in search of Sir John Franklin, under Sir Edward Belcher. This bark, under the command of Captain Kellett, had been frozen up in the Arctic regions, and abandoned as hopelessly ice-bound. She afterwards drifted with the ice southward, and was found by our hardy whalemens nearly a thousand miles from the place where she was frozen in. Her armament and stores were complete, and every thing in the state in which she had been left, except as affected by the exposure to the weather. Although in not the most seaworthy condition, the captain of the whaler put what crew could be spared from his vessel on board his prize, and brought her safely into New London harbor. Congress subsequently voted forty thousand dollars for the purchase and refitting of the Resolute, and after putting her in complete repair she was sent, under command of Lieutenant Hartstene, to be presented, in the name of the United States, to the British government. This mark of good feeling, on the part of this country, was received with great satisfaction by the people and government of England.

A short time before this opportunity occurred for a display of good will by the United States and England, there was a slight "speck of war" seen in the distance. The filibustering expeditions which were fitted out, and rumored to be fitting out, in the United States, served to arouse the suspicions and vigilance of the British government, and they increased the strength of their West India squadron, while some of the English papers were quite belligerent in their tone. This feeling was aroused in part, probably, by the prosecution of certain parties who were procuring recruits in this country for the English army in the Crimea; and some of the English seemed to think that while the government were very vigilant in this direction, they were winking at grosser violations of the neutrality laws, which had Cuba or Central America for an object. These difficulties were of short duration, however, at this time, and explanations soon settled them.

* The Arctic Explorations of Dr. Kane were published in two handsome volumes of absorbing interest. They have been widely read, and the name of the gallant adventurer became a household word in all parts of the country. Dr. Kane's health was much impaired by his exposure and sufferings, and after completing these volumes he went to Cuba, seeking its restoration. But the disease was too deeply seated, and he died in Havana, February 16, 1857. His heroic life has been the theme of many an eloquent discourse, and his name will long be remembered among those recorded in history.

CHAPTER V.

Thirty-fourth Congress. — Organization of the House. — Choice of Speaker. — President's Message. — Kansas Affairs. — Special Message. — Delegates' contested Seat. — Election under Topeka Constitution, and Organization of State Government. — Memorial for Admission to the Union. — Excitement against Free State Settlers. — Investigation of Frauds and Outrages. — Affairs at Lawrence. — United States Marshal's Proceedings. — Attack on Lawrence, and Destruction of Property.

THE thirty-fourth Congress commenced its first session December 3d, 1855. The elections had resulted in a return of a small majority of members opposed to the administration. This majority was composed of Americans and Republicans, the latter party having in some of the states met with more success than the Americans. The two parties embraced much of the strength of the old Whig party, and they were both opposed to the Kansas-Nebraska policy of the administration. This opposition, however, differed in the American ranks in character and degree according to the section from which the members came. The opponents of the administration could not hope for success in any vote except by a union, and the administration party could not succeed without the aid of more or less of their opponents. In this state of affairs it seemed almost impossible to elect a speaker. The union of the Americans and Republicans was not so perfect as to carry every opposition vote, but the Democrats, nevertheless, gained none of their dissatisfied opponents. The contest therefore continued for weeks, and vote after vote was taken, each party deeming it a duty, or matter of pride, to adhere to its own candidates. The country grew tired of the oft-repeated story of "no choice," although the sympathies of the respective parties were heartily enlisted in the struggle, and approved of the firmness of their representatives. At last, after two months' delay, the members also grew weary of the ineffectual strife, and adopted a rule providing that at a certain vote a plurality should elect.

This closed the contest, and on the 2d of February, 1856, Nathaniel P. Banks, of Massachusetts, on whom the opposition finally rallied, was elected speaker by one hundred and three votes, Mr. Aiken, of South Carolina, the administration candidate, receiving one hundred, and eleven others being divided among several candidates. Mr. Banks was admirably qualified by abilities and experience for the position to which he was called.

In the mean time President Pierce, after waiting nearly a month for the organization of the house, had transmitted his annual message to the senate alone, on the 31st of December. This unusual course was the occasion for some severe animadversions in the house. This message was devoted to the various subjects of interest, both in the foreign and domestic relations of the country; and on those in which the greatest interest was felt, as the political questions on which parties divided, the president entered into arguments in favor of the views and action of the Democratic party. The principles of the Kansas-Nebraska act were supported at length, and with much earnestness, while the president also discussed the relations of the several states on the subject of slavery and the fugitive slave law. On these questions the message appeared more as a partisan address than is usual with such state papers; but it is probable that the result of the Kansas-Nebraska bill in renewing the deprecated "agitation," and bringing the principles of slavery and freedom into a hand-to-hand struggle, as it were, was thought to demand from the president a strong expression of the sentiments of his party on these subjects. The finances of the country still continued in a flourishing condition; the balance in the treasury at the commencement of the fiscal year (July 1, 1855) being nearly nineteen millions of dollars, and the estimated receipts and expenditures promising a balance of sixteen millions at the close. The differences of opinion between the United States and British governments with regard to Central American affairs had been the subject of considerable correspondence between the diplomatists of the two countries,—the difficulties arising from the construction put upon the Clayton-Bulwer treaty by the British government. Recruiting for the British army had also occasioned correspondence and a demand for explanations. The relations with other foreign countries were represented to be in a peaceful and satisfactory state generally.

Of affairs in Kansas the president spoke quite briefly in his annual message, saying that there had been acts prejudicial to good order, but as yet none had occurred under circumstances to justify the interposition of the federal executive. That could only be in case of obstruction to federal law, or of organized resistance to territorial law, assuming the character of insurrection, which, if it should occur, it would be his duty promptly to suppress. But he indulged the hope that the occurrence of such an untoward event would be prevented by the sound sense of the people of the territory, who, by its organic law, possessing the right to determine their own domestic institutions, are entitled, while deporting themselves peacefully, to the free exercise of that right, and must be protected in the enjoyment of it, without interference on the part of the citizens of any of the states.

To such language as this the free state men in Kansas could make no answer. The rights here conceded were all that they desired, if they could enjoy them fully, and it was the invasion of these rights by the people of Missouri that had led to the troubles.

In January, the president sent a message to the senate specially relating to affairs in Kansas, and recommending that Congress adopt such measures as the exigency of the case required. In this message the president attributed the troubles in Kansas partly to local maladministration and partly to the unjustifiable interference of the inhabitants of some states with views foreign to the rights and interests of the territory. He charged Governor Reeder with a neglect of duties, "thereby setting an example of violation of law and duty which rendered his removal necessary." He recognized the first territorial legislature, whatever the informalities of its election, as, for all practical purposes, a lawful body, whose acts were to be obeyed; and he condemned the convention which framed the free state constitution at Topeka, as a party affair, contrary to the principles of public law and practice under the constitution of the United States, and the rule of right and common sense. The movement in opposition to the authorities in Kansas he regarded as revolutionary in character, and if it should reach the point of organized resistance, as a treasonable insurrection, which it would be the duty of the federal government to suppress. Although the disturbances of December preceding were quieted, the president apprehended renewed disorders unless decided measures were taken to prevent them.

In December, the free state party held a convention to nominate candidates for officers under the state constitution which they had framed, and which, by a small and almost wholly party vote, had been adopted when submitted to the people. Charles Robinson, a leading member of the free state party, and one of its most able and judicious advisers, was nominated for governor. The election was appointed by the executive committee to take place on the 15th of February. In the mean time the troubles by no means diminished, and a bitter animosity grew up between the parties. Outrages and murders were committed; persecution was followed sometimes by retaliation. There were also threats of another invasion from Missouri, and it was feared that it would not be so harmless as the last. At this stage, the president issued a proclamation stating that combinations had been formed in the territory to resist the execution of the laws, and to subvert by violence the present legal authority, and that persons outside the territory were contemplating armed interference in the more remote, as well as in neighboring states, and he, therefore, had taken the proper measures to repress outbreaks and maintain the peace of the country.

Upon the organization of the house of representatives, the affairs of Kansas came before them, Mr. Whitfield and Mr. Reeder, the contesting delegates, claiming a seat as representative of the territory. A majority of the committee on elections, to whom the subject was referred, reported adversely to the claim of Mr. Whitfield, and took ground against the authority of the territorial legislature. They also asked for power to send for persons and papers, with a view to investigate fully the frauds alleged in the elections in Kansas. The minority of the committee offered a counter report, and also recommended that a commission be sent to Kansas to take testimony, instead of sending for persons and papers. A long debate arose on these reports, and finally a proposition to send a committee of three members of the house to Kansas, with full powers to make a thorough investigation of the troubles there, was adopted, and Mr. Sherman, of Ohio, Mr. Howard, of Michigan, and Mr. Oliver, of Missouri, were appointed to constitute the committee.

In the senate, also, the affairs of Kansas occupied much time and attention. Mr. Douglas, from the committee on territories, submitted a report on the subject, which affirmed the legality of the territorial legislature and the authority of its enactments. It also pronounced the proceedings of the free state convention at Topeka as illegal and treasonable, and animadverted with much severity on the emigrant aid societies. The committee proposed a bill authorizing the inhabitants of Kansas, when it should appear that the population was sufficient to entitle them to one representative in Congress, to hold a convention for the purpose of forming a state constitution. Mr. Collamer, of Vermont, submitted a minority report controverting many of the points in the majority report, reiterating the charges of fraud, violence, and illegality in respect to the territorial legislature, and defending the proceedings of the free state settlers in framing the Topeka constitution, and holding elections under it. As the easiest and most direct way of meeting all the difficulties, and settling them at once, the report recommended that Kansas be admitted to the Union with the Topeka constitution.

In the mean time, in Kansas, the persons elected under the Topeka constitution to compose the state executive and legislature, assembled at Topeka, and proceeded to organize the government for prospective action. The two branches of the legislature made choice of their officers, and the governor elect, Mr. Robinson, took the oath of office and delivered his inaugural address. A memorial asking for admission to the Union was then adopted and sent to Congress. A committee from each branch of the legislature was appointed to frame a code of laws for the future state, and other business of a prospective nature was transacted, but without taking any steps to bring the new state government into collision with the territorial government. After electing Andrew H. Reeder and James H. Lane as United States senators to represent the state when admitted into the Union, the legislature adjourned until the 4th of July succeeding. These proceedings were magnified into treason by the pro-slavery party, and they were represented to the national government in the worst possible light.

The feeling against the free state settlers grew more intense among the pro-slavery men of the territory, and of Western Missouri, as they saw the probability that Kansas, if left to itself, would certainly become a free state. This enmity was increased by the arrival of armed companies from the Southern States, who came with a determination to sustain the slaveholding interests, and to force slavery upon Kansas if possible. Some of them perhaps came to settle in Kansas, but the majority were mere adventurers, "soldiers of fortune," at all times disposed to lawless violence, and glad of an opportunity to indulge in it against the "abolitionists," as the free state men were termed. The presence of these men, sustaining and pressing forward the pro-slavery party to acts of aggression, under color of legal authority, precipitated a civil war on Kansas.

The congressional committee, appointed to investigate the alleged frauds and outrages on the people, proceeded immediately to Kansas to perform their duties. This investigation, faithfully made by the majority of the committee, was not acceptable to those who had participated in or profited by the frauds, and various means were resorted to in order to break up or trouble the sittings of the committee. Attempts were made to arrest parties attending as witnesses, and even the officers of the committee were not free from molestation. The committee, however, proceeded with their business. While they were at Lawrence, the sheriff of Douglas County, a man especially obnoxious, by his acts and manners, to the free state inhabitants, attempted to arrest a party against whom he had a precept. This person was rescued in a not very violent way, and the sheriff left. The following Sunday he returned and called upon some of the most respectable persons in the town, as they were on their way to church, to assist him in making arrests. These persons went on their way without paying attention to the call. This being construed into a refusal to support the laws, and an organized resistance to them, the sheriff made a demand on Governor Shannon for the aid of the federal troops, which had been placed at the disposal of the governor by the government at Washington, to sustain the territorial laws. Governor Shannon made the requisition, and a small force of dragoons was placed under the orders of the sheriff. With the aid of these, or rather without any resistance, he arrested those parties who had on the previous Sunday gone on their way to church when he called on them to assist him. These prisoners were kept in a tent guarded by the dragoons, in the town of Lawrence, and treated like felons. The accounts of this whole affair give the strongest impression that it was designed to harass the people of Lawrence, and perhaps to provoke a rescue, which would soon bring on a crisis. It was the belief of many that such a crisis was desired, in order to put an end to the investigations of the committee.

No rescue was attempted, and the people of Lawrence had generally shown a disposition not to come into any collision with the federal authorities. There were, however, individuals less disposed to submit, and one of these attempted to shoot the sheriff in his camp. The officer was wounded, but not killed, and he was attended with every care by the citizens of Lawrence, who condemned the attempted murder as much as their opponents. A public meeting was held, which denounced the act, and Mr. Robinson, the free state governor, at the request of influential citizens, offered a reward for the apprehension of the assailant.

This affair created the greatest excitement among the supporters of the territorial legislature and their friends in Missouri. It was charged upon the free state men generally, and was considered as proof that they were determined to resist the execution of the laws, even by bloodshed. It should not be forgotten, however, that this was not the only outrage, or even murder, which had been committed about this time, for there had been some greater atrocities committed against unoffending free state men, which served to exasperate that party. Matters soon proceeded, under this state of feelings, from bad to worse. The grand jury presented as nuisances two newspapers and the free state hotel in Lawrence. Ex-Governor Reeder, who was attending the congressional committee by their citation, was summoned to attend before the grand jury at Lecompton, and declining to do so, a writ for his arrest for contempt was issued. Mr. Reeder claimed exemption from the service of the writ, by his privilege as a party before the congressional committee, to whom his presence was necessary; and believing that this action was intended to interfere with the labors of the committee, and that he had reason to fear assassination at Lecompton, he refused to go with the officer. He subsequently escaped from the territory in disguise. About this time Mr. Robinson, the free state governor, while on his way to the east, was stopped on his passage down the river by a mob, and kept as a prisoner.

The next step was a proclamation, issued by United States Marshal Donaldson, calling upon all "law-abiding citizens of the territory" to aid him in the service of certain judicial writs of arrest, in the attempted service of which his deputy marshal had been resisted by a large number of the citizens of Lawrence. The marshal feared, or pretended to fear, that these writs would be resisted by a large body of armed men, although the public resolutions of the citizens of Lawrence and the declarations of all its influential men were, that no resistance would be offered to the service of legal writs by United States officers. Already the "southern regiment," as it was called, had come into the territory, and were committing depredations, threatening to destroy Lawrence. The citizens of Lawrence called on Governor Shannon for protection in view of these threats, but the governor said there was no force approaching Lawrence except the legally constituted posse of the marshal, and refused to interfere. The citizens then adopted a resolution declaring that they had not resisted and would not resist the officers, and would aid them, if necessary, in the service of judicial writs, but that they were "ready to resist, if need be, unto death, the ravages and desolation of an invading mob." This resolution was sent to the marshal, as were several letters requesting protection from the ravages of parties of armed men collecting about Lawrence. But nothing was done to withdraw these forces or to prevent the outrages. On the contrary, the number of these armed men increased, and they seized cattle and horses and whatever came in their way, greatly to the loss of innocent and poor settlers.

At last the marshal was prepared to serve his writs, and with a few men was in the town and attending to that business without molestation. There was evidently no occasion for an armed posse, but it was marched to the immediate neighborhood of the town, and other processes were served, several citizens of Lawrence acting as a posse. The marshal then informed the armed forces that he was done with them, but the sheriff took command, and the troops entered the town to destroy the printing offices and the hotel, under orders, as it was alleged, from the District Court. The women and children were removed from the town, and many of the men, liable as they were in their defenceless state to outrages and murder, had also left. But their property remained behind, and after the "armed posse," of whom Mr. Atchison (who had been a senator in Congress and acting vice-president of the United States) was the leader, had destroyed the hotel and printing offices, they burned houses and plundered the town, carrying away and destroying much property. The number of this army was six or eight hundred men. Whether or not it was a cause for congratulation with them that they had sacked a defenceless town, inhabited by their fellow-citizens, who had committed no offence except to entertain and express political opinions opposed to the invaders, it is only a dishonor to the country that such a thing should have occurred and been permitted by the federal authorities who had the power to prevent it.

CHAPTER VI.

Agitation among the People respecting Kansas Affairs. — Debates in Congress. — Speech of Mr. Sumner, of Massachusetts. — Its Consequences. — Assault on Mr. Sumner by Mr. Brooks, of South Carolina. — Investigation by a Congressional Committee of the Frauds and Outrages in Kansas. — Vote of the House to admit Kansas as a State. — The Bill rejected by the Senate. — Continued Disturbances in Kansas. — Course of Governor Shannon. — His Removal — State Legislature dispersed. — Armed Emigrants. — Governor Geary. — His Measures and Policy.

WHILE these things were taking place in Kansas, the whole country was agitated with the questions involved in the struggle there. It was a closer contest between the principles of freedom and slavery than had yet occurred since the formation of the Union, and the feelings of men were enlisted on one side or the other, according to their proclivities caused by education or interest. In Congress the affairs of Kansas were debated with great warmth and bitterness, as might be expected from the exciting character of the subject. Mr. Butler, Mr. Mason, and others spoke strongly in favor of the territorial laws and their enforcement, and denounced the proceedings of the free state men and their sympathizers in the states as the cause of the troubles. Among those who replied to them was Mr. Sumner, of Massachusetts, who delivered a long and elaborate speech on the subject, in which he treated those gentlemen in no tender manner, by his keen irony and stern invective. Sharp retorts followed on both sides, and bitter feelings were aroused in the senate chamber, as well as in Kansas. From Mr. Sumner's speech,* which is memorable on account of its sequel, we make the following extracts: —

“Mr. President: You are now called to redress a great transgression. Seldom in the history of nations has such a question been presented. Tariffs, army bills, navy bills, land bills, are important, and justly occupy your care; but these all belong to the course of ordinary legislation. As means and instruments only, they are necessarily subordinate to the conservation of government itself. Grant them or deny them, in greater or less degree, and you will inflict no shock. The machinery of government will continue to move. The state will not cease to exist. Far otherwise is it with the eminent question now before you, involving, as it does, liberty in a broad territory, and also involving the peace of the whole country, with our good name in history forevermore.

“Take down your map, sir, and you will find that the territory of Kansas, more than any other region, occupies the middle spot of North America, equally distant from the Atlantic on the east, and the Pacific on the west; from the frozen waters of Hudson's Bay on the north, and the tepid Gulf Stream on the south; constituting the precise territorial centre of the whole vast continent. To such advantages of situation, on the very highway between two oceans, are added a soil of unsurpassed richness, and a fascinating, undulating beauty of surface, with a health-giving climate, calculated to nurture a powerful and generous people, worthy to be a central pivot of American institutions. A few short months only have passed since this spacious mediterranean country was open only to the savage, who ran wild in its woods and prairies; and now it has already drawn to its bosom a population of freemen larger than Athens crowded within her historic gates, when her sons, under Miltiades, won liberty for mankind on the field of Marathon; more than Sparta contained when she ruled Greece, and sent forth her devoted children, quickened by a mother's benediction, to return with their shields or on them; more than Rome gathered on her seven hills, when, under her kings, she commenced that sovereign sway, which afterwards embraced the whole earth; more than London held, when, on the fields of Crecy and Agincourt, the English banner was carried victoriously over the chivalrous hosts of France.

"Against this territory, thus fortunate in position and population, a crime has been committed which is without example in the records of the past. Not in plundered provinces or in the cruelties of selfish governors will you find its parallel; and yet there is an ancient instance, which may show at least the path of justice. In the terrible impeachment by which the great Roman orator has blasted through all time the name of Verres, amidst charges of robbery and sacrilege, the enormity which most aroused the indignant voice of his accuser, and which still stands forth with strongest distinctness, arresting the sympathetic indignation of all who read the story, is, that away in Sicily he had scourged a citizen of Rome; that the cry, 'I am a Roman citizen,' had been interposed in vain against the lash of the tyrant governor. Other charges were, that he had carried away productions of art, and that he had violated the sacred shrines. It was in the presence of the Roman senate that this arraignment proceeded; in a temple of the forum; amidst crowds, such as no orator had ever before drawn together, thronging the porticoes and colonnades, even clinging to the house-tops and neighboring slopes; and under the anxious gaze of witnesses summoned from the scene of crime. But an audience grander far, of higher dignity, of more various people, and of wider intelligence, the countless multitude of succeeding generations, in every land where eloquence has been studied or where the Roman name has been recognized, has listened to the accusation, and throbbed with condemnation of the criminal. Sir, speaking in an age of light and in a land of constitutional liberty, where the safeguards of elections are justly placed among the highest triumphs of civilization, I fearlessly assert that the wrongs of much-abused Sicily, thus memorable in history, were small by the side of the wrongs of Kansas, where the very shrines of popular institutions, more sacred than any heathen altar, have been desecrated; where the ballot-box, more precious than any work, in ivory or marble, from the cunning hand of art, has been plundered; and where the cry, 'I am an American citizen,' has been interposed in vain against outrage of every kind, even upon life itself. Are you against sacrilege? I present it for your execration. Are you against robbery? I hold it up to your scorn. Are you for the protection of American citizens? I show you how their dearest rights have been cloven down, while a tyrannical usurpation has sought to install itself on their very necks.

"But the wickedness which I now begin to expose is immeasurably aggravated by the motive which prompted it. Not in any common lust for power did this uncommon tragedy have its origin. It is the rape of a virgin territory, compelling it to the hateful embrace of slavery; and it may be clearly traced to a depraved longing for a new slave state, the hideous offspring of such a crime, in the hope of adding to the power of slavery in the national government. Yes, sir, when the whole world, alike Christian and Turk, is rising up to condemn this wrong, and to make it a hissing to the nations, here in our republic, force — ay, sir, FORCE — has been openly employed in compelling Kansas to this pollution, and all for the sake of political power. There is the simple fact, which you will vainly attempt to deny, but which in itself presents an essential wickedness that makes other public crimes seem like public virtues.

"But this enormity, vast beyond comparison, swells to dimensions of wickedness which the imagination toils in vain to grasp, when it is understood that for this purpose are hazarded the horrors of intestine feud, not only in this distant territory, but every where throughout the country. Already the muster has begun. The strife is no longer local, but national. Even now, while I speak, portents hang on all the arches of the horizon, threatening to darken the broad land, which already yawns with the mutterings of civil war. The fury of the propagandists of slavery, and the calm determination of their opponents, are now diffused from the distant territory over wide-spread communities, and the whole country, in all its extent, marshalling hostile divisions, and foreshadowing a strife which, unless happily averted by the triumph of freedom, will become war, fratricidal, parricidal war, with an accumulated wickedness beyond the wickedness of any war in human annals; justly provoking the avenging judgment of Providence and the avenging pen of history, and constituting a strife, in the language of the ancient writer, more than foreign, more than social, more than civil; but something compounded of all these strifes, and in itself more than war; sed potius commune quoddam ex omnibus, et plus quam bellum.

"Such is the crime which you are to judge. But the criminal also must be dragged into day, that you may see and measure the power by which all this wrong is sustained. From no common source could it proceed. In its perpetration was needed a spirit of vaulting ambition which would hesitate at nothing; a hardihood of purpose which was insensible to the judgment of mankind; a madness for slavery which should disregard the constitution, the laws, and all the great examples of our history; also a consciousness of power such as comes from the habit of power; a combination of energies found only in a hundred arms directed by a hundred eyes; a control of public opinion, through venal pens and a prostituted press; an ability to subsidize crowds in every vocation of life — the politician with his local importance, the lawyer with his subtle tongue, and even the authority of the judge on the bench; and a familiar use of men in places high and low, so that none, from the president to the lowest border postmaster, should decline to be its tool; all these things, and more, were needed; and they were found in the slave power of our republic. There, sir, stands the criminal, all unmasked before you, heartless, grasping, and tyrannical; with an audacity beyond that of Verres, a subtlety beyond that of Machiavel, a meanness beyond that of Bacon, and an ability beyond that of Hastings. Justice to Kansas can be secured only by the prostration of this influence; for this is the power behind — greater than any president — which succors and sustains the crime. Nay, the proceedings I now arraign derive their fearful consequence only from this connection. * * *

"My task will be divided under three different heads; first, THE CRIME AGAINST KANSAS, in its origin and extent; secondly, THE APOLOGIES FOR THE CRIME; and, thirdly, THE TRUE REMEDY.

"But, before entering upon the argument, I must say something of a general character, particularly in response to what has fallen from senators who have raised themselves to eminence on this floor in championship of human wrongs; I mean the senator from South Carolina, [Mr. Butler,] and the senator from Illinois, [Mr. Douglas,] who, though unlike as Don Quixote and Sancho Panza, yet, like this couple, sally forth together in the same adventure. I regret much to miss the elder senator from his seat; but the cause, against which he has run a tilt, with such activity of animosity, demands that the opportunity of exposing him should not be lost; and it is for the cause that I speak. The senator from South Carolina has read many books of chivalry, and believes himself a chivalrous knight, with sentiments of honor and courage. Of course he has chosen a mistress to whom he has made his vows, and who, though ugly to others, is always lovely to him; though polluted in the sight of the world, is chaste in his sight—I mean the harlot, Slavery. For her, his tongue is always profuse in words. Let her be impeached in character, or any proposition made to shut her out from the extension of her wantonness, and no extravagance of manner or hardihood of assertion is then too great for this senator. The frenzy of Don Quixote, in behalf of his wench, Dulcinea del Toboso, is all surpassed. The asserted rights of Slavery, which shock equality of all kinds, are cloaked by a fantastic claim of equality. If the slave states cannot enjoy what, in mockery of the great fathers of the republic, he misnames equality under the constitution,—in other words, the full power in the national territories to compel fellow-men to unpaid toil, to separate husband and wife, and to sell little children at the auction block,—then, sir, the chivalric senator will conduct the state of South Carolina out of the Union! Heroic knight! Exalted senator! A second Moses come for a second exodus!

“But not content with this poor menace, which we have been twice told was “measured,” the senator, in the unrestrained chivalry of his nature, has undertaken to apply opprobrious words to those who differ from him on this floor. He calls them ‘sectional and fanatical;’ and opposition to the usurpation in Kansas he denounces as ‘an uncalculating fanaticism.’ To be sure, these charges lack all grace of originality and all sentiment of truth; but the adventurous senator does not hesitate. He is the uncompromising, unblushing representative on this floor of a flagrant sectionalism, which now domineers over the republic, and yet, with a ludicrous ignorance of his own position, unable to see himself as others see him, or with an effrontery which even his white head ought not to protect from rebuke, he applies to those here who resist his sectionalism the very epithet which designates himself. The men who strive to bring back the government to its original policy, when freedom, and not slavery, was national, while slavery, and not freedom, was sectional, he arraigns as sectional. This will not do. It involves too great a perversion of terms. I tell that senator that it is to himself, and to the ‘organization’ of which he is the ‘committed advocate,’ that this epithet belongs. I now fasten it upon them. For myself, I care little for names; but since the question has been raised here, I affirm that the Republican party of the Union is in no just sense sectional, but, more than any other party, national; and that it now goes forth to dislodge from the high places of the government the tyrannical sectionalism of which the senator from South Carolina is one of the maddest zealots.

“To the charge of fanaticism I also reply. Sir, fanaticism is found in an enthusiasm or exaggeration of opinions, particularly on religious subjects; but there may be a fanaticism for evil, as well as for good. Now, I will not deny, that there are persons among us loving liberty too well for their personal good, in a selfish generation. Such there may be, and, for the sake of their example, would that there were more! In calling them ‘fanatics,’ you cast contumely upon the noble army of martyrs, from the earliest day down to this hour; upon the great tribunes of human rights, by whom life, liberty, and happiness, on earth, have been secured; upon the long line of devoted patriots, who, throughout history, have truly loved their country; and upon all who, in noble aspirations for the general good, and in forgetfulness of self, have stood out before their age, and gathered into their generous bosoms the shafts of tyranny and wrong, in order to make a pathway for Truth. You discredit Luther, when alone he nailed his articles to the door of the church at Wittenberg, and then, to the imperial demand that he should retract, firmly replied, 'Here I stand; I cannot do otherwise, so help me God!' You discredit Hampden, when alone he refused to pay the few shillings of ship-money, and shook the throne of Charles I.; you discredit Milton, when, amidst the corruptions of a heartless court, he lived on, the lofty friend of liberty, above question or suspicion; you discredit Russell and Sidney, when, for the sake of their country, they calmly turned from family and friends, to tread the narrow steps of the scaffold; you discredit those early founders of American institutions, who preferred the hardships of a wilderness, surrounded by a savage foe, to injustice on beds of ease; you discredit our later fathers, who, few in numbers and weak in resources, yet strong in their cause, did not hesitate to brave the mighty power of England, already encircling the globe with her morning drum-beats. Yes, sir, of such are the fanatics of history, according to the senator. But I tell that senator, that there are characters badly eminent, of whose fanaticism there can be no question. Such were the ancient Egyptians, who worshipped divinities in brutish forms; the Druids, who darkened the forests of oak, in which they lived, by sacrifices of blood; the Mexicans, who surrendered countless victims to the propitiation of their obscene idols; the Spaniards, who, under Alva, sought to force the Inquisition upon Holland, by a tyranny kindred to that now employed to force slavery upon Kansas; and such were the Algerines, when in solemn conclave, after listening to a speech not unlike that of the senator from South Carolina, they resolved to continue the slavery of white Christians, and to extend it to the countrymen of Washington! Ay, sir, extend it! And in this same dreary catalogue faithful history must record all who now, in an enlightened age and in a land of boasted freedom, stand up, in perversion of the constitution and in denial of immortal truth, to fasten a new shackle upon their fellow-man. If the senator wishes to see fanatics, let him look round among his own associates; let him look at himself. * * *

"I. It belongs to me now, in the first place, to expose the CRIME AGAINST KANSAS, in its origin and extent. Logically, this is the beginning of the argument. I say crime, and deliberately adopt this strongest term, as better than any other denoting the consummate transgression. I would go farther, if language could farther go. It is the Crime of Crimes, surpassing far the old crimen majestatis, pursued with vengeance by the laws of Rome, and containing all other crimes, as the greater contains the less. I do not go too far, when I call it the Crime against Nature, from which the soul recoils, and which language refuses to describe. To lay bare this enormity, I now proceed. The whole subject has already become a twice-told tale, and its renewed recital will be a renewal of its sorrow and shame; but I shall not hesitate to enter upon it. The occasion requires it from the beginning.

"It has been well remarked by a distinguished historian of our country, that, at the Ithuriel touch of the Missouri discussion, the slave interest, hitherto hardly recognized as a distinct element in our system, started up portentous and dilated, with threats and assumptions, which are the origin of our existing national politics. This was in 1820. The discussion ended with the admission of Missouri as a slaveholding state, and the prohibition of slavery in all the remaining territory west of the Mississippi, and north of 36° 30', leaving the condition of other territory south of this line, or subsequently acquired, untouched by the arrangement. Here was a solemn act of legislation, called at the time a compromise, a covenant, a compact, first brought forward in this body by a slaveholder, vindicated by slaveholders in debate, finally sanctioned by slaveholding votes; also upheld at the time by the essential approbation of a slaveholding president, James Monroe, and his cabinet, of whom a majority were slaveholders, including Mr. Calhoun himself; and this compromise was made the condition of the admission of Missouri, without which that state could not have been received into the Union. The bargain was simple, and was applicable, of course, only to the territory named. Leaving all other territory to await the judgment of another generation, the south said to the north, 'Conquer your prejudices so far as to admit Missouri as a slave state, and, in consideration of this much-coveted boon, slavery shall be prohibited forever in all the remaining Louisiana territory above 36° 30';' and the north yielded.

"In total disregard of history, the president, in his annual message, has told us that this compromise 'was reluctantly acquiesced in by the Southern States.' Just the contrary is true. It was the work of slaveholders, and was crowded by their concurring votes upon a reluctant north. At the time, it was hailed by slaveholders as a victory. Charles Pinckney, of South Carolina, in an oft-quoted letter, written at three o'clock on the night of its passage, says, 'It is considered here by the slaveholding states as a great triumph.' At the north, it was accepted as a defeat, and the friends of freedom every where throughout the country bowed their heads with mortification. But little did they know the completeness of their disaster. Little did they dream that the prohibition of slavery in the territory, which was stipulated as the price of their fatal capitulation, would also at the very moment of its maturity be wrested from them.

"Time passed, and it became necessary to provide for this territory an organized government. Suddenly, without notice in the public press, or the prayer of a single petition, or one word of open recommendation from the president; after an acquiescence of thirty-three years, and the irreclaimable possession by the south of its special share under this compromise, in violation of every obligation of honor, compact, and good neighborhood, and in contemptuous disregard of the outgushing sentiments of an aroused north, this time-honored prohibition, in itself a landmark of freedom, was overturned, and the vast region now known as Kansas and Nebraska was opened to slavery. It was natural that a measure thus repugnant in character should be pressed by arguments mutually repugnant. It was urged on two principal reasons, so opposite and inconsistent as to slap each other in the face; one being, that by the repeal of the prohibition, the territory would be left open to the entry of slaveholders with their slaves, without hinderance; and the other being, that the people would be left absolutely free to determine the question for themselves, and to prohibit the entry of slaveholders with their slaves, if they should think best. With some, the apology was the alleged rights of slaveholders; with others, it was the alleged rights of the people. With some, it was openly the extension of slavery; and with others, it was openly the establishment of freedom, under the guise of popular sovereignty. Of course, the measure, thus upheld in defiance of reason, was carried through Congress in defiance of all the securities of legislation; and I mention these things that you may see in what foulness the present crime was engendered.

"It was carried, first, by whipping in to its support, through executive influence and patronage, men who acted against their own declared judgment and the known will of their constituents. Secondly, by foisting out of place, both in the senate and house of representatives, important business, long pending, and usurping its room. Thirdly, by trampling under foot the rules of the house of representatives, always before the safeguard of the minority. And, fourthly, by driving it to a close during the very session in which it originated, so that it might not be arrested by the indignant voice of the people. Such are some of the means by which this snap judgment was obtained. If the clear will of the people had not been disregarded, it could not have passed. If the government had not nefariously interposed its influence, it could not have passed. If it had been left to its natural place in the order of business, it could not have passed. If the rules of the house and the rights of the minority had not been violated, it could not have passed. If it had been allowed to go over to another Congress, when the people might be heard, it would have been ended; and then the crime we now deplore would have been without its first seminal life.

"Mr. President, I mean to keep absolutely within the limits of parliamentary propriety. I make no personal imputations; but only with frankness, such as belongs to the occasion and my own character, describe a great historical act, which is now enrolled in the Capitol. Sir, the Nebraska bill was in every respect a swindle. It was a swindle by the south of the north. It was, on the part of those who had already completely enjoyed their share of the Missouri compromise, a swindle of those whose share was yet absolutely untouched; and the plea of unconstitutionality set up—like the plea of usury after the borrowed money has been enjoyed—did not make it less a swindle. Urged as a bill of peace, it was a swindle of the whole country. Urged as opening the doors to slave-masters with their slaves, it was a swindle of the asserted doctrine of popular sovereignty. Urged as sanctioning popular sovereignty, it was a swindle of the asserted rights of slave-masters. It was a swindle of a broad territory, thus cheated of protection against slavery. It was a swindle of a great cause, early espoused by Washington, Franklin, and Jefferson, surrounded by the best fathers of the republic. Sir, it was a swindle of God-given, inalienable rights. Turn it over; look at it on all sides, and it is every where a swindle; and, if the word I now employ has not the authority of classical usage, it has, on this occasion, the indubitable authority of fitness. No other word will adequately express the mingled meanness and wickedness of the cheat.

"Its character was still further apparent in the general structure of the bill. Amidst overflowing professions of regard for the sovereignty of the people in the territory, they were despoiled of every essential privilege of sovereignty. They were not allowed to choose their governor, secretary, chief justice, associate justices, attorney, or marshal, all of whom are sent from Washington; nor were they allowed to regulate the salaries of any of these functionaries, or the daily allowance of the legislative body, or even the pay of the clerks and door-keepers; but they were left free to adopt slavery. And this was called popular sovereignty! Time does not allow, nor does the occasion require, that I should stop to dwell on this transparent device to cover a transcendent wrong. Suffice it to say, that slavery is in itself an arrogant denial of human rights, and by no human reason can the power to establish such a wrong be placed among the attributes of any just sovereignty. In refusing it such a place, I do not deny popular rights, but uphold them; I do not restrain popular rights, but extend them. And, sir, to this conclusion you must yet come, unless deaf, not only to the admonitions of political justice, but also to the genius of our own constitution, under which, when properly interpreted, no valid claim for slavery can be set up any where in the national territory. The senator from Michigan [Mr. Cass] may say, in response to the senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown,] that slavery cannot go into the territory under the constitution without legislative introduction; and permit me to add, in response to both, that slavery cannot go there at all. Nothing can come out of nothing; and there is absolutely nothing in the constitution out of which slavery can be derived, while there are provisions, which, when properly interpreted, make its existence any where within the exclusive national jurisdiction impossible. * * *

"Mr. President, men are wisely presumed to intend the natural consequences of their conduct, and to seek what their acts seem to promote. Now, the Nebraska bill, on its very face, openly cleared the way for slavery, and it is not wrong to presume that its originators intended the natural consequences of such an act, and sought in this way to extend slavery. Of course they did. And this is the first stage in the crime against Kansas.

"But this was speedily followed by other developments. The barefaced scheme was soon whispered that Kansas must be a slave state. In conformity with this idea was the government of this unhappy territory organized in all its departments; and thus did the president, by whose complicity the prohibition of slavery had been overthrown, lend himself to a new complicity, giving to the conspirators a lease of connivance, amounting even to co-partnership. The governor, secretary, chief justice, associate justices, attorney, and marshal, with a whole caucus of other stipendiaries, nominated by the president and confirmed by the senate, were all commended as friendly to slavery. No man with the sentiments of Washington, or Jefferson, or Franklin, found any favor; nor is it too much to say, that, had these great patriots once more come among us, not one of them, with his recorded, unretracted opinions on slavery, could have been nominated by the president or confirmed by the senate for any post in that territory. With such auspices the conspiracy proceeded. Even in advance of the Nebraska bill, secret societies were organized in Missouri, ostensibly to protect her institutions, and afterwards, under the name of 'Self-Defensive Associations,' and of 'Blue Lodges,' these were multiplied throughout the western counties of that state, before any counter-movement from the north. It was confidently anticipated that, by the activity of these societies, and the interest of slaveholders every where, with the advantage derived from the neighborhood of Missouri, and the influence of the territorial government, slavery might be introduced into Kansas, quietly but surely, without arousing a conflict — that the crocodile egg might be stealthily dropped in the sun-burnt soil, there to be hatched unobserved until it sent forth its reptile monster.

"But the conspiracy was unexpectedly balked. The debate, which convulsed Congress, had stirred the whole country. Attention from all sides was directed upon Kansas, which at once became the favorite goal of emigration. The bill had loudly declared that its object was 'to leave the people perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way;' and its supporters every where challenged the determination of the question between freedom and slavery by a competition of emigration. Thus, while opening the territory to slavery, the bill also opened it to emigrants from every quarter, who might by their votes redress the wrong. The populous north, stung by a sharp sense of outrage, and inspired by a noble cause, poured into the debatable land, and promised soon to establish a supremacy of numbers there, involving, of course, a just supremacy of freedom.

"Then was conceived the consummation of the crime against Kansas. What could not be accomplished peaceably was to be accomplished forcibly. The reptile monster, that could not be quietly and securely hatched there, was to be pushed full-grown into the territory. All efforts were now given to the dismal work of forcing slavery on free soil. In flagrant derogation of the very popular sovereignty, whose name helped to impose this bill upon the country, the atrocious object was now distinctly avowed. And the avowal has been followed by the act. Slavery has been forcibly introduced into Kansas, and placed under the formal safeguards of pretended law. How this was done, belongs to the argument.

In depicting this consummation, the simplest outline, without one word of color, will be best. Whether regarded in its mass or its details, in its origin or its result, it is all blackness, illumined by nothing from itself, but only by the heroism of the undaunted men and women whom it environed. A plain statement of facts will be a picture of fearful truth, which faithful history will preserve in its darkest gallery. In the foreground all will recognize a familiar character, in himself a connecting link between the president and the border ruffian, — less conspicuous for ability than for the exalted place he has occupied, — who once sat in the seat where you now sit, sir; where once sat John Adams and Thomas Jefferson; also, where once sat Aaron Burr. I need not add the name of David R. Atchison. You have not forgotten that, at the session of Congress immediately succeeding the Nebraska bill, he came tardily to his duty here, and then, after a short time, disappeared. The secret has been long since disclosed. Like Catiline, he stalked into this chamber, reeking with conspiracy — immo in senatum venit; and then, like Catiline, he skulked away — abiit, excessit, evasit, erupit — to join and provoke the conspirators, who at a distance awaited their congenial chief. Under the influence of his malign presence the crime ripened to its fatal fruits, while the similitude with Catiline was again renewed in the sympathy, not even concealed, which he found in the very senate itself, where, beyond even the Roman example, a senator has not hesitated to appear as his open compurgator. * * *

"Thus was the crime consummated. Slavery now stands erect, clanking its chains on the territory of Kansas, surrounded by a code of death, and trampling upon all cherished liberties, whether of speech, the press, the bar, the trial by jury, or the electoral franchise. And, sir, all this has been done, not merely to introduce a wrong which in itself is a denial of all rights, and in dread of which a mother has lately taken the life of her offspring; not merely, as has been sometimes said, to protect slavery in Missouri, since it is futile for this state to complain of freedom on the side of Kansas, when freedom exists without complaint on the side of Iowa and also on the side of Illinois; but it has been done for the sake of political power, in order to bring two new slaveholding senators upon this floor, and thus to fortify in the national government the desperate chances of a waning oligarchy. As the ship, voyaging on pleasant summer seas, is assailed by a pirate crew, and robbed for the sake of its doubloons and dollars, so is this beautiful territory now assailed in its peace and prosperity, and robbed, in order to wrest its political power to the side of slavery. Even now the black flag of the land pirates from Missouri waves at the mast head; in their laws you hear the pirate yell, and see the flash of the pirate knife; while, incredible to relate! the president, gathering the slave power at his back, testifies a pirate sympathy.

Sir, all this was done in the name of popular sovereignty. And this is the close of the tragedy. Popular sovereignty, which, when truly understood, is a fountain of just power, has ended in popular slavery; not merely in the subjection of the unhappy African race, but of this proud Caucasian blood, which you boast. The profession with which you began, of all by the people, has been lost in the wretched reality of nothing for the people. Popular sovereignty, in whose deceitful name plighted faith was broken, and an ancient landmark of freedom was overturned, now lifts itself before us, like Sin, in the terrible picture of Milton, —

‘That seemed a woman to the waist, and fair,
But ended foul in many a scaly fold
Voluminous and vast, a serpent armed With mortal sting; about her middle round
A cry of hell-hounds never ceasing barked
With wide Cerberean mouths full loud, and rung
A hideous peal; yet, when they list, would creep,
If aught disturbed their noise, into her womb,
And kennel there, yet there still barked and howled Within, unseen.’

The image is complete at all points; and, with this exposure, I take my leave of the crime against Kansas. * * *

“Sir, the crime cannot be denied. The president himself has admitted ‘illegal and reprehensible’ conduct. To such conclusion he was compelled by irresistible evidence; but what he mildly describes I openly arraign. Senators may affect to put it aside by a sneer; or to reason it away by figures; or to explain it by a theory, such as desperate invention has produced on this floor, that the assassins and thugs of Missouri were in reality citizens of Kansas; but all these efforts, so far as made, are only tokens of the weakness of the cause, while to the original crime they add another offence of false testimony against innocent and suffering men. But the APOLOGIES for the crime are worse than the efforts at denial. In cruelty and heartlessness they identify their authors with the great transgression.

“They are four in number, and fourfold in character. The first is the apology tyrannical; the second, the apology imbecile; the third, the apology absurd; and the fourth, the apology infamous. This is all. Tyranny, imbecility, absurdity, and infamy, all unite to dance, like the weird sisters, about this crime.

“The apology tyrannical is founded on the mistaken act of Governor Reeder, in authenticating the usurping legislature, by which it is asserted that, whatever may have been the actual force or fraud in its election, the people of Kansas are effectually concluded, and the whole proceeding is placed under the formal sanction of law. According to this assumption, complaint is now in vain, and it only remains that Congress should sit and hearken to it, without correcting the wrong, as the ancient tyrant listened and granted no redress to the human moans that issued from the heated brazen bull, which subtle cruelty had devised. This I call the apology of technicality inspired by tyranny. * * *

“Next comes the apology imbecile, which is founded on the alleged want of power in the president to arrest this crime. It is openly asserted, that, under the existing laws of the United States, the chief magistrate had no authority to interfere in Kansas for this purpose. Such is the broad statement, which, even if correct, furnishes no apology for any proposed ratification of the crime, but which is in reality untrue; and this I call the apology of imbecility.

“In other matters, no such ostentatious imbecility appears. Only lately, a vessel of war in the Pacific has chastised the cannibals of the Feejee Islands for alleged outrages on American citizens. But no person of ordinary intelligence will pretend that American citizens in the Pacific have received wrongs from these cannibals comparable in atrocity to those received by American citizens in Kansas. Ah, sir, the interests of slavery are not touched by any chastisement of the Feejees!

“Constantly we are informed of efforts at New York, through the agency of the government, and sometimes only on the breath of suspicion, to arrest vessels about to sail on foreign voyages in violation of our neutrality laws or treaty stipulations. Now, no man familiar with the cases will presume to suggest that the urgency for these arrests was equal to the urgency for interposition against these successive invasions from Missouri. But the slave power is not disturbed by such arrests at New York!

"At this moment, the president exults in the vigilance with which he has prevented the enlistment of a few soldiers, to be carried off to Halifax, in violation of our territorial sovereignty, and England is bravely threatened, even to the extent of a rupture of diplomatic relations, for her endeavor, though unsuccessful, and at once abandoned. Surely no man in his senses will urge that this act was any thing but trivial by the side of the crime against Kansas. But the slave power is not concerned in this controversy.

"Thus, where the slave power is indifferent, the president will see that the laws are faithfully executed; but, in other cases, where the interests of slavery are at stake, he is controlled absolutely by this tyranny, ready at all times to do, or not to do, precisely as it dictates. Therefore it is that Kansas is left a prey to the propagandists of slavery, while the whole treasury, the army and navy of the United States, are lavished to hunt a single slave through the streets of Boston. You have not forgotten the latter instance; but I choose to refresh it in your minds. * * *

"Next comes the apology absurd, which is, indeed, in the nature of a pretext. It is alleged that a small printed pamphlet, containing the 'Constitution and Ritual of the Grand Encampment and Regiments of the Kansas Legion,' was taken from the person of one George F. Warren, who attempted to avoid detection by chewing it. The oaths and grandiose titles of the pretended legion have all been set forth, and this poor mummery of a secret society, which existed only on paper, has been gravely introduced on this floor, in order to extenuate the crime against Kansas. * * *

"It only remains, under this head, that I should speak of the apology infamous; founded on false testimony against the Emigrant Aid Company, and assumptions of duty more false than the testimony. Defying truth and mocking decency, this apology excels all others in futility and audacity, while, from its utter hollowness, it proves the utter impotence of the conspirators to defend their crime. Falsehood, always infamous, in this case arouses peculiar scorn. An association of sincere benevolence, faithful to the constitution and laws, whose only fortifications are hotels, school houses, and churches; whose only weapons are saw-mills, tools, and books; whose mission is peace and good will, has been falsely assailed on this floor, and an errand of blameless virtue has been made the pretext for an unpardonable crime. Nay, more—the innocent are sacrificed, and the guilty set at liberty. They who seek to do the mission of the Saviour are scourged and crucified, while the murderer, Barabbas, with the sympathy of the chief priests, goes at large. * * *

"The falsehood of the whole accusation will appear in illustrative specimens.

"A charter is set out, section by section, which though originally granted, was subsequently abandoned, and is not in reality the charter of the company, but is materially unlike it.

"The company is represented as 'a powerful corporation, with a capital of five millions;' when, by its actual charter, it is not allowed to hold property above one million, and, in point of fact, its capital has not exceeded one hundred thousand dollars.

"Then, again, it is suggested, if not alleged, that this enormous capital, which I have already said does not exist, is invested in 'cannon and rifles, in powder and lead, and implements of war'—all of which, whether alleged or suggested, is absolutely false. The officers of the company authorize me to give to this whole pretension a point-blank denial.

"All these allegations are of small importance, and I mention them only because they show the character of the report, and also something of the quicksand on which the senator from Illinois has chosen to plant himself. But these are all capped by the unblushing assertion that the proceedings of the company were 'in perversion of the plain provisions of an act of Congress;' and also, another unblushing assertion, as 'certain and undeniable,' that the company was formed to promote certain objects, 'regardless of the rights and wishes of the people, as guaranteed by the constitution of the United States, and secured by their organic law;' when it is certain and undeniable that the company has done nothing in perversion of any act of Congress, while to the extent of its power it has sought to protect the rights and wishes of the actual people in the territory.

"Sir, this company has violated in no respect the constitution or laws of the land; not in the severest letter or the slightest spirit. But every other imputation is equally baseless. It is not true, as the senator from Illinois has alleged, in order in some way to compromise the company, that it was informed before the public of the date fixed for the election of the legislature. This statement is pronounced by the secretary, in a letter now before me, 'an unqualified falsehood, not having even the shadow of a shade of truth for its basis.' It is not true that men have been hired by the company to go to Kansas; for every emigrant, who has gone under its direction, has himself provided the means for his journey. Of course, sir, it is not true, as has been complained by the senator from South Carolina, with that proclivity to error which marks all his utterances, that men have been sent by the company 'with one uniform gun, Sharpe's rifle;' for it has supplied no arms of any kind to any body. It is not true that the company has encouraged any fanatical aggression upon the people of Missouri; for it has counselled order, peace, forbearance. It is not true that the company has chosen its emigrants on account of their political opinions; for it has asked no questions with regard to the opinions of any whom it aids, and at this moment stands ready to forward those from the south as well as the north, while, in the territory, all, from whatever quarter, are admitted to an equal enjoyment of its tempting advantages. It is not true that the company has sent persons merely to control elections, and not to remain in the territory; for its whole action, and all its anticipation of pecuniary profits, are founded on the hope to stock the country with permanent settlers, by whose labor the capital of the company shall be made to yield its increase, and by whose fixed interest in the soil the welfare of all shall be promoted.

"Sir, it has not the honor of being an abolition society, or of numbering among its officers abolitionists. Its president is a retired citizen, of ample means and charitable life, who has taken no part in the conflicts on slavery, and has never allowed his sympathies to be felt by abolitionists. One of its vice-presidents is a gentleman from Virginia, with family and friends there, who has always opposed the abolitionists. Its generous treasurer, who is now justly absorbed by the objects of the company, has always been understood as ranging, with his extensive connections by blood and marriage, on the side of that quietism which submits to all the tyranny of the slave power. Its directors are more conspicuous for wealth and science than for any activity against slavery. Among these is an eminent lawyer of Massachusetts, Mr. Chapman, — personally known, doubtless, to some who hear me, — who has distinguished himself by an austere conservatism, too natural to the atmosphere of courts, which does not flinch even from the support of the fugitive slave bill. In a recent address at a public meeting in Springfield, this gentleman thus speaks for himself and his associates: —

"I have been a director of the society from the first, and have kept myself well informed in regard to its proceedings. I am not aware that any one in this community ever suspected me of being an abolitionist; but I have been accused of being pro-slavery; and I believe many good people think I am quite too conservative on that subject. I take this occasion to say that all the plans and proceedings of the society have met my approbation; and I assert that it has never done a single act with which any political party or the people of any section of the country can justly find fault. The names of its president, Mr. Brown, of Providence, and of its treasurer, Mr. Lawrence, of Boston, are a sufficient guaranty in the estimation of intelligent men against its being engaged in any fanatical enterprise. Its stockholders are composed of men of all political parties except abolitionists. I am not aware that it has received the patronage of that class of our fellow-citizens, and I am informed that some of them disapprove of its proceedings.'

"The acts of the company have been such as might be expected from auspices thus severely careful at all points. The secret through which, with small means, it has been able to accomplish so much, is, that, as an inducement to emigration, it has gone forward and planted capital in advance of population. According to the old immethodical system, this rule is reversed, and population has been left to grope blindly, without the advantage of fixed centres, with mills, schools, and churches — all calculated to soften the hardships of pioneer life — such as have been established beforehand in Kansas. Here, sir, is the secret of the Emigrant Aid Company. By this single principle, which is now practically applied for the first time in history, and which has the simplicity of genius, a business association at a distance, without a large capital, has become a beneficent instrument of civilization, exercising the functions of various societies, and in itself being a missionary society, a Bible society, a tract society, an education society, and a society for the diffusion of the mechanic arts. * * *

"God be praised! Massachusetts, honored commonwealth that gives me the privilege to plead for Kansas on this floor, knows her rights, and will maintain them firmly to the end. This is not the first time in history that her public acts have been arraigned, and that her public men have been exposed to contumely. Thus was it when, in the olden time, she began the great battle whose fruits you all enjoy. But never yet has she occupied a position so lofty as at this hour. By the intelligence of her population — by the resources of her industry — by her commerce, cleaving every wave — by her manufactures, various as human skill — by her institutions of education, various as human knowledge — by her institutions of benevolence, various as human suffering — by the pages of her scholars and historians — by the voices of her poets and orators, she is now exerting an influence more subtle and commanding than ever before — shooting her far-darting rays wherever ignorance, wretchedness, or wrong, prevail, and flashing light even upon those who travel far to persecute her. Such is Massachusetts, and I am proud to believe that you may as well attempt, with puny arm, to topple down the earth-rooted, heaven-kissing granite which crowns the historic sod of Bunker Hill, as to change her fixed resolves for freedom every where, and especially now for freedom in Kansas. I exult, too, that in this battle, which surpasses far in moral grandeur the whole war of the revolution, she is able to preserve her just eminence. To the first she contributed a larger number of troops than any other state in the Union, and larger than all the slave states together; and now to the second, which is not of contending armies, but of contending opinions, on whose issue hangs trembling the advancing civilization of the country, she contributes, through the manifold and endless intellectual activity of her children, more of that divine spark by which opinions are quickened into life, than is contributed by any other state, or by all the slave states together, while her annual productive industry excels in value three times the whole vaunted cotton crop of the whole south.

"Sir, to men on earth it belongs only to deserve success; not to secure it; and I know not how soon the efforts of Massachusetts will wear the crown of triumph. But it cannot be that she acts wrong for herself or children, when in this cause she thus encounters reproach. No; by the generous souls who were exposed at Lexington; by those who stood arrayed at Bunker Hill; by the many from her bosom who, on all the fields of the first great struggle, lent their vigorous arms to the cause of all; by the children she has borne, whose names alone are national trophies, is Massachusetts now vowed irrevocably to this work. What belongs to the faithful servant she will do in all things, and Providence shall determine the result. * * *

"As the apologies were fourfold, so are the REMEDIES proposed fourfold; and they range themselves in natural order, under designations which so truly disclose their character as even to supersede argument. First, we have the remedy of tyranny; next, the remedy of folly; next, the remedy of injustice and civil war; and fourthly, the remedy of justice and peace. There are the four caskets; and you are to determine which shall be opened by senatorial votes.

"There is the remedy of tyranny, which, like its complement, the apology of tyranny — though espoused on this floor, especially by the senator from Illinois — proceeds from the president, and is embodied in a special message. It proposes to enforce obedience to the existing laws of Kansas, 'whether federal or local,' when, in fact, Kansas has no 'local' laws except those imposed by the usurpation from Missouri, and it calls for additional appropriations to complete this work of tyranny. * * *

"Next comes the remedy of folly, which, indeed, is also a remedy of tyranny; but its folly is so surpassing as to eclipse even its tyranny. It does not proceed from the president. With this proposition he is not in any way chargeable. It comes from the senator from South Carolina, who, at the close of a long speech, offered it as his single contribution to the adjustment of this question, and who thus far stands alone in its support. It might, therefore, fitly bear his name; but that which I now give to it is a more suggestive synonyme.

"This proposition, nakedly expressed, is that the people of Kansas should be deprived of their arms. That I may not do the least injustice to the senator, I quote his precise words: —

" 'The president of the United States is under the highest and most solemn obligations to interpose; and if I were to indicate the manner in which he should interpose in Kansas, I would point out the old common-law process. I would serve a warrant on Sharpe's rifles, and if Sharpe's rifles did not answer the summons and come into court on a day certain, or if they resisted the sheriff, I would summon the posse comitatus, and would have Colonel Sumner's regiment to be a part of that posse comitatus.'

"Really, sir, has it come to this? The rifle has ever been the companion of the pioneer, and under God, his tutelary protector against the red man and the beast of the forest. Never was this efficient weapon more needed in just self-defence, than now in Kansas, and at least one article in our national constitution must be blotted out, before the complete right to it can in any way be impeached. And yet such is the madness of the hour, that, in defiance of the solemn guaranty, embodied in the amendments to the constitution, that 'the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed,' the people of Kansas have been arraigned for keeping and bearing them, and the senator from South Carolina has had the face to say openly, on this floor, that they should be disarmed — of course, that the fanatics of slavery, his allies and constituents, may meet no impediment. * * *

"Next comes the remedy of injustice and civil war — organized by act of Congress. This proposition, which is also an offshoot of the original remedy of tyranny, proceeds from the senator from Illinois, [Mr. Douglas,] with the sanction of the committee on territories, and is embodied in the bill which is now pressed to a vote.

"By this bill it is proposed, as follows: —

" 'That whenever it shall appear, by a census to be taken under the direction of the governor, by the authority of the legislature, that there shall be ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty inhabitants (that being the number required by the present ratio of representation for a member of Congress) within the limits hereafter described as the territory of Kansas, the legislature of said territory shall be, and is hereby, authorized to provide by law for the election of delegates, by the people of said territory, to assemble in convention and form a constitution and state government, preparatory to their admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original states in all respects whatsoever, by the name of the state of Kansas.'

"Now, sir, consider these words carefully, and you will see that, however plausible and velvet-pawed they may seem, yet in reality they are most unjust and cruel. While affecting to initiate honest proceedings for the formation of a state, they furnish to this territory no redress for the crime under which it suffers; nay, they recognize the very usurpation in which the crime ended, and proceed to endow it with new prerogatives. It is by the authority of the legislature that the census is to be taken, which is the first step in the work. It is also by the authority of the legislature that a convention is to be called for the formation of a constitution, which is the second step. But the legislature is not obliged to take either of these steps. To its absolute wilfulness is it left to act or not to act in the premises. And since, in the ordinary course of business, there can be no action of the legislature till January of the next year, all these steps, which are preliminary in their character, are postponed till after that distant day; thus keeping this great question open, to distract and irritate the country. Clearly this is not what is required. The country desires peace at once, and is determined to have it. But this objection is slight by the side of the glaring tyranny, that, in recognizing the legislature and conferring upon it these new powers, the bill recognizes the existing usurpation, not only as the authentic government of the territory for the time being, but also as possessing a creative power to reproduce itself in the new state. Pass this bill, and you enlist Congress in the conspiracy, not only to keep the people of Kansas in their present subjugation, throughout their territorial existence, but also to protract this subjugation into their existence as a state, while you legalize and perpetuate the very force by which slavery has been already planted there. * * *

"Next, and lastly, comes the remedy of justice and peace, proposed by the senator from New York, [Mr. Seward,] and embodied in his bill for the immediate admission of Kansas as a state of this Union, now pending as a substitute for the bill of the senator from Illinois. This is sustained by the prayer of the people of the territory, setting forth a constitution formed by a spontaneous movement, in which all there had opportunity to participate, without distinction of party. Rarely has any proposition, so simple in character, so entirely practicable, so absolutely within your power, been presented, which promised at once such beneficent results. In its adoption, the crime against Kansas will be all happily absolved, the usurpation which it established will be peacefully suppressed, and order will be permanently secured. By a joyful metamorphosis, this fair territory may be saved from outrage.

'O help,' she cries, 'in this extremest need,
If you who hear are deities indeed;
Gape, earth, and make for this dread foe a tomb,
Or change my form, whence all my sorrows come.'

"In offering this proposition, the senator from New York has entitled himself to the gratitude of the country. He has, throughout a life of unsurpassed industry, and of eminent ability, done much for freedom, which the world will not let die; but he has done nothing more opportune than this, and he has uttered no words more effective than the speech, so masterly and ingenious, by which he has vindicated it. * *

"Mr. President, an immense space has been traversed, and I now stand at the goal. The argument in its various parts is here closed. The crime against Kansas has been displayed, in its origin and extent, beginning with the overthrow of the prohibition of slavery; next cropping out in conspiracy on the borders of Missouri; then hardening into a continuity of outrage, through organized invasions and miscellaneous assaults, in which all security was destroyed, and ending at last in the perfect subjugation of a generous people to an unprecedented usurpation. Turning aghast from the crime, which, like murder, seemed to confess itself 'with most miraculous organ,' we have looked with mingled shame and indignation upon the four apologies, whether of tyranny, imbecility, absurdity, or infamy, in which it has been wrapped, marking especially the false testimony, congenial with the original crime, against the Emigrant Aid Company. Then were noted, in succession, the four remedies, whether of tyranny — folly — injustice and civil war — or justice and peace, which last bids Kansas, in conformity with past precedents and under the exigencies of the hour, in order to redeem her from usurpation, to take a place as a sovereign state of the Union; and this is the true remedy. If in this argument I have not unworthily vindicated truth, then have I spoken according to my desires; if imperfectly, then only according to my powers. But there are other things, not belonging to the argument, which still press for utterance.

"Sir, the people of Kansas, bone of your bone and flesh of your flesh, with the education of freemen and the rights of American citizens, now stand at your door. Will you send them away, or bid them enter? Will you push them back to renew their struggles with a deadly foe, or will you preserve them in security and peace? Will you cast them again into the den of tyranny, or will you help their despairing efforts to escape? These questions I put with no common solicitude; for I feel that on their just determination depend all the most precious interests of the republic; and I perceive too clearly the prejudices in the way, and the accumulating bitterness against this distant people, now claiming their simple birthright, while I am bowed with mortification, as I recognize the president of the United States, who should have been a staff to the weak and a shield to the innocent, at the head of this strange oppression.

"At every stage, the similitude between the wrongs of Kansas, and those other wrongs against which our fathers rose, becomes more apparent. Read the Declaration of Independence, and there is hardly an accusation which is there directed against the British monarch, which may not now be directed with increased force against the American president. The parallel has a fearful particularity. Our fathers complained that the king had 'sent hither swarms of officers, to harass our people, and eat out their substance;' that he 'had combined, with others, to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution, giving his assent to their acts of pretended legislation;' that 'he had abdicated government here, by declaring us out of his protection, and waging war against us;' that 'he had excited domestic insurrection among us, and endeavored to bring on the inhabitants of our frontier the merciless savages;' that 'our repeated petitions have been answered only by repeated injury.' And this arraignment was aptly followed by the damning words, that 'a prince, whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a free people.' And surely, a president who has done all these things cannot be less unfit than a prince. At every stage, the responsibility is brought directly to him. His offence has been both of commission and omission. He has done that which he ought not to have done, and he has left undone that which he ought to have done. By his activity the prohibition of slavery was overturned. By his failure to act, the honest emigrants in Kansas have been left a prey to wrong of all kinds. Nullum flagitium exstilit, nisi per te; nullum flagitium sine te. And now he stands forth the most conspicuous enemy of that unhappy territory.

"As the tyranny of the British king is all renewed in the president, so on this floor have the old indignities been renewed, which embittered and fomented the troubles of our fathers. The early petition of the American Congress to Parliament, long before any suggestion of independence, was opposed, like the petitions of Kansas, because that body 'was assembled without any requisition on the part of the supreme power.' Another petition from New York, presented by Edmund Burke, was flatly rejected, as claiming rights derogatory to parliament. And still another petition from Massachusetts Bay was dismissed as 'vexatious and scandalous,' while the patriot philosopher who bore it was exposed to peculiar contumely. Throughout the debates, our fathers were made the butt of sorry jests and supercilious assumptions. And now these scenes, with these precise objections, have been renewed in the American senate.

"With regret I come again upon the senator from South Carolina, [Mr. Butler,] who, omnipresent in this debate, overflowed with rage at the simple suggestion that Kansas had applied for admission as a state; and, with incoherent phrases, discharged the loose expectoration of his speech, now upon her representative, and then upon her people. There was no extravagance of the ancient parliamentary debate which he did not repeat; nor was there any possible deviation from truth which he did not make, with so much of passion, I am glad to add, as to save him from the suspicion of intentional aberration. But the senator touches nothing which he does not disfigure with error, sometimes of principle, sometimes of fact. He shows an incapacity of accuracy, whether in stating the constitution or in stating the law, whether in the details of statistics or the diversions of scholarship. He cannot open his mouth, but out there flies a blunder. Surely he ought to be familiar with the life of Franklin; and yet he referred to this household character, while acting as agent of our fathers in England, as above suspicion; and this was done that he might give point to a false contrast with the agent of Kansas; not knowing that, however they may differ in genius and fame, in this experience they are alike—that Franklin, when intrusted with the petition of Massachusetts Bay, was assaulted by a foul-mouthed speaker, where he could not be heard in defence, and denounced as a 'thief,' even as the agent of Kansas has been assaulted on this floor, and denounced as a 'forger.' And let not the vanity of the senator be inspired by the parallel with the British statesmen of that day; for it is only in hostility to freedom that any parallel can be recognized.

"But it is against the people of Kansas that the sensibilities of the senator are particularly aroused. Coming, as he announces, 'from a state,'—ay, sir, from South Carolina,—he turns with lordly disgust from this newly-formed community, which he will not recognize even as 'a body politic.' Pray, sir, by what title does he indulge in this egotism? Has he read the history of 'the state' which he represents? He cannot, surely, have forgotten its shameful imbecility from slavery, confessed throughout the revolution, followed by its more shameful assumptions for slavery since. He cannot have forgotten its wretched persistence in the slave trade as the very apple of its eye, and the condition of its participation in the Union. He cannot have forgotten its constitution, which is republican only in name, confirming power in the hands of the few, and founding the qualifications of its legislators on 'a settled freehold estate or ten negroes.' And yet the senator, to whom that 'state' has in part committed the guardianship of its good name, instead of moving with backward-treading steps, to cover its nakedness, rushes forward, in the very ecstasy of madness, to expose it, by provoking a comparison with Kansas. South Carolina is old; Kansas is young. South Carolina counts by centuries, where Kansas counts by years. But a beneficent example may be born in a day; and I venture to say, that against the two centuries of the older 'state,' may be already set the two years of trial, evolving corresponding virtue, in the younger community. In the one, is the long wail of slavery; in the other, the hymns of freedom. And if we glance at special achievements, it will be difficult to find any thing in the history of South Carolina which presents so much of heroic spirit in an heroic cause, as appears in that repulse of the Missouri invaders by the beleaguered town of Lawrence, where even the women gave their effective efforts to freedom. The matrons of Rome, who poured their jewels into the treasury for the public defence; the wives of Prussia, who, with delicate fingers, clothed their defenders against French invasion; the mothers of our own revolution, who sent forth their sons, covered over with prayers and blessings, to combat for human rights, did nothing of self-sacrifice truer than did these women on this occasion. Were the whole history of South Carolina blotted out of existence, from its very beginning down to the day of the last election of the senator to his present seat on this floor, civilization might lose — I do not say how little, but surely less than it has already gained by the example of Kansas, in its valiant struggle against oppression, and in the development of a new science of emigration. Already in Lawrence alone there are newspapers and schools, including a high school; and throughout this infant territory there is more of mature scholarship, in proportion to its inhabitants, than in all South Carolina. Ah, sir, I tell the senator that Kansas, welcomed as a free state, will be a 'ministering angel' to the republic, when South Carolina, in the cloak of darkness which she hugs, 'lies howling.'

"The senator from Illinois [Mr. Douglas] naturally joins the senator from South Carolina in this warfare, and gives to it the superior intensity of his nature. He thinks that the national government has not completely proved its power, as it has never hanged a traitor; but, if the occasion requires, he hopes there will be no hesitation; and this threat is directed at Kansas, and even at the friends of Kansas throughout the country. Again occurs the parallel with the struggles of our fathers, and I borrow the language of Patrick Henry, when, to the cry from the senator of 'Treason, treason,' I reply, 'If this be treason, make the most of it.' Sir, it is easy to call names; but I beg to tell the senator that if the word 'traitor' is in any way applicable to those who refuse submission to a tyrannical usurpation, whether in Kansas or elsewhere, then must some new word, of deeper color, be invented, to designate those mad spirits who would endanger and degrade the republic, while they betray all the cherished sentiments of the fathers, and the spirit of the constitution, in order to give new spread to slavery. Let the senator proceed. It will not be the first time in history that a scaffold erected for punishment has become a pedestal of honor. Out of death comes life, and the 'traitor' whom he blindly executes will live immortal in the cause.

'For humanity sweeps onward; where to-day the martyr stands,
On the morrow crouches Judas, with the silver in his hands;
While the hooting mob of yesterday in silent awe return
To glean up the scattered ashes into history's golden urn.'

"Among these hostile senators there is yet another, with all the prejudices of the senator from South Carolina, but without his generous impulses, who, on account of his character before the country, and the rancor of his opposition, deserves to be named. I mean the senator from Virginia, [Mr. Mason,] who, as the author of the fugitive slave bill, has associated himself with a special act of inhumanity and tyranny. Of him I shall say little, for he has said little in this debate, though within that little was compressed the bitterness of a life absorbed in the support of slavery. He holds the commission of Virginia; but he does not represent that early Virginia, so dear to our hearts, which gave to us the pen of Jefferson, by which the equality of men was declared, and the sword of Washington, by which independence was secured; but he represents that other Virginia, from which Washington and Jefferson now avert their faces, where human beings are bred as cattle for the shambles, and where a dungeon rewards the pious matron who teaches little children to relieve their bondage by reading the book of life. It is proper that such a senator, representing such a state, should rail against free Kansas. * * *

"In this contest, Kansas bravely stands forth — the stripling leader, clad in the panoply of American institutions. In calmly meeting and adopting a frame of government, her people have with intuitive promptitude performed the duties of freemen; and when I consider the difficulties by which she was beset, I find dignity in her attitude. In offering herself for admission into the Union as a free state, she presents a single issue for the people to decide. And since the slave power now stakes on this issue all its ill-gotten supremacy, the people, while vindicating Kansas, will at the same time overthrow this tyranny. Thus does the contest which she now begins involve not only liberty for herself, but for the whole country. God be praised that she did not bend ignobly beneath the yoke! Far away on the prairies, she is now battling for the liberty of all, against the president, who misrepresents all. Every where among those who are not insensible to right, the generous struggle meets a generous response. From innumerable throbbing hearts go forth the very words of encouragement which, in the sorrowful days of our fathers, were sent by Virginia, speaking by the pen of Richard Henry Lee, to Massachusetts, in the person of her popular tribune, Samuel Adams: —

'I hope the good people of Boston will not lose their spirits, under their present heavy oppression, for they will certainly be supported by the other colonies; and the cause for which they suffer is so glorious and so deeply interesting to the present and future generations, that all America will owe, in a great measure, their political salvation to the present virtue of Massachusetts Bay.' — American Archives, 4th series, Vol. I. p. 446.

"In all this sympathy there is strength. But in the cause itself there is angelic power. Unseen of men, the great spirits of history combat by the side of the people of Kansas, breathing a divine courage. Above all towers the majestic form of Washington, once more, as on the bloody field, bidding them to remember those rights of human nature for which the war of independence was waged. Such a cause, thus sustained, is invincible.

"The contest, which, beginning in Kansas, has reached us, will soon be transferred from Congress to a broader stage, where every citizen will be not only spectator, but actor; and to their judgment I confidently appeal. To the people, now on the eve of exercising the electoral franchise, in choosing a chief magistrate of the republic, I appeal, to vindicate the electoral franchise in Kansas. Let the ballot-box of the Union, with multitudinous might, protect the ballot-box in that territory. Let the voters every where, while rejoicing in their own rights, help to guard the equal rights of distant fellow-citizens; that the shrines of popular institutions, now desecrated, may be sanctified anew; that the ballot-box, now plundered, may be restored; and that the cry, 'I am an American citizen,' may not be sent forth in vain against outrage of every kind. In just regard for free labor in that territory, which it is sought to blast by unwelcome association with slave labor; in Christian sympathy with the slave, whom it is proposed to task and to sell there; in stern condemnation of the crime which has been consummated on that beautiful soil; in rescue of fellow-citizens now subjugated to a tyrannical usurpation; in dutiful respect for the early fathers, whose aspirations are now ignobly thwarted; in the name of the constitution, which has been outraged; of the laws trampled down; of justice banished; of humanity degraded; of peace destroyed; of freedom crushed to earth; and in the name of the heavenly Father, whose service is perfect freedom, I make this last appeal."

One consequence of this speech was a most melancholy and disgraceful occurrence, the record of which it is painful to be obliged to make. On the 22d of May, after the senate adjourned, while Mr. Sumner was writing at his desk in the senate chamber, Mr. Preston S. Brooks, a member of the house from South Carolina, and a nephew of Mr. Butler, came up to him, and denouncing him as a libeller of South Carolina and a slanderer of his relative, said that he was about to chastise him. Then, while two of his colleagues stood near to prevent interference, the South Carolina member assaulted Mr. Sumner before he could rise from his seat, with a heavy cane of gutta percha, inflicting upon his head repeated and heavy blows till he was prostrate and senseless. This outrage created an intense feeling among the political friends of Mr. Sumner, in and out of Congress, and was condemned by men of all parties. In the senate and in the house indignant speeches were made by the members from Massachusetts and other states; but when in the house an attempt was made to expel the man who had brought disgrace upon it, there were not votes enough (two thirds being required) to carry it. Mr. Brooks was fined by a criminal court, and one of his coadjutors, Mr. Keitt, was censured, but they retained their seats. The injuries to Mr. Sumner were very serious. It was feared at first that they might terminate fatally; but though that was fortunately not the case, he did not recover his health and strength so as to resume his duties for a long period, and not until he had been in Europe for some time for the purpose of medical treatment. His seat for three years remained vacant—a sad commentary upon the unhappy occurrence. Before he returned to the senate his assailant had passed away by a painful death.

The committee appointed to investigate the troubles in Kansas, upon their return submitted a voluminous report of the testimony they had taken, and the facts which had come to their knowledge. Their conclusions were, that citizens of Missouri had illegally interfered in Kansas affairs, and that but for the frauds perpetrated by them in the elections, which prevented an expression of the will of the actual settlers, Kansas would be a free state. The committee reported against the admission of either of the contestants, Reeder or Whitfield, to a seat as delegate, and recommended that steps be taken to secure a free and fair election in the territory. Mr. Oliver submitted a minority report, disagreeing with the conclusions of the majority, and to some extent slighting the testimony.

But before the report was acted upon, the committee on territories in the house reported a bill for the admission of Kansas into the Union as a state, with the Topeka constitution. This bill was rejected on the 30th of June by a vote of one hundred and six to one hundred and five. This vote was so close that a reconsideration was carried the next day, and on the 3d of July the bill was passed by a vote of ninety-nine to ninety-seven. In the senate a bill was passed for the purpose of securing a fair expression of the will of the people of Kansas, and allowing the formation of a state constitution; but the bill for admitting Kansas into the Union did not receive the vote of that branch.

Affairs in Kansas continued to grow worse after the sacking of Lawrence. That event and the circumstances attending it, which we have mentioned somewhat in detail as the crisis in the early history of the territory, served to exasperate the free state settlers, and to excite them to acts of retaliation which they had not before attempted. Some of them had been robbed and driven from their homes, and, becoming desperate, were ready to do any thing to retaliate on their oppressors; but the majority yet hoped for a favorable issue, and that, by peaceful adherence to their principles, Kansas might before long become a free state. They had suffered much by losses, robbery, and forced neglect of their private affairs in the times of excitement, and it was absolutely necessary for most of them to attend to their farms and their business. Those who were less disposed to peace found opportunities to meet parties of marauders belonging to the companies which had come from the south. There were frequent collisions and some bloodshed, and portions of the territory were in a state of civil war,—men of neither party being safe from the guerilla warfare which for a time was carried on. A reference to the pro-slavery papers of the territory and of Western Missouri, of that day, will show how the excitement was kept up and the warfare encouraged. Most of the free state papers were already stopped. To put down this sort of warfare Governor Shannon called on the United States dragoons, and small troops were soon riding through the territory to drive out the marauders. The governor at the same time undertook to disarm the free state people, whether peaceful citizens or not.

Governor Shannon, who never had any qualifications for the post he held, soon made himself obnoxious to his own friends, or rather to the party to whom he had made himself subservient. His course was foolish and inefficient for any good, and by his habits he disgraced the position which he held. When the marauding parties of Missourians and other lawless men of the pro-slavery party were driven out by the dragoons, they indignantly turned upon the governor, who had called the troops into the field. The governor, therefore, determined to resign, and left the territory for that purpose. He was, however, persuaded to return, and soon after was removed by the president.

As the time for the reassembling of the state legislature, on the 4th of July, approached, the free state men hoped that their cause, which for the time seemed to have been utterly defeated, might receive a new impulse. But orders had been issued from Washington that this legislature must not be permitted to assemble. Governor Robinson was a prisoner, and most of the other leading men of the free state party were out of the territory, either on public business or for personal safety. When the legislature assembled, the members did not all attend, and there was no disposition to resist the orders of the government. Colonel Sumner, who marched to Topeka with a large force of dragoons to enforce the orders, met the legislature at the time appointed for their meeting, and performed what he acknowledged was the most painful duty of his life. No resistance was made, and the legislature dispersed. The war department stated afterwards that it was not satisfied that Colonel Sumner was justifiable in dispersing the meeting at Topeka.

Although the free state cause seemed for the present to be prostrate, quiet was by no means restored. The sacking of Lawrence had aroused the sympathies of the people in the states, and emigrants, prepared for fighting, went into the territory. Such companies were not permitted to enter Kansas through Missouri, and the rights of citizens of the United States were repeatedly violated by the authorities or people of that state. Parties, however, entered the territory through Iowa and Nebraska. The free state men formed military organizations, and several conflicts occurred between them and their opponents with various success, each party taking prisoners and arms, and numerous lives being lost. The Missourians were again in the field, and the aspect of affairs became worse than ever. Matters were probably not improved by the course of the acting governor, Woodson, who proclaimed the territory in a state of insurrection.

While matters were in this condition, Mr. John W. Geary, of Pennsylvania, who had been appointed to succeed Governor Shannon, went to Kansas to enter upon his duties. He was a man of energy and character, and he proceeded at once to take measures for the pacification of the discordant elements, instead of exciting them, as his predecessor had done. He issued proclamations charging the disturbed state of the territory mainly upon persons residing beyond its limits; announcing his determination to uphold the organic law of the territory, which guaranteed the right of self-government to the people; and demanding obedience to the present laws as long as they were legally in force. He declared that he would do justice at all hazards, knowing no party or section. He soon ordered the disbandment of the volunteer militia, summoned by the late acting governor, and commanded all bodies of men, armed and equipped without authority from the government, to disband, or quit the territory. It was apparent that the new governor was disposed to take a different course from that of the last, and though the free state men had learned not to put much confidence in the officers appointed by the federal government, they by degrees became more assured of his intentions to do justice. The election for members of the territorial legislature and delegate to Congress was to take place early in October, and the governor promised that measures should be taken to protect the settlers from invasion on that day. These and other measures served in some degree to restore quiet.

CHAPTER VII.

Relations with Spain. — Mr. Perry and Mr. Soulé. — Relations with Great Britain. — Violation of Neutrality Laws by the British Minister. — The British Government requested to recall the Minister and certain Consuls. — Refusal. — Mr. Crampton dismissed and Exequaturs of British Consuls revoked. — Presidential Nominations. — The Canvass. — The Result of the Election.

BUT the affairs of Kansas did not wholly occupy public attention in 1856, although, from the importance of the principles involved and the effect of the contest there upon the future of our country, we have given much space to them.

After the return of Mr. Soulé from Spain, Mr. Perry, the United States secretary of legation at that court, had charge of the negotiations, and an arrangement was effected by which the difficulties and demands between the two countries could be settled. The idea of purchasing Cuba having subsided for the present, the relations between the countries became more friendly. In a letter to the president Mr. Perry reviewed the difficulties which had arisen between himself and Mr. Soulé, and also the manner in which the latter had conducted negotiations, charging him with misapprehending the feelings of the people of Spain and transmitting erroneous information to Washington. It was quite evident that Mr. Perry was correct in some of his statements, but the administration deemed it proper to recall him.

During the spring the friendly relations between the United States and England were somewhat disturbed by the proceedings of the British minister at Washington, Mr. Crampton, and several of the British consuls in the United States, in relation to enlistments for the British army. These proceedings occurred the preceding year, as already mentioned, and certain persons were prosecuted at Philadelphia for violating the neutrality laws, by procuring such enlistments for service against a power (Russia) with whom the United States were at peace. A remonstrance against these proceedings was sent to the British government, and the subject occasioned some diplomatic correspondence, in the course of which it was declared that the British government had, while seeking to increase their forces by recruits coming from the United States into the provinces, given express orders that nothing should be done to infringe the neutrality laws of the United States. And the English government had also, when complaint was made, given orders to stop all arrangements for the enlistment of such recruits coming from the United States. The recruiting, however, in some form continued, and occasioned fresh complaints. It appeared, too, that the British minister at Washington, and the British consuls at New York, Philadelphia, and Cincinnati, were more or less directly concerned in the proceedings. The government, therefore, requested that those agents be recalled by the English government. To this request, while disavowing any intention to infringe the neutrality laws or to give any cause of offence to the United States, the British government refused to accede, stating that it was not believed that those agents had given any cause for such a demand. The United States government, while accepting the conciliatory and apologetic course of the British ministry with regard to the enlistments, insisted that the representatives of England, above named, had persisted in acting in violation of the known wishes of the government and the neutrality laws; and as the British government did not see fit to recall them, the president determined to discontinue further intercourse with Mr. Crampton as minister from that government, and revoked the exequaturs of the British consuls at New York, Philadelphia, and Cincinnati.

This dismissal of Mr. Crampton occasioned some discussion both in the United States and England, where there were not a few who did not disapprove of the president's course. The affair, however, though it was expected to produce some irritation, was not such as could be considered a serious cause of offence, and friendly relations between the two countries were soon resumed. In due time the British government sent Lord Napier to be Mr. Crampton's successor.

The subject of the most general and intense interest during this year was the presidential canvass. On the 22d of February, the national convention of the American party assembled at Philadelphia, and nominated Ex-President Fillmore for the presidency and Andrew J. Donelson, of Tennessee, for the vice-presidency. There had been a warm contest, just previous, in the "national council" of the party, in relation to their principles, or platform, and as the principles adopted were not satisfactory to many of the northern men, they refused to be bound by them or by the nomination of the party.

On the second day of June, the Democratic national convention was held at Cincinnati. There were three leading candidates for the nomination, President Pierce, Mr. Douglas, and Mr. Buchanan. Great efforts were made by the friends of these several gentlemen to secure the nomination of their favorite, and there were some not very friendly thrusts at some of the candidates. On the seventeenth ballot James Buchanan, of Pennsylvania, received the unanimous nomination. The result appeared to give general satisfaction to the party, and was regarded on all sides as the strongest nomination which the Democratic party could make. J. C. Breckinridge, of Kentucky, was nominated for the vice-presidency.

On the 17th of June, the national convention of the Republican party was held at Philadelphia. This party, by its declared principles, stood most directly in opposition to the Democratic party and its policy. The principal candidates were John C. Fremont, of California, and John McLean, of Ohio, an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. Upon the first formal ballot Colonel Fremont received all the ballots but thirty-eight, and the nomination was then made unanimous. William L. Dayton, of New Jersey, was then nominated for the vice-presidency.

The members of the American party who were dissatisfied with the declared principles of that party and with the nomination of Mr. Fillmore held a convention in New York, where they expressed their preference for Nathaniel P. Banks, of Massachusetts, for the presidency, and William F. Johnston, of Pennsylvania, for the vice-presidency. The convention then presented these names to the Republican convention. The latter having made their nominations, the American convention nominated Colonel Fremont for the presidency, and Mr. Johnston for the vice-presidency. For some time there appeared to be a difficulty in uniting these two parties in a way which should give their combined vote to their candidate for the presidency. This was finally arranged in most of the states where the dissenting Americans had an organization, and a union of forces was thus effected.

After the adjournment of Congress, which took place on the 18th of August, public attention was turned almost entirely to the presidential canvass. It was carried on with much spirit and not a little acrimony, the affairs of Kansas furnishing a subject for much of the controversy. The Republican party was confined chiefly to the free states, their policy being to restrain the further extension of slavery; but in some of the border states, especially in Missouri, there were considerable numbers who supported their principles and nominations. The American and the Democratic party, of course, were organized in all the states; but the contest was really between the Democratic and Republican parties. At last the important day came when the nation — of twenty millions — should declare their choice for the highest office in the republic; and notwithstanding the previous excitement, and threats, and forebodings, in which the different parties had shared, when the contest was over and the ballots had been cast, all was peace, and the people pursued their ordinary avocations, submitting quietly to the will of the majority.

The result of the election was the success of the Democratic party. James Buchanan was elected president, and John C. Breckinridge was elected vice-president. They received the votes of nineteen states, being one hundred and seventy-four electoral votes. John C. Fremont and William L. Dayton received the votes of eleven states, being one hundred and fourteen electoral votes. Millard Fillmore and A. J. Donelson received the vote of one state, (Maryland,) being eight electoral votes. The popular vote was not so strongly in favor of the successful candidates as the electoral vote. The Democratic popular vote in all the states was one million eight hundred and fifty-nine thousand three hundred and thirty-seven; the Republican popular vote was one million three hundred forty-one thousand eight hundred and twelve; and the American popular vote was eight hundred eighty-eight thousand and fifty-five; so that the Democratic party, while they had a majority of fifty-two electoral votes, (out of two hundred and ninety-six cast,) were really in a minority on the popular vote.

CHAPTER VIII.

Second Session of the Thirty-fourth Congress. — President's Message. — International Law. — Privateering. — Rules proposed by Paris Congress. — Mr. Marcy's Letter. — Concurrence of the Russian Government. — Revenue. — Revision of the Tariff. — Atlantic Telegraph. — State of Minnesota. — End of President Pierce's Administration.

THE second session of the thirty-fourth Congress commenced December 1st. The last annual message of President Pierce was transmitted the next day. In it the president discussed at length the position of parties in the recent canvass, the slavery question, and the policy of the repeal of the Missouri compromise. This part of the message is partisan in its tone and arguments, but as a defence of the policy of the Democratic party on these questions, we submit it to the reader. Whether or not the president's statements and conclusions are just or sustained by history, the careful and candid reader and observer of events may judge.

"It is impossible to misapprehend the great principles, which, by their recent political action, the people of the United States have sanctioned and announced.

"They have asserted the constitutional equality of each and all of the states of the Union as states; they have affirmed the constitutional equality of each and all of the citizens of the United States as citizens, whatever their religion, wherever their birth, or their residence; they have maintained the inviolability of the constitutional rights of the different sections of the Union; and they have proclaimed their devoted and unalterable attachment to the Union and to the constitution, as objects of interest superior to all subjects of local or sectional controversy, as the safeguard of the rights of all, as the spirit and the essence of the liberty, peace, and greatness of the republic.

"In doing this, they have, at the same time, emphatically condemned the idea of organizing in these United States mere geographical parties; of marshalling in hostile array towards each other the different parts of the country, north or south, east or west.

"Schemes of this nature, fraught with incalculable mischief, and which the considerate sense of the people has rejected, could have had countenance in no part of the country, had they not been disguised by suggestions plausible in appearance, acting upon an excited state of the public mind, induced by causes temporary in their character, and, it is to be hoped, transient in their influence.

"Perfect liberty of association for political objects, and the widest scope of discussion, are the received and ordinary conditions of government in our country. Our institutions, framed in the spirit of confidence in the intelligence and integrity of the people, do not forbid citizens, either individually or associated together, to attack by writing, speech, or any other methods short of physical force, the constitution and the very existence of the Union. Under the shelter of this great liberty, and protected by the laws and usages of the government they assail, associations have been formed, in some of the states, of individuals, who, pretending to seek only to prevent the spread of the institution of slavery into the present or future inchoate states of the Union, are really inflamed with desire to change the domestic institutions of existing states. To accomplish their objects, they dedicate themselves to the odious task of depreciating the government organization which stands in their way, and of calumniating, with indiscriminate invective, not only the citizens of particular states, with whose laws they find fault, but all others of their fellow-citizens throughout the country who do not participate with them in their assaults upon the constitution, framed and adopted by our fathers, and claiming for the privileges it has secured, and the blessings it has conferred, the steady support and grateful reverence of their children. They seek an object which they well know to be a revolutionary one. They are perfectly aware that the change in the relative condition of the white and black races in the slaveholding states, which they would promote, is beyond their lawful authority; that to them it is a foreign object; that it cannot be effected by any peaceful instrumentality of theirs; that for them, and the states of which they are citizens, the only path to its accomplishment is through burning cities, and ravaged fields, and slaughtered populations, and all there is most terrible in foreign, complicated with civil and servile war; and that the first step in the attempt is the forcible disruption of a country embracing in its broad bosom a degree of liberty, and an amount of individual and public prosperity, to which there is no parallel in history, and substituting in its place hostile governments, driven at once and inevitably into mutual devastation and fratricidal carnage, transforming the now peaceful and felicitous brotherhood into a vast permanent camp of armed men, like the rival monarchies of Europe and Asia. Well knowing that such, and such only, are the means and the consequences of their plans and purposes, they endeavor to prepare the people of the United States for civil war by doing every thing in their power to deprive the constitution and the laws of moral authority, and to undermine the fabric of the Union by appeals to passion and sectional prejudice, by indoctrinating its people with reciprocal hatred, and by educating them to stand face to face as enemies, rather than shoulder to shoulder as friends.

"It is by the agency of such unwarrantable interference, foreign and domestic, that the minds of many, otherwise good citizens, have been so inflamed into the passionate condemnation of the domestic institutions of the Southern States, as at length to pass insensibly to almost equally passionate hostility towards their fellow-citizens of those states, and thus finally to fall into temporary fellowship with the avowed and active enemies of the constitution. Ardently attached to liberty in the abstract, they do not stop to consider practically how the objects they would attain can be accomplished, nor to reflect that, even if the evil were as great as they deem it, they have no remedy to apply, and that it can be only aggravated by their violence and unconstitutional action. A question which is one of the most difficult of all the problems of social institution, political economy, and statesmanship, they treat with unreasoning intemperance of thought and language. Extremes beget extremes. Violent attack from the north finds its inevitable consequence in the growth of a spirit of angry defiance at the south. Thus in the progress of events we had reached that consummation, which the voice of the people has now so pointedly rebuked, of the attempt of a portion of the states, by a sectional organization and movement, to usurp the control of the government of the United States.

"I confidently believe that the great body of those who inconsiderately took this fatal step are sincerely attached to the constitution and the Union. They would, upon deliberation, shrink with unaffected horror from any conscious act of disunion or civil war. But they have entered into a path which leads nowhere, unless it be to civil war and disunion, and which has no other possible outlet. They have proceeded thus far in that direction in consequence of the successive stages of their progress having consisted of a series of secondary issues, each of which professed to be confined within constitutional and peaceful limits, but which attempted indirectly what few men were willing to do directly, that is, to act aggressively against the constitutional rights of nearly one half of the thirty-one states.

"In the long series of acts of indirect aggression, the first was the strenuous agitation, by citizens of the Northern States, in Congress and out of it, of the question of negro emancipation in the Southern States.

"The second step in this path of evil consisted of acts of the people of the Northern States, and in several instances of their governments, aimed to facilitate the escape of persons held to service in the Southern States, and to prevent their extradition when reclaimed according to law and in virtue of express provisions of the constitution. To promote this object, legislative enactments and other means were adopted, to take away or defeat rights which the constitution solemnly guarantied. In order to nullify the then existing act of Congress concerning the extradition of fugitives from service, laws were enacted, in many states, forbidding their officers, under the severest penalties, to participate in the execution of any act of Congress whatever. In this way that system of harmonious coöperation between the authorities of the United States and of the several states, for the maintenance of their common institutions, which existed in the early years of the republic, was destroyed; conflicts of jurisdiction came to be frequent; and Congress found itself compelled, for the support of the constitution, and the vindication of its power, to authorize the appointment of new officers, charged with the execution of its acts, as if they and the officers of the states were the ministers, respectively, of foreign governments in a state of mutual hostility, rather than fellow-magistrates of a common country, peacefully subsisting under the protection of one well-constituted Union. Thus here, also, aggression was followed by reaction; and the attacks upon the constitution at this point did but serve to raise up new barriers for its defence and security.

"The third stage of this unhappy sectional controversy was in connection with the organization of territorial governments, and the admission of new states into the Union. When it was proposed to admit the state of Maine, by separation of territory from that of Massachusetts, and the state of Missouri, formed of a portion of the territory ceded by France to the United States, representatives in Congress objected to the admission of the latter, unless with conditions suited to particular views of public policy. The imposition of such a condition was successfully resisted. But, at the same period, the question was presented of imposing restrictions upon the residue of the territory ceded by France. That question was, for the time, disposed of by the adoption of a geographical line of limitation.

"In this connection it should not be forgotten, that when France, of her own accord, resolved, for considerations of the most far-sighted sagacity, to cede Louisiana to the United States, and that accession was accepted by the United States, the latter expressly engaged that 'the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the federal constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the mean time they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess;' that is to say, while it remains in a territorial condition, its inhabitants are maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property, with a right then to pass into the condition of states on a footing of perfect equality with the original states.

"The enactment which established the restrictive geographical line was acquiesced in rather than approved by the states of the Union. It stood on the statute book, however, for a number of years; and the people of the respective states acquiesced in the reënactment of the principle as applied to the state of Texas; and it was proposed to acquiesce in its further application to the territory acquired by the United States from Mexico. But this proposition was successfully resisted by the representatives from the Northern States, who, regardless of the statute line, insisted upon applying restriction to the new territory generally, whether lying north or south of it, thereby repealing it as a legislative compromise, and, on the part of the north, persistently violating the compact, if compact there was.

"Thereupon this enactment ceased to have binding virtue in any sense, whether as respects the north or the south; and so in effect it was treated on the occasion of the admission of the state of California, and the organization of the territories of New Mexico, Utah, and Washington.

"Such was the state of this question, when the time arrived for the organization of the territories of Kansas and Nebraska. In the progress of constitutional inquiry and reflection, it had now at length come to be seen clearly that Congress does not possess constitutional power to impose restrictions of this character upon any present or future state of the Union.

"In a long series of decisions, on the fullest argument, and after the most deliberate consideration, the Supreme Court of the United States had finally determined this point, in every form under which the question could arise, whether as affecting public or private rights, in questions of the public domain, of religion, of navigation, and of servitude.

"The several states of the Union are, by force of the constitution, co-equal in domestic legislative power. Congress cannot change a law of domestic relation in the state of Maine; no more can it in the state of Missouri. Any statute which proposes to do this is a mere nullity; it takes away no right, it confers none. If it remains on the statute book unrepealed, it remains there only as a monument of error, and a beacon of warning to the legislator and the statesman. To repeal it will be only to remove imperfection from the statutes, without affecting, either in the sense of permission or of prohibition, the action of the states, or of their citizens.

"Still, when the nominal restriction of this nature, already a dead letter in law, was in terms repealed by the last Congress, in a clause of the act organizing the territories of Kansas and Nebraska, that repeal was made the occasion of a wide-spread and dangerous agitation.

"It was alleged that, the original enactment being a compact of perpetual moral obligation, its repeal constituted an odious breach of faith.

"An act of Congress, while it remains unrepealed; more especially if it be constitutionally valid in the judgment of those public functionaries whose duty it is to pronounce on that point, is undoubtedly binding on the conscience of each good citizen of the republic. But in what sense can it be asserted that the enactment in question was invested with perpetuity and entitled to the respect of a solemn compact? Between whom was the compact? No distinct, contending powers of the government, no separate sections of the Union, treating as such, entered into treaty stipulations on the subject. It was a mere clause of an act of Congress, and, like any other controverted matter of legislation, received its final shape, and was passed by compromise of the conflicting opinions or sentiments of the members of Congress. But if it had moral authority over men's consciences, to whom did this authority attach? Not to those of the north, who had repeatedly refused to confirm it by extension, and who had zealously striven to establish other and incompatible regulations upon the subject. And if, as it thus appears, the supposed compact had no obligatory force as to the north, of course it could not have had any as to the south, for all such compacts must be mutual, and of reciprocal obligation.

"It has not unfrequently happened that law-givers, with undue estimation of the value of the law they give, or in the view of imparting to it peculiar strength, make it perpetual in terms; but they cannot thus bind the conscience, the judgment, and the will of those who may succeed them, invested with similar responsibilities, and clothed with equal authority. More careful investigation may prove the law to be unsound in principle. Experience may show it to be imperfect in detail and impracticable in execution. And then both reason and right combine not merely to justify, but to require, its repeal.

"The constitution, supreme as it is over all the departments of the government, legislative, executive, and judicial, is open to amendment by its very terms; and Congress or the states may, in their discretion, propose amendments to it, solemn compact though it in truth is between the sovereign states of the Union. In the present instance, a political enactment, which had ceased to have legal power or authority of any kind, was repealed. The position assumed, that Congress had no moral right to enact such repeal, was strange enough, and singularly so in view of the fact that the argument came from those who openly refused obedience to existing laws of the land, having the same popular designation and quality as compromise acts; nay, more, who unequivocally disregarded and condemned the most positive and obligatory injunctions of the constitution itself, and sought, by every means within their reach, to deprive a portion of their fellow-citizens of the equal enjoyment of those rights and privileges guaranteed alike to all by the fundamental compact of our Union.

"This argument against the repeal of the statute line in question was accompanied by another of congenial character, and, equally with the former, destitute of foundation in reason and truth. It was imputed that the measure originated in the conception of extending the limits of slave labor beyond those previously assigned to it, and that such was its natural as well as intended effect; and these baseless assumptions were made, in the Northern States, the ground of unceasing assault upon constitutional right.

"The repeal, in terms, of a statute which was already obsolete, and also null for unconstitutionality, could have no influence to obstruct or to promote the propagation of conflicting views of political or social institution. When the act organizing the territories of Kansas and Nebraska was passed, the inherent effect upon that portion of the public domain thus opened to legal settlement, was to admit settlers from all the states of the Union alike, each with his convictions of public policy and private interest, there to found in their discretion, subject to such limitations as the constitution and acts of Congress might prescribe, new states, hereafter to be admitted into the Union. It was a free field, open alike to all, whether the statute line of assumed restriction were repealed or not. That repeal did not open to free competition of the diverse opinions and domestic institutions a field which, without such repeal, would have been closed against them: it found that field of competition already opened, in fact and in law. All the repeal did was to relieve the statute book of an objectionable enactment, unconstitutional in effect and injurious in terms to a large portion of the states.

"Is it the fact that, in all the unsettled regions of the United States, if emigration be left free to act in this respect for itself, without legal prohibitions on either side, slave labor will spontaneously go every where, in preference to free labor? Is it the fact, that the peculiar domestic institutions of the Southern States possess relatively so much of vigor that, wheresoever an avenue is freely opened to all the world, they will penetrate to the exclusion of those of the Northern States? Is it the fact, that the former enjoy, compared with the latter, such irresistibly superior vitality, independent of climate, soil, and all other accidental circumstances, as to be able to produce the supposed result, in spite of the assumed moral and natural obstacles to its accomplishment, and of the more numerous population of the Northern States?

"The argument of those who advocate the enactment of new laws of restriction, and condemn the repeal of old ones, in effect avers that their particular views of government have no self-extending or self-sustaining power of their own, and will go nowhere unless forced by act of Congress. And if Congress do but pause for a moment in the policy of stern coercion; if it venture to try the experiment of leaving men to judge for themselves what institutions will best suit them; if it be not strained up to perpetual legislative exertion on this point; if Congress proceed thus to act in the very spirit of liberty, it is at once charged with aiming to extend slave labor into all the new territories of the United States.

"Of course, these imputations on the intentions of Congress in this respect, conceived as they were in prejudice, and disseminated in passion, are utterly destitute of any justification in the nature of things, and contrary to all the fundamental doctrines and principles of civil liberty and self-government.

"While, therefore, in general, the people of the Northern States have never, at any time, arrogated for the federal government the power to interfere directly with the domestic condition of persons in the Southern States, but, on the contrary, have disavowed all such intentions, and have shrunk from conspicuous affiliation with those few who pursue their fanatical objects avowedly through the contemplated means of revolutionary change of the government, and with acceptance of the necessary consequences, — a civil and servile war, — yet many citizens have suffered themselves to be drawn into one evanescent political issue of agitation after another, appertaining to the same set of opinions, and which subsided as rapidly as they arose, when it came to be seen, as it uniformly did, that they were incompatible with the compacts of the constitution and the existence of the Union. Thus, when the acts of some of the states to nullify the existing extradition law imposed upon Congress the duty of passing a new one, the country was invited by agitators to enter into party organization for its repeal; but that agitation speedily ceased by reason of the impracticability of its object. So, when the statute restriction upon the institutions of new states, by a geographical line, had been repealed, the country was urged to demand its restoration, and that project also died almost with its birth. Then followed the cry of alarm from the north against imputed southern encroachments; which cry sprang in reality from the spirit of revolutionary attack on the domestic institutions of the south, and, after a troubled existence of a few months, has been rebuked by the voice of a patriotic people.

"Of this last agitation, one lamentable feature was, that it was carried on at the immediate expense of the peace and happiness of the people of the territory of Kansas. That was made the battle-field, not so much of opposing factions or interests within itself, as of the conflicting passions of the whole people of the United States. Revolutionary disorder in Kansas had its origin in projects of intervention, deliberately arranged by certain members of that Congress which enacted the law for the organization of the territory. And when propagandist colonization of Kansas had thus been undertaken in one section of the Union, for the systematic promotion of its peculiar views of policy, there ensued, as a matter of course, a counter action, with opposite views, in other sections of the Union."

In respect to foreign affairs, the president stated that the "United States continued in the enjoyment of amicable relations with all foreign powers." Negotiations were pending with several governments for the settlement of difficulties of more or less consequence, but with the probability of successful results. In Central America there were some difficulties; especially with New Granada, on account of a riotous attack on the premises of the railroad company, by which the lives of several American citizens were lost, and much property destroyed. The interests of the citizens of the United States on the routes across the isthmus, which are used so much by them, and are so important as connecting the Atlantic and Pacific states, in the opinion of the president demanded more protection, and if not afforded by the states of Central America, such protection should be given by our own government.

We have already mentioned that the United States had by negotiation endeavored to secure from other powers the recognition of certain principles with regard to the security of enemy's property under a neutral flag, and of a neutral's property on board enemy's ships. The representatives of the great powers of Europe, at the Paris congress of plenipotentiaries, adopted a declaration embodying these two rules, with the addition of two others, one abolishing privateering, and the other requiring that blockades, to be binding, must be maintained by a force sufficient actually to prevent access to the place blockaded. The latter rule the United States were willing to adopt, but to the rule abolishing privateering the president urged objections, as it was likely to affect injuriously the United States; but he proposed to accept it with a further provision that "private property of the subjects or citizens of a belligerent should be exempt from seizure by the public armed vessels of the other belligerent, except it be contraband." This proposition was received favorably by some of the powers, and there was a prospect that the rule would be adopted into the code of international law.

The following is a part of the correspondence on this subject:—

Extract from a Despatch of His Excellency Count Walewski to Count de Sartiges, May, 1856.

"The plenipotentiaries assembled in the congress of Paris have come to an agreement on the terms of a declaration intended to settle the principles of maritime law in so much as it concerns neutrals during war. Herewith I have the honor to transmit to you a copy of that act, which fully meets the tendencies of our epoch, and at once puts an end to the useless calamities which a custom equally reprobated by reason and by humanity superadded to those which fatally result from a state of war.

"The congress have not overlooked the fact, that their work, in order that it may prove complete, must secure the assent of all the maritime powers, since such governments only as shall have acceded to the arrangement can be mutually bound by it. On this score, we attach peculiar value to the concurrence of the United States, that will not consent, we confidently trust, to hold off from a concert of action which defines a new and essential progress in international relations.

"The determination of the congress at Paris defines the object which it is intended to attain. The clashing constructions given to the rights of neutrals have, up to the last war, proved a source of deplorable conflicts; whilst privateering inflicted on the commerce and navigation of non-belligerent states an injury so much the more grievous, as it gave room for the most calamitous excesses.

"These, count, are the events which, for our part, we are happy in striving to repel, and we feel convinced that the concurrence of the United States will not be withheld in a question every way worthy of the philanthropic spirit of the American people—a question which at once, and in a high degree, concerns the development and security of commercial transactions.

"The plenipotentiaries sent to the congress have, as you may see in protocol number twenty-four, bound themselves, in the name of their respective governments, to enter, for the future, into no arrangement, on the application of maritime law in time of war, without stip-ulating for a strict observance of the four points resolved by the declaration. The concurrence which we solicit at the hands of those governments which were not represented in the Paris conferences can, consequently, apply to those principles only laid down in said declaration, and which are indivisible.

"LEGATION OF FRANCE IN THE UNITED STATES."

DECLARATION.

"The plenipotentiaries who signed the treaty of Paris of the thirtieth of March, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-six, assembled in conference, considering —

"That maritime law, in time of war, has long been the subject of deplorable disputes;

"That the uncertainty of the law, and of the duties in such a matter, gives rise to differences of opinion between neutrals and belligerents, which may occasion serious difficulties, and even conflicts;

"That it is, consequently, advantageous to establish a uniform doctrine on so important a point;

"That the plenipotentiaries assembled in congress at Paris cannot better respond to the intentions by which their governments are animated, than by seeking to introduce into international relations fixed principles in this respect;

"The above-mentioned plenipotentiaries, being duly authorized, resolved to concert among themselves as to the means of attaining this object; and, having come to an agreement, have adopted the following solemn declaration: —

"1. Privateering is, and remains, abolished;

"2. The neutral flag covers enemy's goods, with the exception of contraband of war;

"3. Neutral goods, with the exception of contraband of war, are not liable to capture under enemy's flag;

"4. Blockades, in order to be binding, must be effective; that is to say, maintained by a force sufficient really to prevent access to the coast of the enemy.

"The governments of the undersigned plenipotentiaries engage to bring the present declaration to the knowledge of the states which have not taken part in the congress of Paris, and to invite them to accede to it.

"Convinced that the maxims which they now proclaim cannot but be received with gratitude by the whole world, the undersigned plenipotentiaries doubt not that the efforts of their governments to obtain the general adoption thereof will be crowned with full success.

"The present declaration is not and shall not be binding, except between those powers who have acceded, or shall accede, to it.

"Done at Paris, the sixteenth of April, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-six."

Protocol No. 24. — Sitting of April 16, 1856.

EXTRACT.

"On the proposition of Count Walewski, and recognizing that it is for the general interest to maintain the indivisibility of the four principles mentioned in the 'declaration' signed this day, the plenipotentiaries agree that the powers which shall have signed it, or which shall have acceded to it, cannot hereafter enter into any arrangement in regard to the application of the right of neutrals in time of war, which does not at the same time rest on the four principles which are the object of the said 'declaration.'"

Mr. Marcy to the Count de Sartiges.

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, July 28, 1856. }

"The undersigned, secretary of state of the United States, has laid before the president 'the declaration concerning maritime law, adopted by the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain, Austria, France, Prussia, Russia, Sardinia, and Turkey, at Paris, on the 16th of April, 1856, which the Count de Sartiges, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of France, has presented, in behalf of the emperor of the French, to the government of the United States, for the purpose of obtaining its adhesion to the principles therein contained.

“Nearly two years since, the president submitted, not only to the powers represented in the late congress at Paris, but to all other maritime nations, the second and third propositions contained in that ‘declaration,’ and asked their assent to them as permanent principles of international law. The propositions thus submitted by the president were, —

“‘1. That free ships make free goods; that is to say, that the effects or goods belonging to subjects or citizens of a power or state at war are free from capture or confiscation when found on board of neutral vessels, with the exception of articles contraband of war.

“‘2. That the property of neutrals on board an enemy’s vessel is not subject to confiscation, unless the same be contraband of war.’

“It will be perceived that these propositions are substantially the same as the second and third in the ‘declaration’ of the congress at Paris.

“Four of the governments with which negotiations were opened on the subject by the United States have signified their acceptance of the foregoing propositions. Others were inclined to defer acting on them until the return of peace should furnish a more auspicious time for considering such international questions. The proceeding of the congress of the plenipotentiaries at Paris will, as a necessary consequence, defeat the pending negotiations with the United States, if the two following propositions, contained in protocol number twenty-four, are acceded to: first, that the four principles shall be indivisible; and, second, that the powers which have signed or may accede to the ‘declaration,’ shall not enter into any arrangement, in regard to the application of the right of neutrals in time of war, which does not, at the same time, rest on the four principles which are the object of said ‘declaration.’ As the indivisibility of the four principles, and the limitation upon the sovereign attribute of negotiating with other powers, are not a part of the ‘declaration,’ any nation is at liberty to reject either or both, and to act upon the ‘declaration’ without restriction, acceding to it in whole or in part. In deliberating on this important subject, it behoves all powers to consider, and, if they think proper, to act upon this distinction. All the powers which may accede to that ‘declaration,’ and the subsequent restrictions contained in the twenty-fourth protocol, will assume an obligation which takes from them the liberty of assenting to the propositions submitted to them by the United States, unless they at the same time surrender a principle of maritime law which has never been contested — the right to employ privateers in time of war.

“The second and third principles set forth in the ‘declaration,’ being those submitted to other maritime powers for adoption by this government, it is most anxious to see incorporated, by general consent, into the code of maritime law, and thus placed beyond future controversy or question. Such a result, securing so many advantages to the commerce of neutral nations, might have been reasonably expected, but for the proceedings of the congress at Paris, which require them to be purchased by a too costly sacrifice — the surrender of a right which may well be considered as essential to the freedom of the seas.

“The fourth principle contained in the ‘declaration,’ namely, ‘Blockades, in order to be binding, must be effective, — that is to say, maintained by a force sufficient really to prevent access to the coast of the enemy, — can hardly be regarded as one falling within that class with which it was the object of the congress to interfere; for this rule has not, for a long time, been regarded as uncertain, or the cause of any 'deplorable disputes.' If there have been any disputes in regard to blockades, the uncertainty was about the facts, but not the law. Those nations which have resorted to what are appropriately denominated 'paper blockades,' have rarely, if ever, undertaken afterwards to justify their conduct upon principle, but have generally admitted the illegality of the practice, and indemnified the injured parties. What is to be adjudged 'a force sufficient really to prevent access to a coast of the enemy,' has often been a severely contested question; and certainly the declaration, which merely reiterates a general undisputed maxim of maritime law, does nothing towards relieving the subject of blockade from that embarrassment. What force is requisite to constitute an effective blockade, remains as unsettled and as questionable as it was before the congress at Paris adopted the 'declaration.'

"In regard to the right to employ privateers, which is declared to be abolished by the first principle put forth in the 'declaration,' there was, if possible, less uncertainty. The right to resort to privateers is as clear as the right to use public armed ships, and as incontestable as any other right appertaining to belligerents. The policy of that law has been occasionally questioned, not, however, by the best authorities; but the law itself has been universally admitted, and most nations have not hesitated to avail themselves of it; it is as well sustained by practice and public opinion as any other to be found in the maritime code.

"There is scarcely any rule of international law which particular nations, in their treaties, have not occasionally suspended or modified in regard to its application to themselves. Two treaties only can be found, in which the contracting parties have agreed to abstain from the employment of privateers in case of war between them. The first was a treaty between the King of Sweden and the States General of the United Provinces, in 1675. Shortly after it was concluded the parties were involved in war, and the stipulation concerning privateers was entirely disregarded by both. The second was the treaty of 1785, between the United States and the King of Prussia. When this treaty was renewed, in 1799, the clause stipulating not to resort to privateering was omitted. For the last half century there has been no arrangement, by treaty or otherwise, to abolish the right, until the recent proceedings of the plenipotentiaries at Paris.

"By taking the subject of privateering into consideration, that congress has gone beyond its professed object, which was, as it declared, to remove the uncertainty on points of maritime law, and thereby prevent 'differences of opinion between neutrals and belligerents, and, consequently, serious difficulties and even conflicts.' So far as the principle in regard to privateering is concerned, the proceedings of the congress are in the nature of an act of legislation, and seek to change a well-settled principle of international law.

"The interest of commerce is deeply concerned in the establishment of the two principles which the United States has submitted to all maritime powers; and it is much to be regretted that the powers represented in the congress at Paris, fully approving them, should have endangered their adoption by uniting them to another inadmissible principle, and making the failure of all the necessary consequence of the rejection of any one. To three of the four principles contained in the 'declaration,' there would not probably be a serious objection from any quarter; but to the other a vigorous resistance must have been anticipated.

"The policy of the law which allows a resort to privateers has been questioned, for reasons which do not command the assent of this government. Without entering into a full discussion on this point, the undersigned will confront the ordinary and chief objection to that policy by authority which will be regarded with profound respect, particularly in France. In a commentary on the French ordonnance of 1681, Valin says,—

“However lawful and time-honored this mode of warfare may be, it is, nevertheless, disapproved of by some pretended philosophers. According to their notions, such is not the way in which the state and the sovereign are to be served; whilst the profits which individuals may derive from the pursuits are illicit, or at least disgraceful. But this is the language of bad citizens, who, under the stately mask of a spurious wisdom, and of a craftily sensitive conscience, seek to mislead the judgment by a concealment of the secret motive which gives birth to their indifference for the welfare and advantage of the state. Such are as worthy of blame as are those entitled to praise who generously expose their property and their lives to the dangers of privateering.” * * *

“It is fair to presume that the strong desire to ameliorate the severe usages of war by exempting private property upon the ocean from hostile seizure, to the extent it is usually exempted on land, was the chief inducement which led to the ‘declaration,’ by the congress at Paris, that ‘privateering is, and remains, abolished.’

“The undersigned is directed by the president to say, that to this principle of exempting private property upon the ocean, as well as upon the land, applied without restriction, he yields a most ready and willing assent. The undersigned cannot better express the president’s views upon the subject, than by quoting the language of his annual message to Congress, of December 4, 1854:—

“‘The proposition to enter into engagements to forego a resort to privateers, in case this country should be forced into a war with a great naval power, is not entitled to more favorable consideration than would be a proposition to agree not to accept the services of volunteers for operations on land. When the honor or rights of our country require it to assume a hostile attitude, it confidently relies upon the patriotism of its citizens, not ordinarily devoted to the military profession, to augment the army and navy, so as to make them fully adequate to the emergency which calls them into action. The proposal to surrender the right to employ privateers is professedly founded upon the principle that private property of unoffending non-combatants, though enemies, should be exempt from the ravages of war; but the proposed surrender goes but little way in carrying out that principle, which equally requires that such private property should not be seized or molested by national ships of war. Should the leading powers of Europe concur in proposing, as a rule of international law, to exempt private property upon the ocean from seizure by public armed cruisers as well as by privateers, the United States will readily meet them on that broad ground.’

“The reasons in favor of the doctrine that private property should be exempted from seizure in the operations of war, are considered in this enlightened age so controlling as to have secured its partial adoption by all civilized nations; but it would be difficult to find any substantial reasons for the distinction now recognized in its application to such property on land, and not to that which is found upon the ocean.

“If it be the object of the ‘declaration’ adopted at Paris to abolish this distinction, and to give the same security from the ravages of war to the property of belligerent subjects on the ocean as is now accorded to such property upon the land, the congress at Paris has fallen short of the proposed result, by not placing individual effects of belligerents beyond the reach of public armed ships, as well as privateers. If such property is to remain exposed to seizure by ships belonging to the navy of the adverse party, it is extremely difficult to perceive why it should not, in like manner, be exposed to seizure by privateers, which are in fact but another branch of the public force of the nation commissioning them.

"If the principle of capturing private property on the ocean and condemning it as prize of war be given up, that property would, and of right ought to be, as secure from molestation by public armed vessels as by privateers; but if that principle be adhered to, it would be worse than useless to attempt to confine the exercise of the right of capture to any particular description of the public force of the belligerents. There is no sound principle by which such a distinction can be sustained; no capacity which could trace a definite line of separation proposed to be made; and no proper tribunal to which a disputed question on that subject could be referred for adjustment. The pretence that the distinction may be supported upon the ground that ships not belonging permanently to a regular navy are more likely to disregard the rights of neutrals than those which do belong to such a navy, is not well sustained by modern experience. If it be urged that a participation in the prizes is calculated to stimulate cupidity, that, as a peculiar objection, is removed by the fact that the same passion is addressed by the distribution of prize money among the officers and crews of ships of a regular navy. Every nation which authorizes privateers is as responsible for their conduct as it is for that of its navy, and will, as a matter of prudence, take proper precaution and security against abuses.

"But if such a distinction were to be attempted, it would be very difficult, if not impracticable, to define the particular class of the public maritime force which should be regarded as privateers. 'Deplorable disputes,' more in number, and more difficult of adjustment, would arise from an attempt to discriminate between privateers and public armed ships.

"If such a discrimination were attempted, every nation would have an undoubted right to declare what vessels should constitute its navy, and what should be requisite to give them the character of public armed ships. These are matters which could not be safely or prudently left to the determination or supervision of any foreign power; yet the decision of such controversies would naturally fall into the hands of predominant naval powers, which would have the ability to enforce their judgments. It cannot be offensive to urge weaker powers to avoid as far as possible such an arbitrament, and to maintain with firmness every existing barrier against encroachments from such a quarter.

"No nation which has a due sense of self-respect will allow any other, belligerent or neutral, to determine the character of the force which it may deem proper to use in prosecuting hostilities; nor will it act wisely if it voluntarily surrenders the right to resort to any means, sanctioned by international law, which, under any circumstances, may be advantageously used for defence or aggression.

"The United States consider powerful navies and large standing armies, as permanent establishments, to be detrimental to national prosperity, and dangerous to civil liberty. The expense of keeping them up is burdensome to the people; they are, in the opinion of this government, in some degree, a menace to peace among nations. A large force, ever ready to be devoted to the purposes of war, is a temptation to rush into it. The policy of the United States has ever been, and never more than now, adverse to such establishments; and they can never be brought to acquiesce in any change in international law which may render it necessary for them to maintain a powerful navy or large regular army in time of peace. If forced to vindicate their rights by arms, they are content, in the present aspect of international relations, to rely, in military operations on land, mainly upon volunteer troops, and for the protection of their commerce, in no inconsiderable degree, upon their mercantile marine. If this country were deprived of these resources, it would be obliged to change its policy and assume a military attitude before the world. In resisting an attempt to change the existing maritime law that may produce such a result, it looks beyond its own interest, and embraces in its view the interest of all such nations as are not likely to be dominant naval powers. Their situation in this respect is similar to that of the United States, and to them the protection of commerce and the maintenance of international relations of peace appeal as strongly as to this country to withstand the proposed change in the settled law of nations. To such nations the surrender of the right to resort to privateers would be attended with consequences most adverse to their commercial prosperity without any compensating advantages. Most certainly no better reasons can be given for such a surrender, than for foregoing the right to receive the services of volunteers; and the proposition to abandon the former is entitled, in the judgment of the president, to no more favor than a similar proposition in relation to the latter. This opinion of the importance of privateers to the community of nations, excepting only those of great naval strength, is not only vindicated by history, but sustained by high authority. The following passage in the treatise on maritime prizes, to which I have before referred, deserves particular attention:—

“Privateers are especially useful to those powers whose navy is inferior to that of their enemies. Belligerents, with powerful and extensive naval armaments, may cruise upon the seas with their national navies; but should those states, whose naval forces are of less power and extent, be left to their own resources, they could not hold out in a maritime war; whilst by the equipment of privateers they may succeed in inflicting upon the enemy an injury equivalent to that which they themselves sustain. Hence governments have frequently been known, by every possible applicance, to favor privateering armaments. It has even occurred that sovereigns, not merely satisfied with issuing letters of marque, have also taken, as it were, an interest in the armament. Thus did Louis XIV. frequently lend out his ships, and sometimes reserve for himself a share in the prizes.’

“It certainly ought not to excite the least surprise that strong naval powers should be willing to forego the practice, comparatively useless to them, of employing privateers, upon condition that weaker powers agree to part with their most effective means of defending their maritime rights. It is, in the opinion of this government, to be seriously apprehended that if the use of privateers be abandoned, the dominion over the seas will be surrendered to those powers which adopt the policy and have the means of keeping up large navies. The one which has a decided naval superiority would be potentially the mistress of the ocean, and by the abolition of privateering, that domination would be more firmly secured. Such a power engaged in a war with a nation inferior in naval strength, would have nothing to do for the security and protection of its commerce but to look after the ships of the regular navy of its enemy. These might be held in check by one half, or less, of its naval force, and the other might sweep the commerce of its enemy from the ocean. Nor would the injurious effects of a vast naval superiority to weaker states be much diminished if that superiority was shared among three or four great powers. It is unquestionably the interest of such weaker states to discountenance and resist a measure which fosters the growth of regular naval establishments.

"In discussing the effect of the proposed measure—the abolition of privateering—a reference to the existing condition of nations is almost unavoidable. An instance will at once present itself in regard to two nations where the commerce of each is about equal, and about equally wide spread over the world. As commercial powers, they approach to an equality; but as naval powers, there is great disparity between them. The regular navy of one vastly exceeds that of the other. In case of a war between them, only an inconsiderable part of the navy of the one would be required to prevent that of the other from being used for defence or aggression, while the remainder would be devoted to the unembarrassed employment of destroying the commerce of the weaker in naval strength. The fatal consequences of this great inequality of naval force between two such belligerents would be in part remedied by the use of privateers; in that case, while either might assail the commerce of the other in every sea, they would be obliged to distribute and employ their respective navies in the work of protection. This statement only illustrates what would be the case, with some modification, in every war where there may be considerable disparity in the naval strength of the belligerents.

"History throws much light upon this question. France, at an early period, was without a navy; and in her wars with Great Britain and Spain, both then naval powers, she resorted with signal good effect to privateering, not only for protection, but successful aggression. She obtained many privateers from Holland, and by this force gained decided advantages on the ocean over her enemy. Whilst in that condition, France could hardly have been expected to originate or concur in a proposition to abolish privateering. The condition of many of the smaller states of the world is now, in relation to naval powers, not much unlike that of France in the middle of the sixteenth century.

At a later period, during the reign of Louis XIV. several expeditions were fitted out by him, composed wholly of privateers, which were most effectively employed in prosecuting hostilities with naval powers.

"Those who may have at any time a control on the ocean will be strongly tempted to regulate its use in a manner to subserve their own interests and ambitious projects. The ocean is the common property of all nations; and instead of yielding to a measure which will be likely to secure to a few—possibly to one—an ascendancy over it, each should pertinaciously retain all the means it possesses to defend the common heritage. A predominant power upon the ocean is more menacing to the well-being of others than such a power on land; and all are alike interested in resisting a measure calculated to facilitate the permanent establishment of such a domination, whether to be wielded by one power or shared among a few others.

"The injuries likely to result from surrendering the dominion of the seas to one or a few nations which have powerful navies, arise mainly from the practice of subjecting private property on the ocean to seizure by belligerents. Justice and humanity demand that this practice should be abandoned, and that the rule in relation to such property on land should be extended to it when found upon the high seas.

"The president, therefore, proposes to add to the first proposition in the 'declaration' of the congress at Paris the following words: 'And that the private property of the subjects or citizens of a belligerent on the high seas shall be exempted from seizure by public armed vessels of the other belligerent, except it be contraband.' Thus amended, the government of the United States will adopt it, together with the other three principles contained in that 'declaration.'

"I am directed to communicate the approval of the president to the second, third, and fourth propositions, independently of the first, should the amendment be unacceptable. The amendment is commended by so many powerful considerations, and the principle which calls for it has so long had the emphatic sanction of all enlightened nations in military operations on land, that the president is reluctant to believe it will meet with any serious opposition. Without the proposed modification of the first principle, he cannot convince himself that it would be wise or safe to change the existing law in regard to the right of privateering.

"If the amendment should not be adopted, it will be proper for the United States to have some understanding in regard to the treatment of their privateers when they shall have occasion to visit the ports of those powers which are, or may become, parties to the 'declaration' of the congress at Paris. The United States will, upon the ground of right and comity, claim for them the same consideration to which they are entitled, and which was extended to them, under the law of nations, before the attempted modification of it by that congress.

"As connected with the subject herein discussed, it is not inappropriate to remark, that a due regard to the fair claims of neutrals would seem to require some modification, if not an abandonment, of the doctrine in relation to contraband trade. Nations which preserve the relations of peace should not be injuriously affected in their commercial intercourse by those which choose to involve themselves in war, provided the citizens of such peaceful nations do not compromise their character as neutrals by a direct interference with the military operations of the belligerents. The laws of siege and blockade, it is believed, afford all the remedies against neutrals that the parties to the war can justly claim. Those laws interdict all trade with the besieged or blockaded places. A further interference with the ordinary pursuits of neutrals, in no wise to blame for an existing state of hostilities, is contrary to the obvious dictates of justice. If this view of the subject could be adopted, and practically observed by all civilized nations, the right of search, which has been the source of so much annoyance and of so many injuries to neutral commerce, would be restricted to such cases only as justified a suspicion of an attempt to trade with places actually in a state of siege or blockade.

"Humanity and justice demand that the calamities incident to war should be strictly limited to the belligerents themselves, and to those who voluntarily take part with them; but neutrals abstaining in good faith from such complicity ought to be left to pursue their ordinary trade with either belligerent, without restrictions in respect to the articles entering into it.

"Though the United States do not propose to embarrass the other pending negotiations relative to the rights of neutrals, by pressing this change in the law of contraband, they will be ready to give it their sanction whenever there is a prospect of its favorable reception by other maritime powers.

"The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to renew to the Count de Sartiges the assurance of his high consideration.

[Translation.]

"IMPERIAL LEGATION OF RUSSIA,
WASHINGTON, November 28, 1856. }

"The undersigned, chargé d'affaires of his majesty the Emperor of all the Russias, has the honor, in compliance with the order of his government, of addressing the following communication to the Honorable Mr. Marcy, secretary of state of the United States:—

"The attention of the emperor has, in an eminent degree, dwelt on the proposition by which the United States answered the invitation which had been extended to them to accede to the 'declaration' of the 14th of April. His majesty entirely concurs in the views of the government of the United States which the Honorable Mr. Marcy has laid down in his equally lucid as temperate note of the 28th of July. The proposition of the federal government, in the opinion of his imperial majesty, deserves so much the more to be taken into consideration that the honorable secretary of state argues not for the exclusive interests of the United States, but for those of the whole of mankind.

"The imperial government would have room for self-gratulation should its concurrence contribute to the adoption of the proposition of the United States, and should all the powers, by a common resolution, proclaimed in the face of the world, agree to apply to private property on the seas the same principles of inviolability which belligerents profess for property on land.

"The undersigned is accordingly instructed to notify to the Honorable Mr. Marcy that his majesty the emperor accepts, for his part, the condition under which the United States consent to the abolition of privateering — namely, that the private property of the subjects and citizens of the contracting parties shall in time of war be respected by their respective naval forces, as well as by those of all the powers which may join in this 'declaration.'

"The undersigned is equally instructed to declare to the honorable secretary of state that, should the proposition of the United States become the subject of a collective deliberation, the vote of the imperial cabinet is pledged to them.

"The undersigned improves this opportunity to tender to Mr. Marcy the assurance of his very high consideration. STOECKL."

The revenues for the fiscal year ending July 1, 1856, were seventy-three millions nine hundred and eighteen thousand one hundred and forty-one dollars, which, with the balance on hand at the commencement of the year, made the total resources ninety-two millions eight hundred and fifty thousand one hundred and seventeen dollars. The expenditures, including three millions of dollars, in execution of the treaty with Mexico, and upwards of twelve million dollars of debt, were seventy-two millions nine hundred and forty-eight thousand seven hundred and ninety-two dollars; leaving a balance in the treasury at the above date of nearly twenty millions of dollars. The revenues of the current year were estimated by the secretary of the treasury to be ample for all expenditures, leaving still a balance in the treasury. In view of the receipts being larger than necessary for an economical administration of the government, the president recommended a revision of the tariff, in order to reduce the revenue from the customs.

This subject of the revision of the tariff was a prominent question before Congress, and several schedules were submitted by the different interests of the country. There was something of a contest between the iron interest and the manufacturing interest; but finally, after some compromise, a bill was reported, and with amendments passed both houses by a large vote. This tariff was intended to carry out the president's views with regard to a reduction of the revenue, and it was estimated that it would effect such a reduction to the amount of twenty millions of dollars. The business of the country up to that time had been prosperous, and had it continued so the new tariff might have afforded a sufficient revenue for the wants of the government; but the sequel showed that a measure for such a reduction was not required at this time.

Among the other acts passed at this session of Congress was one in relation to the Atlantic telegraph, which it was proposed to lay down in the Atlantic between Ireland and Newfoundland, and thus connect the two continents by a daily and even hourly intercommunication. The bill provided for paying to the company — an English corporation, but represented in America — a sum not exceeding seventy thousand dollars annually, until the net profits reached six per cent. on the capital, and after that a sum not exceeding fifty thousand dollars. For this consideration the United States government was to be placed on an equal footing with that of Great Britain, in the transmission of intelligence, — the governments having precedence in all cases, — and the citizens of the United States were to have the same privilege as the subjects of Great Britain. By subsequent arrangement the United States government was to furnish one or more steamers to aid in laying down the cable. The Niagara and Susquehanna, two of the finest vessels in the navy, were commissioned for this purpose.

Acts were also passed authorizing the people of Minnesota to form a constitution and state government, for the purpose of admission into the Union, appropriating half a million dollars for the construction of a wagon road to the Pacific from Fort Kearney, via Salt Lake City, and for various other purposes, of which it is not necessary to make mention here. Many important bills, as is too often the case, were acted upon in haste, amid the confusion which attends the close of the session, especially when it is also the termination of the Congress. At this time there was the additional excitement arising from the approaching inauguration of a new president, and many were more disposed to think of the policy of the incoming administration than of the business to be consummated by that which was about to end. But the public business being finally accomplished as far as it was possible in such a state of things, the thirty-fourth Congress came to a close, and the administration of Franklin Pierce was ended.

As we stated at the commencement of this Book, President Pierce had come into office under very favorable circumstances, and the nation was disposed to look with favor upon his administration. Whether or not he realized the reasonable expectations of the country, or redeemed the pledges, direct and implied, which, in his inaugural address and his first message, had been given, we leave for the candid reader to judge.

CHAPTER IX.

The Dred Scott Case. — Opinion of the Supreme Court. — Views of Mr. Benton on the Missouri Compromise and the Decision of the Court. — His Strictures on the President's Message.

As a matter of history belonging to President Pierce's administration, though not delivered till after his term had expired, and in its effects reaching far into future administrations, the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Dred Scott vs. John A. Sandford should find a place in this chapter. That opinion may be regarded as an exposition of the progress of slavery thus far, and an indication of what might be its future progress — the goal of Mr. Pierce's administration and the starting point of Mr. Buchanan's. It was an opinion which touched the hearts and interests of the people of this country more nearly and more generally than perhaps any other decision of that court since its establishment; for it undertook to decide a political question of vital importance, and in a way which ignores the history of the past and disregards the hopes of the future.

The facts were these: Dred Scott and his wife were slaves belonging to a surgeon in the United States army, who took them with him into Illinois, where they resided some time, at Fort Snelling. Subsequently they were taken into Missouri, where they had always been held as slaves. Scott claimed his freedom and that of his wife, on the ground that they had by the act of their master been carried into free territory, Illinois being within the territory in which, by the celebrated ordinance of 1787, slavery was forever prohibited. The District Court of Missouri gave judgment for the master. In the Supreme Court it was decided that the court below had no jurisdiction, because the plaintiffs were not citizens of the United States in the sense in which that word is used in the constitution. But it was not so much the decision of the court as its arguments and dicta on points which were not directly before it for adjudication, that gave this case so much consequence.

As a paper of much importance, and of lasting interest, from its bearing on questions which must sooner or later be decided by the political power, we make the following extracts from the opinion of the court, as delivered by Chief Justice Taney, with whom six of the associate justices concurred, and also extracts from the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Curtis, with whom Mr. Justice McLean concurred.

Mr. Chief Justice Taney delivered the opinion of the court.

"This case has been twice argued. After the argument at the last term, differences of opinion were found to exist among the members of the court; and as the questions in controversy are of the highest importance, and the court was at that time much pressed by the ordinary business of the term, it was deemed advisable to continue the case, and direct a re-argument on some of the points, in order that we might have an opportunity of giving to the whole subject a more deliberate consideration. It has accordingly been again argued by counsel, and considered by the court; and I now proceed to deliver its opinion.

"There are two leading questions presented by the record:—

"1. Had the Circuit Court of the United States jurisdiction to hear and determine the case between these parties? And

"2. If it had jurisdiction, is the judgment it has given erroneous or not?

"The plaintiff in error, who was also the plaintiff in the court below, was, with his wife and children, held as slaves by the defendant, in the state of Missouri; and he brought this action in the Circuit Court of the United States for that district, to assert the title of himself and his family to freedom. * * *

"This is certainly a very serious question, and one that now for the first time has been brought for decision before this court. But it is brought here by those who have a right to bring it, and it is our duty to meet it and decide it.

"The question is simply this: Can a negro, whose ancestors were imported into this country, and sold as slaves, become a member of the political community formed and brought into existence by the constitution of the United States, and as such become entitled to all the rights, and privileges, and immunities, guaranteed by that instrument to the citizen? One of which rights is the privilege of suing in a court of the United States in the cases specified in the constitution.

"It will be observed that the plea applies to that class of persons only whose ancestors were negroes of the African race, and imported into this country, and sold and held as slaves. The only matter in issue before the court, therefore, is, whether the descendants of such slaves, when they shall be emancipated, or who are born of parents who had become free before their birth, are citizens of a state, in the sense in which the word 'citizen' is used in the constitution of the United States. And this being the only matter in dispute on the pleadings, the court must be understood as speaking in this opinion of that class only; that is, of those persons who are the descendants of Africans who were imported into this country, and sold as slaves.

"The situation of this population was altogether unlike that of the Indian race. The latter, it is true, formed no part of the colonial communities, and never amalgamated with them in social connections or in government. But although they were uncivilized, they were yet a free and independent people, associated together in nations or tribes, and governed by their own laws. Many of these political communities were situated in territories to which the white race claimed the ultimate right of dominion. But that claim was acknowledged to be subject to the right of the Indians to occupy it as long as they thought proper, and neither the English nor colonial governments claimed or exercised any dominion over the tribe or nation by whom it was occupied, nor claimed the right to the possession of the territory, until the tribe or nation consented to cede it. These Indian governments were regarded and treated as foreign governments, as much so as if an ocean had separated the red man from the white; and their freedom has constantly been acknowledged, from the time of the first emigration to the English colonies to the present day, by the different governments which succeeded each other. Treaties have been negotiated with them, and their alliance sought for in war; and the people who compose these Indian political communities have always been treated as foreigners not living under our government. It is true that the course of events has brought the Indian tribes within the limits of the United States under subjection to the white race; and it has been found necessary, for their sake as well as our own, to regard them as in a state of pupilage, and to legislate to a certain extent over them and the territory they occupy. But they may, without doubt, like the subjects of any other foreign government, be naturalized by the authority of Congress, and become citizens of a state, and of the United States; and if an individual should leave his nation or tribe, and take up his abode among the white population, he would be entitled to all the rights and privileges which would belong to an emigrant from any other foreign people.

"We proceed to examine the case as presented by the pleadings.

"The words 'people of the United States' and 'citizens' are synonymous terms, and mean the same thing. They both describe the political body who, according to our republican institutions, form the sovereignty, and who hold the power and conduct the government through their representatives. They are what we familiarly call the 'sovereign people,' and every citizen is one of this people, and a constituent member of this sovereignty. The question before us is, whether the class of persons described in the plea in abatement compose a portion of this people, and are constituent members of this sovereignty. We think they are not, and that they are not included, and were not intended to be included, under the word 'citizens' in the constitution, and can therefore claim none of the rights and privileges which that instrument provides for and secures to citizens of the United States. On the contrary, they were at that time considered as a subordinate and inferior class of beings, who had been subjugated by the dominant race, and whether emancipated or not, yet remained subject to their authority, and had no rights or privileges but such as those who held the power and the government might choose to grant them.

"It is not the province of the court to decide upon the justice or injustice, the policy or impolicy, of these laws. The decision of that question belonged to the political or law-making power; to those who formed the sovereignty and framed the constitution. The duty of the court is, to interpret the instrument they have framed, with the best lights we can obtain on the subject, and to administer it as we find it, according to its true intent and meaning when it was adopted. * * *

"In the opinion of the court, the legislation and histories of the times, and the language used in the Declaration of Independence, show that neither the class of persons who had been imported as slaves, nor their descendants, whether they had become free or not, were then acknowledged as a part of the people, nor intended to be included in the general words used in that memorable instrument.

"It is difficult at this day to realize the state of public opinion, in relation to that unfortunate race, which prevailed in the civilized and enlightened portions of the world at the time of the declaration of independence, and when the constitution of the United States was framed and adopted. But the public history of every European nation displays it in a manner too plain to be mistaken.

"They had, for more than a century before, been regarded as beings of an inferior order, and altogether unfit to associate with the white race, either in social or political relations; and so far inferior, that they had no rights which the white man was bound to respect; and that the negro might justly and lawfully be reduced to slavery for his benefit. He was bought and sold, and treated as an ordinary article of merchandise and traffic, whenever a profit could be made by it. This opinion was at that time fixed and universal in the civilized portion of the white race. It was regarded as an axiom in morals as well as in politics, which no one thought of disputing, or supposed to be open to dispute; and men in every grade and position in society daily and habitually acted upon it in their private pursuits, as well as in matters of public concern, without doubting for a moment the correctness of this opinion.

"And in no nation was this opinion more firmly fixed, or more uniformly acted upon, than by the English government and English people. They not only seized them on the coast of Africa, and sold them, or held them in slavery for their own use, but they took them as ordinary articles of merchandise to every country where they could make a profit on them, and were far more extensively engaged in this commerce than any other nation in the world.

"The opinion thus entertained and acted upon in England was naturally impressed upon the colonies they founded on this side of the Atlantic. And, accordingly, a negro of the African race was regarded by them as an article of property, and held, and bought, and sold as such, in every one of the thirteen colonies which united in the declaration of independence, and afterwards formed the constitution of the United States. The slaves were more or less numerous in the different colonies, as slave labor was found more or less profitable. But no one seems to have doubted the correctness of the prevailing opinion of the time.

"The legislation of the different colonies furnishes positive and indisputable proof of this fact. * * *

"This state of public opinion had undergone no change when the constitution was adopted, as is equally evident from its provisions and language.

"The brief preamble sets forth by whom it was formed, for what purposes, and for whose benefit and protection. It declares that it is formed by the people of the United States; that is to say, by those who were members of the different political communities in the several states; and its great object is declared to be to secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity. It speaks in general terms of the people of the United States, and of citizens of the several states, when it is providing for the exercise of the powers granted or the privileges secured to the citizen. It does not define what description of persons are intended to be included under these terms, or who shall be regarded as a citizen and one of the people. It uses them as terms so well understood, that no further description or definition was necessary.

"But there are two clauses in the constitution which point directly and specifically to the negro race as a separate class of persons, and show clearly that they were not regarded as a portion of the people or citizens of the government then formed.

"One of these clauses reserves to each of the thirteen states the right to import slaves until the year 1808, if it thinks proper. And the importation which it thus sanctions was unquestionably of persons of the race of which we are speaking, as a traffic in slaves in the United States had always been confined to them. And by the other provision the states pledge themselves to each other to maintain the right of property of the master, by delivering up to him any slave who may have escaped from his service, and be found within their respective territories. By the first above-mentioned clause, therefore, the right to purchase and hold this property is directly sanctioned and authorized for twenty years by the people who framed the constitution. And by the second, they pledge themselves to maintain and uphold the right of the master in the manner specified, as long as the government they then formed should endure. And these two provisions show, conclusively, that neither the description of persons therein referred to, nor their descendants, were embraced in any of the other provisions of the constitution; for certainly these two clauses were not intended to confer on them or their posterity the blessings of liberty, or any of the personal rights so carefully provided for the citizen.

"No one of that race had ever migrated to the United States voluntarily; all of them had been brought here as articles of merchandise. The number that had been emancipated at that time were but few in comparison with those held in slavery; and they were identified in the public mind with the race to which they belonged, and regarded as a part of the slave population rather than the free. It is obvious that they were not even in the minds of the framers of the constitution when they were conferring special rights and privileges upon the citizens of a state in every other part of the Union.

"Indeed, when we look to the condition of this race in the several states at the time, it is impossible to believe that these rights and privileges were intended to be extended to them.

"It is very true, that in that portion of the Union where the labor of the negro race was found to be unsuited to the climate and unprofitable to the master, but few slaves were held at the time of the declaration of independence; and when the constitution was adopted, it had entirely worn out in one of them, and measures had been taken for its gradual abolition in several others. But this change had not been produced by any change of opinion in relation to this race; but because it was discovered, from experience, that slave labor was unsuited to the climate and productions of these states; for some of the states, where it had ceased, or nearly ceased, to exist, were actively engaged in the slave trade, procuring cargoes on the coast of Africa, and transporting them for sale to those parts of the Union where their labor was found to be profitable, and suited to the climate and productions. And this traffic was openly carried on, and fortunes accumulated by it, without reproach from the people of the states where they resided. And it can hardly be supposed that, in the states where it was then countenanced in its worst form,—that is, in the seizure and transportation,—the people could have regarded those who were emancipated as entitled to equal rights with themselves.

"And we may here again refer, in support of this proposition, to the plain and unequivocal language of the laws of the several states, some passed after the declaration of independence and before the constitution was adopted, and some since the government went into operation. * * *

"The legislation of the states therefore shows, in a manner not to be mistaken, the inferior and subject condition of that race at the time the constitution was adopted, and long afterwards, throughout the thirteen states by which that instrument was framed; and it is hardly consistent with the respect due to these states, to suppose that they regarded, at that time, as fellow-citizens and members of the sovereignty, a class of beings whom they had thus stigmatized; whom, as we are bound, out of respect to the state sovereignties, to assume they had deemed it just and necessary thus to stigmatize, and upon whom they had impressed such deep and enduring marks of inferiority and degradation; or, that when they met in convention to form the constitution, they looked upon them as a portion of their constituents, or designed to include them in the provisions so carefully inserted for the security and protection of the liberties and rights of their citizens. It cannot be supposed that they intended to secure to them rights, and privileges, and rank, in the new political body throughout the Union, which every one of them denied within the limits of its own dominion. More especially, it cannot be believed that the large slaveholding states regarded them as included in the word 'citizens,' or would have consented to a constitution which might compel them to receive them in that character from another state. For if they were so received, and entitled to the privileges and immunities of citizens, it would exempt them from the operation of the special laws and from the police regulations which they considered to be necessary for their own safety. It would give to persons of the negro race, who were recognized as citizens in any one state of the Union, the right to enter every other state whenever they pleased, singly or in companies, without pass or passport, and without obstruction, to sojourn there as long as they pleased, to go where they pleased at every hour of the day or night without molestation, unless they committed some violation of law for which a white man would be punished; and it would give them the full liberty of speech in public and in private upon all subjects upon which its own citizens might speak; to hold public meetings upon political affairs, and to keep and carry arms wherever they went. And all of this would be done in the face of the subject race of the same color, both free and slaves, and inevitably producing discontent and insubordination among them, and endangering the peace and safety of the state.

"It is impossible, it would seem, to believe that the great men of the slaveholding states, who took so large a share in framing the constitution of the United States, and exercised so much influence in procuring its adoption, could have been so forgetful and regardless of their own safety and the safety of those who trusted and confided in them.

"Besides, this want of foresight and care would have been utterly inconsistent with the caution displayed in providing for the admission of new members into this political family. For, when they gave to the citizens of each state the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states, they at the same time took from the several states the power of naturalization, and confined that power exclusively to the federal government. No state was willing to permit another state to determine who should or should not be admitted as one of its citizens, and entitled to demand equal rights and privileges with their own people, within their own territories. The right of naturalization was therefore, with one accord, surrendered by the states, and confided to the federal government. And this power granted to Congress to establish a uniform rule of naturalization is, by the well-understood meaning of the word, confined to persons born in a foreign country, under a foreign government. It is not a power to raise to the rank of a citizen any one born in the United States, who, from birth or parentage, by the laws of the country, belongs to an inferior and subordinate class. And when we find the states guarding themselves from the indiscreet or improper admission by other states of emigrants from other countries, by giving the power exclusively to Congress, we cannot fail to see that they could never have left with the states a much more important power — that is, the power of transforming into citizens a numerous class of persons, who in that character would be much more dangerous to the peace and safety of a large portion of the Union, than the few foreigners one of the states might improperly naturalize. The constitution, upon its adoption, obviously took from the states all power by any subsequent legislation to introduce as a citizen into the political family of the United States any one, no matter where he was born, or what might be his character or condition; and it gave to Congress the power to confer this character upon those only who were born outside of the dominions of the United States. And no law of a state, therefore, passed since the constitution was adopted, can give any right of citizenship outside of its own territory.

“A clause similar to the one in the constitution, in relation to the rights and immunities of citizens of one state in the other states, was contained in the Articles of Confederation. But there is a difference of language which is worthy of note. The provision in the Articles of Confederation was, ‘that the free inhabitants of each of the states, paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted, should be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several states.’

“It will be observed, that under this confederation, each state had the right to decide for itself, and in its own tribunals, whom it would acknowledge as a free inhabitant of another state. The term free inhabitant, in the generality of its terms, would certainly include one of the African race who had been manumitted. But no example, we think, can be found of his admission to all the privileges of citizenship in any state of the Union after these Articles were formed, and while they continued in force. And, notwithstanding the generality of the words ‘free inhabitants,’ it is very clear that, according to their accepted meaning in that day, they did not include the African race, whether free or not; for the fifth section of the ninth article provides that Congress should have the power ‘to agree upon the number of land forces to be raised, and to make requisitions from each state for its quota in proportion to the number of white inhabitants in such state, which requisition should be binding.’

“Words could hardly have been used which more strongly mark the line of distinction between the citizen and the subject; the free and the subjugated races. The latter were not even counted when the inhabitants of a state were to be embodied in proportion to its numbers for the general defence. And it cannot for a moment be supposed, that a class of persons thus separated and rejected from those who formed the sovereignty of the states, were yet intended to be included under the words ‘free inhabitants,’ in the preceding article, to whom privileges and immunities were so carefully secured in every state.

“But although this clause of the Articles of Confederation is the same in principle with that inserted in the constitution, yet the comprehensive word ‘inhabitant,’ which might be construed to include an emancipated slave, is omitted; and the privilege is confined to citizens of the state. And this alteration in words would hardly have been made, unless a different meaning was intended to be conveyed, or a possible doubt removed. The just and fair inference is, that as this privilege was about to be placed under the protection of the general government, and the words expounded by its tribunals, and all power in relation to it taken from the state and its courts, it was deemed prudent to describe with precision and caution the persons to whom this high privilege was given — and the word ‘citizen’ was on that account substituted for the words ‘free inhabitant.’ The word ‘citizen’ excluded, and no doubt intended to exclude, foreigners who had not become citizens of some one of the states when the constitution was adopted; and also every description of persons who were not fully recognized as citizens in the several states. This, upon any fair construction of the instruments to which we have referred, was evidently the object and purpose of this change of words.

“To all this mass of proof we have still to add, that Congress has repeatedly legislated upon the same construction of the constitution that we have given. Three laws, two of which were passed almost immediately after the government went into operation, will be abundantly sufficient to show this. The two first are particularly worthy of notice, because many of the men who assisted in framing the constitution, and took an active part in procuring its adoption, were then in the halls of legislation, and certainly understood what they meant when they used the words ‘people of the United States’ and ‘citizen’ in that well-considered instrument.

“The first of these acts is the naturalization law, which was passed at the second session of the first Congress, March 26, 1790, and confines the right of becoming citizens ‘to aliens being free white persons.’

“Now, the constitution does not limit the power of Congress in this respect to white persons. And they may, if they think proper, authorize the naturalization of any one, of any color, who was born under allegiance to another government. But the language of the law above quoted shows that citizenship at that time was perfectly understood to be confined to the white race; and that they alone constituted the sovereignty in the government. * *

“Another of the early laws of which we have spoken, is the first militia law, which was passed in 1792, at the first session of the second Congress. The language of this law is equally plain and significant with the one just mentioned. It directs that every ‘free able-bodied white male citizen’ shall be enrolled in the militia. The word ‘white’ is evidently used to exclude the African race, and the word ‘citizen’ to exclude unnaturalized foreigners; the latter forming no part of the sovereignty, owing it no allegiance, and therefore under no obligation to defend it. The African race, however, born in the country, did owe allegiance to the government, whether they were slave or free; but it is repudiated and rejected from the duties and obligations of citizenship in marked language.

“The third act to which we have alluded is even still more decisive; it was passed as late as 1813 (2 Stat. 809,) and it provides, ‘That from and after the termination of the war in which the United States are now engaged with Great Britain, it shall not be lawful to employ, on board of any public or private vessels of the United States, any person or persons except citizens of the United States, or persons of color, natives of the United States.’

“Here the line of distinction is drawn in express words. Persons of color, in the judgment of Congress, were not included in the word ‘citizens,’ and they are described as another and different class of persons, and authorized to be employed, if born in the United States. * *

“But it is said that a person may be a citizen, and entitled to that character, although he does not possess all the rights which may belong to other citizens; as, for example, the right to vote, or to hold particular offices; and that yet, when he goes into another state, he is entitled to be recognized there as a citizen, although the state may measure his rights by the rights which it allows to persons of a like character or class resident in the state, and refuse to him the full rights of citizenship.

"This argument overlooks the language of the provision in the constitution of which we are speaking.

"Undoubtedly, a person may be a citizen, that is, a member of the community who form the sovereignty, although he exercises no share of the political power, and is incapacitated from holding particular offices. Women and minors, who form a part of the political family, cannot vote; and when a property qualification is required to vote or hold a particular office, those who have not the necessary qualification cannot vote or hold the office, yet they are citizens.

"So, too, a person may be entitled to vote by the law of the state, who is not a citizen even of the state itself. And in some of the states of the Union foreigners not naturalized are allowed to vote. And the state may give the right to free negroes and mulattoes, but that does not make them citizens of the state, and still less of the United States. And the provision in the constitution giving privileges and immunities in other states, does not apply to them.

"Neither does it apply to a person who, being the citizen of a state, migrates to another state. For then he becomes subject to the laws of the state in which he lives, and he is no longer a citizen of the state from which he removed. And the state in which he resides may then, unquestionably, determine his status or condition, and place him among the class of persons who are not recognized as citizens, but belong to an inferior and subject race; and may deny him the privileges and immunities enjoyed by its citizens.

"But so far as mere rights of person are concerned, the provision in question is confined to citizens of a state who are temporarily in another state without taking up their residence there. It gives them no political rights in the state, as to voting or holding office, or in any other respect. For a citizen of one state has no right to participate in the government of another. But if he ranks as a citizen in the state to which he belongs, within the meaning of the constitution of the United States, then, whenever he goes into another state, the constitution clothes him, as to the rights of person, with all the privileges and immunities which belong to citizens of the state. And if persons of the African race are citizens of a state, and of the United States, they would be entitled to all of these privileges and immunities in every state, and the state could not restrict them; for they would hold these privileges and immunities under the paramount authority of the federal government, and its courts would be bound to maintain and enforce them, the constitution and laws of the state to the contrary notwithstanding. And if the states could limit or restrict them, or place the party in an inferior grade, this clause of the constitution would be unmeaning, and could have no operation; and would give no rights to the citizen when in another state. He would have none but what the state itself chose to allow him. This is evidently not the construction or meaning of the clause in question. It guaranties rights to the citizen, and the state cannot withhold them. And these rights are of a character and would lead to consequences which make it absolutely certain that the African race were not included under the name of citizens of a state, and were not in the contemplation of the framers of the constitution when these privileges and immunities were provided for the protection of the citizen in other states.

"The case of Legrand vs. Darnall (2 Peters, 664) has been referred to for the purpose of showing that this court has decided that the descendant of a slave may sue as a citizen in a court of the United States; but the case itself shows that the question did not arise, and could not have arisen, in the case. * *

"No one, we presume, supposes that any change in public opinion or feeling, in relation to this unfortunate race, in the civilized nations of Europe or in this country, should induce the court to give to the words of the constitution a more liberal construction in their favor than they were intended to bear when the instrument was framed and adopted. Such an argument would be altogether inadmissible in any tribunal called on to interpret it. If any of its provisions are deemed unjust, there is a mode prescribed in the instrument itself by which it may be amended; but while it remains unaltered, it must be construed now as it was understood at the time of its adoption. It is not only the same in words, but the same in meaning, and delegates the same powers to the government, and reserves and secures the same rights and privileges to the citizen; and as long as it continues to exist in its present form, it speaks not only in the same words, but with the same meaning and intent with which it spoke when it came from the hands of its framers, and was voted on and adopted by the people of the United States. Any other rule of construction would abrogate the judicial character of this court, and make it the mere reflex of the popular opinion or passion of the day. This court was not created by the constitution for such purposes. Higher and graver trusts have been confided to it, and it must not falter in the path of duty.

"What the construction was at that time, we think, can hardly admit of doubt. We have the language of the Declaration of Independence and of the Articles of Confederation, in addition to the plain words of the constitution itself; we have the legislation of the different states, before, about the time, and since, the constitution was adopted; we have the legislation of Congress, from the time of its adoption to a recent period; and we have the constant and uniform action of the executive department, all concurring together, and leading to the same result. And if any thing in relation to the construction of the constitution can be regarded as settled, it is that which we now give to the word 'citizen' and the word 'people.'

"And upon a full and careful consideration of the subject, the court is of opinion, that, upon the facts stated in the plea in abatement, Dred Scott was not a citizen of Missouri within the meaning of the constitution of the United States, and not entitled as such to sue in its courts; and, consequently, that the Circuit Court had no jurisdiction of the case, and that the judgment on the plea in abatement is erroneous.

"We are aware that doubts are entertained by some of the members of the court, whether the plea in abatement is legally before the court upon this writ of error; but if that plea is regarded as waived, or out of the case upon any other ground, yet the question as to the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court is presented on the face of the bill of exception itself, taken by the plaintiff at the trial; for he admits that he and his wife were born slaves, but endeavors to make out his title to freedom and citizenship by showing that they were taken by their owner to certain places, hereinafter mentioned, where slavery could not by law exist, and that they thereby became free, and upon their return to Missouri became citizens of that state.

"Now, if the removal of which he speaks did not give them their freedom, then by his own admission he is still a slave; and whatever opinions may be entertained in favor of the citizenship of a free person of the African race, no one supposes that a slave is a citizen of the state or of the United States. If, therefore, the acts done by his owner did not make them free persons, he is still a slave, and certainly incapable of suing in the character of a citizen.

"The principle of law is too well settled to be disputed, that a court can give no judgment for either party, where it has no jurisdiction; and if, upon the showing of Scott himself, it appeared that he was still a slave, the case ought to have been dismissed, and the judgment against him, and in favor of the defendant for costs, is, like that on the plea in abatement, erroneous, and the suit ought to have been dismissed by the Circuit Court for want of jurisdiction in that court. * * *

"The plea in abatement is not a plea to the jurisdiction of this court, but to the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court. And it appears by the record before us, that the Circuit Court committed an error in deciding that it had jurisdiction upon the facts in the case, admitted by the pleadings. It is the duty of the appellate tribunal to correct this error; but that could not be done by dismissing the case for want of jurisdiction here — for that would leave the erroneous judgment in full force, and the injured party without remedy. And the appellate court therefore exercises the power for which alone appellate courts are constituted, by reversing the judgment of the court below for this error. It exercises its proper and appropriate jurisdiction over the judgment and proceedings of the Circuit Court, as they appear upon the record brought up by the writ of error.

"The correction of one error in the court below does not deprive the appellate court of the power of examining further into the record, and correcting any other material errors which may have been committed by the inferior court. There is certainly no rule of law — nor any practice — nor any decision of a court — which even questions this power in the appellate tribunal. On the contrary, it is the daily practice of this court, and of all appellate courts where they reverse the judgment of an inferior court for error, to correct by its opinions whatever errors may appear on the record material to the case; and they have always held it to be their duty to do so where the silence of the court might lead to misconstruction or future controversy, and the point has been relied on by either side, and argued before the court.

"In the case before us, we have already decided that the Circuit Court erred in deciding that it had jurisdiction upon the facts admitted by the pleadings. And it appears that, in the further progress of the case, it acted upon the erroneous principle it had decided on the pleadings, and gave judgment for the defendant, where, upon the facts admitted in the exception, it had no jurisdiction.

"We are at a loss to understand upon what principle of law, applicable to appellate jurisdiction, it can be supposed that this court has not judicial authority to correct the last-mentioned error, because they had before corrected the former; or by what process of reasoning it can be made out, that the error of an inferior court in actually pronouncing judgment for one of the parties, in a case in which it had no jurisdiction, cannot be looked into or corrected by this court, because we have decided a similar question presented in the pleadings. The last point is distinctly presented by the facts contained in the plaintiff's own bill of exceptions, which he himself brings here by this writ of error. It was the point which chiefly occupied the attention of the counsel on both sides in the argument; and the judgment which this court must render upon both errors is precisely the same. It must, in each of them, exercise jurisdiction over the judgment, and reverse it for the errors committed by the court below; and issue a mandate to the Circuit Court to conform its judgment to the opinion pronounced by this court, by dismissing the case for want of jurisdiction in the Circuit Court. This is the constant and invariable practice of this court, where it reverses a judgment for want of jurisdiction in the Circuit Court. * *

"We proceed, therefore, to inquire whether the facts relied on by the plaintiff entitled him to his freedom.

"The case, as he himself states it, on the record brought here by his writ of error, is this: —

"The plaintiff was a negro slave, belonging to Dr. Emerson, who was a surgeon in the army of the United States. In the year 1834, he took the plaintiff from the state of Missouri to the military post at Rock Island, in the state of Illinois, and held him there as a slave until the month of April or May, 1836. At the time last mentioned, said Dr. Emerson removed the plaintiff from said military post at Rock Island to the military post at Fort Snelling, situate on the west bank of the Mississippi River, in the territory known as Upper Louisiana, acquired by the United States of France, and situate north of the latitude of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north, and north of the state of Missouri. Said Dr. Emerson held the plaintiff in slavery at said Fort Snelling from said last-mentioned date until the year 1838.

"In the year 1835, Harriet, who is named in the second count of the plaintiff's declaration, was the negro slave of Major Taliaferro, who belonged to the army of the United States. In that year, 1835, said Major Taliaferro took said Harriet to said Fort Snelling, a military post, situated as hereinbefore stated, and kept her there as a slave until the year 1836, and then sold and delivered her as a slave, at said Fort Snelling, unto the said Dr. Emerson hereinbefore named. Said Dr. Emerson held said Harriet in slavery at said Fort Snelling until the year 1838.

"In the year 1836, the plaintiff and Harriet intermarried at Fort Snelling, with the consent of Dr. Emerson, who then claimed to be their master and owner. Eliza and Lizzie, named in the third count of the plaintiff's declaration, are the fruit of that marriage. Eliza is about fourteen years old, and was born on board the steamboat Gipseey, north of the north line of the state of Missouri, and upon the River Mississippi. Lizzie is about seven years old, and was born in the state of Missouri, at the military post called Jefferson Barracks.

"In the year 1838, said Dr. Emerson removed the plaintiff and said Harriet, and their said daughter Eliza, from said Fort Snelling to the state of Missouri, where they have ever since resided.

"Before the commencement of this suit, said Dr. Emerson sold and conveyed the plaintiff, and Harriet, Eliza, and Lizzie, to the defendant, as slaves, and the defendant has ever since claimed to hold them, and each of them, as slaves.

"In considering this part of the controversy, two questions arise: 1. Was he, together with his family, free in Missouri by reason of the stay in the territory of the United States hereinbefore mentioned? And, 2. If they were not, is Scott himself free by reason of his removal to Rock Island, in the state of Illinois, as stated in the above admissions?

"We proceed to examine the first question.

"The act of Congress, upon which the plaintiff relies, declares that slavery and involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, shall be forever prohibited in all that part of the territory ceded by France, under the name of Louisiana, which lies north of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude, and not included within the limits of Missouri. And the difficulty which meets us at the threshold of this part of the inquiry is, whether Congress was authorized to pass this law under any of the powers granted to it by the constitution; for if the authority is not given by that instrument, it is the duty of this court to declare it void and inoperative, and incapable of conferring freedom upon any one who is held as a slave under the laws of any one of the states.

"The counsel for the plaintiff has laid much stress upon that article in the constitution which confers on Congress the power to 'dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States;' but, in the judgment of the court, that provision has no bearing on the present controversy, and the power there given, whatever it may be, is confined, and was intended to be confined, to the territory which at that time belonged to, or was claimed by, the United States, and was within their boundaries as settled by the treaty with Great Britain, and can have no influence upon a territory afterwards acquired from a foreign government. It was a special provision for a known and particular territory, and to meet a present emergency, and nothing more.

"A brief summary of the history of the times, as well as the careful and measured terms in which the article is framed, will show the correctness of this proposition.

"It will be remembered that, from the commencement of the revolutionary war, serious difficulties existed between the states, in relation to the disposition of large and unsettled territories which were included in the chartered limits of some of the states. And some of the other states, and more especially Maryland, which had no unsettled lands, insisted that as the unoccupied lands, if wrested from Great Britain, would owe their preservation to the common purse and the common sword, the money arising from them ought to be applied in just proportion among the several states to pay the expenses of the war, and ought not to be appropriated to the use of the state in whose chartered limits they might happen to lie, to the exclusion of the other states, by whose combined efforts and common expense the territory was defended and preserved against the claim of the British government.

"These difficulties caused much uneasiness during the war, while the issue was in some degree doubtful, and the future boundaries of the United States yet to be defined by treaty, if we achieved our independence.

"The majority of the Congress of the confederation obviously concurred in opinion with the state of Maryland, and desired to obtain from the states which claimed it a cession of this territory, in order that Congress might raise money on this security to carry on the war. This appears by the resolution passed on the 6th of September, 1780, strongly urging the states to cede these lands to the United States, both for the sake of peace and union among themselves, and to maintain the public credit; and this was followed by the resolution of October 10th, 1780, by which Congress pledged itself, that if the lands were ceded, as recommended by the resolution above mentioned, they should be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, and be settled and formed into distinct republican states, which should become members of the Federal Union, and have the same rights of sovereignty, and freedom, and independence, as other states.

"But these difficulties became much more serious after peace took place, and the boundaries of the United States were established. Every state, at that time, felt severely the pressure of its war debt; but in Virginia, and some other states, there were large territories of unsettled lands, the sale of which would enable them to discharge their obligations without much inconvenience; while other states, which had no such resource, saw before them many years of heavy and burdensome taxation; and the latter insisted, for the reasons before stated, that these unsettled lands should be treated as the common property of the states, and the proceeds applied to their common benefit.

"The letters from the statesmen of that day will show how much this controversy occupied their thoughts, and the dangers that were apprehended from it. It was the disturbing element of the time, and fears were entertained that it might dissolve the confederation by which the states were then united.

"These fears and dangers were, however, at once removed, when the state of Virginia, in 1784, voluntarily ceded to the United States the immense tract of country lying north-west of the River Ohio, and which was within the acknowledged limits of the state. The only object of the state, in making this cession, was to put an end to the threatening and exciting controversy, and to enable the Congress of that time to dispose of the lands, and appropriate the proceeds as a common fund for the common benefit of the states. It was not ceded because it was inconvenient to the state to hold and govern it, nor from any expectation that it could be better or more conveniently governed by the United States.

"The example of Virginia was soon afterwards followed by other states, and, at the time of the adoption of the constitution, all of the states, similarly situated, had ceded their unappropriated lands, except North Carolina and Georgia. The main object for which these cessions were desired and made, was on account of their money value, and to put an end to a dangerous controversy, as to who was justly entitled to the proceeds when the lands should be sold. It is necessary to bring this part of the history of these cessions thus distinctly into view, because it will enable us the better to comprehend the phraseology of the article in the constitution, so often referred to in the argument.

"Undoubtedly the powers of sovereignty and the eminent domain were ceded with the land. This was essential, in order to make it effectual, and to accomplish its objects. But it must be remembered that, at that time, there was no government of the United States in existence with enumerated and limited powers; what was then called the United States, were thirteen separate, sovereign, independent states, which had entered into a league or confederation for their mutual protection and advantage, and the Congress of the United States was composed of the representatives of these separate sovereignties, meeting together, as equals, to discuss and decide on certain measures which the states, by the Articles of Confederation, had agreed to submit to their decision. But this confederation had none of the attributes of sovereignty in legislative, executive, or judicial power. It was little more than a congress of ambassadors, authorized to represent separate nations in matters in which they had a common concern.

"It was this Congress that accepted the cession from Virginia. They had no power to accept it under the Articles of Confederation. But they had an undoubted right, as independent sovereignties, to accept any cession of territory for their common benefit, which all of them assented to; and it is equally clear, that as their common property, and having no superior to control them, they had the right to exercise absolute dominion over it, subject only to the restrictions which Virginia had imposed in her act of cession. There was, as we have said, no government of the United States then in existence with special enumerated and limited powers. The territory belonged to sovereignties, who, subject to the limitations above mentioned, had a right to establish any form of government they pleased, by compact or treaty among themselves, and to regulate rights of person and rights of property in the territory, as they might deem proper. It was by a Congress representing the authority of these several and separate sovereignties, and acting under their authority and command, (but not from any authority derived from the Articles of Confederation,) that the instrument usually called the ordinance of 1787 was adopted; regulating in much detail the principles and the laws by which this territory should be governed; and among other provisions slavery is prohibited in it. We do not question the power of the states, by agreement among themselves, to pass this ordinance, nor its obligatory force in the territory, while the confederation or league of the states in their separate sovereign character continued to exist.

"This was the state of things when the constitution of the United States was formed. The territory ceded by Virginia belonged to several confederated states as common property, and they had united in establishing in it a system of government and jurisprudence, in order to prepare it for admission as states, according to the terms of the cession. They were about to dissolve this federative Union, and to surrender a portion of their independent sovereignty to a new government, which, for certain purposes, would make the people of the several states one people, and which was to be supreme and controlling within its sphere of action throughout the United States; but this government was to be carefully limited in its powers, and to exercise no authority beyond those expressly granted by the constitution, or necessarily to be implied from the language of the instrument, and the objects it was intended to accomplish; and as this league of states would, upon the adoption of the new government, cease to have any power over the territory, and the ordinance they had agreed upon be incapable of execution, and a mere nullity, it was obvious that some provision was necessary to give the new government sufficient power to enable it to carry into effect the objects for which it was ceded, and the compacts and agreements which the states had made with each other in the exercise of their powers of sovereignty. It was necessary that the lands should be sold to pay the war debt; that a government and system of jurisprudence should be maintained in it, to protect the citizens of the United States who should migrate to the territory, in their rights of person and of property. It was also necessary that the new government, about to be adopted, should be authorized to maintain the claim of the United States to the unappropriated lands in North Carolina and Georgia, which had not then been ceded, but the cession of which was confidently anticipated upon some terms that would be arranged between the general government and these two states. And, moreover, there were many articles of value besides this property in land, such as arms, military stores, munitions, and ships of war, which were the common property of the states, when acting in their independent characters as confederates, which neither the new government nor any one else would have a right to take possession of, or control, without authority from them; and it was to place these things under the guardianship and protection of the new government, and to clothe it with the necessary powers, that the clause was inserted in the constitution, which gives Congress the power to 'dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.' It was intended for a specific purpose, to provide for the things we have mentioned. It was to transfer to the new government the property then held in common by the states, and to give to that government power to apply it to the objects for which it had been destined by mutual agreement among the states before their league was dissolved. It applied only to the property which the states held in common at that time, and has no reference whatever to any territory or other property which the new sovereignty might afterwards itself acquire.

"The language used in the clause, the arrangement and combination of the powers, and the somewhat unusual phraseology it uses, when it speaks of the political power to be exercised in the government of the territory, all indicate the design and meaning of the clause to be such as we have mentioned. It does not speak of any territory, nor of territories, but uses language which, according to its legitimate meaning, points to a particular thing. The power is given in relation only to the territory of the United States; that is, to a territory then in existence, and then known or claimed as the territory of the United States. It begins its enumeration of powers by that of disposing—in other words, making sale—of the lands, or raising money from them, which, as we have already said, was the main object of the cession, and which is accordingly the first thing provided for in the article. It then gives the power which was necessarily associated with the disposition and sale of the lands; that is, the power of making needful rules and regulations respecting the territory. And whatever construction may now be given to these words, every one, we think, must admit that they are not the words usually employed by statesmen in giving supreme power of legislation. They are certainly very unlike the words used in the power granted to legislate over territory which the new government might afterwards itself obtain by cession from a state, either for its seat of government, or for forts, magazines, arsenals, dock yards, and other needful buildings.

“And the same power of making needful rules respecting the territory is, in precisely the same language, applied to the other property belonging to the United States—associating the power over the territory in this respect with the power over movable or personal property—that is, the ships, arms, and munitions of war, which then belonged in common to the state sovereignties. And it will hardly be said that this power, in relation to the last-mentioned objects, was deemed necessary to be thus specially given to the new government, in order to authorize it to make needful rules and regulations respecting the ships it might itself build, or arms and munitions of war it might itself manufacture or provide for the public service.

“No one, it is believed, would think a moment of deriving the power of Congress to make needful rules and regulations in relation to property of this kind from this clause of the constitution. Nor can it, upon any fair construction, be applied to any property but that which the new government was about to receive from the confederated states. And if this be true as to this property, it must be equally true and limited as to the territory, which is so carefully and precisely coupled with it—and like it, referred to as property in the power granted. The concluding words of the clause appear to render this construction irresistible; for, after the provisions we have mentioned, it proceeds to say, ‘that nothing in the constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular state.’

“Now, as we have before said, all of the states, except North Carolina and Georgia, had made the cession before the constitution was adopted, according to the resolution of Congress of October 10, 1780. The claims of other states, that the unappropriated lands in these two states should be applied to the common benefit, in like manner was still insisted on, but refused by the states. And this member of the clause in question evidently applies to them, and can apply to nothing else. It was to exclude the conclusion that either party, by adopting the constitution, would surrender what they deemed their rights. And when the latter provision relates so obviously to the unappropriated lands not yet ceded by the states, and the first clause makes provision for those then actually ceded, it is impossible, by any just rule of construction, to make the first provision general, and extend to all territories which the federal government might in any way afterwards acquire, when the latter is plainly and unequivocally confined to a particular territory; which was a part of the same controversy, and involved in the same dispute, and depended upon the same principles. The union of the two provisions in the same clause shows that they were kindred subjects; and that the whole clause is local, and relates only to lands within the limits of the United States, which had been or then were claimed by a state; and that no other territory was in the mind of the framers of the constitution, or intended to be embraced in it. Upon any other construction it would be impossible to account for the insertion of the last provision in the place where it is found, or to comprehend why or for what object it was associated with the previous provision.

"This view of the subject is confirmed by the manner in which the present government of the United States dealt with the subject as soon as it came into existence. It must be borne in mind that the same states that formed the confederation also formed and adopted the new government, to which so large a portion of their former sovereign powers were surrendered. It must also be borne in mind that all of these same states which had then ratified the new constitution were represented in the Congress which passed the first law for the government of this territory; and many of the members of that legislative body had been deputies from the states under the confederation—had united in adopting the ordinance of 1787, and assisted in forming the new government under which they were then acting, and whose powers they were then exercising. And it is obvious, from the law they passed to carry into effect the principles and provisions of the ordinance, that they regarded it as the act of the states done in the exercise of their legitimate powers at the time. The new government took the territory as it found it, and in the condition in which it was transferred, and did not attempt to undo any thing that had been done. And, among the earliest laws passed under the new government, is one reviving the ordinance of 1787, which had become inoperative, and a nullity, upon the adoption of the constitution. This law introduces no new form or principles for its government, but recites, in the preamble, that it is passed in order that this ordinance may continue to have full effect, and proceeds to make only those rules and regulations which were needful to adapt it to the new government, into whose hands the power had fallen. It appears, therefore, that this Congress regarded the purposes to which the land in this territory was to be applied, and the form of government and principles of jurisprudence which were to prevail there, while it remained in the territorial state, as already determined on by the states when they had full power and right to make the decision; and that the new government, having received it in this condition, ought to carry substantially into effect the plans and principles which had been previously adopted by the states, and which, no doubt, the states anticipated when they surrendered their power to the new government. And if we regard this clause of the constitution as pointing to this territory, with a territorial government already established in it, which had been ceded to the states for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned—every word in it is perfectly appropriate, and easily understood, and the provisions it contains are in perfect harmony with the objects for which it was ceded, and with the condition of its government as a territory at the time. We can, then, easily account for the manner in which the first Congress legislated on the subject—and can also understand why this power over the territory was associated in the same clause with the other property of the United States, and subjected to the like power of making needful rules and regulations. But if the clause is construed in the expanded sense contended for, so as to embrace any territory acquired from a foreign nation by the present government, and to give it in such territory a despotic and unlimited power over persons and property, such as the confederated states might exercise in their common property, it would be difficult to account for the phraseology used, when compared with other grants of power — and also for its association with the other provisions in the same clause.

“The constitution has always been remarkable for the felicity of its arrangement of different subjects, and the perspicuity and appropriateness of the language it uses. But if this clause is construed to extend to territory acquired by the present government from a foreign nation, outside of the limits of any charter from the British government to a colony, it would be difficult to say, why it was deemed necessary to give the government the power to sell any vacant lands belonging to the sovereignty which might be found within it; and if this was necessary, why the grant of this power should precede the power to legislate over it and establish a government there; and still more difficult to say, why it was deemed necessary so specially and particularly to grant the power to make needful rules and regulations in relation to any personal or movable property it might acquire there. For the words other property, necessarily, by every known rule of interpretation, must mean property of a different description from territory or land. And the difficulty would perhaps be insurmountable in endeavoring to account for the last member of the sentence, which provides that ‘nothing in this constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States or any particular state,’ or to say how any particular state could have claims in or to a territory ceded by a foreign government, or to account for associating this provision with the preceding provisions of the clause, with which it would appear to have no connection.

“The words ‘needful rules and regulations’ would seem, also, to have been cautiously used for some definite object. They are not the words usually employed by statesmen, when they mean to give the powers of sovereignty, or to establish a government, or to authorize its establishment. Thus, in the law to renew and keep alive the ordinance of 1787, and to reestablish the government, the title of the law is, ‘An act to provide for the government of the territory north-west of the River Ohio.’ And in the constitution, when granting the power to legislate over the territory that may be selected for the seat of government independently of a state, it does not say Congress shall have power ‘to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory;’ but it declares that ‘Congress shall have power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over such District (not exceeding ten miles square) as may, by cession of particular states and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of the government of the United States.’

“The words ‘rules and regulations’ are usually employed in the constitution in speaking of some particular specified power which it means to confer on the government, and not, as we have seen, when granting general powers of legislation; as, for example, in the particular power to Congress ‘to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces, or the particular and specific power to regulate commerce;’ ‘to establish a uniform rule of naturalization;’ ‘to coin money and regulate the value thereof.’ And to construe the words of which we are speaking as a general and unlimited grant of sovereignty over territories which the government might afterwards acquire, is to use them in a sense and for a purpose for which they were not used in any other part of the instrument. But if confined to a particular territory, in which a government and laws had already been established, but which would require some alterations to adapt it to the new government, the words are peculiarly applicable and appropriate for that purpose. * * *

"This brings us to examine by what provision of the constitution the present federal government, under its delegated and restricted powers, is authorized to acquire territory outside of the original limits of the United States, and what powers it may exercise therein over the person or property of a citizen of the United States, while it remains a territory, and until it shall be admitted as one of the states of the Union.

"There is certainly no power given by the constitution to the federal government to establish or maintain colonies bordering on the United States or at a distance, to be ruled and governed at its own pleasure; nor to enlarge its territorial limits in any way, except by the admission of new states. That power is plainly given; and if a new state is admitted, it needs no further legislation by Congress, because the constitution itself defines the relative rights, and powers, and duties of the state, and the citizens of the state, and the federal government. But no power is given to acquire a territory to be held and governed permanently in that character.

"And indeed the power exercised by Congress to acquire territory and establish a government there, according to its own unlimited discretion, was viewed with great jealousy by the leading statesmen of the day. And in the Federalist, (No. 38,) written by Mr. Madison, he speaks of the acquisition of the north-western territory by the confederated states, by the cession from Virginia, and the establishment of a government there, as an exercise of power not warranted by the Articles of Confederation, and dangerous to the liberties of the people. And he urges the adoption of the constitution as a security and safeguard against such an exercise of power.

"We do not mean, however, to question the power of Congress in this respect. The power to expand the territory of the United States, by the admission of new states, is plainly given; and in the construction of this power by all the departments of the government, it has been held to authorize the acquisition of territory, not fit for admission at the time, but to be admitted as soon as its population and situation would entitle it to admission. It is acquired to become a state, and not to be held as a colony and governed by Congress with absolute authority; and as the propriety of admitting a new state is committed to the sound discretion of Congress, the power to acquire territory for that purpose, to be held by the United States until it is in a suitable condition to become a state upon an equal footing with the other states, must rest upon the same discretion. It is a question for the political department of the government, and not the judicial; and whatever the political department of the government shall recognize as within the limits of the United States, the judicial department is also bound to recognize, and to administer in it the laws of the United States, so far as they apply, and to maintain in the territory the authority and rights of the government, and also the personal rights and rights of property of individual citizens, as secured by the constitution. All we mean to say on this point is, that, as there is no express regulation in the constitution defining the power which the general government may exercise over the person or property of a citizen in a territory thus acquired, the court must necessarily look to the provisions and principles of the constitution, and its distribution of powers, for the rules and principles by which its decision must be governed.

"Taking this rule to guide us, it may be safely assumed that citizens of the United States who migrate to a territory belonging to the people of the United States, cannot be ruled as mere colonists, dependent upon the will of the general government, and to be governed by any laws it may think proper to impose. The principle upon which our governments rest, and upon which alone they continue to exist, is the union of states, sovereign and independent within their own limits in their internal and domestic concerns, and bound together as one people by a general government, possessing certain enumerated and restricted powers, delegated to it by the people of the several states, and exercising supreme authority within the scope of the powers granted to it throughout the dominion of the United States. A power, therefore, in the general government to obtain and hold colonies and dependent territories, over which they might legislate without restriction, would be inconsistent with its own existence in its present form. Whatever it acquires, it acquires for the benefit of the people of the several states who created it. It is their trustee acting for them, and charged with the duty of promoting the interests of the whole people of the Union in the exercise of the powers specifically granted.

"At the time when the territory in question was obtained by cession from France, it contained no population fit to be associated together and admitted as a state; and it therefore was absolutely necessary to hold possession of it, as a territory belonging to the United States, until it was settled and inhabited by a civilized community capable of self-government, and in a condition to be admitted on equal terms with the other states as a member of the Union. . But, as we have before said, it was acquired by the general government, as the representative and trustee of the people of the United States, and it must therefore be held in that character for their common and equal benefit; for it was the people of the several states, acting through their agent and representative, the federal government, who in fact acquired the territory in question, and the government holds it for their common use until it shall be associated with the other states as a member of the Union. * * *

"But the power of Congress over the person or property of a citizen can never be a mere discretionary power under our constitution and form of government. The powers of the government and the rights and privileges of the citizen are regulated and plainly defined by the constitution itself. And when the territory becomes a part of the United States, the federal government enters into possession in the character impressed upon it by those who created it. It enters upon it with its powers over the citizen strictly defined, and limited by the constitution, from which it derives its own existence, and by virtue of which alone it continues to exist and act as a government and sovereignty. It has no power of any kind beyond it; and it cannot, when it enters a territory of the United States, put off its character, and assume discretionary or despotic powers which the constitution has denied to it. It cannot create for itself a new character separated from the citizens of the United States, and the duties it owes them under the provisions of the constitution. The territory being a part of the United States, the government and the citizen both enter it under the authority of the constitution, with their respective rights defined and marked out; and the federal government can exercise no power over his person or property beyond what that instrument confers, nor lawfully deny any right which it has reserved.

"A reference to a few of the provisions of the constitution will illustrate this proposition.

"For example, no one, we presume, will contend that Congress can make any law in a territory respecting the establishment of religion, or the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people of the territory peaceably to assemble, and to petition the government for the redress of grievances.

"Nor can Congress deny to the people the right to keep and bear arms, nor the right to trial by jury, nor compel any one to be a witness against himself in a criminal proceeding.

"These powers, and others, in relation to rights of person, which it is not necessary here to enumerate, are, in express and positive terms, denied to the general government; and the rights of private property have been guarded with equal care. Thus the rights of property are united with the rights of person, and placed on the same ground by the fifth amendment to the constitution, which provides that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, and property, without due process of law. And an act of Congress which deprives a citizen of the United States of his liberty or property, merely because he came himself or brought his property into a particular territory of the United States, and who had committed no offence against the laws, could hardly be dignified with the name of due process of law.

"So, too, it will hardly be contended that Congress could by law quarter a soldier in a house in a territory without the consent of the owner, in time of peace; nor in time of war, but in a manner prescribed by law. Nor could they by law forfeit the property of a citizen in a territory, who was convicted of treason, for a longer period than the life of the person convicted; nor take private property for public use without just compensation.

"The powers over person and property of which we speak are not only not granted to Congress, but are in express terms denied, and they are forbidden to exercise them. And this prohibition is not confined to the states, but the words are general, and extend to the whole territory over which the constitution gives it power to legislate, including those portions of it remaining under territorial government, as well as that covered by states. It is a total absence of power every where within the dominion of the United States, and places the citizens of a territory, so far as these rights are concerned, on the same footing with citizens of the states, and guards them as firmly and plainly against any inroads which the general government might attempt, under the plea of implied or incidental powers. And if Congress itself cannot do this—if it is beyond the powers conferred on the federal government—it will be admitted, we presume, that it could not authorize a territorial government to exercise them. It could confer no power on any local government, established by its authority, to violate the provisions of the constitution.

"It seems, however, to be supposed, that there is a difference between property in a slave and other property, and that different rules may be applied to it in expounding the constitution of the United States. And the laws and usages of nations, and the writings of eminent jurists upon the relation of master and slave, and their mutual rights and duties, and the powers which governments may exercise over it, have been dwelt upon in the argument.

"But in considering the question before us, it must be borne in mind that there is no law of nations standing between the people of the United States and their government, and interfering with their relation to each other. The powers of the government, and the rights of the citizen under it, are positive and practical regulations plainly written down. The people of the United States have delegated to it certain enumerated powers, and forbidden it to exercise others. It has no power over the person or property of a citizen but what the citizens of the United States have granted. And no laws or usages of other nations, or reasoning of statesmen or jurists upon the relations of master and slave, can enlarge the powers of the government, or take from the citizens the rights they have reserved. And if the constitution recognizes the right of property of the master in a slave, and makes no distinction between that description of property and other property owned by a citizen, no tribunal, acting under the authority of the United States, whether it be legislative, executive, or judicial, has a right to draw such a distinction, or deny to it the benefit of the provisions and guarantees which have been provided for the protection of private property against the encroachments of the government.

"Now, as we have already said in an earlier part of this opinion, upon a different point, the right of property in a slave is distinctly and expressly affirmed in the constitution. The right to traffic in it, like an ordinary article of merchandise and property, was guaranteed to the citizens of the United States, in every state that might desire it, for twenty years. And the government in express terms is pledged to protect it in all future time, if the slave escapes from his owner. This is done in plain words — too plain to be misunderstood. And no word can be found in the constitution which gives Congress a greater power over slave property, or which entitles property of that kind to less protection than property of any other description. The only power conferred is the power coupled with the duty of guarding and protecting the owner in his rights.

"Upon these considerations, it is the opinion of the court that the act of Congress which prohibited a citizen from holding and owning property of this kind in the territory of the United States north of the line therein mentioned, is not warranted by the constitution, and is therefore void; and that neither Dred Scott himself, nor any of his family, were made free by being carried into this territory; even if they had been carried there by the owner, with the intention of becoming a permanent resident. * * *

"Upon the whole, therefore, it is the judgment of this court, that it appears by the record before us that the plaintiff in error is not a citizen of Missouri, in the sense in which that word is used in the constitution; and that the Circuit Court of the United States, for that reason, had no jurisdiction in the case, and could give no judgment in it. Its judgment for the defendant must, consequently, be reversed, and a mandate issued, directing the suit to be dismissed for want of jurisdiction."

The dissenters from the opinion of the court were Associate Justices McLean of Ohio and Curtis of Massachusetts.

Mr. Justice Curtis said, —

"I dissent from the opinion pronounced by the chief justice, and from the judgment which the majority of the court think it proper to render in this case. The plaintiff alleged, in his declaration, that he was a citizen of the state of Missouri, and that the defendant was a citizen of the state of New York. It is not doubted that it was necessary to make each of these allegations, to sustain the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court. The defendant denied, by a plea to the jurisdiction, either sufficient or insufficient, that the plaintiff was a citizen of the state of Missouri. The plaintiff demurred to that plea. The Circuit Court adjudged the plea insufficient, and the first question for our consideration is, whether the sufficiency of that plea is before this court for judgment, upon this writ of error. The part of the judicial power of the United States, conferred by Congress on the Circuit Courts, being limited to certain described cases and controversies, the question whether a particular case is within the cognizance of a Circuit Court, may be raised by a plea to the jurisdiction of such court. When that question has been raised, the Circuit Court must, in the first instance, pass upon and determine it. Whether its determination be final, or subject to review by this appellate court, must depend upon the will of Congress; upon which body the constitution has conferred the power, with certain restrictions, to establish inferior courts, to determine their jurisdiction, and to regulate the appellate power of this court. The twenty-second section of the judiciary act of 1789, which allows a writ of error from final judgments of Circuit Courts, provides that there shall be no reversal in this court, on such writ of error, for error in ruling any plea in abatement, other than a plea to the jurisdiction of the court. Accordingly it has been held, from the origin of the court to the present day, that Circuit Courts have not been made by Congress the final judges of their own jurisdiction in civil cases; and that when a record comes here upon a writ of error or appeal, and, on its inspection, it appears to this court that the Circuit Court had not jurisdiction, its judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded, to be dismissed for want of jurisdiction.

"It is alleged by the defendant in error, in this case, that the plea to the jurisdiction was a sufficient plea; that it shows, on inspection of its allegations, confessed by the demurrer, that the plaintiff was not a citizen of the state of Missouri; that, upon this record, it must appear to this court that the case was not within the judicial power of the United States, as defined and granted by the constitution, because it was not a suit by a citizen of one state against a citizen of another state.

"To this it is answered, first, that the defendant, by pleading over, after the plea to the jurisdiction was adjudged insufficient, finally waived all benefit of that plea.

"When that plea was adjudged insufficient, the defendant was obliged to answer over. He held no alternative. He could not stop the further progress of the case in the Circuit Court by a writ of error, on which the sufficiency of his plea to the jurisdiction could be tried in this court, because the judgment on that plea was not final, and no writ of error would lie. He was forced to plead to the merits. It cannot be true, then, that he waived the benefit of his plea to the jurisdiction by answering over. Waiver includes consent. Here there was no consent. And if the benefit of the plea was finally lost, it must be, not by any waiver, but because the laws of the United States have not provided any mode of reviewing the decision of the Circuit Court on such a plea, when that decision is against the defendant. This is not the law. Whether the decision of the Circuit Court on a plea to the jurisdiction be against the plaintiff, or against the defendant, the losing party may have any alleged error in law, in ruling such a plea, examined in this court on a writ of error, when the matter in controversy exceeds the sum or value of two thousand dollars. If the decision be against the plaintiff, and his suit dismissed for want of jurisdiction, the judgment is technically final, and he may at once sue out his writ of error. (Mollan vs. Torrance, 9 Wheat. 537.) If the decision be against the defendant, though he must answer over, and wait for a final judgment in the cause, he may then have his writ of error, and upon it obtain the judgment of this court on any question of law apparent on the record, touching the jurisdiction. The fact that he pleaded over to the merits, under compulsion, can have no effect on his right to object to the jurisdiction. If this were not so, the condition of the two parties would be grossly unequal. For if a plea to the jurisdiction were ruled against the plaintiff, he could at once take his writ of error, and have the ruling reviewed here; while, if the same plea were ruled against the defendant, he must not only wait for a final judgment, but could in no event have the ruling of the Circuit Court upon the plea reviewed by this court. I know of no ground for saying that the laws of the United States have thus discriminated between the parties to a suit in its courts.

"It is further objected, that as the judgment of the Circuit Court was in favor of the defendant, and the writ of error in this cause was sued out by the plaintiff, the defendant is not in a condition to assign any error in the record, and therefore this court is precluded from considering the question whether the Circuit Court had jurisdiction.

"The practice of this court does not require a technical assignment of errors. (See the rule.) Upon a writ of error, the whole record is open for inspection; and if any error be found in it, the judgment is reversed. (Bank of United States vs. Smith, 11 Wheat. 171.)

"It is true, as a general rule, that the court will not allow a party to rely on any thing as cause for reversing a judgment, which was for his advantage. In this we follow an ancient rule of the common law. But so careful was that law of the preservation of the course of its courts, that it made an exception out of that general rule, and allowed a party to assign for error that which was for his advantage, if it were a departure by the court itself from its settled course of procedure. The cases on this subject are collected in Bac. Ab., Error H. 4. And this court followed this practice in Capron vs. Van Noorden (2 Cranch, 126,) where the plaintiff below procured the reversal of a judgment for the defendant, on the ground that the plaintiff's allegations of citizenship had not shown jurisdiction.

"But it is not necessary to determine whether the defendant can be allowed to assign want of jurisdiction as an error in a judgment in his own favor. The true question is, not what either of the parties may be allowed to do, but whether this court will affirm or reverse a judgment of the Circuit Court on the merits, when it appears on the record, by a plea to the jurisdiction, that it is a case to which the judicial power of the United States does not extend. The course of the court is, where no motion is made by either party, on its own motion to reverse such a judgment for want of jurisdiction, not only in cases where it is shown, negatively, by a plea to the jurisdiction, that jurisdiction does not exist, but even where it does not appear, affirmatively, that it does exist. (Pequignot vs. The Pennsylvania R. R.

Co., 16 How. 104.) It acts upon the principle that the judicial power of the United States must not be exerted in a case to which it does not extend, even if both parties desire to have it exerted. (Cutler vs. Rae, 7 How. 729.) I consider, therefore, that when there was a plea to the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court in a case brought here by a writ of error, the first duty of this court is, sua sponte, if not moved to it by either party, to examine the sufficiency of that plea; and thus to take care that neither the Circuit Court nor this court shall use the judicial power of the United States in a case to which the constitution and laws of the United States have not extended that power.

"I proceed, therefore, to examine the plea to the jurisdiction. * * *

"The plea was as follows: 'And the said John F. A. Sandford, in his own proper person, comes and says that this court ought not to have or take further cognizance of the action aforesaid, because he says that said cause of action, and each and every of them, (if any such have accrued to the said Dred Scott,) accrued to the said Dred Scott out of the jurisdiction of this court, and exclusively within the jurisdiction of the courts of the state of Missouri; for that, to wit, the said plaintiff, Dred Scott, is not a citizen of the state of Missouri, as alleged in his declaration, because he is a negro of African descent; his ancestors were of pure African blood, and were brought into this country and sold as negro slaves, and this the said Sandford is ready to verify. Wherefore he prays judgment whether this court can or will take further cognizance of the action aforesaid.'

"The plaintiff demurred, and the judgment of the Circuit Court was, that the plea was insufficient.

"I cannot treat this plea as a general traverse of the citizenship alleged by the plaintiff. Indeed, if it were so treated, the plea was clearly bad, for it concludes with a verification, and not to the country, as a general traverse should. And though this defect in a plea in bar must be pointed out by a special demurrer, it is never necessary to demur specially to a plea in abatement; all matters, though of form only, may be taken advantage of upon a general demurrer to such a plea. (Chitty on Pl. 465.)

"The truth is, that though not drawn with the utmost technical accuracy, it is a special traverse of the plaintiff's allegation of citizenship, and was a suitable and proper mode of traverse under the circumstances. By reference to Mr. Stephen's description of the uses of such a traverse, contained in his excellent analysis of pleadings, (Steph. on Pl. 176,) it will be seen how precisely this plea meets one of his descriptions. No doubt the defendant might have traversed, by a common or general traverse, the plaintiff's allegation that he was a citizen of the state of Missouri, concluding to the country. The issue thus presented being joined, would have involved matter of law, on which the jury must have passed, under the direction of the court. But by traversing the plaintiff's citizenship specially, — that is, averring those facts on which the defendant relied to show that in point of law the plaintiff was not a citizen, and basing the traverse on those facts as a deduction therefrom, — opportunity was given to do, what was done; that is, to present directly to the court, by a demurrer, the sufficiency of those facts to negative, in point of law, the plaintiff's allegation of citizenship. This, then, being a special, and not a general or common traverse, the rule is settled, that the facts thus set out in the plea, as the reason or ground of the traverse, must of themselves constitute, in point of law, a negative of the allegation thus traversed. (Stephen on Pl. 183; Ch. on Pl. 620.) And upon a demurrer to this plea, the question which arises is, whether the facts, that the plaintiff is a negro, of African descent, whose ancestors were of pure African blood, and were brought into this country and sold as negro slaves, may all be true, and yet the plaintiff be a citizen of the state of Missouri, within the meaning of the constitution and laws of the United States, which confer on citizens of one state the right to sue citizens of another state in the Circuit Courts. Undoubtedly, if these facts, taken together, amount to an allegation that, at the time of action brought, the plaintiff was himself a slave, the plea is sufficient. It has been suggested that the plea, in legal effect, does so aver, because, if his ancestors were sold as slaves, the presumption is, they continued slaves; and if so, the presumption is, the plaintiff was born a slave; and if so, the presumption is, he continued to be a slave to the time of action brought.

"I cannot think such presumptions can be resorted to, to help out defective averments in pleading; especially, in pleading in abatement, where the utmost certainty and precision are required. (Chitty on Pl. 457.) That the plaintiff himself was a slave at the time of action brought, is a substantive fact, having no necessary connection with the fact that his parents were sold as slaves. For they might have been sold after he was born; or the plaintiff himself, if once a slave, might have become a free man before action brought. To aver that his ancestors were sold as slaves, is not equivalent, in point of law, to an averment that he was a slave. If it were, he could not even confess and avoid the averment of the slavery of his ancestors, which would be monstrous; and if it be not equivalent in point of law, it cannot be treated as amounting thereto when demurred to; for a demurrer confesses only those substantive facts which are well pleaded, and not other distinct substantive facts which might be inferred therefrom by a jury. To treat an averment that the plaintiff's ancestors were Africans, brought to this country and sold as slaves, as amounting to an averment on the record that he was a slave, because it may lay some foundation for presuming so, is to hold that the facts actually alleged may be treated as intended as evidence of another distinct fact not alleged. But it is a cardinal rule of pleading, laid down in Dowman's case (9 Rep. 9 b,) and in even earlier authorities therein referred to, 'that evidence shall never be pleaded, for it only tends to prove matter of fact; and therefore the matter of fact shall be pleaded.' Or, as the rule is sometimes stated, pleadings must not be argumentative. (Stephen on Pleading, 384, and authorities cited by him.) In Com. Dig., Pleader E. 3, and Bac. Abridgment, Pleas I. 5, and Stephen on Pl., many decisions under this rule are collected. In trover, for an indenture whereby A granted a manor, it is no plea that A did not grant the manor, for it does not answer the declaration except by argument. (Yelv. 223.) * * *

"In Gassies vs. Ballou, (6 Pet. 761,) the defendant was described on the record as a naturalized citizen of the United States, residing in Louisiana. The court held this equivalent to an averment that the defendant was a citizen of Louisiana; because a citizen of the United States, residing in any state of the Union, is, for purposes of jurisdiction, a citizen of that state. Now, the plea to the jurisdiction in this case does not controvert the fact that the plaintiff resided in Missouri at the date of the writ. If he did then reside there, and was also a citizen of the United States, no provisions contained in the constitution or laws of Missouri can deprive the plaintiff of his right to sue citizens of states other than Missouri in the courts of the United States.

"So that, under the allegations contained in this plea, and admitted by the demurrer, the question is, whether any person of African descent, whose ancestors were sold as slaves in the United States, can be a citizen of the United States. If any such person can be a citizen, this plaintiff has the right to the judgment of the court that he is so; for no cause is shown by the plea why he is not so, except his descent and the slavery of his ancestors.

"The first section of the second article of the constitution uses the language, 'a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of the constitution.' One mode of approaching this question is, to inquire who were citizens of the United States at the time of the adoption of the constitution.

"Citizens of the United States at the time of the adoption of the constitution can have been no other than citizens of the United States under the confederation. By the Articles of Confederation, a government was organized, the style whereof was, 'The United States of America.' This government was in existence when the constitution was framed and proposed for adoption, and was to be superseded by the new government of the United States of America, organized under the constitution. When, therefore, the constitution speaks of citizenship of the United States, existing at the time of the adoption of the constitution, it must necessarily refer to citizenship under the government which existed prior to and at the time of such adoption.

"Without going into any question concerning the powers of the confederation to govern the territory of the United States out of the limits of the states, and consequently to sustain the relation of government and citizen in respect to the inhabitants of such territory, it may safely be said that the citizens of the several states were citizens of the United States under the confederation.

"That government was simply a confederacy of the several states, possessing a few defined powers over subjects of general concern, each state retaining every power, jurisdiction, and right, not expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled. And no power was thus delegated to the government of the confederation to act on any question of citizenship, or to make any rules in respect thereto. The whole matter was left to stand upon the action of the several states, and to the natural consequence of such action, that the citizens of each state should be citizens of that confederacy into which that state had entered, the style whereof was, 'The United States of America.'

"To determine whether any free persons, descended from Africans held in slavery, were citizens of the United States under the confederation, and consequently at the time of the adoption of the constitution of the United States, it is only necessary to know whether any such persons were citizens of either of the states under the confederation, at the time of the adoption of the constitution.

"Of this there can be no doubt. At the time of the ratification of the Articles of Confederation, all free native-born inhabitants of the states of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, and North Carolina, though descended from African slaves, were not only citizens of those states, but such of them as had the other necessary qualifications possessed the franchise of electors, on equal terms with other citizens.

"The Supreme Court of North Carolina, in the case of The State vs. Manuel, (4 Dev. and Bat. 20,) has declared the law of that state on this subject, in terms which I believe to be as sound law in the other states I have enumerated, as it was in North Carolina.

"According to the laws of this state,' says Judge Gaston in delivering the opinion of the court, 'all human beings within it, who are not slaves, fall within one of two classes. Whatever distinctions may have existed in the Roman laws between citizens and free inhabitants, they are unknown to our institutions. Before our revolution, all free persons born within the dominions of the King of Great Britain, whatever their color or complexion, were native-born British subjects—those born out of his allegiance were aliens. Slavery did not exist in England, but it did in the British colonies. Slaves were not in legal parlance persons, but property. The moment the incapacity, the disqualification of slavery, was removed, they became persons, and were then either British subjects, or not British subjects, according as they were or were not born within the allegiance of the British king. Upon the revolution, no other change took place in the laws of North Carolina, than was consequent on the transition from a colony dependent on a European king to a free and sovereign state. Slaves remained slaves. British subjects in North Carolina became North Carolina freemen. Foreigners, until made members of the state, remained aliens. Slaves, manumitted here, became freemen, and therefore, if born within North Carolina, are citizens of North Carolina, and all free persons born within the state are born citizens of the state. The constitution extended the elective franchise to every free-man who had arrived at the age of twenty-one, and paid a public tax; and it is a matter of universal notoriety, that, under it, free persons, without regard to color, claimed and exercised the franchise, until it was taken from free men of color a few years since by our amended constitution.'

"In The State vs. Newcomb, (5 Iredell's R. 253,) decided in 1844, the same court referred to this case of The State vs. Manuel, and said, 'That case underwent a very laborious investigation, both by the bar and the bench. The case was brought here by appeal, and was felt to be one of great importance in principle. It was considered with an anxiety and care worthy of the principle involved, and which gave it a controlling influence and authority on all questions of a similar character.'

"An argument from speculative premises, however well chosen, that the then state of opinion in the commonwealth of Massachusetts was not consistent with the natural rights of people of color who were born on that soil, and that they were not, by the constitution of 1780 of that state, admitted to the condition of citizens, would be received with surprise by the people of that state, who know their own political history. It is true, beyond all controversy, that persons of color, descended from African slaves, were by that constitution made citizens of the state; and such of them as have had the necessary qualifications, have held and exercised the elective franchise, as citizens, from that time to the present. (See Com. vs. Aves, 18 Pick. R. 210.)

"The constitution of New Hampshire conferred the elective franchise upon 'every inhabitant of the state having the necessary qualifications,' of which color or descent was not one.

"The constitution of New York gave the right to vote to 'every male inhabitant who shall have resided,' &c.; making no discrimination between free colored persons and others. (See Con. of N. Y., Art. 2, Rev. Stats. of N. Y., vol. i. p. 126.)

"That of New Jersey, to 'all inhabitants of this colony, of full age, who are worth £50 proclamation money, clear estate.'

"New York, by its constitution of 1820, required colored persons to have some qualifications, as prerequisites for voting, which white persons need not possess. And New Jersey, by its present constitution, restricts the right to vote to white male citizens. But these changes can have no other effect upon the present inquiry, except to show, that before they were made, no such restrictions existed; and colored, in common with white persons, were not only citizens of those states, but entitled to the elective franchise on the same qualifications as white persons, as they now are in New Hampshire and Massachusetts. I shall not enter into an examination of the existing opinions of that period respecting the African race, nor into any discussion concerning the meaning of those who asserted, in the Declaration of Independence, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. My own opinion is, that a calm comparison of these assertions of universal abstract truths, and of their own individual opinions and acts, would not leave these men under any reproach of inconsistency; that the great truths they asserted on that solemn occasion they were ready and anxious to make effectual, wherever a necessary regard to circumstances, which no statesman can disregard without producing more evil than good, would allow; and that it would not be just to them, nor true in itself, to allege that they intended to say that the Creator of all men had endowed the white race, exclusively, with the great natural rights which the Declaration of Independence asserts. But this is not the place to vindicate their memory. As I conceive, we should deal here, not with such disputes, if there can be a dispute concerning this subject, but with those substantial facts evinced by the written constitutions of states, and by the notorious practice under them. And they show, in a manner which no argument can obscure, that in some of the original thirteen states, free colored persons, before and at the time of the formation of the constitution, were citizens of those states.

"The fourth of the fundamental Articles of the Confederation was as follows: 'The free inhabitants of each of these states, paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several states.'

"The fact that free persons of color were citizens of some of the several states, and the consequence, that this fourth Article of the Confederation would have the effect to confer on such persons the privileges and immunities of general citizenship, were not only known to those who framed and adopted those Articles, but the evidence is decisive, that the fourth article was intended to have that effect, and that more restricted language, which would have excluded such persons, was deliberately and purposely rejected.

"On the 25th of June, 1778, the Articles of Confederation being under consideration by the Congress, the delegates from South Carolina moved to amend this fourth article, by inserting after the word 'free,' and before the word 'inhabitants,' the word 'white,' so that the privileges and immunities of general citizenship would be secured only to white persons. Two states voted for the amendment, eight states against it, and the vote of one state was divided. The language of the article stood unchanged, and both by its terms of inclusion, 'free inhabitants,' and the strong implication from its terms of exclusion, 'paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice,' who alone were excepted, it is clear, that under the confederation, and at the time of the adoption of the constitution, free colored persons of African descent might be, and, by reason of their citizenship in certain states, were, entitled to the privileges and immunities of general citizenship of the United States.

"Did the constitution of the United States deprive them or their descendants of citizenship?

"That constitution was ordained and established by the people of the United States, through the action, in each state, of those persons who were qualified by its laws to act thereon, in behalf of themselves and all other citizens of that state. In some of the states, as we have seen, colored persons were among those qualified by law to act on this subject. These colored persons were not only included in the body of 'the people of the United States,' by whom the constitution was ordained and established, but in at least five of the states they had the power to act, and doubtless did act, by their suffrages, upon the question of its adoption. It would be strange if we were to find in that instrument any thing which deprived of their citizenship any part of the people of the United States who were among those by whom it was established.

"I can find nothing in the constitution which, proprio vigore, deprives of their citizenship any class of persons who were citizens of the United States at the time of its adoption, or who should be native-born citizens of any state after its adoption; nor any power enabling Congress to disfranchise persons born on the soil of any state, and entitled to citizenship of such state by its constitution and laws. And my opinion is, that, under the constitution of the United States, every free person born on the soil of a state, who is a citizen of that state by force of its constitution or laws, is also a citizen of the United States.

"I will proceed to state the grounds of that opinion.

"The first section of the second article of the constitution uses the language, 'a natural-born citizen.' It thus assumes that citizenship may be acquired by birth. Undoubtedly, this language of the constitution was used in reference to that principle of public law, well understood in this country at the time of the adoption of the constitution, which referred citizenship to the place of birth. At the declaration of independence, and ever since, the received general doctrine has been, in conformity with the common law, that free persons born within either of the colonies were subjects of the king; that by the declaration of independence, and the consequent acquisition of sovereignty by the several states, all such persons ceased to be subjects, and became citizens of the several states, except so far as some of them were disfranchised by the legislative power of the states, or availed themselves, seasonably, of the right to adhere to the British crown in the civil contest, and thus to continue British subjects. (McIlvain vs. Coxe's Lessee, 4 Cranch, 209; Inglis vs. Sailors' Snug Harbor, 3 Peters, 99; Shanks vs. Dupont, Ibid. 242.)

"The constitution having recognized the rule that persons born within the several states are citizens of the United States, one of four things must be true:—

"First. That the constitution itself has described what native-born persons shall or shall not be citizens of the United States; or,

"Second. That it has empowered Congress to do so; or,

"Third. That all free persons, born within the several states, are citizens of the United States; or,

"Fourth. That it is left to each state to determine what free persons, born within its limits, shall be citizens of such state, and thereby be citizens of the United States.

"If there be such a thing as citizenship of the United States acquired by birth within the states, which the constitution expressly recognizes, and no one denies, then these four alternatives embrace the entire subject, and it only remains to select that one which is true.

"That the constitution itself has defined citizenship of the United States by declaring what persons, born within the several states, shall or shall not be citizens of the United States, will not be pretended. It contains no such declaration. We may dismiss the first alternative, as without doubt unfounded.

"Has it empowered Congress to enact what free persons, born within the several states, shall or shall not be citizens of the United States?

"Before examining the various provisions of the constitution which may relate to this question, it is important to consider for a moment the substantial nature of this inquiry. It is, in effect, whether the constitution has empowered Congress to create privileged classes within the states, who alone can be entitled to the franchises and powers of citizenship of the United States. If it be admitted that the constitution has enabled Congress to declare what free persons, born within the several states, shall be citizens of the United States, it must at the same time be admitted that it is an unlimited power. If this subject is within the control of Congress, it must depend wholly on its discretion. For, certainly, no limits of that discretion can be found in the constitution, which is wholly silent concerning it; and the necessary consequence is, that the federal government may select classes of persons within the several states who alone can be entitled to the political privileges of citizenship of the United States. If this power exists, what persons born within the states may be president or vice-president of the United States, or members of either House of Congress, or hold any office or enjoy any privilege whereof citizenship of the United States is a necessary qualification, must depend solely on the will of Congress. By virtue of it, though Congress can grant no title of nobility, they may create an oligarchy, in whose hands would be concentrated the entire power of the federal government.

"It is a substantive power, distinct in its nature from all others; capable of affecting not only the relations of the states to the general government, but of controlling the political condition of the people of the United States. Certainly we ought to find this power granted by the constitution, at least by some necessary inference, before we can say it does not remain to the states or the people. I proceed, therefore, to examine all the provisions of the constitution which may have some bearing on this subject.

"Among the powers expressly granted to Congress is 'the power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization.' It is not doubted that this is a power to prescribe a rule for the removal of the disabilities consequent on foreign birth. To hold that it extends farther than this, would do violence to the meaning of the term 'naturalization,' fixed in the common law,

(Co. Lit. 8 a, 129 a; 2 Ves. Sen. 286; 2 Bl. Com. 293,) and in the minds of those who concurred in framing and adopting the constitution. It was in this sense of conferring on an alien and his issue the rights and powers of a native-born citizen, that it was employed in the Declaration of Independence. It was in this sense it was expounded in the Federalist, (No. 42,) has been understood by Congress, by the judiciary, (2 Wheat. 259, 269; 3 Wash. R. 313, 322; 12 Wheat. 277,) and by commentators on the constitution. (3 Story's Com. on Con. 1-3; 1 Rawle on Con. 84-88; 1 Tucker's Bl. Com. App. 255-259.)

"It appears, then, that the only power expressly granted to Congress to legislate concerning citizenship, is confined to the removal of the disabilities of foreign birth.

"Whether there be any thing in the constitution from which a broader power may be implied, will best be seen when we come to examine the two other alternatives, which are, whether all free persons, born on the soil of the several states, or only such of them as may be citizens of each state, respectively, are thereby citizens of the United States. The last of these alternatives, in my judgment, contains the truth. * * *

"The first-named power, that of establishing a uniform rule of naturalization, was granted; and here the grant, according to its terms, stopped. Construing a constitution containing only limited and defined powers of government, the argument derived from this definite and restricted power to establish a rule of naturalization, must be admitted to be exceedingly strong. I do not say it is necessarily decisive. It might be controlled by other parts of the constitution. But when this particular subject of citizenship was under consideration, and, in the clause specially intended to define the extent of power concerning it, we find a particular part of this entire power separated from the residue, and conferred on the general government, there arises a strong presumption that this is all which is granted, and that the residue is left to the states and to the people. And this presumption is, in my opinion, converted into a certainty, by an examination of all such other clauses of the constitution as touch this subject.

"I will examine each which can have any possible bearing on this question.

"The first clause of the second section of the third article of the constitution is, 'The judicial power shall extend to controversies between a state and citizens of another state; between citizens of different states; between citizens of the same state claiming lands under grants of different states; and between states, or the citizens thereof, and foreign states, citizens, or subjects.' I do not think this clause has any considerable bearing upon the particular inquiry now under consideration. Its purpose was, to extend the judicial power to those controversies into which local feelings or interests might so enter as to disturb the course of justice, or give rise to suspicions that they had done so, and thus possibly give occasion to jealousy or ill will between different states, or a particular state and a foreign nation. At the same time, I would remark, in passing, that it has never been held—I do not know that it has ever been supposed—that any citizen of a state could bring himself under this clause and the eleventh and twelfth sections of the judiciary act of 1789, passed in pursuance of it, who was not a citizen of the United States. But I have referred to the clause only because it is one of the places where citizenship is mentioned by the constitution. Whether it is entitled to any weight in this inquiry or not, it refers only to citizenship of the several states; it recognizes that; but it does not recognize citizenship of the United States as something distinct therefrom.

"As has been said, the purpose of this clause did not necessarily connect it with citizenship of the United States, even if that were something distinct from citizenship of the several states, in the contemplation of the constitution. This cannot be said of other clauses of the constitution, which I now proceed to refer to.

“‘The citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several states.’ Nowhere else in the constitution is there any thing concerning a general citizenship; but here, privileges and immunities to be enjoyed throughout the United States, under and by force of the national compact, are granted and secured. In selecting those who are to enjoy these national rights of citizenship, how are they described? As citizens of each state. It is to them these national rights are secured. The qualification for them is not to be looked for in any provision of the constitution or laws of the United States. They are to be citizens of the several states, and, as such, the privileges and immunities of general citizenship, derived from and guaranteed by the constitution, are to be enjoyed by them. It would seem that if it had been intended to constitute a class of native-born persons within the states, who should derive their citizenship of the United States from the action of the federal government, this was an occasion for referring to them. It cannot be supposed that it was the purpose of this article to confer the privileges and immunities of citizens in all the states upon persons not citizens of the United States.

“And if it was intended to secure these rights only to citizens of the United States, how has the constitution here described such persons? Simply as citizens of each state.

“But, further: though, as I shall presently more fully state, I do not think the enjoyment of the elective franchise essential to citizenship, there can be no doubt it is one of the chiefest attributes of citizenship under the American constitutions; and the just and constitutional possession of this right is decisive evidence of citizenship. The provisions made by a constitution on this subject must therefore be looked to as bearing directly on the question what persons are citizens under that constitution; and as being decisive, to this extent, that all such persons as are allowed by the constitution to exercise the elective franchise, and thus to participate in the government of the United States, must be deemed citizens of the United States.

“Here, again, the consideration presses itself upon us, that if there was designed to be a particular class of native-born persons within the states, deriving their citizenship from the constitution and laws of the United States, they should at least have been referred to as those by whom the president and house of representatives were to be elected, and to whom they should be responsible.

“Instead of that, we again find this subject referred to the laws of the several states. The electors of president are to be appointed in such manner as the legislature of each state may direct, and the qualifications of electors of members of the house of representatives shall be the same as for electors of the most numerous branch of the state legislature.

“Laying aside, then, the case of aliens, concerning which the constitution of the United States has provided, and confining our view to free persons born within the several states, we find that the constitution has recognized the general principle of public law, that allegiance and citizenship depend on the place of birth; that it has not attempted practically to apply this principle by designating the particular classes of persons who should or should not come under it; that when we turn to the constitution for an answer to the question, what free persons, born within the several states, are citizens of the United States, the only answer we can receive from any of its express provisions is, the citizens of the several states are to enjoy the privileges and immunities of citizens in every state, and their franchise as electors under the constitution depends on their citizenship in the several states. Add to this, that the constitution was ordained by the citizens of the several states; that they were 'the people of the United States,' for whom and whose posterity the government was declared in the preamble of the constitution to be made; that each of them was 'a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of the constitution,' within the meaning of those words in that instrument; that by them the government was to be and was in fact organized; and that no power is conferred on the government of the Union to discriminate between them, or to disfranchise any of them — the necessary conclusion is, that those persons born within the several states, who, by force of their respective constitutions and laws, are citizens of the state, are thereby citizens of the United States.

"It may be proper here to notice some supposed objections to this view of the subject.

"It has been often asserted that the constitution was made exclusively by and for the white race. It has already been shown that in five of the thirteen original states, colored persons then possessed the elective franchise, and were among those by whom the constitution was ordained and established. If so, it is not true, in point of fact, that the constitution was made exclusively by the white race. And that it was made exclusively for the white race is, in my opinion, not only an assumption not warranted by any thing in the constitution, but contradicted by its opening declaration, that it was ordained and established by the people of the United States, for themselves and their posterity. And as free colored persons were then citizens of at least five states, and so in every sense part of the people of the United States, they were among those for whom and whose posterity the constitution was ordained and established.

"Again, it has been objected that if the constitution has left to the several states the rightful power to determine who of their inhabitants shall be citizens of the United States, the states may make aliens citizens.

"The answer is obvious. The constitution has left to the states the determination what persons, born within their respective limits, shall acquire by birth citizenship of the United States; it has not left to them any power to prescribe any rule for the removal of the disabilities of alienage. This power is exclusively in Congress.

"It has been further objected, that if free colored persons, born within a particular state, and made citizens of that state by its constitution and laws, are thereby made citizens of the United States, then, under the second section of the fourth article of the constitution, such persons would be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states; and if so, then colored persons could vote, and be eligible to not only federal offices, but offices even in those states whose constitutions and laws disqualify colored persons from voting or being elected to office.

"But this position rests upon an assumption which I deem untenable. Its basis is, that no one can be deemed a citizen of the United States who is not entitled to enjoy all the privileges and franchises which are conferred on any citizen. (See 1 Lit. Kentucky R. 326.) That this is not true, under the constitution of the United States, seems to me clear.

"A naturalized citizen cannot be president of the United States, nor a senator till after the lapse of nine years, nor a representative till after the lapse of seven years, from his naturalization. Yet, as soon as naturalized, he is certainly a citizen of the United States. Nor is any inhabitant of the District of Columbia, or of either of the territories, eligible to the office of senator or representative in Congress, though they may be citizens of the United States. So, in all the states, numerous persons, though citizens, cannot vote, or cannot hold office, either on account of their age, or sex, or the want of the necessary legal qualifications. The truth is, that citizenship, under the constitution of the United States, is not dependent on the possession of any particular political or even of all civil rights; and any attempt so to define it must lead to error. To what citizens the elective franchise shall be confided, is a question to be determined by each state, in accordance with its own views of the necessities or expedencies of its condition. What civil rights shall be enjoyed by its citizens, and whether all shall enjoy the same, or how they may be gained or lost, are to be determined in the same way. * * *

“There is one view of this article entitled to consideration in this connection. It is manifestly copied from the fourth of the Articles of Confederation, with only slight changes of phraseology, which render its meaning more precise, and dropping the clause which excluded paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice, probably because these cases could be dealt with under the police powers of the states, and a special provision therefore was not necessary. It has been suggested, that in adopting it into the constitution, the words ‘free inhabitants’ were changed for the word ‘citizens.’ An examination of the forms of expression commonly used in the state papers of that day, and an attention to the substance of this article of the confederation, will show that the words ‘free inhabitants,’ as then used, were synonymous with citizens. When the Articles of Confederation were adopted, we were in the midst of the war of the revolution, and there were very few persons then embraced in the words ‘free inhabitants’ who were not born on our soil. It was not a time when many, save the children of the soil, were willing to embark their fortunes in our cause; and though there might be an inaccuracy in the uses of words to call free inhabitants citizens, it was then a technical rather than a substantial difference. If we look into the constitutions and state papers of that period, we find the inhabitants or people of these colonies, or the inhabitants of this state, or commonwealth, employed to designate those whom we should now denominate citizens. The substance and purpose of the article prove it was in this sense it used these words: it secures to the free inhabitants of each state the privileges and immunities of free citizens in every state. It is not conceivable that the states should have agreed to extend the privileges of citizenship to persons not entitled to enjoy the privileges of citizens in the states where they dwelt; that under this article there was a class of persons in some of the states, not citizens, to whom were secured all the privileges and immunities of citizens when they went into other states; and the just conclusion is, that though the constitution cured an inaccuracy of language, it left the substance of this article in the national constitution the same as it was in the Articles of Confederation.

“The history of this fourth article, respecting the attempt to exclude free persons of color from its operation, has been already stated. It is reasonable to conclude that this history was known to those who framed and adopted the constitution. That under this fourth article of the confederation, free persons of color might be entitled to the privileges of general citizenship, if otherwise entitled thereto, is clear. When this article was, in substance, placed in and made part of the constitution of the United States, with no change in its language calculated to exclude free colored persons from the benefit of its provisions, the presumption is, to say the least, strong, that the practical effect which it was designed to have, and did have, under the former government, it was designed to have, and should have, under the new government. * * *

"It has sometimes been urged that colored persons are shown not to be citizens of the United States by the fact that the naturalization laws apply only to white persons. But whether a person born in the United States be or be not a citizen, cannot depend on laws which refer only to aliens, and do not affect the status of persons born in the United States. The utmost effect which can be attributed to them is, to show that Congress has not deemed it expedient generally to apply the rule to colored aliens. That they might do so, if thought fit, is clear. The constitution has not excluded them. And since that has conferred the power on Congress to naturalize colored aliens, it certainly shows color is not a necessary qualification for citizenship under the constitution of the United States. It may be added, that the power to make colored persons citizens of the United States, under the constitution, has been actually exercised in repeated and important instances. (See the Treaties with the Choctaws, of September 27, 1830, art. 14; with the Cherokees, of May 23, 1836, art. 12; Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, February 2, 1848, art. 8.)

"I do not deem it necessary to review at length the legislation of Congress having more or less bearing on the citizenship of colored persons. It does not seem to me to have any considerable tendency to prove that it has been considered by the legislative department of the government, that no such persons are citizens of the United States. Undoubtedly they have been debarred from the exercise of particular rights or privileges extended to white persons, but, I believe, always in terms which, by implication, admit they may be citizens. Thus the act of May 17, 1792, for the organization of the militia, directs the enrolment of 'every free, able-bodied, white male citizen.' An assumption that none but white persons are citizens, would be as inconsistent with the just import of this language, as that all citizens are able-bodied, or males.

"So the act of February 28, 1803, (2 Stat. at Large, 205,) to prevent the importation of certain persons into states, when by the laws thereof their admission is prohibited, in its first section forbids all masters of vessels to import or bring 'any negro, mulatto, or other person of color, not being a native, a citizen, or registered seaman of the United States,' &c.

"The acts of March 3, 1813, section 1, (2 Stat. at Large, 809,) and March 1, 1817, section 3, (3 Stat. at Large, 351,) concerning seamen, certainly imply there may be persons of color, natives of the United States, who are not citizens of the United States. This implication is undoubtedly in accordance with the fact. For not only slaves, but free persons of color, born in some of the states, are not citizens. But there is nothing in these laws inconsistent with the citizenship of persons of color in others of the states, nor with their being citizens of the United States.

"Whether much or little weight should be attached to the particular phraseology of these and other laws, which were not passed with any direct reference to this subject, I consider their tendency to be, as already indicated, to show that, in the apprehension of their framers, color was not a necessary qualification of citizenship. It would be strange if laws were found on our statute book to that effect, when, by solemn treaties, large bodies of Mexican and North American Indians, as well as free colored inhabitants of Louisiana, have been admitted to citizenship of the United States.

"In the legislative debates which preceded the admission of the state of Missouri into the Union, this question was agitated. Its result is found in the resolution of Congress of March 5, 1821, for the admission of that state into the Union. The constitution of Missouri, under which that state applied for admission into the Union, provided, that it should be the duty of the legislature 'to pass laws to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to and settling in the state, under any pretext whatever.' One ground of objection to the admission of the state under this constitution was, that it would require the legislature to exclude free persons of color, who would be entitled, under the second section of the fourth article of the constitution, not only to come within the state, but to enjoy there the privileges and immunities of citizens. The resolution of Congress admitting the state was upon the fundamental condition, 'that the constitution of Missouri shall never be construed to authorize the passage of any law, and that no law shall be passed in conformity thereto, by which any citizen of either of the states of this Union shall be excluded from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the constitution of the United States.' It is true that neither this legislative declaration, nor any thing in the constitution or laws of Missouri, could confer or take away any privilege or immunity granted by the constitution. But it is also true that it expresses the then conviction of the legislative power of the United States, that free negroes, as citizens of some of the states, might be entitled to the privileges and immunities of citizens in all the states.

"The conclusions at which I have arrived on this part of the case are, —

"First. That the free native-born citizens of each state are citizens of the United States.

"Second. That as free colored persons born within some of the states are citizens of those states, such persons are also citizens of the United States.

"Third. That every such citizen, residing in any state, has the right to sue and is liable to be sued in the federal courts, as a citizen of that state in which he resides.

"Fourth. That as the plea to the jurisdiction in this case shows no facts, except that the plaintiff was of African descent, and his ancestors were sold as slaves, and as these facts are not inconsistent with his citizenship of the United States, and his residence in the state of Missouri, the plea to the jurisdiction was bad, and the judgment of the Circuit Court overruling it was correct.

"I dissent, therefore, from that part of the opinion of the majority of the court, in which it is held that a person of African descent cannot be a citizen of the United States; and I regret I must go farther, and dissent both from what I deem their assumption of authority to examine the constitutionality of the act of Congress commonly called the Missouri compromise act, and the grounds and conclusions announced in their opinion.

"Having first decided that they were bound to consider the sufficiency of the plea to the jurisdiction of the Circuit Court, and having decided that this plea showed that the Circuit Court had not jurisdiction, and consequently that this is a case to which the judicial power of the United States does not extend, they have gone on to examine the merits of the case as they appeared on the trial before the court and jury, on the issues joined on the pleas in bar, and so have reached the question of the power of Congress to pass the act of 1820. On so grave a subject as this, I feel obliged to say that, in my opinion, such an exertion of judicial power transcends the limits of the authority of the court, as described by its repeated decisions, and, as I understand, acknowledged in this opinion of the majority of the court. * * *

"But as, in my opinion, the Circuit Court had jurisdiction, I am obliged to consider the question whether its judgment on the merits of the case should stand or be reversed.

"The residence of the plaintiff in the state of Illinois, and the residence of himself and his wife in the territory acquired from France lying north of latitude thirty-six degrees thirty minutes, and north of the state of Missouri, are each relied on by the plaintiff in error.

As the residence in the territory affects the plaintiff's wife and children as well as himself, I must inquire what was its effect.

"The general question may be stated to be, whether the plaintiff's status, as a slave, was so changed by his residence within that territory, that he was not a slave in the state of Missouri at the time this action was brought.

"In such cases, two inquiries arise, which may be confounded, but should be kept distinct.

"The first is, what was the law of the territory, into which the master and slave went, respecting the relation between them?

"The second is, whether the state of Missouri recognizes and allows the effect of that law of the territory on the status of the slave, on his return within its jurisdiction.

"As to the first of these questions, the will of states and nations, by whose municipal law slavery is not recognized, has been manifested in three different ways.

"One is, absolutely to dissolve the relation, and terminate the rights of the master existing under the law of the country whence the parties came. This is said by Lord Stowell, in the case of the slave Grace, (2 Hag. Ad. R. 94,) and by the Supreme Court of Louisiana in the case of Maria Louise vs. Marot, (9 Louis. R. 473,) to be the law of France; and it has been the law of several states of this Union, in respect to slaves introduced under certain conditions. (Wilson vs. Isabel, 5 Call's R. 430; Hunter vs. Hulcher, 1 Leigh, 172; Stewart vs. Oaks, 5 Har. and John. 107.)

"The second is, where, the municipal law of a country not recognizing slavery, it is the will of the state to refuse the master all aid to exercise any control over his slave; and if he attempt to do so, in a manner justifiable only by that relation, to prevent the exercise of that control. But no law exists designed to operate directly on the relation of master and slave, and put an end to that relation. This is said by Lord Stowell, in the case above mentioned, to be the law of England, and by Mr. Chief Justice Shaw, in the case of the Commonwealth vs. Aves, (18 Pick. 193,) to be the law of Massachusetts.

"The third is, to make a distinction between the case of a master and his slave only temporarily in the country, animo non manendi, and those who are there to reside for permanent or indefinite purposes. This is said by Mr. Wheaton to be the law of Prussia, and was formerly the statute law of several states of our Union. It is necessary in this case to keep in view this distinction between those countries whose laws are designed to act directly on the status of a slave, and make him a free man, and those where his master can obtain no aid from the laws to enforce his rights.

"It is to the last case only that the authorities, out of Missouri, relied on by defendant, apply, when the residence in the non-slaveholding territory was permanent. In the Commonwealth vs. Aves, (18 Pick. 218,) Mr. Chief Justice Shaw said, 'From the principle above stated, on which a slave brought here becomes free,—to wit, that he becomes entitled to the protection of our laws,—it would seem to follow, as a necessary conclusion, that if the slave waives the protection of those laws, and returns to the state where he is held as a slave, his condition is not changed.' It was upon this ground, as is apparent from his whole reasoning, that Sir William Scott rests his opinion in the case of the slave Grace. To use one of his expressions, the effect of the law of England was to put the liberty of the slave into a parenthesis. If there had been an act of Parliament declaring that a slave coming to England with his master should thereby be deemed no longer to be a slave, it is easy to see that the learned judge could not have arrived at the same conclusion. This distinction is very clearly stated and shown by President Tucker, in his opinion in the case of Betty vs. Horton,

(5 Leigh's Virginia R. 615.) (See also Hunter vs. Fletcher, 1 Leigh's Va. R. 172; Maria Louise vs. Marot, 9 Louisiana R.; Smith vs. Smith, 13 Ib. 441; Thomas vs. Genevieve, 16 Ib. 483; Rankin vs. Lydia, 2 A. K. Marshall, 467; Davies vs. Tingle, 8 B. Munroe, 539; Griffeth vs. Fanny, Gilm. V. R. 143; Lumford vs. Coquillon, 14 Martin's La. R. 405; Josephine vs. Poultney, 1 Louis. Ann. R. 329.)

"But if the acts of Congress on this subject are valid, the law of the territory of Wisconsin, within whose limits the residence of the plaintiff and his wife, and their marriage and the birth of one or both of their children, took place, falls under the first category, and is a law operating directly on the status of the slave. By the eighth section of the act of March 6, 1820, (3 Stat. at Large, 548,) it was enacted that, within this territory, 'slavery and involuntary servitude, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the parties shall have been duly convicted, shall be, and is hereby, forever prohibited: Provided, always, that any person escaping into the same, from whom labor or service is lawfully claimed in any state or territory in the United States, such fugitive may be lawfully reclaimed, and conveyed to the person claiming his or her labor or service, as aforesaid.'

"By the act of April 20, 1836, (4 Stat. at Large, 10,) passed in the same month and year of the removal of the plaintiff to Fort Snelling, this part of the territory ceded by France, where Fort Snelling is, together with so much of the territory of the United States east of the Mississippi as now constitutes the state of Wisconsin, was brought under a territorial government, under the name of the Territory of Wisconsin. By the eighteenth section of this act, it was enacted, 'That the inhabitants of this territory shall be entitled to and enjoy all and singular the rights, privileges, and advantages, granted and secured to the people of the territory of the United States north-west of the River Ohio, by the articles of compact contained in the ordinance for the government of said territory, passed on the 13th day of July, 1787; and shall be subject to all the restrictions and prohibitions in said articles of compact imposed upon the people of the said territory.' The sixth article of that compact is, 'There shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said territory, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted. Provided, always, that any person escaping into the same, from whom labor or service is lawfully claimed in any one of the original states, such fugitive may be lawfully reclaimed, and conveyed to the person claiming his or her labor or service, as aforesaid.' By other provisions of this act establishing the territory of Wisconsin, the laws of the United States, and the then existing laws of the state of Michigan, are extended over the territory; the latter being subject to alteration and repeal by the legislative power of the territory created by the act.

"Fort Snelling was within the territory of Wisconsin, and these laws were extended over it. The Indian title to that site for a military post had been acquired from the Sioux nation as early as September 23, 1805, (Am. State Papers, Indian Affairs, vol. i. p. 744,) and until the erection of the territorial government, the persons at that post were governed by the rules and articles of war, and such laws of the United States, including the eighth section of the act of March 6, 1820, prohibiting slavery, as were applicable to their condition; but after the erection of the territory, and the extension of the laws of the United States and the laws of Michigan over the whole of the territory, including this military post, the persons residing there were under the dominion of those laws in all particulars to which the rules and articles of war did not apply.

"It thus appears that, by these acts of Congress, not only was a general system of municipal law borrowed from the state of Michigan, which did not tolerate slavery, but it was positively enacted that slavery and involuntary servitude, with only one exception, specifically described, should not exist there. It is not simply that slavery is not recognized and cannot be aided by the municipal law. It is recognized for the purpose of being absolutely prohibited, and declared incapable of existing within the territory, save in the instance of a fugitive slave.

"It would not be easy for the legislature to employ more explicit language to signify its will that the status of slavery should not exist within the territory, than the words found in the act of 1820, and in the ordinance of 1787; and if any doubt could exist concerning their application to cases of masters coming into the territory with their slaves to reside, that doubt must yield to the inference required by the words of exception. That exception is, of cases of fugitive slaves. An exception from a prohibition marks the extent of the prohibition; for it would be absurd, as well as useless, to except from a prohibition a case not contained within it. (9 Wheat. 200.) I must conclude, therefore, that it was the will of Congress that the state of involuntary servitude of a slave, coming into the territory with his master, should cease to exist. The Supreme Court of Missouri so held in Rachel vs. Walker, (4 Misso. R. 350,) which was the case of a military officer going into the territory with two slaves.

"But it is a distinct question whether the law of Missouri recognized and allowed effect to the change wrought in the status of the plaintiff, by force of the laws of the territory of Wisconsin. * * *

"I have not heard it suggested that there was any statute of the state of Missouri bearing on this question. The customary law of Missouri is the common law, introduced by statute in 1816. (1 Ter. Laws, 436.) And the common law, as Blackstone says, (4 Com. 67,) adopts, in its full extent, the law of nations, and holds it to be a part of the law of the land. * *

"It appears that this case came on for trial before the Circuit Court and a jury, upon an issue, in substance, whether the plaintiff, together with his wife and children, were the slaves of the defendant.

"The court instructed the jury that, 'upon the facts in this case, the law is with the defendant.' This withdrew from the jury the consideration and decision of every matter of fact. The evidence in the case consisted of written admissions, signed by the counsel of the parties. If the case had been submitted to the judgment of the court, upon an agreed statement of facts, entered of record, in place of a special verdict, it would have been necessary for the court below, and for this court, to pronounce its judgment solely on those facts, thus agreed, without inferring any other facts therefrom. By the rules of the common law applicable to such a case, and by force of the seventh article of the amendments of the constitution, this court is precluded from finding any fact not agreed to by the parties on the record. No submission to the court on a statement of facts was made. It was a trial by jury, in which certain admissions, made by the parties, were the evidence. The jury were not only competent, but were bound to draw from that evidence every inference which, in their judgment, exercised according to the rules of law, it would warrant. The Circuit Court took from the jury the power to draw any inferences from the admissions made by the parties, and decided the case for the defendant. This course can be justified here, if at all, only by its appearing that upon the facts agreed, and all such inferences of fact favorable to the plaintiff's case as the jury might have been warranted in drawing from those admissions, the law was with the defendant. Otherwise, the plaintiff would be deprived of the benefit of his trial by jury, by whom, for aught we can know, those inferences favorable to his case would have been drawn.

"The material facts agreed, bearing on this part of the case, are, that Dr. Emerson, the plaintiff's master, resided about two years at the military post of Fort Snelling, being a surgeon in the army of the United States, his domicile of origin being unknown; and what, if any thing, he had done, to preserve or change his domicile prior to his residence at Rock Island, being also unknown.

"Now, it is true, that under some circumstances the residence of a military officer at a particular place in the discharge of his official duties, does not amount to the acquisition of a technical domicile. But it cannot be affirmed, with correctness, that it never does. There being actual residence, and this being presumptive evidence of domicile, all the circumstances of the case must be considered before a legal conclusion can be reached that his place of residence is not his domicile. If a military officer stationed at a particular post should entertain an expectation that his residence there would be indefinitely protracted, and in consequence should remove his family to the place where his duties were to be discharged, form a permanent domestic establishment there, exercise there the civil rights and discharge the civil duties of an inhabitant, while he did no act and manifested no intent to have a domicile elsewhere, I think no one would say that the mere fact that he was himself liable to be called away by the orders of the government would prevent his acquisition of a technical domicile at the place of the residence of himself and his family. In other words, I do not think a military officer incapable of acquiring a domicile. (Bruce vs. Bruce, 2 Bos. and Pul. 230; Munroe vs. Douglass, 5 Mad. Ch. R. 232.) This being so, this case stands thus: there was evidence before the jury that Emerson resided about two years at Fort Snelling, in the territory of Wisconsin. This may or may not have been with such intent as to make it his technical domicile. The presumption is, that it was. It is so laid down by this court, in Ennis vs. Smith, (14 How.,) and the authorities in support of the position are there referred to. His intent was a question of fact for the jury. (Fitchburg vs. Winchendon, 4 Cush. 190.)

"The case was taken from the jury. If they had power to find that the presumption of the necessary intent had not been rebutted, we cannot say, on this record, that Emerson had not his technical domicile at Fort Snelling. But, for reasons which I shall now proceed to give, I do not deem it necessary in this case to determine the question of the technical domicile of Dr. Emerson.

"It must be admitted that the inquiry, whether the law of a particular country has rightfully fixed the status of a person, so that, in accordance with the principles of international law, that status should be recognized in other jurisdictions, ordinarily depends on the question whether the person was domiciled in the country whose laws are asserted to have fixed his status. But, in the United States, questions of this kind may arise, where an attempt to decide solely with reference to technical domicile, tested by the rules which are applicable to changes of places of abode from one country to another, would not be consistent with sound principles. And, in my judgment, this is one of those cases.

"The residence of the plaintiff, who was taken by his master, Dr. Emerson, as a slave, from Missouri to the state of Illinois, and thence to the territory of Wisconsin, must be deemed to have been for the time being, and until he asserted his own separate intention, the same as the residence of his master; and the inquiry, whether the personal statutes of the territory were rightfully extended over the plaintiff, and ought, in accordance with the rules of international law, to be allowed to fix his status, must depend upon the circumstances under which Dr. Emerson went into that territory, and remained there; and upon the further question, whether any thing was there rightfully done by the plaintiff to cause those personal statutes to operate on him.

"Dr. Emerson was an officer in the army of the United States. He went into the territory to discharge his duty to the United States. The place was out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, and within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. It does not appear where the domicile of origin of Dr. Emerson was, nor whether or not he had lost it, and gained another domicile, nor of what particular state, if any, he was a citizen.

"On what ground can it be denied that all valid laws of the United States, constitutionally enacted by Congress for the government of the territory, rightfully extended over an officer of the United States and his servant who went into the territory to remain there for an indefinite length of time, to take part in its civil or military affairs? They were not foreigners, coming from abroad. Dr. Emerson was a citizen of the country which had exclusive jurisdiction over the territory; and not only a citizen, but he went there in a public capacity, in the service of the same sovereignty which made the laws. Whatever those laws might be, whether of the kind denominated personal statutes or not, so far as they were intended by the legislative will, constitutionally expressed, to operate on him and his servant, and on the relations between them, they had a rightful operation, and no other state or country can refuse to allow that those laws might rightfully operate on the plaintiff and his servant, because such a refusal would be a denial that the United States could, by laws constitutionally enacted, govern their own servants, residing on their own territory, over which the United States had the exclusive control, and in respect to which they are an independent sovereign power. Whether the laws now in question were constitutionally enacted, I repeat once more, is a separate question. But, assuming that they were, and that they operated directly on the status of the plaintiff, I consider that no other state or country could question the rightful power of the United States so to legislate, or, consistently with the settled rules of international law, could refuse to recognize the effects of such legislation upon the status of their officers and servants, as valid every where.

"This alone would, in my apprehension, be sufficient to decide this question.

"But there are other facts stated on the record which should not be passed over. It is agreed that, in the year 1836, the plaintiff, while residing in the territory, was married, with the consent of Dr. Emerson, to Harriet, named in the declaration as his wife, and that Eliza and Lizzie were the children of that marriage, the first named having been born on the Mississippi River, north of the line of Missouri, and the other having been born after their return to Missouri. And the inquiry is, whether, after the marriage of the plaintiff in the territory, with the consent of Dr. Emerson, any other state or country can, consistently with the settled rules of international law, refuse to recognize and treat him as a free man, when suing for the liberty of himself, his wife, and the children of that marriage. It is in reference to his status, as viewed in other states and countries, that the contract of marriage and the birth of children become strictly material. At the same time, it is proper to observe that the female to whom he was married having been taken to the same military post of Fort Snelling as a slave, and Dr. Emerson claiming also to be her master at the time of her marriage, her status, and that of the children of the marriage, are also affected by the same considerations.

"If the laws of Congress governing the territory of Wisconsin were constitutional and valid laws, there can be no doubt these parties were capable of contracting a lawful marriage, attended with all the usual civil rights and obligations of that condition. In that territory they were absolutely free persons, having full capacity to enter into the civil contract of marriage.

"It is a principle of international law, settled beyond controversy in England and America, that a marriage valid by the law of the place where it was contracted, and not in fraud of the law of any other place, is valid every where; and that no technical domicile at the place of the contract is necessary to make it so. (See Bishop on Mar. and Div. 125-129, where the cases are collected.)

"If, in Missouri, the plaintiff were held to be a slave, the validity and operation of his contract of marriage must be denied. He can have no legal rights; of course, not those of a husband and father. And the same is true of his wife and children. The denial of his rights is the denial of theirs. So that, though lawfully married in the territory, when they came out of it, into the state of Missouri, they were no longer husband and wife; and a child of that lawful marriage, though born under the same dominion where its parents contracted a lawful marriage, is not the fruit of that marriage, nor the child of its father, but subject to the maxim, Partus sequitur ventrem.

"It must be borne in mind that in this case there is no ground for the inquiry, whether it be the will of the state of Missouri not to recognize the validity of the marriage of a fugitive slave, who escapes into a state or country where slavery is not allowed, and there contracts a marriage; or the validity of such a marriage, where the master, being a citizen of the state of Missouri, voluntarily goes with his slave, in itinere, into a state or country which does not permit slavery to exist, and the slave there contracts marriage without the consent of his master; for in this case, it is agreed, Dr. Emerson did consent; and no further question can arise concerning his rights, so far as their assertion is inconsistent with the validity of the marriage. Nor do I know of any ground for the assertion that this marriage was in fraud of any law of Missouri. It has been held by this court, that a bequest of property by a master to his slave, by necessary implication entitles the slave to his freedom; because only as a free man could he take and hold the bequest. (Legrand vs. Darnall, 2 Pet. R. 664.) It has also been held, that when a master goes with his slave to reside for an indefinite period in a state where slavery is not tolerated, this operates as an act of manumission; because it is sufficiently expressive of the consent of the master that the slave should be free. (2 Marshall's Ken. R. 470; 14 Martin's Louis. R. 401.)

"What, then, shall we say of the consent of the master, that the slave may contract a lawful marriage, attended with all the civil rights and duties which belong to that relation; that he may enter into a relation which none but a free man can assume — a relation which involves not only the rights and duties of the slave, but those of the other party to the contract, and of their descendants to the remotest generation? In my judgment, there can be no more effectual abandonment of the legal rights of a master over his slave, than by the consent of the master that the slave should enter into a contract of marriage, in a free state, attended by all the civil rights and obligations which belong to that condition.

"And any claim by Dr. Emerson, or any one claiming under him, the effect of which is to deny the validity of this marriage, and the lawful paternity of the children born from it, wherever asserted, is, in my judgment, a claim inconsistent with good faith and sound reason, as well as with the rules of international law. And I go further: in my opinion, a law of the state of Missouri, which should thus annul a marriage lawfully contracted by these parties while resident in Wisconsin, not in fraud of any law of Missouri, or of any right of Dr. Emerson, who consented thereto, would be a law impairing the obligation of a contract, and within the prohibition of the constitution of the United States. (See 4 Wheat. 629, 695, 696.)

"To avoid misapprehension on this important and difficult subject, I will state, distinctly, the conclusions at which I have arrived. They are, —

"First. The rules of international law respecting the emancipation of slaves, by the rightful operation of the laws of another state or country upon the status of the slave, while resident in such foreign state or country, are part of the common law of Missouri, and have not been abrogated by any statute law of that state.

"Second. The laws of the United States, constitutionally enacted, which operated directly on and changed the status of a slave coming into the territory of Wisconsin with his master who went thither to reside for an indefinite length of time, in the performance of his duties as an officer of the United States, had a rightful operation on the status of the slave; and it is in conformity with the rules of international law that this change of status should be recognized every where.

"Third. The laws of the United States, in operation in the territory of Wisconsin at the time of the plaintiff's residence there, did act directly on the status of the plaintiff, and change his status to that of a free man.

"Fourth. The plaintiff and his wife were capable of contracting, and, with the consent of Dr. Emerson, did contract, a marriage in that territory, valid under its laws; and the validity of this marriage cannot be questioned in Missouri, save by showing that it was in fraud of the laws of that state, or of some right derived from them; which cannot be shown in this case, because the master consented to it.

"Fifth. That the consent of the master that his slave, residing in a country which does not tolerate slavery, may enter into a lawful contract of marriage, attended with the civil rights and duties which belong to that condition, is an effectual act of emancipation. And the law does not enable Dr. Emerson, or any one claiming under him, to assert a title to the married persons as slaves, and thus destroy the obligation of the contract of marriage, and bastardize their issue, and reduce them to slavery. * * *

"I have thus far assumed, merely for the purpose of the argument, that the laws of the United States, respecting slavery in this territory, were constitutionally enacted by Congress. It remains to inquire whether they are constitutional and binding laws.

"In the argument of this part of the case at bar, it was justly considered by all the counsel to be necessary to ascertain the source of the power of Congress over the territory belonging to the United States. Until this is ascertained, it is not possible to determine the extent of that power. On the one side it was maintained that the constitution contains no express grant of power to organize and govern what is now known to the laws of the United States as a territory; that whatever power of this kind exists, is derived by implication from the capacity of the United States to hold and acquire territory out of the limits of any state, and the necessity for its having some government.

"On the other side, it was insisted that the constitution has not failed to make an express provision for this end, and that it is found in the third section of the fourth article of the constitution.

"To determine which of these is the correct view, it is needful to advert to some facts respecting this subject, which existed when the constitution was framed and adopted. It will be found that these facts not only shed much light on the question, whether the framers of the constitution omitted to make a provision concerning the power of Congress to organize and govern territories, but they will also aid in the construction of any provision which may have been made respecting this subject.

"Under the confederation, the unsettled territory within the limits of the United States had been a subject of deep interest. Some of the states insisted that these lands were within their chartered boundaries, and that they had succeeded to the title of the crown to the soil. On the other hand, it was argued that the vacant lands had been acquired by the United States, by the war carried on by them under a common government and for the common interest.

"This dispute was further complicated by unsettled questions of boundary among several states. It not only delayed the accession of Maryland to the confederation, but at one time seriously threatened its existence. (5 Jour. of Cong. 208, 442.) Under the pressure of these circumstances, Congress earnestly recommended to the several states a cession of their claims and rights to the United States. (5 Jour. of Cong. 442.) And before the constitution was framed, it had been begun. That by New York had been made on the 1st day of March, 1781; that of Virginia on the 1st day of March, 1784; that of Massachusetts on the 19th day of April, 1785; that of Connecticut on the 14th day of September, 1786; that of South Carolina on the 8th day of August, 1787, while the convention for framing the constitution was in session.

"It is very material to observe, in this connection, that each of these acts cedes, in terms, to the United States, as well the jurisdiction as the soil.

"It is also equally important to note that, when the constitution was framed and adopted, this plan of vesting in the United States, for the common good, the great tracts of ungranted lands claimed by the several states, in which so deep an interest was felt, was yet incomplete. It remained for North Carolina and Georgia to cede their extensive and valuable claims. These were made, by North Carolina on the 25th day of February, 1790, and by Georgia on the 24th day of April, 1802. The terms of these last-mentioned cessions will hereafter be noticed in another connection; but I observe here that each of them distinctly shows, upon its face, that they were not only in execution of the general plan proposed by the Congress of the confederation, but of a formed purpose of each of these states, existing when the assent of their respective people was given to the constitution of the United States.

"It appears, then, that when the federal constitution was framed, and presented to the people of the several states for their consideration, the unsettled territory was viewed as justly applicable to the common benefit, so far as it then had or might attain thereafter a pecuniary value; and so far as it might become the seat of new states, to be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original states; and also that the relations of the United States to that unsettled territory were of different kinds. The titles of the states of New York, Virginia, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and South Carolina, as well of soil as of jurisdiction, had been transferred to the United States. North Carolina and Georgia had not actually made transfers, but a confident expectation, founded on their appreciation of the justice of the general claim, and fully justified by the results, was entertained, that these cessions would be made. The ordinance of 1787 had made provision for the temporary government of so much of the territory actually ceded as lay north-west of the River Ohio.

"But it must have been apparent, both to the framers of the constitution and the people of the several states who were to act upon it, that the government thus provided for could not continue, unless the constitution should confer on the United States the necessary powers to continue it. That temporary government, under the ordinance, was to consist of certain officers, to be appointed by and responsible to the Congress of the confederation; their powers had been conferred and defined by the ordinance. So far as it provided for the temporary government of the territory, it was an ordinary act of legislation, deriving its force from the legislative power of Congress, and depending for its vitality upon the continuance of that legislative power. But the officers to be appointed for the north-western territory, after the adoption of the constitution, must necessarily be officers of the United States, and not of the Congress of the confederation; appointed and commissioned by the president, and exercising powers derived from the United States under the constitution.

"Such was the relation between the United States and the north-western territory, which all reflecting men must have foreseen would exist, when the government created by the constitution should supersede that of the confederation; that if the new government should be without power to govern this territory, it could not appoint and commission officers, and send them into the territory, to exercise there legislative, judicial, and executive power; and that this territory, which was even then foreseen to be so important, both politically and financially, to all the existing states, must be left not only without the control of the general government, in respect to its future political relations to the rest of the states, but absolutely without any government, save what its inhabitants, acting in their primary capacity, might from time to time create for themselves.

"But this north-western territory was not the only territory, the soil and jurisdiction whereof were then understood to have been ceded to the United States. The cession by South Carolina, made in August, 1787, was of 'all the territory included within the River Mississippi, and a line beginning at that part of the said river which is intersected by the southern boundary of North Carolina, and continuing along the said boundary line until it intersects the ridge or chain of mountains which divides the eastern from the western waters; then to be continued along the top of said ridge of mountains, until it intersects a line to be drawn due west from the head of the southern branch of the Tugaloo River to the said mountains; and thence to run a due west course to the River Mississippi.' * * *

"There is another consideration applicable to this part of the subject, and entitled, in my judgment, to great weight.

"The Congress of the confederation had assumed the power not only to dispose of the lands ceded, but to institute governments and make laws for their inhabitants. In other words, they had proceeded to act under the cession, which, as we have seen, was as well of the jurisdiction as of the soil. This ordinance was passed on the 13th of July, 1787. The convention for framing the constitution was then in session at Philadelphia. The proof is direct and decisive, that it was known to the convention. It is equally clear that it was admitted and understood not to be within the legitimate powers of the confederation to pass this ordinance. (Jefferson's Works, vol. ix pp. 251, 276; Federalist, Nos. 38, 43.)

"The importance of conferring on the new government regular powers commensurate with the objects to be attained, and thus avoiding the alternative of a failure to execute the trust assumed by the acceptance of the cessions made and expected, or its execution by usurpation, could scarcely fail to be perceived. That it was in fact perceived, is clearly shown by the Federalist, (No. 38,) where this very argument is made use of in commendation of the constitution.

"Keeping these facts in view, it may confidently be asserted that there is very strong reason to believe, before we examine the constitution itself, that the necessity for a competent grant of power to hold, dispose of, and govern territory, ceded and expected to be ceded, could not have escaped the attention of those who framed or adopted the constitution; and that if it did not escape their attention, it could not fail to be adequately provided for.

"Any other conclusion would involve the assumption that a subject of the gravest national concern, respecting which the small states felt so much jealousy that it had been almost an insurmountable obstacle to the formation of the confederation, and as to which all the states had deep pecuniary and political interests, and which had been so recently and constantly agitated, was nevertheless overlooked; or that such a subject was not overlooked, but designedly left unprovided for, though it was manifestly a subject of common concern, which belonged to the care of the general government, and adequate provision for which could not fail to be deemed necessary and proper.

"The admission of new states, to be framed out of the ceded territory, early attracted the attention of the convention. Among the resolutions introduced by Mr. Randolph, on the 29th of May, was one on this subject, (Res. No. 10, 5 Elliot, 128,) which, having been affirmed in committee of the whole, on the 5th of June, (5 Elliot, 156,) and reported to the convention on the 13th of June, (5 Elliot, 190,) was referred to the committee of detail, to prepare the constitution, on the 26th of July, (5 Elliot, 376.) This committee reported an article for the admission of new states 'lawfully constituted or established.' Nothing was said concerning the power of Congress to prepare or form such states. This omission struck Mr. Madison, who, on the 18th of August, (5 Elliot, 439,) moved for the insertion of power to dispose of the unappropriated lands of the United States, and to institute temporary governments for new states arising therein.

"On the 29th of August, (5 Elliot, 492,) the report of the committee was taken up, and after debate, which exhibited great diversity of views concerning the proper mode of providing for the subject, arising out of the supposed diversity of interests of the large and small states, and between those which had and those which had not unsettled territory, but no difference of opinion respecting the propriety and necessity of some adequate provision for the subject, Gouverneur Morris moved the clause as it stands in the constitution. This met with general approbation, and was at once adopted. The whole section is as follows:—

"'New states may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new state shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other state, nor any state be formed by the junction of two or more states, or parts of states, without the consent of the legislatures of the states concerned, as well as of Congress.

"'The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States or any particular state.' * * *

"It is said this provision has no application to any territory save that then belonging to the United States. I have already shown that, when the constitution was framed, a confident expectation was entertained, which was speedily realized, that North Carolina and Georgia would cede their claims to that great territory which lay west of those states. No doubt has been suggested that the first clause of this same article, which enabled Congress to admit new states, refers to and includes new states to be formed out of this territory, expected to be thereafter ceded by North Carolina and Georgia, as well as new states to be formed out of territory north-west of the Ohio, which then had been ceded by Virginia. It must have been seen, therefore, that the same necessity would exist for an authority to dispose of and make all needful regulations respecting this territory, when ceded, as existed for a like authority respecting territory which had been ceded.

"No reason has been suggested why any reluctance should have been felt, by the framers of the constitution, to apply this provision to all the territory which might belong to the United States, or why any distinction should have been made, founded on the accidental circumstance of the dates of the cessions—a circumstance in no way material as respects the necessity for rules and regulations, or the propriety of conferring on the Congress power to make them. And if we look at the course of the debates in the convention on this article, we shall find that the then unceded lands, so far from having been left out of view in adopting this article, constituted, in the minds of members, a subject of even paramount importance.

"Again, in what an extraordinary position would the limitation of this clause to territory then belonging to the United States place the territory which lay within the chartered limits of North Carolina and Georgia! The title to that territory was then claimed by those states, and by the United States; their respective claims are purposely left unsettled by the express words of this clause; and when cessions were made by those states, they were merely of their claims to this territory, the United States neither admitting nor denying the validity of those claims; so that it was impossible then, and has ever since remained impossible, to know whether this territory did or did not then belong to the United States; and, consequently, to know whether it was within or without the authority conferred by this clause, to dispose of and make rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States. This attributes to the eminent men who acted on this subject a want of ability and forecast, or a want of attention to the known facts upon which they were acting, in which I cannot concur.

"There is not, in my judgment, any thing in the language, the history, or the subject-matter of this article, which restricts its operation to territory owned by the United States when the constitution was adopted.

"But it is also insisted that provisions of the constitution respecting territory belonging to the United States do not apply to territory acquired by treaty from a foreign nation. This objection must rest upon the position that the constitution did not authorize the federal government to acquire foreign territory, and consequently has made no provision for its government when acquired; or, that though the acquisition of foreign territory was contemplated by the constitution, its provisions concerning the admission of new states, and the making of all needful rules and regulations respecting territory belonging to the United States, were not designed to be applicable to territory acquired from foreign nations.

"It is undoubtedly true, that at the date of the treaty of 1803, between the United States and France, for the cession of Louisiana, it was made a question, whether the constitution had conferred on the executive department of the government of the United States power to acquire foreign territory by a treaty.

"There is evidence that very grave doubts were then entertained concerning the existence of this power. But that there was then a settled opinion in the executive and legislative branches of the government, that this power did not exist, cannot be admitted, without at the same time imputing to those who negotiated and ratified the treaty, and passed the laws necessary to carry it into execution, a deliberate and known violation of their oaths to support the constitution; and whatever doubts may then have existed, the question must now be taken to have been settled. Four distinct acquisitions of foreign territory have been made by as many different treaties, under as many different administrations. Six states, formed on such territory, are now in the Union. Every branch of this government, during a period of more than fifty years, has participated in these transactions. To question their validity now, is vain. As was said by Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, in the American Insurance Company vs. Canter, (1 Peters, 542,) 'The constitution confers absolutely on the government of the Union the powers of making war and of making treaties; consequently, that government possesses the power of acquiring territory, either by conquest or treaty.' (See Cerré vs. Pitot, 6 Cr. 336.) And I add, it also possesses the power of governing it, when acquired, not by resorting to supposititious powers, nowhere found described in the constitution, but expressly granted in the authority to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States.

"There was to be established by the constitution a frame of government, under which the people of the United States and their posterity were to continue indefinitely. To take one of its provisions, the language of which is broad enough to extend throughout the existence of the government, and embrace all territory belonging to the United States throughout all time, and the purposes and objects of which apply to all territory of the United States, and narrow it down to territory belonging to the United States when the constitution was framed, while at the same time it is admitted that the constitution contemplated and authorized the acquisition, from time to time, of other and foreign territory, seems to me to be an interpretation as inconsistent with the nature and purposes of the instrument, as it is with its language, and I can have no hesitation in rejecting it.

"I construe this clause, therefore, as if it had read, Congress shall have power to make all needful rules and regulations respecting those tracts of country, out of the limits of the several states, which the United States have acquired, or may hereafter acquire, by cessions, as well of the jurisdiction as of the soil, so far as the soil may be the property of the party making the cession, at the time of making it. * * *

"But it is insisted, that whatever other powers Congress may have respecting the territory of the United States, the subject of negro slavery forms an exception.

"The constitution declares that Congress shall have power to make 'all needful rules and regulations' respecting the territory belonging to the United States.

"The assertion is, though the constitution says all, it does not mean all — though it says all, without qualification, it means all except such as allow or prohibit slavery. It cannot be doubted that it is incumbent on those who would thus introduce an exception not found in the language of the instrument, to exhibit some solid and satisfactory reason, drawn from the subject-matter or the purposes and objects of the clause, the context, or from other provisions of the constitution, showing that the words employed in this clause are not to be understood according to their clear, plain, and natural signification.

"The subject-matter is the territory of the United States out of the limits of every state, and consequently under the exclusive power of the people of the United States. Their will respecting it, manifested in the constitution, can be subject to no restriction. The purposes and objects of the clause were the enactment of laws concerning the disposal of the public lands, and the temporary government of the settlers thereon until new states should be formed. It will not be questioned that, when the constitution of the United States was framed and adopted, the allowance and the prohibition of negro slavery were recognized subjects of municipal legislation; every state had in some measure acted thereon; and the only legislative act concerning the territory — the ordinance of 1787, which had then so recently been passed — contained a prohibition of slavery. The purpose and object of the clause being to enable Congress to provide a body of municipal law for the government of the settlers, the allowance or the prohibition of slavery comes within the known and recognized scope of that purpose and object.

“There is nothing in the context which qualifies the grant of power. The regulations must be ‘respecting the territory.’ An enactment that slavery may or may not exist there, is a regulation respecting the territory. Regulations must be needful; but it is necessarily left to the legislative discretion to determine whether a law be needful. No other clause of the constitution has been referred to at the bar, or has been seen by me, which imposes any restriction or makes any exception concerning the power of Congress to allow or prohibit slavery in the territory belonging to the United States.

“A practical construction, nearly contemporaneous with the adoption of the constitution, and continued by repeated instances through a long series of years, may always influence, and in doubtful cases should determine, the judicial mind, on a question of the interpretation of the constitution. (Stuart vs. Laird, 1 Cranch, 269; Martin vs. Hunter, 1 Wheat. 304; Cohens vs. Virginia, 6 Wheat. 264; Prigg vs. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. 621; Cooley vs. Port Wardens, 12 How. 315.)

“In this view, I proceed briefly to examine the practical construction placed on the clause now in question, so far as it respects the inclusion therein of power to permit or prohibit slavery in the territories.

“It has already been stated, that after the government of the United States was organized under the constitution, the temporary government of the territory north-west of the River Ohio could no longer exist, save under the powers conferred on Congress by the constitution. Whatever legislative, judicial, or executive authority should be exercised therein could be derived only from the people of the United States under the constitution. And, accordingly, an act was passed on the 7th day of August, 1789, (1 Stat. at Large, 50,) which recites, ‘Whereas, in order that the ordinance of the United States in Congress assembled, for the government of the territory north-west of the River Ohio, may continue to have full effect, it is required that certain provisions should be made, so as to adapt the same to the present constitution of the United States.’ It then provides for the appointment by the president of all officers, who, by force of the ordinance, were to have been appointed by the Congress of the confederation, and their commission in the manner required by the constitution; and empowers the secretary of the territory to exercise the powers of the governor in case of the death or necessary absence of the latter.

“Here is an explicit declaration of the will of the first Congress, of which fourteen members, including Mr. Madison, had been members of the convention which framed the constitution, that the ordinance, one article of which prohibited slavery, ‘should continue to have full effect.’ General Washington, who signed this bill, as president, was the president of that convention.

“It does not appear to me to be important, in this connection, that that clause in the ordinance which prohibited slavery was one of a series of articles of what is therein termed a compact. The Congress of the confederation had no power to make such a compact, nor to act at all on the subject; and after what had been so recently said by Mr. Madison on this subject, in the thirty-eighth number of the Federalist, I cannot suppose that he, or any others who voted for this bill, attributed any intrinsic effect to what was denominated in the ordinance a compact between 'the original states and the people and states in the new territory;' there being no new states then in existence in the territory, with whom a compact could be made, and the few scattered inhabitants, unorganized into a political body, not being capable of becoming a party to a treaty, even if the Congress of the confederation had had power to make one touching the government of that territory.

"I consider the passage of this law to have been an assertion by the first Congress of the power of the United States to prohibit slavery within this part of the territory of the United States; for it clearly shows that slavery was thereafter to be prohibited there, and it could be prohibited only by an exertion of the power of the United States, under the constitution; no other power being capable of operating within that territory after the constitution took effect.

"On the 2d of April, 1790, (1 Stat. at Large, 106,) the first Congress passed an act accepting a deed of cession by North Carolina of that territory afterwards erected into the state of Tennessee. The fourth express condition contained in this deed of cession, after providing that the inhabitants of the territory shall be temporarily governed in the same manner as those beyond the Ohio, is followed by these words: 'Provided, always, that no regulations made or to be made by Congress shall tend to emancipate slaves.'

"This provision shows that it was then understood Congress might make a regulation prohibiting slavery, and that Congress might also allow it to continue to exist in the territory; and accordingly, when, a few days later, Congress passed the act of May 20th, 1790, (1 Stat. at Large, 123,) for the government of the territory south of the River Ohio, it provided, 'and the government of the territory south of the Ohio shall be similar to that now exercised in the territory north-west of the Ohio, except so far as is otherwise provided in the conditions expressed in an act of Congress of the present session, entitled "An act to accept a cession of the claims of the state of North Carolina to a certain district of western territory."' Under the government thus established, slavery existed until the territory became the state of Tennessee.

"On the 7th of April, 1798, (1 Stat. at Large, 649,) an act was passed to establish a government in the Mississippi territory in all respects like that exercised in the territory north-west of the Ohio, 'excepting and excluding the last article of the ordinance made for the government thereof by the late Congress, on the 13th day of July, 1787.' When the limits of this territory had been amicably settled with Georgia, and the latter ceded all its claim thereto, it was one stipulation in the compact of cession, that the ordinance of July 13th, 1787, 'shall in all its parts extend to the territory contained in the present act of cession, that article only excepted which forbids slavery.' The government of this territory was subsequently established and organized under the act of May 10th, 1800; but so much of the ordinance as prohibited slavery was not put in operation there.

"Without going minutely into the details of each case, I will now give reference to two classes of acts, in one of which Congress has extended the ordinance of 1787, including the article prohibiting slavery, over different territories, and thus exerted its power to prohibit it; in the other, Congress has erected governments over territories acquired from France and Spain, in which slavery already existed, but refused to apply to them that part of the government under the ordinance which excluded slavery.

"Of the first class are the act of May 7th, 1800, (2 Stat. at Large, 58,) for the government of the Indiana territory; the act of January 11th, 1805, (2 Stat. at Large, 309,) for the government of Michigan territory; the act of May 3d, 1809, (2 Stat. at Large, 514,) for the government of the Illinois territory; the act of April 20th, 1836, (5 Stat. at Large, 10,) for the government of the territory of Wisconsin; the act of June 12th, 1838, for the government of the territory of Iowa; the act of August 14th, 1848, for the government of the territory of Oregon. To these instances should be added the act of March 6th, 1820, (3 Stat. at Large, 548,) prohibiting slavery in the territory acquired from France, being north-west of Missouri, and north of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude.

"Of the second class, in which Congress refused to interfere with slavery already existing under the municipal law of France or Spain, and established governments by which slavery was recognized and allowed, are the act of March 26th, 1804, (2 Stat. at Large, 283,) for the government of Louisiana; the act of March 2d, 1805, (2 Stat. at Large, 322,) for the government of the territory of Orleans; the act of June 4th, 1812, (2 Stat. at Large, 743,) for the government of the Missouri territory; the act of March 30th, 1822, (3 Stat. at Large, 654,) for the government of the territory of Florida. Here are eight distinct instances, beginning with the first Congress, and coming down to the year 1848, in which Congress has excluded slavery from the territory of the United States; and six distinct instances in which Congress organized governments of territories by which slavery was recognized and continued, beginning also with the first Congress, and coming down to the year 1822. These acts were severally signed by seven presidents of the United States, beginning with General Washington, and coming regularly down as far as Mr. John Quincy Adams, thus including all who were in public life when the constitution was adopted.

"If the practical construction of the constitution contemporaneously with its going into effect, by men intimately acquainted with its history from their personal participation in framing and adopting it, and continued by them through a long series of acts of the gravest importance, be entitled to weight in the judicial mind on a question of construction, it would seem to be difficult to resist the force of the acts above adverted to. * * *

"Is it conceivable that the constitution has conferred the right on every citizen to become a resident on the territory of the United States with his slaves, and there to hold them as such, but has neither made nor provided for any municipal regulations which are essential to the existence of slavery?

"Is it not more rational to conclude that they who framed and adopted the constitution were aware that persons held to service under the laws of a state are property only to the extent and under the conditions fixed by those laws; that they must cease to be available as property, when their owners voluntarily place them permanently within another jurisdiction, where no municipal laws on the subject of slavery exist; and that, being aware of these principles, and having said nothing to interfere with or displace them, or to compel Congress to legislate in any particular manner on the subject, and having empowered Congress to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States, it was their intention to leave to the discretion of Congress what regulations, if any, should be made concerning slavery therein? Moreover, if the right exists, what are its limits, and what are its conditions? If citizens of the United States have the right to take their slaves to a territory, and hold them there as slaves, without regard to the laws of the territory, I suppose this right is not to be restricted to the citizens of slaveholding states. A citizen of a state which does not tolerate slavery can hardly be denied the power of doing the same thing. And what law of slavery does either take with him to the territory? If it be said to be those laws respecting slavery which existed in the particular state from which each slave last came, what an anomaly is this! Where else can we find, under the law of any civilized country, the power to introduce and permanently continue diverse systems of foreign municipal law, for holding persons in slavery? I say, not merely to introduce, but permanently to continue, these anomalies. For the offspring of the female must be governed by the foreign municipal laws to which the mother was subject; and when any slave is sold, or passes by succession on the death of the owner, there must pass with him, by a species of subrogation, and as a kind of unknown jus in re, the foreign municipal laws which constituted, regulated, and preserved, the status of the slave before his exportation. Whatever theoretical importance may be now supposed to belong to the maintenance of such a right, I feel a perfect conviction that it would, if ever tried, prove to be as impracticable in fact, as it is, in my judgment, monstrous in theory.

"I consider the assumption which lies at the basis of this theory to be unsound; not in its just sense, and when properly understood, but in the sense which has been attached to it. That assumption is, that the territory ceded by France was acquired for the equal benefit of all the citizens of the United States. I agree to the position. But it was acquired for their benefit in their collective, not their individual, capacities. It was acquired for their benefit as an organized political society, subsisting as 'the people of the United States,' under the constitution of the United States; to be administered justly and impartially, and as nearly as possible for the equal benefit of every individual citizen, according to the best judgment and discretion of the Congress; to whose power, as the legislature of the nation which acquired it, the people of the United States have committed its administration. Whatever individual claims may be founded on local circumstances, or sectional differences of condition, cannot, in my opinion, be recognized in this court, without arrogating to the judicial branch of the government powers not committed to it; and which, with all the unaffected respect I feel for it, when acting in its proper sphere, I do not think it fitted to wield.

"Nor, in my judgment, will the position, that a prohibition to bring slaves into a territory deprives any one of his property without due process of law, bear examination.

"It must be remembered that this restriction on the legislative power is not peculiar to the constitution of the United States; it was borrowed from Magna Charta; was brought to America by our ancestors, as part of their inherited liberties, and has existed in all the states, usually in the very words of the Great Charter. It existed in every political community in America in 1787, when the ordinance prohibiting slavery north and west of the Ohio was passed.

"And if a prohibition of slavery in a territory in 1820 violated this principle of Magna Charta, the ordinance of 1787 also violated it; and what power had, I do not say the Congress of the confederation alone, but the legislature of Virginia, or the legislature of any or all the states of the confederacy, to consent to such a violation? The people of the states had conferred no such power. I think I may at least say, if the Congress did then violate Magna Charta by the ordinance, no one discovered that violation. Besides, if the prohibition upon all persons, citizens as well as others, to bring slaves into a territory, and a declaration that if brought they shall be free, deprive citizens of their property without due process of law, what shall we say of the legislation of many of the slaveholding states which have enacted the same prohibition? As early as October, 1778, a law was passed in Virginia, that thereafter no slave should be imported into that commonwealth by sea or by land, and that every slave who should be imported should become free. A citizen of Virginia purchased in Maryland a slave who belonged to another citizen of Virginia, and removed with the slave to Virginia. The slave sued for her freedom and recovered it; as may be seen in Wilson vs. Isabel, (5 Call's R. 425.) See also Hunter vs. Hulsher, (1 Leigh, 172;) and a similar law has been recognized as valid in Maryland, in Stewart vs. Oaks, (5 Har. and John. 107.) I am not aware that such laws, though they exist in many states, were ever supposed to be in conflict with the principle of Magna Charta incorporated into the state constitutions. It was certainly understood by the convention which framed the constitution, and has been so understood ever since, that, under the power to regulate commerce, Congress could prohibit the importation of slaves; and the exercise of the power was restrained till 1808. A citizen of the United States owns slaves in Cuba, and brings them to the United States, where they are set free by the legislation of Congress. Does this legislation deprive him of his property without due process of law? If so, what becomes of the laws prohibiting the slave trade? If not, how can a similar regulation respecting a territory violate the fifth amendment of the constitution. * * *

"But it is further insisted that the treaty of 1803, between the United States and France, by which this territory was acquired, has so restrained the constitutional powers of Congress, that it cannot, by law, prohibit the introduction of slavery into that part of this territory north and west of Missouri, and north of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude.

"By a treaty with a foreign nation, the United States may rightfully stipulate that the Congress will or will not exercise its legislative power in some particular manner, on some particular subject. Such promises, when made, should be voluntarily kept, with the most scrupulous good faith. But that a treaty with a foreign nation can deprive the Congress of any part of the legislative power conferred by the people, so that it no longer can legislate as it was empowered by the constitution to do, I more than doubt.

"The powers of the government do and must remain unimpaired. The responsibility of the government to a foreign nation, for the exercise of those powers, is quite another matter. That responsibility is to be met, and justified to the foreign nation, according to the requirements of the rules of public law; but never upon the assumption that the United States had parted with or restricted any power of acting according to its own free will, governed solely by its own appreciation of its duty.

"The second section of the fourth article is, 'This constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land.' This has made treaties part of our municipal law; but it has not assigned to them any particular degree of authority, nor declared that laws so enacted shall be irrepealable. No supremacy is assigned to treaties over acts of Congress. That they are not perpetual, and must be in some way repealable, all will agree.

"If the president and the senate alone possess the power to repeal or modify a law found in a treaty, inasmuch as they can change or abrogate one treaty only by making another inconsistent with the first, the government of the United States could not act at all, to that effect, without the consent of some foreign government. I do not consider, I am not aware it has ever been considered, that the constitution has placed our country in this helpless condition. The action of Congress in repealing the treaties with France by the act of July 7th, 1798, (1 Stat. at Large, 578,) was in conformity with these views. In the case of Taylor et al. vs. Morton, (2 Curtis's Cir. Ct. R. 454,) I had occasion to consider this subject, and I adhere to the views there expressed.

"If, therefore, it were admitted that the treaty between the United States and France did contain an express stipulation that the United States would not exclude slavery from so much of the ceded territory as is now in question, this court could not declare that an act of Congress excluding it was void by force of the treaty. Whether or no a case existed sufficient to justify a refusal to execute such a stipulation, would not be a judicial, but a political and legislative question, wholly beyond the authority of this court to try and determine. It would belong to diplomacy and legislation, and not to the administration of existing laws. Such a stipulation in a treaty, to legislate or not to legislate in a particular way, has been repeatedly held in this court to address itself to the political or the legislative power, by whose action thereon this court is bound. (Foster vs. Nicholson, 2 Peters, 314; Garcia vs. Lee, 12 Peters, 519.)

"But, in my judgment, this treaty contains no stipulation in any manner affecting the action of the United States respecting the territory in question. Before examining the language of the treaty, it is material to bear in mind that the part of the ceded territory lying north of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes, and west and north of the present state of Missouri, was then a wilderness, uninhabited save by savages, whose possessory title had not then been extinguished.

"It is impossible for me to conceive on what ground France could have advanced a claim, or could have desired to advance a claim, to restrain the United States from making any rules and regulations respecting this territory which the United States might think fit to make; and still less can I conceive of any reason which would have induced the United States to yield to such a claim. It was to be expected that France would desire to make the change of sovereignty and jurisdiction as little burdensome as possible to the then inhabitants of Louisiana, and might well exhibit even an anxious solicitude to protect their property and persons, and to secure to them and their posterity their religious and political rights; and the United States, as a just government, might readily accede to all proper stipulations respecting those who were about to have their allegiance transferred. But what interest France could have in uninhabited territory, which, in the language of the treaty, was to be transferred 'forever, and in full sovereignty,' to the United States, or how the United States could consent to allow a foreign nation to interfere in its purely internal affairs, in which that foreign nation had no concern whatever, is difficult for me to conjecture. In my judgment, this treaty contains nothing of the kind.

"The third article is supposed to have a bearing on the question. It is as follows: 'The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the federal constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the mean time they shall be maintained and protected in the enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion they profess.'

"There are two views of this article, each of which, I think, decisively shows that it was not intended to restrain the Congress from excluding slavery from that part of the ceded territory then uninhabited. The first is, that, manifestly, its sole object was to protect individual rights of the then inhabitants of the territory. They are to be 'maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion they profess.' But this article does not secure to them the right to go upon the public domain ceded by the treaty, either with or without their slaves. The right or power of doing this did not exist before or at the time the treaty was made. The French and Spanish governments while they held the country, as well as the United States when they acquired it, always exercised the undoubted right of excluding inhabitants from the Indian country, and of determining when and on what conditions it should be opened to settlers. And a stipulation, that the then inhabitants of Louisiana should be protected in their property, can have no reference to their use of that property, where they had no right, under the treaty, to go with it, save at the will of the United States. * * *

"For these reasons, I am of opinion that so much of the several acts of Congress as prohibited slavery and involuntary servitude within that part of the territory of Wisconsin lying north of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude, and west of the River Mississippi, were constitutional and valid laws.

"I have expressed my opinion, and the reasons therefor, at far greater length than I could have wished, upon the different questions on which I have found it necessary to pass, to arrive at a judgment on the case at bar. These questions are numerous, and the grave importance of some of them required me to exhibit fully the grounds of my opinion. I have touched no question which, in the view I have taken, it was not absolutely necessary for me to pass upon, to ascertain whether the judgment of the Circuit Court should stand or be reversed. I have avoided no question on which the validity of that judgment depends. To have done either more or less, would have been inconsistent with my views of my duty.

"In my opinion, the judgment of the Circuit Court should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial."

Among many reviews and strictures upon the Dred Scott decision, the "Examination of the Dred Scott Case," by the veteran statesman Thomas H. Benton, of Missouri, is worthy of note, because of Mr. Benton being a citizen of a slaveholding state, and long one of the leading members of the Democratic party, which, in all the recent contests, had adhered to the policy of the south,—but especially because he stood almost the sole connecting link between the last generation of great statesmen and the present. In that review, all the questions then at issue in relation to slavery were discussed with the ability and earnestness which distinguished Colonel Benton. Of the opinion of the court against the constitutionality of the Missouri Compromise Act, Colonel Benton writes thus:—

"The Missouri compromise was a 'political enactment,' made by the political power, for reasons founded in national policy, enlarged and liberal, of which it was the proper judge; and which was not to be reversed afterwards by judicial interpretation of words and phrases.

"Doubtless the court was actuated by the most laudable motives in undertaking, while settling an individual controversy, to pass from the private rights of an individual to the public rights of the whole body of the people, and in endeavoring to settle, by a judicial decision, a political question which engrosses and distracts the country; but the undertaking was beyond its competency, both legally and potentially. It had no right to decide; no means to enforce the decision; no machinery to carry it into effect; no penalties of fines or jails to enforce it; and the event has corresponded with these inabilities. Far from settling the question, the opinion itself has become a new question, more virulent than the former; has become the very watchword of parties; has gone into party creeds and platforms, bringing the court itself into the political field, and condemning all future appointments of federal judges, and the elections of those who make the appointments, and of those who can multiply judges by creating new districts and circuits, to the test of these decisions. * * *

"Those who suppose that there was no object in view in this abrogation of the Missouri compromise, but merely to make Kansas a slave state, are far behind the state of the facts, and can have had but little opportunity of knowing the intentions of the prime movers of that measure — those who ruled the council that commanded it. Certainly that was one of the objects; but there were others far beyond it, far transcending it in importance, and of which the establishment of Kansas as a slave state was only an introduction and a means of attainment. To form the slave states into a unit, for federal elections and legislation, by the revival of the slavery question, was one object, counting upon the federal patronage to gain as much help from the free states as would give the slave states the majority. Vast acquisitions of free territory to the southward, to be made slave, (besides Cuba,) was another object; and for this purpose, the principles of the Kansas-Nebraska bill were doubly contrived; first, to carry slavery into these free territories by the constitution; next, to establish it by the inhabitants of the states, enough southern people going in to dominate over the feeble and ignorant natives. Separation of the slave states, or domination over the free states, driving out of the Union the north Atlantic states, was to be the consequence of this consolidation of the slave states, and vast acquisition of slave territory. * * *

"The citizens of all the states, free and slave, are precisely equal in their capacity to carry their property with them into territories. Each may carry whatever is property by the laws of nature; neither can carry that which is only property by statute law; and the reason is, because he cannot carry with him the law which makes it property. Either may carry the thing which is the subject of this local property, but neither can carry the law which makes it so. The Virginian may carry his man slave; but he cannot carry the Virginian law which makes him a slave. The citizen of Massachusetts may carry the pile of money which, under a state law, constitutes a bank; but he cannot carry the law or charter which makes it a bank; and his treasure is only a pile of money; and besides being impossible, it would be absurd, and confusion confounded, to be otherwise. For, if the citizen of one state might carry his slave state law with him into a territory, the citizens of every other slave state might do the same; and then what Babylonish confusion, not merely of tongues, but of laws, would be found there! Fifteen different codes, as the slave states now number, and more to come. For every slave state has a servile code of its own, differing from others in some respects — and in some radically; as much so as land, in the eye of the law, differs from cattle. * * *

"Mr. Calhoun (1848) declared, 'I deny that the laws of Mexico can have the effect attributed to them, (that of keeping slavery out of New Mexico and California.) As soon as the treaty between the two countries is ratified, the sovereignty and authority of Mexico in the territory acquired by it becomes extinct, and that of the United States is substituted in its place, conveying the constitution, with its overriding control over all the laws and institutions of Mexico inconsistent with it.' This is the declared effect of the transmigration of the constitution to free territory by the author of the doctrine; and great is the extent of country, either acquired or to be acquired, in which the doctrine is to have application. All New Mexico and California, at the time it was broached,—all the territories now held, wherever situated, and as much as can be added to them,—these additions have already been considerable, and vast and varied accessions are still expected. Arizona has been acquired; fifty millions were offered to Mexico for her northern half, to include Monterey and Saltillo; a vast sum is now offered for Sonora and Sinaloa, down to Guyamas; Tehuantepec, Nicaragua, Panama, Darien, the Spanish part of San Domingo, Cuba, with islands on both sides of the tropical continent. Nor do we stop at the two Americas, their coasts and islands, extensive as they are; but circumvolving the terraqueous globe, we look wistfully at the Sandwich Islands, and on some gem in the Polynesian group, and, plunging to the antipodes, pounce down upon Formosa, in the Chinese Sea. Such were the schemes of the last administration, and must continue, if its policy should continue. Over all these provinces, isthmuses, islands, and ports, now free, our constitution must spread, (if we acquire them, and the decision of the Supreme Court stands,) overriding and overruling anti-slavery law in their respective limits, and planting African slavery in its place, beyond the power of Congress or the people there to prevent it.”

From Mr. Benton's able and interesting discussion of the various questions raised in this opinion of the Supreme Court further extracts might be made, to show the reasons and the purposes which were underlying that opinion. From his long experience, keen observation, and knowledge of human nature, and from his position in the political world, as well as his geographical position, a representative of a border slave state, none better than Mr. Benton could know the schemes and objects for the accomplishment of which the opinion of the court was but one means. More recent events show that he was not wrong in his judgment, though he perhaps failed to see to what that malign power would resort, when its political schemes should fail, and the government should pass beyond its absolute control. In an appendix to the “Examination,” Mr. Benton reviews that portion of President Pierce's last annual message, which is given in previous pages. In concluding he thus sums up the progress and purposes of the political slave power as developed at that time:—

“Up to Mr. Pierce's administration the plan had been defensive—that is to say, to make the secession of the south a measure of self-defence against the abolition encroachments, aggressions, and crusades of the north: in the time of Mr. Pierce, the plan became offensive—that is to say, to commence the expansion of slavery, and the acquisition of territory to spread it over, so as to overpower the north with new slave states, and drive them out of the Union. In this change of tactics originated the abrogation of the Missouri compromise; the attempt to purchase one half of Mexico, and the actual purchase of a large part; the design to take Cuba; the encouragement to Kinney and to Walker in Central America; the quarrels with Great Britain, for outlandish coasts and islands; the designs upon the Tehuantepec, the Nicaragua, the Panama, and the Darien routes; and the scheme to get a foothold in the Island of San Domingo. The rising in the free states in consequence of the abrogation of the Missouri compromise checked these schemes, and limited the success of the disunionists to the revival of the agitation which enables them to wield the south against the north in all the federal elections and federal legislation. Accidents and events have given this party a strange preëminence. Under Jackson's administration, proclaimed for treason; since, at the head of the government, and of the Democratic party. The death of Harrison, and the accession of Tyler, was their first great lift; the election of Mr. Pierce was their culminating point. It not only gave them the government, but power to pass themselves for the Union party and for Democrats, and to stigmatize all who refuse to go with them as disunionists and abolitionists. And to keep up this classification is the object of the eleven pages of the message which calls for this review—unhappily, assisted in that object by the conduct of a few real abolitionists, (not five per centum of the population of the free states,) but made to stand in the eyes of the south for the whole.”

The rapid development of the disunion schemes under the next administration, when it was found that neither by force nor fraud could Kansas be secured as a slave state, and the power of the government was likely to pass into the hands of the more populous and numerous free states, Mr. Benton did not live to see.* But the results show that he did not err much in his judgment of the political leaders of the south.

* Mr. Benton died at Washington, April 10, 1858, aged seventy-six years. He was born at Hillsborough, North Carolina, and at an early age emigrated to Tennessee, where he studied law, and was elected to the state legislature. In 1814 he removed to Missouri, where he soon acquired some distinction, and when that territory was admitted to the Union as a state, in 1820, he was elected United States senator. He remained in the senate until 1851—a period of thirty years. He afterwards served one term in the house of representatives, and then retired from public life. He was a man of the greatest industry and perseverance, and long held a high rank among the members of the Democratic party, but in the latter part of his life he did not wholly agree with the policy of the party. He has left a valuable legacy to his countrymen in his works, “Thirty Years in the Senate,” and the “Abridgment of the Debates in Congress.” He had just completed the latter work when he died.

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

P R E F A C E .

THE memory of the illustrious men, to whose patriotism and firmness the American people owe their national independence, should ever be cherished with respect and admiration. A knowledge of their personal histories may serve to keep alive the gratitude which is due to them, and to preserve a just appreciation of their action in founding a new Republic. The following Biographical Sketches are compiled from authentic sources, and aim only at a simple narrative of the public services of these patriots and statesmen. They show of what manner of men the Continental Congress was composed, and how many of them were prominent citizens of their respective colonies, whose services in the cause of their country were not confined to the memorable act of signing the Declaration. As unassuming sketches of eventful lives, they are submitted to the kind consideration of the reader.

JOSIAH BARTLETT.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

JOSIAH BARTLETT was born in Amesbury, Massachusetts, in November, 1729. He was unable to enjoy the advantages to be derived from a collegiate education, but improved every opportunity, and was able to obtain some knowledge of Greek and Latin. He chose the medical profession as a means of subsistence, and began the study of medicine at the age of sixteen. He possessed an active, energetic mind, which made up in part for the want of books, from which he had few opportunities of acquiring knowledge, and he was able to pass an examination with honor.

He commenced practising as a physician at Kingston, in 1750, where he soon established a reputation by his treatment with Peruvian bark in 1754, and amassed a competency. Bartlett received several appointments from the royal governor, John Wentworth, by whom he was highly esteemed; among them was the appointment to the command of a regiment of militia. In 1765 he was elected a member of the Provincial Legislature of New Hampshire. When the Stamp Act was before the British Parliament, he became a leader of the opposing party; but his patriotism was inflexible, though he was offered extravagant bribes by Wentworth. In 1776 he was appointed a member of the Committee of Safety for his state, which was dissolved by the governor, and reassembled under the lead of Bartlett. He was soon after chosen a member of the Continental Congress, and in 1775 was deprived of his appointments by the governor; but on assumption of government by the Provincial Congress, in the absence of Wentworth, he was reappointed. He was reelected a delegate to the Continental Congress both in 1775 and 1776, and was one of the committee to form a plan for the confederation of the states. He was a warm supporter of the Declaration of Independence, and was the first of the members of Congress to append his signature. He accompanied Stark to Bennington in 1777. In 1779 he was appointed chief justice of the Court of Common Pleas, in 1784 justice of the Supreme Court, and chief justice in 1788.

Dr. Bartlett took an active part in the Convention called to adopt the Constitution in 1788, and was elected a member of the first Senate convened under it in the city of New York; but he declined the honor, and did not take his seat. He was chosen president of the state in 1790, which office he continued to hold till 1793, when he was elected the first governor of the state under the Constitution. Through his exertions a medical society was formed of which he was chosen president. In all his various offices of trust and honor he faithfully performed his duties. He held the office of governor for one year, when he retired to private life, which he was not permitted to enjoy long, as he died on the 19th of May, 1795, in the sixty-sixth year of his age.

WILLIAM WHIPPLE.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

WILLIAM WHIPPLE was born in 1730, at Kittery. This town at the time of his birth was in New Hampshire, but has since formed a part of Maine.

His early advantages were only such as the common school of the town could afford, which he quitted, when yet a mere lad, to follow the sea. After having engaged in this pursuit for several years, by which he accumulated a considerable sum of money, he commenced business with one of his brothers at Portsmouth.

In January, 1775, he was elected as representative to the Provincial Congress of New Hampshire, appointed for the purpose of choosing delegates to the Continental Congress, of which latter Convention he was made a member the next year.

He continued in Congress until September, 1777, when, having been commissioned a brigadier-general, he joined Gates's army to repel Burgoyne. He took part in the battle of Saratoga, and was among those who arranged the terms of capitulation, and conducted the prisoners to Cambridge and Charlestown. In 1778 he joined Sullivan in his expedition against the British in Rhode Island, which failed through the neglect of Count d'Estaing to sustain Sullivan in his attack on Newport.

In 1782 he was appointed the superintendent of finance for his state—an office requiring great faithfulness and integrity in its incumbent. During the same year he was also appointed to settle the dispute between Pennsylvania and Connecticut concerning the ownership of the Wyoming valley.

In 1783 he was constituted a judge of the Superior Court, which office he retained until November, 1785, when a violent attack of palpitation of the heart, from which he never recovered, caused him to relinquish it. He died on the 28th of that month, aged fifty-five.

MATTHEW THORNTON.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

MATTHEW THORNTON was born in Ireland, in 1714, and was brought to this country, when quite young, by his father, who first settled at Wiscasset, in Maine, but subsequently moved to Worcester, Massachusetts, where he educated his son for one of the learned professions. Matthew chose that of medicine, and upon the completion of his studies settled in Londonderry, New Hampshire, where he soon became eminent as a physician.

He was appointed surgeon, in 1745, to the troops of his state, and accompanied them in the expedition against Louisburg, and on his return was appointed a colonel of militia, and also justice of peace.

He was chosen speaker of the House when the Provisional Congress was organized, and in September of the same year, 1776, was appointed delegate to the Continental Congress. Not being present when the vote on the adoption of the Declaration of Independence was taken, the indulgence was granted him, as well as several others who approved the measure, of subsequently signing their names to it.

Previous to his election to the Congress, he received the appointment of judge of the Superior Court, which position he resigned in 1782. He died in Newburyport, on the twenty-fourth of June, 1803, while on a visit to his daughters.

JOHN HANCOCK.

JOHN HANCOCK.

MASSACHUSETTS.

THE illustrious patriot JOHN HANCOCK, who enjoyed in his time one of the highest places in the consideration of the American community, was born in Quincy, January 12, 1737. Both father and grandfather of Hancock were clergymen, and men of very considerable reputation. His father dying during his infancy, he was left to the care of a paternal uncle, who, being wealthy, and kindly disposed towards him, sent him to Harvard University, and spared neither expense nor exertion to secure his comfort and promotion. He graduated at Harvard in the year 1754, at the early age of seventeen, and during the six years subsequent was engaged most of his time as a clerk in the counting house of his uncle, who was then at the height of commercial prosperity.

In 1760 Hancock visited the mother country, and during that period was present at the funeral of George II., and the coronation of his successor, the principles and policy of whose administration caused the conflict which subsequently occurred. After his return to his own country in 1764, by the decease of his uncle, he was placed, at the age of twenty-seven, in possession of a munificent fortune, reputed to have been the largest property held by any individual in the province, and probably but little inferior to any other American estate.

Shortly after Mr. Hancock's return from England, he was elected one of the selectmen of Boston; an office he continued to hold for several years. In 1766 he was chosen, with James Otis, Samuel Adams, and Thomas Cushing, a representative to the General Court of the province. In this assembly, although only thirty years of age, he was placed immediately among the foremost of the leading and working men, being nominated to most of the important committees of that body, and upon more than one occasion of great and general interest, appointed to the chairmanship over associates of high reputation. He is said to have been somewhat indebted for his early advancement to the kindly offices of Samuel Adams, a gentleman with whom he afterwards differed in political sentiment on several occasions, but it is believed not to the disparagement of the mutual respect of the parties.

In the impositions attempted by the British government, in regard to the importation of foreign merchandise into this country, Mr. Hancock took an early and strong interest, and was one of the most active in establishing those memorable associations of the citizens for the prevention of the introduction and circulation of English goods, which so materially aided, not only in warding off some of the encroachments of tyranny, but in awakening the attention of the American people to a discussion and decision on the whole subject of monarchical and ministerial abuse. In the course of this controversy, his name was brought particularly before the public, on account of the seizure of one of his vessels by the custom-house officers, under the pretext of its being taken in contravention of the revenue laws. It was removed by the officers under the protection of the guns of a British vessel then in the harbor. The citizens, however, became exasperated at this proceeding, and assembling in great numbers, pursued them, beat them with clubs, and drove them aboard their vessels. The collector's boat was then burned by the mob, amidst loud rejoicing, and the houses of some of the most odious of the supporters of "divine right", razed, in the first transport of popular fury, to the ground. This affair, apparently trifling, has been considered one of the principal of those immediate original causes which hastened the great dispute between the mother country and the provinces to a crisis.

Another incident, of still greater interest, tending to the same effect, was the celebrated massacre of the Boston citizens, by the British troops, on the 5th of March, 1770. Mr. Hancock, with several others, was, the day after this affair, appointed by an assembly of the citizens to wait on the royal governor, and procure the removal of the troops from the town, which they succeeded in doing. In 1774 Hancock was called on to deliver an oration on the anniversary of the massacre, over the remains of the murdered victims of tyranny. This production, which increased the author's already established reputation, is still preserved, and is justly considered, though not remarkable for any thing like a learned or classic taste, a fine specimen of indignant patriotism, expressed in the strong language of a fearless freeman.

About this time, having declined accepting the appointment of councillor by the governor, he was removed by General Gage from the captaincy of the Cadets, or Governor's Guard. The company disbanded, however, and the whole affair added to his popularity with every class of the people. Several years before, he had shown a similar spirit when offered a military commission by Governor Bernard, at that time tearing up the paper in presence of his fellow-citizens.

In October, 1774, Hancock, but thirty-seven years of age, was elected president of the Massachusetts Provincial Convention by a unanimous vote. The following year, the first of the revolution, found him at the height of his political distinction, in the honorable position of president of the Continental Congress. When the Declaration of Independence was adopted, as president of the Congress he was the first to affix his signature in that bold hand which will always attract the attention of those who behold that immortal instrument. He held the presidency till October, 1777, a period of two years and a half, during which the constant application he gave to business had rendered his health somewhat delicate. On this account he resigned his office, and retired to his native province, accompanied by the most gratifying testimonials of the universal respect of his countrymen.

He was not permitted, however, to remain long in the quiet of private life; for a convention being appointed to frame a Constitution for the State of Massachusetts, he was chosen one of its members, and took an active part in the deliberations of that important occasion. In 1780 he was chosen governor, being the first under the new Constitution. He was reëlected to this office annually until 1785, when he retired in ill health. In 1787 he was again called to the gubernatorial dignity, and continued to fill that station very acceptably, till his death, which occurred October 8, 1793, in the fifty-sixth year of his age.

The reputation gained by John Hancock among his own countrymen at the time the revolution broke out, cannot better be shown than by the importance attached to his patriotism by the enemy, who perhaps had a particular ill will against him, on account of his signature, as president of the Continental Congress, to the Declaration of Independence. The preceding year, however, he was honored by being pointed out, in connection with Samuel Adams, as an exception to the pardon offered by the royal governor of Massachusetts, in the proclamation he issued after the battle of Bunker Hill, declaring the province in a state of rebellion.

No individual probably contributed as much towards the adoption of the Federal Constitution by the State of Massachusetts, in 1788, as John Hancock. It was generally thought, when he submitted that instrument to the consideration of the legislature, that, should this state refuse to ratify it, its passage would certainly be lost in the other twelve. A convention assembled in Boston to consider the question of acceptance, comprising all the distinguished talent of the state, and Hancock was chosen president. It is said that, through his influence, exerted with his utmost discretion and energy at this juncture, particularly in pressing sundry amendments which obviated the objectionable features of the proposed Constitution, the scale was turned in favor of its adoption. This event was celebrated in Boston with great rejoicing, and hailed with satisfaction throughout the country.

The funeral ceremonies over the remains of Governor Hancock were observed in a manner which plainly indicated the hold he continued to have on the popular good will till the last. His body lay in state for several days at his residence, and its interment was conducted with great ceremony. The disease from which the governor had suffered most in his latter years was the gout; but his death was occasioned not more by this than by the fatigue caused by his arduous and responsible public duties, which seemed to occupy his whole time and thought. Governor Hancock left no lineal descendant. He had married, about twenty years before his death, Miss Quincy, of Boston, a lady belonging to one of the most distinguished families of New England, and by this connection had one son; but this child died at an early age.

SAMUEL ADAMS.

MASSACHUSETTS.

SAMUEL ADAMS, one of the leading actors in the revolution, was born in Boston, September 27, 1722, of a family long settled there. His grandfather was a grandson of Henry Adams, the same emigrant from England to Massachusetts from whom John Adams, second President of the United States, traced his descent. He was prepared for college, and entered Cambridge in 1736; but owing to the misfortunes of his father, who was engaged in trade, and who was nearly ruined by connection with a banking speculation known as the "manufactory scheme," he was obliged to leave before completing his course, though his diligence had been so great that the faculty rewarded him with a bachelor's degree. These family misfortunes were followed by the death of his father, and Adams was compelled to relinquish his intention of entering the clerical profession, and attempt instead to continue his father's mercantile business. He was unsuited to the occupation, however, and had but indifferent success.

In efforts in behalf of the unfortunate speculators in the "manufactory scheme," Samuel Adams found an early introduction to politics, which finally became the chief interest and principal employment of his life. The act of Parliament which prohibited the formation of unincorporated joint-stock companies with more than six partners, compelled the two banking companies, which were formed on account of the scarcity of money, to wind up their affairs, and the partners were held individually liable for the notes issued in lieu of silver. The partners of the banking company called the "manufactory scheme" were particularly unfortunate, and the few who had any thing to lose, among whom was Adams's father, were ruined. This act of Parliament was denounced by the friends of banks as a violation of the chartered rights of Massachusetts. Thus Samuel Adams entered upon politics as the opponent of parliamentary authority, and as a champion for the body of the citizens; a position which his father seems, to a certain extent at least, to have occupied before him. That his mind was strongly turned in this direction, appears from the subject he chose for his thesis upon taking his degree of A. M. He proposed as a question, "Whether it be lawful to resist the supreme magistrate, if the commonwealth cannot otherwise be preserved;" on which he maintained the affirmative.

Not succeeding in business, Adams obtained the office of tax collector for the town of Boston, which caused him to be brought in contact and acquainted with all the inhabitants, and obtained for him from his political opponents, the cognomen of Samuel the publican. Owing to some deficiency in his tax collections, — for he was a man of no business tact, — he was thrown for a time in the shade; but troubles impending, he again came forward conspicuously.

He remained steadily in the opposition during the administration of Governor Shirley, and against Bernard he took a still more decided stand, his influence increasing with his age. He took an active part in all town meetings, where his energy and courage made him a leader. The instructions given to their newly-chosen representative in May, 1764, by the town of Boston, — the first decided protests from any part of America against Grenville's scheme of parliamentary taxation, — were drawn up by him. The following year he was one of the 3 three representatives in the General Court chosen from the town of Boston; an office which he held the nine years following.

Upon his entry into the House he accepted the office of clerk, a position which, besides making an addition to his limited income, enabled him to exert an influence over the course of proceedings. The Massachusetts House of Representatives was the largest assembly in the colonies, numbering at this time about one hundred members. Besides taking an active part in the debates, which had already begun to attract attention, he also was the one who drew up the greater part of the papers put forth by the House in its contentions with Bernard and Hutchinson. He was well fitted for this office by the mixture in his character of caution, with fire, courage, and decision, as well as by his eloquence and fluent pen. An account of Samuel Adams found in the Diary of John Adams, dated December 23, 1765, says, "Adams is zealous, ardent, and keen in the cause; is always for softness, delicacy, and prudence, when they will do, but is stanch, and stiff, and strict, and rigid, and inflexible in the cause."

Governor Hutchinson, who looked upon Adams from an opposite point of view, gives about the same account in his History of Massachusetts, and sets him down as the most artful and insinuating politician he had ever known, and most successful "in robbing men of their character, and calumniating the servants of the crown."

It was proposed to silence him by the gift of some office under the government; but Adams, though poor, was incorruptible, and Hutchinson, in a letter to England, said that, owing to his "obstinacy and inflexible disposition, no gift nor office could conciliate him."

In 1767 the passage of acts of Parliament, for the purpose of raising a parliamentary revenue in America by taxes on trade, aroused the colonists, who considered that taxes on trade for a revenue were as much a violation of their rights as any other tax. Adams took a leading part in urging these views, and supported the petition to the king, which the General Court of Massachusetts adopted on this occasion. The letter of instruction to the colonial agent in England, and a circular letter addressed to the different colonial assemblies, for consultation and mutual coöperation for the defence of their rights, were all written by him.

In 1770, upon the occurrence of the Boston massacre, in March, Samuel Adams was appointed chairman of a committee to wait upon the governor and council, with the vote of a town meeting, to the effect that nothing but the removal of the two regiments then quartered in the town would restore order and prevent carnage. Hutchinson at first disclaimed all authority over the soldiers; but after a consultation with Colonel Dalrymple, he replied, that the colonel was willing to remove one regiment. The energy of Adams prevailed, however, and both regiments were sent to the fortified island in the harbor, where they had previously been quartered. The destruction of the tea which it was attempted to force upon the colonists, the passage of the Boston port bill, and the bill modifying the Massachusetts charter, together with the appointment of General Gage as governor at the head of an army, brought things to a crisis.

At the meeting of the General Court in June, it was proposed to assemble a Continental Congress at Philadelphia, at which Adams was one of the five delegates appointed by the representatives; and Gage having thereupon suddenly dissolved the court, a separate government began immediately to be organized by the patriots. Transferred thus to Philadelphia, and from the Massachusetts General Court to a Continental Congress, Adams now had a broader field in which to act. His first act was conciliatory. There had been a good deal of feeling produced by the recent attempts to extend Episcopacy in America. A motion made by one of the Massachusetts delegates to open the proceedings of Congress with prayer was opposed by one of the delegates from New York, on the ground that as there were so many different beliefs among the members, they would hardly be able to join in the same act of worship. Thereupon Samuel Adams arose and said, "he was no bigot, and could hear a prayer from a gentleman of piety and virtue who was at the same time a friend to his country," and proposed that Mr. Duché, an Episcopal clergyman, might be desired to read prayers before Congress, although he was himself a strict Congregationalist. The motion passed, and Duché, then the most popular preacher in Philadelphia, appeared the next morning as chaplain, which office he held during several sessions, though when the British occupied Philadelphia he abandoned the cause of his country. This motion of Adams was well timed, as it not only pleased the Episcopalians, a powerful body in New York, and predominant at the south, but also secured for the time Duché, whose example was not without effect.

Adams continued a member of Congress for eight years, taking an active and influential part. No man, probably, did as much as he towards putting the revolution in motion and effecting a separation from the mother country; a distinction which General Gage confirmed by excluding him, together with Hancock, from the pardon offered the people in case of submission.

He was not as prominent for his administrative talents, however, the policy he adopted being rather to suit the feelings, sentiments, and occasionally the prejudices of the people, than to meet the real emergencies. In the formation of the state Constitution of Massachusetts, adopted in 1780, he took an active part. In the Massachusetts Convention, called in 1788, to consider the Federal Constitution, Adams was an influential member, and was finally induced to give it his support, in consequence of several proposed amendments, some of which were afterwards adopted, although many of its features did not meet with his approval. The following year, Adams was elected lieutenant-governor of Massachusetts — a position he held till 1794, when he was chosen governor in place of Hancock. In national politics, Adams inclined decidedly towards the republican or Jeffersonian party, a circumstance which influenced him not less than his increasing age and infirmities to decline serving longer as governor in 1797, when he retired to private life.

Possessing neither property nor profession, Adams was compelled, almost to the close of his life, to depend upon the small salaries and emoluments of office, augmented by the industry and economy of his wife, whom he married young, and who is said to have been the chief supporter of the family while Adams devoted himself to politics. The death of his only son, in 1788, gave Adams a competency, however, through the avails of his claims for services as surgeon in the army through the revolutionary war. This competency Adams enjoyed until October 2, 1803, when he died, being eighty-one years of age. Besides the state papers, of which Adams was almost wholly the author, and the many contributions of political articles made to newspapers, he wrote a number of letters which appeared in print, and also an oration on American Independence, which was delivered in Philadelphia, in 1776 — an excellent specimen of his style.

JOHN ADAMS.

MASSACHUSETTS.

THIS distinguished patriot and statesman was born in that part of Braintree, Massachusetts, which has since been set off under the name of Quincy, October 19, 1735. He was a great-grandson of Henry Adams, who emigrated from England in 1640, and settled in Braintree, having had a grant of forty acres there. The father of Adams was a deacon of the church and selectman, though a farmer of limited means and a shoemaker. He was enabled, however, to give a classical education to his eldest son, John, who graduated at Harvard College in 1755.

The first employment of Adams, on leaving college, was the care of a grammar school in Worcester, Massachusetts, which, however, proved an affliction, and induced him to seek relief in the study of law. He had previously, however, thought seriously of becoming a clergyman, but was deterred from so doing by the theological controversies he had witnessed. The army also had attractions for him, and had he patronage to secure preferment nothing would have deterred him from becoming a soldier. About this time he wrote a remarkable letter to a young friend, containing some singular prophecies with regard to England and her colonies in America, and from this time his interest in public affairs commenced. After studying at Worcester two years, where he had placed himself under the tuition of the only lawyer in that town, he returned to Braintree, and in 1758 commenced life in Suffolk county. Gradually his practice increased, and in 1764 he married Abigail Smith, a daughter of the minister of Weymouth, whose connections occupied a superior social position to the family of Mr. Adams. She was well fitted to make him happy, however, and was a lady of great ability and good sense.

Soon after his marriage his attention was called from the law, and directed to politics by reason of the attempt at parliamentary taxation. He encouraged the calling of a town meeting to instruct the representatives on the subject of the stamp act, and the resolutions he offered on that occasion were not only approved and adopted by his own town, but by more than forty others, word for word, and attracted great attention throughout the province. The violence which followed somewhat alarmed him, and the refusal of the judges to go on without stamps caused a vexatious interruption in his own business. An unexpected appointment on the part of the town of Boston to act as counsel, together with Jeremiah Gridley, the king's attorney and head of the bar, and James Otis, the celebrated orator, somewhat consoled him, though they were unsuccessful in their mission to obtain permission from the governor and council to proceed with business notwithstanding the want of stamps. The stamp act was repealed soon after, and business proceeded as before.

Adams at this time first became known as a writer. Among other papers, a series of four articles, which appeared in the Boston Gazette, attracted a great deal of attention, being republished in a London paper, and afterwards printed in a volume with other papers relating to the disputes on taxation, under the title of an "Essay on the Canon and Feudal Law." They had reference to these subjects, but it has been suggested that they might more properly have been called an "Essay on the Government and Rights of New England."

In 1770 he was chosen a representative from Boston to the General Court, although he had previously accepted a retainer to defend Captain Preston and his soldiers for their share in the Boston massacre, which defence he conducted with success. Adams's acceptance of the office of representative interrupted in a great measure his practice at law, which he depended on for support, and which had already grown to be greater than that of any other lawyer in the province. From this time forward Adams became the principal legal adviser of the patriot party, and for the first time an active and conspicuous member of it. Returning afterwards to Braintree, he continued to be consulted, and to give advice regarding important matters, during the two or three following years. Soon after he was elected by the General Court to the Provincial Congress, but was negatived by Governor Hutchinson.

Adams was one of the five delegates from Massachusetts to the Continental Congress in 1774. In the discussions in the committee on the declaration of colonial rights, he took an active part in favor of resting those rights upon the law of nature, as well as the laws of England; and subsequently he was appointed to put the resolutions in shape, after the matter had been decided upon.

After the adjournment of the Provincial Congress, to which he had been elected a member by the town of Braintree on his return from Philadelphia, Adams applied himself to answering a series of able papers in a Boston journal, written by a supporter of the mother country's claims. These essays were continued during the winter of 1774, but were suddenly interrupted by the battle of Lexington. Under the title of "A History of the Dispute with America," an abridgment of them was published in 1775, and afterwards they were issued in pamphlet form, and have been twice reprinted entire. They are valuable on account of the contemporaneous view they present of the primary cause of the contest between England and the colonies, and of the policy adopted by Governors Bernard and Hutchinson, which helped so much to bring on that struggle. These letters are distinguished, like all his other productions, by a bold tone of investigation, as well as by a concise, clear, and pointed style, but, being written piecemeal and at various times, lack order and polish.

Adams was chosen a member of the Continental Congress of 1775, where, active and untiring, he found ample opportunity for the employment of his business talents. He was here placed upon a committee to fit out cruisers and see to naval affairs generally, and laid the foundation of an American navy, the rules and regulations of which were drawn up by him, and form the basis of our present naval code. In 1776, Adams, being frequently consulted by southern members, wrote several letters concerning the best form of government the states could adopt, one of which was published under the title of "Thoughts on Government, applicable to the Present State of the American Colonies." This was largely circulated in Virginia, and intended to controvert the aristocratic views quite common in that state.

After the resolution was carried that the United States "are and ought to be free and independent," Adams was chosen upon two of the committees appointed, a committee on a Declaration of Independence, and one on foreign relations. Upon Adams the duty fell of battling the Declaration of Independence through Congress, which he succeeded in doing after three days' debate.

On the 12th of June, a board of war and ordnance being established by Congress, Adams was made president, a position he continued to hold for several months, and one of great labor and responsibility. At this time he was also chairman of the committee upon which devolved the decisions of appeals in admiralty cases from the state courts.

Having gained the reputation of having "the clearest head and firmest heart of any man in Congress," John Adams was appointed commissioner to France in 1777, to supersede Deane. On arriving, however, he found that the recall of Deane had not reconciled the other two commissioners, and advised the mission should be intrusted to a single person. Adopting his suggestion, Franklin was appointed ambassador, and Adams returned home, to take a leading part in the Convention called to form a state Constitution for Massachusetts. Before this Convention had finished the work, Adams was again sent abroad as minister to treat with Great Britain for peace and commerce, and sailed for France in 1779. Much against his inclination, Mr. Adams was deterred from making any communication of his powers to Great Britain, by Vergennes, the French minister of foreign affairs, between whom and himself a feeling of distrust had arisen, which was entirely unfounded.

Finding his position in Paris uncomfortable, he left for Holland in July, 1780, to form an opinion as to the possibility of borrowing money there. In order that the Dutch might better understand American affairs, he published a number of papers, some of which were afterwards many times reprinted, and appeared under the title of "Twenty-six Letters upon Interesting Subjects respecting the Revolution in America." He had already entered upon negotiations for a loan, when interrupted by the breach caused by the capture of Laurens, and the declaration of war between Great Britain and Holland. He was soon afterwards appointed minister in place of Laurens, and commissioned to sign the articles of armed neutrality, but before he had procured recognition, was obliged to return to Paris in July, 1781, by receiving a notice to act there as minister to treat of peace.

Returning to Holland, Adams succeeded in his efforts to be received as ambassador, on the 19th of April, 1782, and during the year negotiated a Dutch loan of two millions of dollars, the first of a series which afterwards proved the principal resource of the Continental Congress, besides negotiating a treaty of amity and commerce. In the same year Adams was appointed, together with Franklin and Jay, to negotiate a commercial treaty with Great Britain. After remaining in England some time, and negotiating other loans in Holland, he returned to Paris in 1784, remaining there with his family, receiving a commission to form treaties with foreign powers. In 1785 Adams was appointed minister for the United States at the court of Great Britain. Here, being unable to accomplish any of the objects of his mission, and sensible of the ill feeling still existing between the two countries, his position was rather disagreeable, and he was recalled, at his own solicitation, in February, 1788, when he returned to America with the thanks of Congress for "the patriotism, perseverance, integrity, and diligence" he had shown during the ten years of his residence abroad.

Upon the adoption of the new Federal Constitution, after his arrival home, his name was placed upon the ticket with Washington, and he was elected Vice-President, being reëlected to the same office in 1792. In 1796 Adams was elected the successor of Washington, but at the expiration of his term of service, retired from public life, having sufficient property to support him in comfort during the remainder of his life. Adams felt keenly the neglect he then experienced, and the dislike of both political parties, caused by some of his acts during the latter part of his administration. The old charge of his having personal motives in setting on foot the mission to France in 1779, being brought up, he took up the subject in a series of letters to the Boston Patriot. These are a valuable continuation of the history of that period, and are generally regarded as a complete vindication of his conduct at that time.

In 1820, when the District of Maine became a separate state, Adams, although eighty-six years old, was chosen a delegate to the Convention of Massachusetts, to revise the Constitution, in the framing of which instrument he had taken an active part. A series of resolutions were passed by the members of this body, containing an enumeration and warm acknowledgment of some of his principal public services, and calling upon him to preside; but acknowledging the compliment, he declined the honor on account of his age. In 1825 Adams had the pleasure of seeing his son raised to the president's chair, and received the congratulations of Jefferson, between whom and himself there had been ill feeling for thirteen years after the withdrawal of the latter from public life. In 1826 Adams became feeble, and his health rapidly declining, he expired on the 4th of July, in the ninety-second year of his age. Upon the same day, and nearly the same hour, Jefferson also died. It was the fiftieth anniversary of the Declaration of Independence, and the singular coincidence made a deep impression on the minds of the people.

ROBERT TREAT PAINE.

MASSACHUSETTS.

ROBERT TREAT PAINE was born in Boston, Massachusetts, March 11, 1731. His ancestors were of good family, his maternal grandfather being Governor Treat, of Connecticut. His early education was conducted by the same tutor that instructed John Adams and John Hancock, and at the age of fourteen he was admitted to Harvard College, where he graduated with honor. He then studied theology, after he had made a voyage to Europe, and on his return acted as chaplain, in 1755, to the troops on the northern frontier. But he relinquished this profession, and studied law with Chief Justice Pratt, of New York, teaching school meanwhile to support himself, and was admitted to the bar, and commenced practice. He subsequently moved to Boston, and became a powerful rival of the celebrated Timothy Ruggles.

He early took sides with the patriots, but so conducted himself that he won the confidence of the governor. In 1768 he was elected delegate to the Provincial Congress, called after Governor Bernard had dissolved the General Assembly, for refusing to rescind a circular letter sent to the other colonies.

In 1770 he added much to his reputation by the able manner in which he conducted, in the absence of the attorney-general, the prosecution against Captain Preston and his men for firing on the inhabitants of Boston. In 1774 he was chosen a member of the Provincial Assembly, and was one of the commissioners appointed to conduct the proceedings in the impeachment of Chief Justice Oliver.

During this same year he advocated the calling of a Continental Congress, in opposition to Governor Gage, and was appointed a delegate to it. He was deputized by Congress, with two others, to visit General Schuyler's army at the north for the purpose of observation. This delicate commission was performed to the satisfaction of all. He was reelected to the Continental Congress in 1776, and gave his support and vote to the Declaration of Independence.

He occupied many important stations in the government of Massachusetts, being in 1777 speaker of the Massachusetts House of Representatives, and attorney-general, which latter office he held until 1790, when he was appointed judge of the Supreme Court.

In 1804 he was obliged, on account of deafness, to resign the office of judge, and retire to private life. He died May 4, 1814, at Boston, aged eighty-four.

ELBRIDGE GERRY.

MASSACHUSETTS.

ELBRIDGE GERRY was born in Marblehead, Massachusetts, July 17, 1744. He received a good education, and graduated at Harvard College in 1762. Entering into commercial pursuits soon after, he was quite successful, amassing a handsome fortune, and winning the esteem of his fellow-citizens by his honorable character. Having expressed his opinions openly and fearlessly in regard to the oppressions of the mother country, he was elected to the General Court of the province in 1772, from Marblehead. He immediately became the associate of Samuel Adams, Hancock, and Warren, and continued in public life from this time till his death, almost without intermission. He was placed on two most important committees, those of safety and supplies, and afterwards appointed judge of the Court of Admiralty, but declined the office, as he preferred a more active life.

In January, 1776, he was chosen a delegate to the Continental Congress, where he was placed on the most important committees, and was most of the time chairman of the committee of the treasury, until the organization of the treasury board in 1780, of which he was made presiding officer. In 1780 he retired from Congress, but was reelected in 1783, where he remained until 1785, and is said to have been longer a member of that assembly than any other man.

He was appointed a member of the Convention which met at Philadelphia, in 1787, to revise the Articles of Confederation. He was so opposed to many of the leading features of the Constitution proposed, however, that he refused to sign it; but when it was sanctioned by the people he did all in his power to carry out its provisions. He was a member of Congress four successive years, and served faithfully, and in 1795 retired to private life. In 1797, however, President Adams, knowing his ability, appointed him one of the three envoys to France. This joint mission not being received, however, by that government, and the acceptance by Gerry of their invitation to remain, although his associates were ordered to leave, made him very unpopular with many of the people of the United States. On his return he was nominated for governor in 1798, but was defeated, and again in 1801, but was elected in 1810, and again in 1811. In 1812 he was elected Vice-President of the United States, but was suddenly seized with illness while performing his duties at Washington, and died on the

STEPHEN HOPKINS.

RHODE ISLAND.

STEPHEN HOPKINS was born in Scituate, Rhode Island, March 7, 1707. He took up his residence in early life at Providence, and was elected a member of the General Assembly in 1733, and in 1739 chief justice of the Court of Common Pleas. He was chosen governor of the state in 1755, which office he continued to hold until 1768, with the exception of four years. His sympathies were early with the colonies, siding with them against the mother country. In 1754 he was appointed one of the members of the board of commissioners which assembled to form a plan of union for the colonies at Albany, New York. In 1765, at a special town meeting, he was chosen chairman of a committee appointed to draught instructions to the General Assembly on the stamp act.

In August, 1774, Hopkins was elected, with Samuel Ward, to represent the state in the General Congress held at Philadelphia, and was also chosen, in 1775 and 1776, a member of that body. He here used his influence in favor of decisive measures, strongly upholding them, and advising such members as were not prepared for action to return home. At this time, although entering upon his seventieth year, he possessed all the fire of youth in his zeal for the freedom of his country. His signature to the Declaration of Independence is written in a trembling hand, which was owing, however, to a nervous affection. He was placed upon the naval committee next after John Hancock, the chairman, and assisted greatly in the formation of a navy. John Adams, who was associated with him on this committee, says he was the life of them, and his experience and judgment in business were very useful; while, having read Greek, Roman, and British history, and being familiar with British poetry, rendered him an exceedingly agreeable companion, particularly as he possessed wit and humor, as well as the faculty of imparting his knowledge to others. Governor Hopkins was for many years chancellor of Brown University, and for fifty years filled some public station. In 1768 he began a "History of the Planting and Growth of Providence," which was published in the Providence Gazette. In the same year, by order of the General Assembly of Rhode Island, he wrote and published a work, entitled the "Rights of the Colonies Examined," afterwards reprinted in London. He died in Providence July 13, 1785, and a monument was erected over his grave by the state.

WILLIAM ELLERY.

RHODE ISLAND.

WILLIAM ELLERY was born in Newport, Rhode Island, December 22, 1727. Particular attention was paid to his early education, and he distinguished himself as a scholar in Greek and Latin at Harvard University, where he graduated in 1747, at the age of twenty. For some years following his marriage, which occurred in 1750, he devoted himself to mercantile pursuits in Newport, and was also naval officer of the colony of Rhode Island. In 1770 he commenced the practice of law in Newport, having previously served two years as clerk of one of the courts, and acquired a fortune in this pursuit.

When the revolutionary troubles began, Ellery became an ardent sympathizer with the colonies, and an active patriot. In May, 1776, he took a seat in the Continental Congress as delegate from Rhode Island, where he remained till 1786, with the exception of the years 1780 and 1782, proving himself an active and useful member. In 1782 he was appointed by Congress to inform Major-General Greene of their estimate of his valuable services. In 1784 he was a member of the committee to whom the treaty of peace with Great Britain was referred. He was also a member of the marine committee, and subsequently of the board of admiralty, where he exercised a great deal of influence; and the plan of fitting out fire-ships at Newport is said to have originated with him. In 1785, in connection with Rufus King, of New York, he made strenuous efforts to have slavery abolished in the United States. In April, 1786, he was chosen commissioner of the Continental loan office for the State of Rhode Island by Congress; and, in 1790, after the adoption of the new Constitution, was appointed by President Washington collector for the port of Newport, which office, notwithstanding he made frequent avowal of political principles opposed to several administrations, he retained until his death, which occurred on the 15th day of February, 1820, in the seventy-third year of his age.

CONNECTICUT.

THIS distinguished signer was born in Newton, Massachusetts, on the 19th of April, 1721. His father, being only a farmer in moderate circumstances, could give him no better education than a country school afforded; but being naturally eager in the pursuit of knowledge, he supplied by his own exertions what his situation could not give. He was, when young, apprenticed to a shoemaker, but found time, even when at his work, by placing a book before him on his bench, on which he could look when his eyes were not needed for his work, to acquire a good knowledge of mathematics and astronomy.

His father having died when he was only nineteen, the care of the family devolved upon him. In 1743 he sold the farm upon which they had hitherto lived, and with the rest moved to New Milford, Connecticut, performing the journey himself on foot, with his tools upon his back. He relinquished his trade, and commenced business with a brother; but during all these interruptions he never abandoned his habit of study.

Law became a favorite pursuit with him; and so proficient did he become in this, that, although he had no tutor, and was forced to borrow most of the books which he read, he was admitted to the bar in December, 1754. He had previously to this time been appointed county surveyor, and had made most of the astronomical calculations for a New York almanac.

He was elected in 1755 a representative of the Assembly of Connecticut, and appointed a justice of the peace. In 1759 he was made a judge of the Court of Common Pleas. Having changed his residence to New Haven, he received many similar appointments, and also that of treasurer of Yale College, which institution conferred upon him the degree of A. M.

In 1766 he was constituted a member of the Senate of Connecticut. His open and earnest efforts in behalf of the rights of the colonies caused him to be elected a delegate to the Continental Congress, and during his whole career as a member of this body he showed the most untiring zeal and unflinching courage in the discharge of his duties, and was one of the committee selected to draw up the Declaration of Independence. In the midst of these cares he still continued to hold many minor offices, among which was that of mayor of New Haven.

SHERMAN. — HUNTINGTON. — WILLIAMS.

In the year 1783, together with Richard Law, he was commissioned to revise the statutes of his state. In 1787 he was a member of the Convention which framed the present Constitution of the United States, and was unwearied in his efforts for its adoption.

During two years he held the office of United States senator, but his declining health caused him to resign this position. His death occurred on the 23d of July, 1793.

SAMUEL HUNTINGTON.

CONNECTICUT.

SAMUEL HUNTINGTON was born in Windham, Connecticut, on the 2d of July, 1732. His father was an industrious farmer, but unable to give his son any other than a common school education. Huntington was very studious, however, and overcame many obstacles that stood in the way of his advancement. He managed to acquire a tolerable knowledge of Latin, and commenced the study of the law at the age of twenty-two. Although obliged to pursue it with borrowed books and without a teacher, he succeeded in mastering its difficulties and obtaining a good practice in his native town, but removed to Norwich when twenty-eight, where he had a wider field for his talents.

He was elected to the General Assembly of Connecticut in 1764, and in the following year a member of the Council, and in 1774 associate justice of the Superior Court. In January, 1776, he was chosen one of the delegates to the Continental Congress, where he became an active and useful member, and remained nearly five consecutive years. In September, 1779, he succeeded John Jay as president of Congress, and continued in that office until July, 1780, resuming then his seat on the Connecticut bench. He again took a seat in Congress in 1783, leaving it, however, in November of the same year, and, returning to Connecticut, was appointed chief justice of the Superior Court in 1784. In 1785 he was elected lieutenant-governor, and the following year succeeded Roger Griswold as governor, which office he held till his death, in Norwich, on the 5th of January, 1796.

WILLIAM WILLIAMS.

CONNECTICUT.

THE subject of this sketch was born of Welsh parents, who emigrated to this country, at Lebanon, Connecticut, April 8, 1731. His father was minister of the parish, and intended him for the same profession. He entered Harvard at the age of sixteen, and after completing his studies there, commenced a theological course with his father. But the French and Indian war proved more attractive, and in the year 1755 he accepted a commission on the staff of his relative, Colonel Ephraim Williams, and accompanied him on an expedition to Lake George. He returned home after this campaign, thoroughly disgusted with the British soldiers, especially the officers, who regarded the colonists as inferior and treated them with haughtiness. The seeds of dislike towards his mother country which sprung up and flourished during the revolution, were probably sown at this time.

He did not continue his theological course, but entered into business in Lebanon. At the age of twenty-five he was chosen town clerk — an office which he held for nearly half a century. He was not long afterwards made a member of the Connecticut Assembly, in which he held a seat for nearly forty-five years.

When the revolutionary troubles commenced

he was an active member of the council of safety, and in October, 1775, was elected a delegate to the General Congress. He was an earnest though modest advocate of the independence of the colonies, and gladly gave his signature to the Declaration, when the immortal instrument was at last adopted. His property was nearly all expended in the war, and he was successful in procuring many private donations in aid of the army, often going himself from door to door, soliciting articles with which to relieve the destitution of the soldiers. Once, when the issue of paper money had become so worthless that the services of the military could not be procured by it, he exchanged more than two thousand dollars of it for specie from his own funds, thereby losing the whole. His devotion to the cause of independence was illustrated by many similar acts of self-sacrifice and unassuming labor.

When, in 1781, the traitor Arnold made an attack on New London, Williams, who was then a colonel of militia, rode twenty-three miles in three hours, but arrived only in time to see the town enveloped in flames.

He was a member of the state Convention of Connecticut which decided upon the adoption of the present Constitution of the United States. He voted for it in direct opposition to the instructions of his constituents, who, upon discovering their mistake, admired and were grateful for his firmness.

In 1804 Colonel Williams dissolved his connection with the Connecticut Assembly, and retired to private life, where he greatly endeared himself, by his domestic virtues, to all around him. In 1810 the death of his eldest son so powerfully affected his weakened constitution that he never recovered from the shock. For four days previous to his death he lay perfectly silent, and took his departure from this world August 2, 1811, at the advanced age of eighty-one.

OLIVER WOLCOTT.

CONNECTICUT.

OLIVER WOLCOTT was born at Windsor, Connecticut, on the 26th of November, 1726. His career was eminently a military one. Having received a captain's commission directly after his graduation at Yale, which took place in 1747, he raised a company and proceeded to join the army on the northern frontier, to fight the combined forces of the French and Indians. He remained here until the termination of hostilities by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle.

His attention was then turned to medicine; but he abandoned it upon the completion of his studies, on account of the office of sheriff having been conferred upon him.

In 1774 he was made a member of the Council of his state, and was annually reëlected until 1786. During this interval he also filled the positions of chief justice of the county, judge of the Court of Common Pleas, and judge of Probate, and had regularly risen from captain to major-general of militia.

In 1776 his patriotism and ability secured for him a seat in the Continental Congress; and during his connection with this body he was appointed one of the commissioners for procuring the neutrality of the Indians, and also assisted in amicably settling the dispute between Connecticut and Pennsylvania about the Wyoming Valley. In this latter duty he was assisted by William Whipple, another of the noble signers of the Declaration of Independence.

He was sent as delegate to the second General Congress towards the close of 1776, during which time he affixed his name to the Declaration; and after this trying duty had been performed, he was placed by Governor Trumbull at the head of fourteen regiments of the state militia, raised to act for the defence of New York.

After the battle at Long Island he resumed his seat in Congress; but during the following summer he joined Gates's army, and assisted in repelling Burgoyne. He again returned to Congress, where he continued, with some interruptions, until 1783.

During the summer of 1779 he successfully undertook the defence of the sea coast of his state against the British. In 1784 and 1785 he was actively employed as agent in negotiating with the famous Six Nations, and prescribed terms of peace to them.

In 1786 General Wolcott was chosen lieutenant-governor of Connecticut, and after ten successive reëlections, was made governor, which position he retained until the day of his death, December 1, 1797. Among the most prominent traits of his character were decision, virtue, a bright piety, and untarnished integrity.

WILLIAM FLOYD.

NEW YORK.

WILLIAM FLOYD was born in Suffolk county, New York, December 17, 1734. He had hardly finished his studies when he was called to the superintendence of a large estate, by the death of his father, who was a wealthy land owner on Long Island. He performed his duties with great skill and fidelity, but was soon called to a more active life by the differences with Great Britain. An excellent character and pleasing manners soon made him very popular, which, united with his strong sympathy with, and support of the cause of the colonies, led to his appointment to the command of the militia of Suffolk county.

Floyd was chosen a delegate from New York to the Continental Congress in 1774, and became one of the most active of its members. During his absence the British collected a force with the intention of invading Long Island and levying contributions, but he returned in season to place himself at the head of a division, and marching towards the threatening invaders, awed them into a retreat to their vessels by his energy and daring. In 1775 he was again returned to the General Colonial Congress, and continued a member during the eight succeeding years.

While attending so zealously to his public duties in Congress he suffered greatly in consequence of the destruction of his property. After the battle of Long Island, in August, 1776, and the retreat of the American army to York Island, his estate was exposed to the ravages of the British soldiery, and his family forced to seek shelter and protection in Connecticut, and for seven years he received no income whatever from his property. In 1777 he was elected a senator of the State of New York, reserving at the same time his seat in Congress. In 1779 Floyd, in connection with two or three others, led the state safely through threatened bankruptcy, and by their skilful management placed it in a very prosperous financial condition. He was elected a member of the first Congress under the Constitution, which met in New York in 1789, declining a reëlection.

In 1801 he was chosen a presidential elector, and a delegate in the Convention for the revision of the Constitution. He was afterwards chosen a member of the state senate, and twice presidential elector. He retained his mental faculties, and enjoyed robust health until he died, August 4, 1821. His life was a long and active one. Being a thorough business man, and possessing a great deal of decision, his services proved of the greatest benefit to the country during the stormy times of the Revolution and the turbulent period which followed.

SIGNERS OF THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

PHILIP LIVINGSTON.

NEW YORK.

PHILIP LIVINGSTON, a descendant of John Livingston, an exemplary Scotch minister, was born in Albany on the 15th of January, 1716. Having completed a preparatory course of study, he entered Yale College, New Haven, where he graduated with high honors in 1737. He immediately engaged in commercial pursuits, removing to New York, where he commenced an extensive and profitable business, gaining the respect and esteem of all by his honesty and uprightness.

Livingston first entered public life in 1754, when he was chosen alderman, serving in that capacity until 1758. He was then elected to the Colonial House of Assembly, where he became a leader, and through his wisdom and sagacity plans were started which ended in the capture of important fortresses from the French, and subsequently the subjugation of Canada. The celebrated Edmund Burke was the resident agent in England for New York at the commencement of the war. He made some very able speeches in Parliament while there, defending the colonies, and it is believed that he obtained his enlightened views through a constant correspondence with Philip Livingston, who was placed upon a committee for that purpose. He was an influential member, taking a firm stand against the oppressions of Great Britain, and remained here until the ascendancy of Toryism in 1769.

In 1774 Livingston was elected to the first Continental Congress, and was placed upon the committee by whom the address to the people of Great Britain was prepared. The following year he was one of the delegates chosen by the Provincial Convention to Congress, with power to act as circumstances required. He zealously upheld the proposition for independence, and voted for and signed the Declaration of Independence, which act was approved by the Provincial Assembly of New York. He was subsequently chosen to the Provincial Congress and State Assembly, and was elected a member of the first state senate of New York, which met on the 10th of September, 1777. He was reelected to the Continental Congress in 1778, and took his seat, although in an extremely delicate state of health, but died on the 12th of the following June, (1778,) one of the most devoted and purest patriots.

FRANCIS LEWIS.

NEW YORK.

FRANCIS LEWIS was born in Wales, in the town of Llandaff, Glamorganshire, in March, 1713. He was left an orphan when only about five years old, under the care of a maiden aunt, and after receiving a preliminary education in Scotland, his uncle, Dean of St. Paul's in London, sent him to Westminster, where he was well educated. After leaving school he served an apprenticeship with a London merchant. Becoming the possessor of some money on coming of age, he invested in merchandise and sailed for New York, where he engaged in commercial pursuits, which he followed for forty years, until the breaking out of hostilities with Great Britain in 1775. In the interval he several times visited Europe as his business increased, and was agent for supplying the British troops in America during the French and Indian war. He was the aid of Colonel Mercer, at Fort Oswego, when it was captured by Montcalm, in August, 1757, being taken to Canada with other prisoners and narrowly escaping death by the Indians. He was afterwards sent to France, where he was finally exchanged.

Lewis was elected delegate to the Colonial Congress in 1765. He retired to his country residence on Long Island on the enforcement of the Stamp Act. In 1775 he was chosen a member of the General Congress. The following year he was also elected a delegate by the Provincial Assembly, becoming one of the signers of the Declaration in August. He continued a member of Congress until April, 1779, except during a short interval, being always an active committee man in that body. His residence on Long Island was plundered by the British during the war, and not only did they destroy his property to such an extent that he died a poor man, but they imprisoned his wife for several months, during which she received such hard treatment that she died two years afterwards in consequence. Francis Lewis lived to be ninety years of age, and died on the 30th of December, 1803, universally esteemed and respected by his countrymen.

LEWIS MORRIS.

NEW YORK.

THIS bold and zealous advocate of the Declaration of American rights was born at Morrisiana, in New York, in 1726. He entered Yale College at the age of sixteen, where he graduated with honor, and then settled upon the estate which his father had left him.

When the troubles between England and America broke out, he took an active part against the act of Parliament compelling the inhabitants of New York to furnish supplies to the troops. His own circumstances were such as to render this no heavy burden, but his sympathy was awakened for those around him, and he risked his ease and fortune for their sake.

Notwithstanding his earnest endeavors, the colony of New York did not at first see fit to send him as delegate to the General Congress; but he was soon better appreciated, and in April, 1775, was elected a member of the second Continental Congress, which appointed him a member of the committee to devise means for the supply of the colonies with munitions of war. To him was also assigned the arduous task of detaching the Western Indians from their alliance with Great Britain.

In 1776 he resumed his seat in Congress, and when the question arose whether the independence of America should be declared or not, he openly advocated it, although by so doing he sacrificed all his property, as the enemy destroyed all his valuable estate, and drove his family into exile. His patriotic spirit communicated itself to three of his sons, who entered the colonial army, where they served with distinction to themselves.

Mr. Morris received the appointment of major-general, but his services in that capacity were not brought much into requisition. He relinquished his seat in Congress in 1777, and retired to the remains of his once fine estate, where he spent the remainder of his days. He died in January, 1798, and his funeral was attended by a large concourse of citizens, who sincerely mourned his loss.

RICHARD STOCKTON.

NEW JERSEY.

RICHARD STOCKTON was born near Princeton, New Jersey, October 1, 1730. His studies preparatory to a collegiate course were pursued at an academy in Maryland, after having finished which he entered New Jersey College, from which he graduated in 1748. He then commenced the study of law, and was admitted to the bar, where he soon became distinguished for his great abilities.

In June, 1766, Mr. Stockton went to England, making the tour of the British Isles during his sojourn of about two years. He was every where received with the most flattering marks of distinction, and was complimented at Edinburgh with a public dinner and the freedom of the city, and his opinions on the leading topics of the day were eagerly sought for by many eminent persons of the realm. On his return home in 1768, he was escorted to his residence by the people, so greatly was he esteemed.

During this year he was appointed by the king one of the judges of the Supreme Court, and a member of the royal executive council of the colony. Being thus openly honored by the king, and being possessed of an ample fortune, the temptations to remain on the side of royalty during the stormy times which took place in the colonies were many and strong, but he nobly overcame them and boldly avowed himself on the side of the patriots.

In June, 1776, he was constituted a member of the General Congress, then in session at Philadelphia, and took his seat in time to take part in the debate concerning the Declaration of Independence. At first he was somewhat doubtful of the expediency of such a measure, but the conclusive arguments of John Adams having settled the question, he cheerfully voted for and signed it.

In the fall of that year he received an equal number of votes with Mr. Livingston for governor of the state, but the office was finally conferred upon the latter. He declined the honor of chief justice of New Jersey, but accepted a reelection to Congress, which sent him, with Mr. Clymer, on a mission to General Schuyler, to investigate the reasons for the miserable condition of the northern army, and to devise means for its amelioration. He was obliged to hasten home to prevent his family from being captured by the British army, then pursuing Washington and his forces across New Jersey. He removed them to the house of a friend, some thirty miles distant, but the retreat was discovered, and he was dragged from his bed at night by a party of refugee loyalists, and taken to New York. On his way there he was treated with great indignity, and was thrown into the common prison, where he endured great hardships, which terminated his life February 28, 1781.

JOHN WITHERSPOON.

NEW JERSEY.

JOHN WITHERSPOON was born in the parish of Yester, Scotland, on the 5th of February, 1722. He was a descendant, on his mother's side, of John Knox, and was educated at the University of Edinburgh. His father determined to have his early education based upon sound moral and religious principles, and early dedicated him to the ministry, and his own mind seemed specially bent towards sacred literature. He went through a regular course of theological study, and was licensed a preacher when he was twenty-one, and was ordained minister of the parish of Beith, where he labored faithfully for many years.

Mr. Witherspoon was present as a spectator at the battle of Falkirk, January 17, 1746, and was taken prisoner and confined two weeks, during which time his health received a permanent injury. In 1753 he published, anonymously, "Ecclesiastical Characteristics," and a few years later an "Apology," in which he acknowledged himself the author of the previous work.

In 1757 he removed from Beith to Paisley, where he soon became distinguished for his piety and learning. He was invited to remove to several distinguished cities of Europe, but declined. In 1766 he was unanimously invited by the trustees of New Jersey College to become its president, but on account of his wife's unwillingness to leave her native land concluded to refuse. But being strongly urged by Richard Stockton, when on his visit to Scotland, to accept the appointment, he sailed with his family, and arrived at Princeton in August, 1768; and on the 17th was inaugurated as the head of the institution. His character and exertions soon raised its reputation, and increased the state of its finances. He accepted a professorship of divinity, and was pastor of the church at Princeton during his presidency. The Revolution dispersing the students, left him at leisure to attend to the great events of the day, and his talents were soon called into play in a new field.

Early in 1776 he was a member of the Convention called together to assist in the formation of a new Constitution for New Jersey, and his patriotism and good sense were so conspicuous that he was elected a delegate to the Continental Congress. His mind had already been made up on the subject of independence, and he heartily gave his support to it. He remained connected with this body the greater part of six years, served on many important committees, and was intrusted with several delicate commissions.

Upon the restoration of peace in 1783, the college was reopened, and Dr. Witherspoon returned to his duties there, and made a journey to England in order to obtain funds for the institution, which had suffered greatly during the war. This voyage was undertaken against his better judgment, as he wisely concluded that but little money could be obtained from a people so recently engaged in a deadly war with his countrymen, and whose feelings were not then right towards them. Trial proved that he was correct, as he obtained barely enough to pay expenses.

During the latter part of his life he suffered from imprudent speculations in land. About two years before his death he lost his eyesight, but he did not relinquish his ministerial duties.

He closed his long and useful career on the 10th of November, 1794. As a theological writer he had but few superiors, and as a statesman he held a high rank. His learning was extensive, and his knowledge of character singularly good.

FRANCIS HOPKINSON.

NEW JERSEY.

FRANCIS HOPKINSON was born in Philadelphia, in 1737, and died May 9, 1791. His father, Thomas Hopkinson, was an English gentleman, who died when his son was fourteen years of age. He was the first student who entered the College of Philadelphia, (now the University of Pennsylvania,) where he graduated, and afterwards adopted the profession of the law. In 1761, in a conference held on the Lehigh, between the government of Pennsylvania and several Indian tribes, he was chosen secretary — an event he afterwards celebrated in one of his poems. In 1766 he went to England, where he remained two years, and afterwards returning to America, settled in Bordentown, New Jersey, where he married Miss Ann Borden. He was chosen one of the representatives to Congress from New Jersey in 1776.

Hopkinson distinguished himself by his political and satirical writings during the Revolution, which were very popular, and he is said to have done much towards educating the American people for political independence. In 1779 he was made judge of the Admiralty of Pennsylvania, an office he continued to hold until its expiration on the organization of the federal government, a period of ten years. When, however, General Washington took the President's chair, Hopkinson received from him a very complimentary letter, in which was enclosed a commission as United States district judge for Pennsylvania.

SIGNERS OF THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

He was a man possessing many accomplishments, being familiar with the sciences as well as skilful in painting and music, having composed some airs for his own songs, which were very popular. The most important of his political writings were "The Pretty Story," published in Philadelphia, in 1774, "The Prophecy," published in 1776, and "The Political Catechism," in 1777. His poems which are the most well known are "The New Roof, a Song for Federal Mechanics," and a humorous ballad, entitled "The Battle of the Kegs." His essays and occasional writings were published after his death, in Philadelphia, in 1792.

JOHN HART.

NEW JERSEY.

THE precise date of the birth of JOHN HART is unknown. He was born in Hopewell, New Jersey, where he passed the earlier part of his life on his paternal estate, following the avocation of his father, who was a farmer, and by industry and enterprise he acquired a moderate fortune. His sympathies were immediately enlisted in the cause of his oppressed countrymen when the Stamp Act arrested his attention, and although living in a secluded district, he was perfectly acquainted with affairs both at home and abroad, and took part in the election of delegates to the Colonial Congress, convened in the city of New York in 1765. He was often elected to the Colonial Assembly, and took an active part, particularly in the legislation for local improvements.

In 1774 Hart was chosen a delegate to the Continental Congress, and reëlected in 1775, but resigned his seat to attend to family affairs, being chosen, however, to the Provincial Congress of New Jersey, and becoming vice-president of that body. In February, 1776, his talents being considered too valuable to remain inactive, he was again reëlected to the General Congress, when he voted for, and signed the Declaration of Independence. At the invasion of New Jersey by the British army his estate was among the first to be devastated, and particular exertions were made to take him prisoner, so that he dared not remain two nights under the same roof. He was enabled to return to his estate, however, by Washington's capture of the Hessians, and remained there until his death in 1780, at an advanced age.

ABRAHAM CLARK.

NEW JERSEY.

ABRAHAM CLARK was born in Elizabethtown, New Jersey, February 15, 1726. He received an excellent education, particularly in mathematics and civil law, and took up the occupations of surveying and conveyancing, being unable to attend to his paternal farm in consequence of possessing a feeble constitution. He soon acquired a knowledge of the law; and though he never followed the profession, he was often called "the poor man's counsellor," on account of his readiness and ability to impart advice gratuitously.

He held several important local offices under the colonial government, but took an active part in upholding the rights of the colonists, and in resisting the aggressions of the mother country, becoming a constant and useful person at the meetings of the people. He was a member of the Committee of Public Safety in Elizabethtown, and on June 21, 1776, was one of the five delegates appointed to the Continental Congress from New Jersey by the Provincial Congress, and there became one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. He was reëlected in the fall of the same year, and continued a member of this Congress until November, 1783, except during the session of, 1779.

In 1788 Clark again took his seat in the National Legislature. He was one of the commissioners in the Convention which met at Annapolis, September 11, 1786, in order that they might report a uniform system of commercial intercourse and regulations to be ratified by all the states, and in the following year, May 8, he was appointed one of the commissioners to represent New Jersey in the Convention which framed the Constitution. He was prevented, however, from attending the sessions of that famous assembly by ill health, but was elected a member of the Second Congress in 1790, retaining his seat until a short time before his death, which occurred in the autumn of 1794, from the effects of a sunstroke. His remains rest in the cemetery at Rahway, New Jersey, where a handsome marble monument was erected to his memory, July 4, 1848, by his fellow-citizens.

ROBERT MORRIS.

PENNSYLVANIA.

THIS distinguished financier was born in Lancashire, England, in January, 1733. His father was a merchant, engaged in American trade, and came to this country to settle, whither he was followed by his son when he was thirteen. Not long after his arrival he was placed in the counting room of Mr. Charles Willett, and his fidelity and ability caused him, upon the death of the senior partner, to be admitted to the firm. At the commencement of the Revolution this was one of the largest commercial houses in the country, yet, notwithstanding the great sacrifice which such a course of conduct must produce, they cheerfully concurred in the measures taken against importation and the Stamp Act.

Mr. Morris was elected to a seat in the second Continental Congress, and became a member of all the committees on maritime and financial affairs, being a special commissioner to negotiate bills of exchange, and otherwise procure money for the government.

On the 1st of July, 1776, he voted against, and on the 4th, refused to vote at all, for the Declaration, considering the action as premature, but having been reelected to Congress he formally affixed his name to the document the August following. His labors now became arduous, and so confident was he of the final success of the cause, that he did not hesitate to borrow large sums of money on his own credit, with which he materially assisted the half-clothed and half-starved band of Washington, when he crossed the Delaware and won the victory of Trenton.

In 1780 Mr. Morris, assisted by several other prominent citizens, established a bank for the purpose of issuing bills that would receive the confidence of the public, as the government issues were almost worthless, and the funds in the treasury very low.

On the 20th of February, 1781, he was unanimously appointed superintendent of the public finances, and subsequently the entire control of the government moneys was placed in his hands. One of his first and most beneficial measures was the establishment of the Bank of North America, which was incorporated by Congress December 31, 1781, and went into operation early the next year, with a capital of $400,000. The notes of this institution were declared receivable for the payment of duties and taxes in the United States.

Being possessed of an ample fortune and unbounded credit, he rendered the government eminent service by repeatedly raising, on his own private responsibility, large sums for its maintenance, so that he had finally issued his own notes to the amount of $1,400,000, which were subsequently all paid. Indeed, so indispensable was he to the carrying on of the war, that, but for him, the surrender of Cornwallis would never have taken place, but in its stead would have been the laying down of arms by the Americans, through the lack of means actually necessary for prosecuting the campaign.

As no other inducement than a desire to assist his country, in her earnest endeavors to free herself from British tyranny, could have influenced him to accept the office of superintendent of finance, now that there was no further use, after the conclusion of peace, for his services, he tendered his resignation, which Congress refused to accept, but he finally withdrew in November, 1784. Added to his onerous duties while holding this office, were those connected with the agency of marine affairs, which Congress had decided should devolve upon the superintendent of finance.

In 1786 he allowed himself to take a seat in the Pennsylvania Legislature, in order to obtain a renewal of the charter of the North American Bank. In the selection of his cabinet, Washington was particularly desirous of obtaining Robert Morris's services as Secretary of the Treasury, but he declined the honor, and proposed Alexander Hamilton in his place.

In 1787 he was made a member of the Convention which framed the Constitution of the United States. In 1788 the General Assembly of Pennsylvania appointed him a United States senator, which position he filled with honor to himself and benefit to the country. He retired to private life at the expiration of his term. His fortune had been greatly diminished by his meeting, from his own private purse, many government obligations, and having embarked most of the residue in an unfortunate speculation in wild lands, purchased with the expectation that a tide of emigration would set in, he became much embarrassed, which seriously affected his mind. He was one among the first to engage in the East India and China trade, and was also the first to attempt to effect what is termed an out-of-season passage. His death occurred on the 8th of May, 1806.

BENJAMIN RUSH.

PENNSYLVANIA.

DOCTOR BENJAMIN RUSH was born on the 24th of December, 1745. His father dying when he was only six, the care of his education devolved upon his mother, who was anxious to give him a liberal education, but as her means were too limited, she sold her land and moved to Philadelphia, and commenced some commercial business. Her wishes were gratified, as after having received a thorough preparation he entered Princeton-College, where he graduated at the age of sixteen.

The study of the law was his own choice, but by the advice of his former preceptor he commenced that of medicine. In 1766 he went to Edinburgh, where he spent two years attending lectures. The next winter he spent in London, and in the spring went to Paris. He returned to this country greatly improved, and so rapidly did he gain in reputation that before he had been in practice a year he was called in consultation by some of the most distinguished physicians. His kind and unwearied attention to the poor made him very popular with that class, and his polished manners made him a favorite with the rich. His reputation as a teacher became so great that students flocked to him from all parts of the United States.

Doctor Rush espoused the colonial cause immediately after his return to America, and proved a powerful aid. He was solicited to take a seat in the Continental Congress of 1775, but declined; but when, in 1776, some of the Pennsylvania delegates refused to vote for independence and withdrew, he was elected to fill one of them, and feeling that duty now pointed that way he accepted the office.

In 1777 Congress appointed him physician general to the military hospitals, in which he was of great service. In 1787 he was a member of the Convention of Pennsylvania for the adoption of the Federal Constitution. He was appointed president of the mint in 1788, which office he held for fourteen years.

He took a deep interest in the many private associations for the advancement of civilization and humanity, and was an honorary member of many of the celebrated literary institutions of Europe. He also received many valuable presents from the different sovereigns of Europe for important discoveries in medical science. He filled the chair of professor of chemistry in the Philadelphia College in 1769, and also that of theory and practice of medicine in 1789.

Doctor Rush's characteristics shone brightest during the time when the yellow fever raged so violently in 1793. The usual method of treatment utterly failed of success, but a new one introduced by him produced such wonderful results that he was soon overwhelmed with practice. Even while at his meals his house was filled with persons, chiefly the poor, desiring his attendance, and even while riding, his horse was frequently stopped, and his hours of rest were sadly encroached upon. Worn out by such constant activity of body and mind, he fell an easy victim to the disease, which nearly cost him his life. The death of this patriot and sincere Christian occurred on the 19th of April, 1813. During his illness crowds flocked to his house, so greatly was he beloved by all.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN.

PENNSYLVANIA.

THIS remarkable personage was born in Boston, January 17, 1706. His father emigrated to this country in 1682, and shortly after his arrival married a Miss Folger, and set up in business as a tallow chandler, which occupation he followed during the rest of his life.

Benjamin's education was commenced with a view to his being a minister, but his parents' scanty means not being sufficient, he was kept at a common school a few years, and then went to work with his father. But this not being to his taste, he was apprenticed, on probation, to a cutler, but the fee charged was more than his father could afford, and he was removed from this also. He then entered the office of one of his brothers, who was a printer, where he attained a considerable degree of proficiency, applying himself in his leisure moments to earnest study, instead of the amusements usual to those of his age.

At length a difficulty having arisen between himself and his brother, he left his employ and went to New York, where he hoped to find work, but failing in this he proceeded to Philadelphia. He attracted considerable attention on his first appearance in this city, friendless, and with only a dollar in his pocket. Having bought three loaves of bread, one of which he ate and the others he placed under his arm, he wandered about until he came to a Quaker meeting-house, which he entered, and slept soundly until he was aroused by the congregation dispersing.

He was successful in obtaining a situation as compositor in a printing office, and soon won the confidence and respect of his employers. Having written to a friend an account of his journey, the letter was shown to Governor Keith, of Delaware, who was so much pleased with it that he invited Franklin to his residence, and offered him his patronage, and advised him to set up in business for himself. This step involved the necessity of a voyage to England to obtain materials; but when he arrived there he found the governor's assistance of so little avail that he was forced to go to work again for others. In his new situation he soon made many friends by pursuing the same course of conduct which characterized him at home. During his stay there he became somewhat tinctured with infidel sentiments, and wrote a pamphlet on deistical metaphysics,—a performance which he afterwards deeply regretted.

With his earnings he started to take a trip on the Continent, but having received an offer to return home as a clerk to a friend, he accepted it. With a new employer at Philadelphia, there was a bright prospect before him of wealth and fame, but his employer having died, he once more became a journeyman printer with his first master. But he soon entered into partnership with another printer, and rapidly rose in popularity, and success attended him on every side.

So numerous and varied were the occupations and pursuits of this wonderful character, that it would require a volume to notice them all and do him justice. In 1732 he began his celebrated Poor Richard's Almanac, which had an extensive circulation in the colonies and in England, and was translated into several of the European languages. The issue of this ceased about 1757, and at the same time he commenced a newspaper, which became very popular in this country. By indefatigable study he acquired a knowledge of the Latin, French, Spanish, and Italian languages. He started a literary club, called the Junto, and the books they collected are the basis of the Philadelphian Library. He was the author of many pamphlets on popular topics, which were much sought for by all classes of people, and which greatly increased his pecuniary resources. In 1734 he was appointed government printer for the state, and two years afterwards he became clerk of the General Assembly. In 1737 he was made postmaster of Philadelphia. These offices bringing him in considerable money, the necessity for a close application to business was done away with, and he was left free to devote much of his attention to the study of philosophy and public improvement. He organized fire companies, invented means for paving the streets and lighting them with gas. Military discipline having been almost entirely neglected, he revived it, and also started several literary societies. He published a treatise on the improvement of chimneys, and invented the celebrated stove which bears his name.

In 1741 he published the "General Magazine and Historical Chronicle for the British Plantations," which was extensively circulated. In 1744 he was elected a member of the General Assembly, and was annually reelected for ten consecutive years, and before this time he had held the office of justice of the peace and alderman.

About this time he made his celebrated discoveries in philosophy, especially in electricity, completely identifying, in a novel and wonderful manner, lightning and the electrical spark. These discoveries alone would have made him famous, but, united with his varied achievements, have rendered his name immortal.

In 1753 he treated with the Indians at Carlisle, and in 1754 attended the Convention, at Albany, of delegates from the different colonies, who met to consult in regard to general defence against the French. About this time he became deputy postmaster general, and was active in providing material for Braddock's expedition against Fort Du Quesne.

In 1757 he was sent to London by the General Assembly, to manage a dispute between the province and its governor, and so admirably did he conduct it that, on his return to this country, he received twenty thousand dollars as compensation for his valuable services. He remained as agent in England for the colony during five years, and formed many valuable acquaintances there. In 1764 he was sent again on much the same business, and when, during his stay there the Stamp Act was passed, declared loudly against its injustice. His opinions weighed much, and averted for a time the storm which finally burst upon the colonies. He returned home in 1775, as he became satisfied that war was unavoidable, and was immediately made a delegate to the General Congress, to which he was reëlected in 1776, and was one of the committee appointed to draft the Declaration of Independence. In September of that year he was appointed one of three commissioners to meet Lord Howe on Staten Island, and hear his proposals for peace. This was unsuccessful, and the war began.

Shortly afterwards a Convention was called in Pennsylvania to organize a state government, in pursuance of a recommendation of the General Congress. Franklin was made the president, and his superior wisdom and judgment were displayed in the constitution which was framed.

Perhaps the most important office held by Franklin was that of commissioner to France, to which he was appointed by Congress in October, 1776, to negotiate a treaty of alliance. He was received with great honor in that country, and the sympathy of the people with the suffering Americans was assured to him; but the court of France hardly dared to make a treaty, until the news of Burgoyne's capture was received, when every thing promising security, they signified their desire of entering into a formal negotiation. The treaty was finally concluded, and was signed by Franklin and the French ministers in February, 1778. The independence of America was acknowledged, and France openly espoused her cause. Congress bestowed upon him almost unlimited power, and although his duties were difficult and complicated, yet they were most satisfactorily discharged.

In September, 1783, Franklin had the pleasure of signing the treaty of peace and recognition with Great Britain. He remained abroad until the arrival of his successor, Thomas Jefferson, in 1785. His return to this country was every where hailed with the most lively demonstrations of joy from individuals of every class, and from nearly every public body in the country. Notwithstanding the great age to which he had attained, being then nearly eighty, he was not allowed to retire to private life, but served in the capacity of President of Pennsylvania, which office he held for the space of three years.

In 1787 he was a member of the Convention which framed the Constitution of the United States. But disease had made such inroads upon his system that he relinquished his position as a public character, and retired to private life.

His death occurred on the 17th of April, 1790. The sad news was heard with profound sorrow wherever his name was known, and Congress proclaimed a season of universal mourning for his loss. In the National Assembly of France public notice was given of his death, and a brief eulogium was pronounced by Mirabeau. A vast concourse of citizens followed his body to the grave, thus testifying to the regard which every one felt for his memory.

JOHN MORTON.

PENNSYLVANIA.

JOHN MORTON was born in Ridley, Pennsylvania, in 1724. His parents, who were of Swedish descent, emigrated to America early in the seventeenth century, and settled on the Delaware, not far from Philadelphia. His father dying before his birth, his education was intrusted to the care of his stepfather, who, being a good practical surveyor, paid particular attention to mathematics, and also to the more common branches.

The first official position that he held was that of justice of peace in 1764, and he was not long afterwards chosen a member of the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, where his services were very valuable, and of which body he was speaker for a number of years.

He was also a delegate to the Stamp-Act Congress in 1765, and in the following year was made high sheriff of his county.

He eagerly espoused the patriots' cause, and when troops were first raised was offered a commission, but was obliged to refuse on account of his duties, which he felt unable to relinquish. He was at this time holding the office of judge of the Court of Common Pleas, and not long afterwards was advanced to a similar position in the Supreme Court.

In 1774 the Assembly of Pennsylvania appointed him a delegate to the General Congress, and reëlected him four times in succession. During his connection with this body his duties were faithfully discharged, though many were arduous ones. He served on many committees, and among others on that which reported the Articles of Confederation for the States.

His death occurred in April, 1777, in the fifty-fourth year of his age, before peace and the independence which he had so warmly espoused, were established.

GEORGE CLYMER.

PENNSYLVANIA.

THIS earnest patriot was born in Philadelphia in 1739. His father left him an orphan at the age of seven, when his maternal uncle, William Coleman, gave him a good education, and eventually bequeathed him the greater part of his fortune. Upon leaving school he entered his uncle's counting house, but spent much of his leisure in study. In 1765 he married Miss Elizabeth Meredith, and joined the commercial house of his father-in-law.

His first appearance in political affairs was in October 16, 1773, as speaker at a "tea meeting," held in Philadelphia by the citizens, where his opposition was so spirited that he was appointed chairman of the committee which requested the tea agents to resign. During the next twenty years Clymer was a prominent man, being a member of many of the preliminary committees, and of the council of safety. He commanded a company, under General Cadwallader, performing but little military duty, however, being of more service in a civil capacity. He was appointed to the care of the public treasury on July 29, 1775, together with Michael Hillegas, and here proved his sincere belief in the future, by converting all his specie into continental currency, liberally subscribing also to the loan.

July 20, 1776, Clymer was appointed one of those who succeeded the members of the Pennsylvania delegation who had refused to subscribe their names to the Declaration of Independence. The new members affixed their signatures, Clymer's being the thirty-eighth name after John Hancock's. In September of the same year he was one of the committee sent to Ticonderoga to confer with Washington on affairs of the army. In December he was among the commissioners left in Philadelphia to guard the public interests on the retirement of Congress to Baltimore. The following year he was reëlected to Congress, and again sent to consult with Washington, and having removed his family to Chester county, had his home plundered by the British at the battle of Brandywine. In 1777 he was appointed, together with Colonel Samuel Washington and Gabriel Jones, to treat with the Indians at Fort Pitt; but failing, returned, after an absence of four months, and recommended compulsory measures.

In 1780 Clymer was a third time elected to Congress. In November, of the same year, he was deputed, with John Nixon, to organize the Bank of North America, and in 1782 was associated with Rutledge in his mission to the Southern States. At the close of the war he removed to Princeton, where he was only permitted to enjoy his retirement for a short time, being elected a member of the Pennsylvania legislature against the party who supported the old constitution. He here did good service by his successful efforts to modify the cruelty of the criminal code. Besides other institutions indebted to him, were the Pennsylvania Agricultural Society, of which he was vice-president; the Academy of Fine Arts and Pennsylvania Bank, of both of which institutions he was also president. Clymer was a member of the Convention which framed the Federal Constitution, and was elected a member of the first Congress under that instrument, in November, 1788. He declined a reëlection in 1790, and the following year was appointed collector of the excise duty on spirits, which collection led to whiskey riots in Pennsylvania. Clymer acted firmly and temperately in these troubles, but finally resigned it, and was appointed one of three to negotiate a treaty with the Cherokees and Creeks in Georgia. Completing this work in 1796, he withdrew from public affairs, and died at the residence of his son, at Morrisville, Pennsylvania, July 23, 1813.

In person George Clymer was of medium stature, fair complexion, and attractive countenance, with marked expression in harmony with his character, which was honest, frank, and republican. He was a man extremely averse to the assumptions of aristocracy, which he thought abounded more in the United States than in any other country. He seldom spoke in public, but when he did he expressed himself in keen, pithy, and laconic language.

JAMES SMITH.

PENNSYLVANIA.

THE birthplace of JAMES SMITH was Ireland, but the time of his birth was never ascertained with certainty. It probably occurred about the year 1720. His father emigrated to this country when James was quite small, and settled on the Susquehanna. Early in life he discovered a strong intellect, and was liberally educated at Philadelphia College. Upon his graduation he studied law, and after having been admitted to the bar, set up for himself in Shippensburg as a lawyer and surveyor, but finding the place too much of a wilderness for extensive practice removed to York.

He early perceived the storm which threatened the annihilation of the colonies, but fearlessly withstood it. In 1774 he was present at a meeting of delegates from all the counties of Pennsylvania for the purpose of expressing the public mind on the Non-importation Act, and the propriety of calling a General Congress. He endeavored to arouse the people, and was in favor of independence as early as 1774; but the State of Pennsylvania was slow to adopt his sentiments, and even gave her delegates adverse instructions, but she finally saw good reason to alter her mind, and sent Mr. Smith, with several others, to fill the vacancies caused by the withdrawal of some who would not vote for the Declaration.

He was a member of the Convention of Pennsylvania which assembled in July to establish a new State Constitution. In this he was very active, and it was not till October, 1776, that he took his seat regularly in Congress. He was soon after appointed one of a most important committee to aid Washington in repelling General Howe. They were provided with almost unlimited power, and were the chief originators of many of the military movements.

In the spring of 1777 he declined a reëlection to Congress, but the disastrous defeats of the Americans at Brandywine and Germantown, and the capture of Philadelphia, rendered his presence with that deliberative body necessary. When, in 1778, the battle of Monmouth retrieved the fallen fortunes of the colonists, he dissolved his connection with it, and retired to private life. In 1779 he served one term in his State Legislature, which terminated his public career.

His death occurred on the 11th of July, 1806, at the advanced age of nearly ninety. In manner, Mr. Smith was quite eccentric, but he possessed a ready wit, joined to a genial humor, which made him a great favorite in the social circle.

GEORGE TAYLOR.

PENNSYLVANIA.

GEORGE TAYLOR was born in Ireland, in 1716, and came to this country when he was about twenty. Upon his arrival here he was so poor that he was obliged to perform menial service, although he had been well educated. He afterwards filled the situation of clerk in an iron establishment in Durham, Pennsylvania. After the death of his employer he married his widow, and thus became possessed of considerable property and a flourishing business. When he had carried this on for some time, and had accumulated considerable wealth, he purchased a fine estate on the Lehigh, and erected iron works there.

His position in society, joined to a suavity of manner, procured for him a seat in the Colonial Assembly in 1764. He soon became a prominent member, and was placed upon many of the most important committees. It was during his connection with this body that a letter was received from Massachusetts calling for a general convention at New York in 1765. The invitation was accepted, and Mr. Taylor was appointed to prepare instructions for the delegates from his state.

He retained his seat in the Assembly five years, when he withdrew that he might attend to his private affairs, which he had been obliged to neglect in the discharge of his public duties. He was elected to the Provincial Congress in 1775, and was also appointed on the committee to make regulations to govern the delegates to the General Congress. These instructions contained one that forbade the delegates to vote for any proposition of independence, as hopes of a reconciliation were still entertained. But public opinion on this subject changed as matters grew worse, and the restriction was removed in June, 1776; still, many of the members adhered to the old course of action. Mr. Taylor was sent to fill the place of one of them, and remained in Congress a year, when he retired to Easton. He died on the 23d of February, 1781.

JAMES WILSON.

PENNSYLVANIA.

THIS patriot was born in Scotland, in 1742. His father was a respectable farmer, and he placed his son under the tuition of some of the best teachers in Edinburgh. He came to this country in 1766, so highly recommended that he found but little difficulty in obtaining a situation as a tutor in the Philadelphia College, where he soon gained the reputation of a fine classical scholar. After a few months' teaching he commenced the study of law in the office of John Dickinson, and was admitted to the bar, and finally established himself at Philadelphia.

He gained great renown as a lawyer, and also as a warm adherent of the republican cause. The zeal which he showed for the interests of his adopted home caused him to be elected to the Provincial Assembly of Pennsylvania in 1774, and in May, 1775, he was deputed to attend the General Congress. He was reëlected in 1776, and showed himself a strong friend of independence, but was opposed in his efforts for its success by several of the members of his own state.

Party spirit running high about this time, his people did not send him to Congress from 1777 until 1782. Although thus unkindly returned to private life, he still continued his efforts for the public good. He labored untiringly, in connection with Mr. Smith, in organizing a volunteer body of militia, and was appointed colonel of a regiment in 1774.

In 1777 he was sent on a commission to the Indians in his state, with whom difficulties had arisen, which he settled amicably. As soon as France had declared herself for America, in 1778, she sent a minister to Congress, a Monsieur Gerard, who soon formed an acquaintance with Mr. Wilson. He was struck with the versatility of his talents, and appointed him advocate-general of French affairs,—a duty both arduous and delicate. He served in this capacity until 1782, when he relinquished the office on account of difficulty respecting remuneration.

Mr. Wilson resumed his connection with Congress in 1783, and during that year was commissioned by the government of Pennsylvania to assist in settling the difficulty between that state and Connecticut in regard to the title to the Wyoming Valley. He was again sent to Congress in 1785, and in 1787 assisted in framing the Federal Constitution. He was chosen as orator on the occasion of its adoption, and was one of those who altered his state's constitution to conform with the general one.

He received the appointment of professor of law in the College of Philadelphia in 1790, and in the year following commenced revising the laws of the state; but the senate refusing to concur with the representatives in this undertaking, he abandoned his work. Washington conferred upon him the office of judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, and he died while at Edenton, August 28, 1798, as he was making a judicial circuit.

GEORGE ROSS.

PENNSYLVANIA.

GEORGE ROSS was born in Newcastle, Delaware, during the year 1730. His father, an Episcopal minister, gave him an excellent education, and he exhibited great proficiency in the classics. He commenced the study of the law at the age of eighteen, at his brother's office, and was admitted to the bar three years afterwards, and fixed his residence at Lancaster, Pennsylvania.

In 1768 he began his public career as a member of the Pennsylvania Assembly, with which he retained his connection for several successive years. When the British government, jealous of the rising power of the colonies, endeavored to crush them by oppressive and unjust regulations, Mr. Ross heartily approved of resistance, and joined in the universal desire for a General Congress. In 1774 he was elected to this body, and was instructed to draw up rules by which himself and his colleagues were to be governed. He was so highly esteemed that he was continually returned until 1777, when indisposition obliged him to withdraw, on which occasion the citizens of Lancaster voted him a piece of plate.

His warmest sympathies were always enlisted on the side of suffering, and he put forth earnest endeavors to ameliorate the condition of the Indians, and prevent any outbreaks among them. In April, 1799 he was made a judge of the Admiralty Court for Pennsylvania, in which position he bid fair to greatly distinguish himself, but a sudden attack of the gout terminated his useful life in July, 1780.

CÆSAR RODNEY.

DELAWARE.

CÆSAR RODNEY was born in Dover, Delaware, in 1730. His father came to this country about the same time as William Penn, and, after a short residence in Pennsylvania, settled in Delaware. Cæsar, being the eldest, inherited his father's estate and high social standing. At the age of twenty-eight he was made high sheriff, and upon the expiration of his services in this capacity, he was created a justice of the peace, and a judge of the lower courts.

He represented his county in the Provincial Legislature in 1762, by which he was sent, in 1765, to the "Stamp Act Congress," which met in New York, when the British, by their numerous unjust measures, laid a yoke upon the colonies too grievous to be borne. He was elected speaker of the Provincial Assembly, and occupied that position until 1774, at the same time being chairman of the committee whose business it was to carry on a political correspondence with the colonies.

He was elected to the first General Congress in 1774, and assisted in drawing up a declaration of rights. In the following year he was reelected, and was also commissioned brigadier-general. When the question of the Declaration of Independence came before Congress he was absent, attending to the duties devolving upon him in his military capacity, but his colleagues, knowing his feelings on the subject, despatched messengers at their own expense to bring Mr. Rodney back as soon as possible. He arrived just in time to cast his vote and sign his name to the document.

In the fall of 1776 the people of Delaware called a convention to frame a state constitution and nominate delegates to the next General Congress. By the influence of the loyalist party, which was too well represented in the state, he was deprived of the honor, which properly belonged to him, of a reelection, but he employed his time in obtaining material aid for the troops of his state then with Washington in New Jersey.

After the battle of Princeton, in 1777, he went to the camp there, and spent two months recruiting, but then, his services being no longer necessary, came home. Shortly after his return he received the appointment of judge of the Supreme Court, but this he declined, as he had a greater relish for the more active duties of military life. He was afterwards called to march, with his brigade, to quell an insurrection in his state, and also to join the main army under Washington when Lord Howe turned his troops towards Philadelphia.

The tory element at length having subsided, General Rodney was returned to Congress, but before taking his seat was chosen president of the state, and fulfilled the arduous duties connected with it in a worthy manner, effectually repressing all tendencies to anarchy which displayed themselves. In 1782 his gradually declining health caused him to retire from office, and he expired early in 1783.

GEORGE READ.

DELAWARE.

GEORGE READ was born in Maryland, in the year 1734. He was of Irish descent, his father having emigrated to this country about 1726. The latter educated his son in the common English branches himself, and then placed him in the hands of good teachers, with whom he made much progress in the classics.

George commenced studying law at Philadelphia when he was only seventeen, and was admitted to the bar two years after. An act of generosity which he performed at that time deserves notice. According to the established laws he was entitled to two shares in his father's estate, but he relinquished his rights to his brothers, considering that he had already received his share in his education. In 1754 he commenced the practice of his profession at Newcastle, Delaware, where, although he was surrounded by lawyers of eminence, he soon rose to a level with them.

In 1763 he was appointed attorney-general for the three lower counties of Delaware, which office he held until he was elected a delegate to the Continental Congress in 1774. In 1765 he was made a member of the General Assembly of his state, and continued his connection with it for eleven consecutive years. He was one of a committee from this body appointed to draw up an address to the King in behalf of the provinces at the time of the passage of the Stamp Act. But he felt that remonstrance from the colonies singly would have but little effect, and believing that "in union there is strength," he advocated a general meeting of all the colonies.

He also strenuously opposed commercial intercourse with the British. When Boston suffered so severely under the crushing weight of the Port Bill, Mr. Read was very active in transmitting donations and procuring pecuniary aid for its inhabitants.

In 1774 he was deputed to attend the session of the Continental Congress, and also in 1775 and 1776. When the vote was taken for the Declaration of Independence, he gave his in opposition to it, deeming the act as premature, but when the time came for signing the instrument he affixed his signature to it. During the latter year he was the president of the Convention which framed a state constitution for Delaware.

In 1779 ill health compelled him to withdraw from public life, but he returned to it the next year. In 1782 he was made a judge of the Court of Appeals in Admiralty Cases, and retained this position during the existence of the office. In 1785 he assisted in settling a disputed point about the territory between Massachusetts and New York. In 1787 he was a representative of his state in the Convention for framing the Federal Constitution, and on its adoption was elected a member of the United States Senate, and occupied a place there until 1793, when he became judge of the Supreme Court of his state. This office he filled till his death in the fall of 1798.

THOMAS McKEAN.

DELAWARE.

THOMAS McKEAN was born in New London, Chester county, Pennsylvania, on the 19th of March, 1734. At the conclusion of his studies with the Rev. Dr. Allison, under whose care he was placed, he began the study of the law, where his talents soon manifested themselves, and he was employed as assistant clerk of the Court of Common Pleas. He was admitted to the bar when twenty-one years of age, and permitted to practise in three counties of Delaware. He soon became eminent in his profession, attracting the attention of many leading men.

When only twenty-two years of age, the attorney-general of the province appointed him, without solicitation, his deputy to prosecute all claims for the crown in the county of Sussex. In 1757 he was admitted to practise in the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and about the same time was elected clerk of the House of Assembly of Delaware; he declined another election the following year, however. In 1762 he was appointed, together with Cæsar Rodney, to revise and print the laws of the province which had been enacted during the preceding ten years.

He was next elected a representative to the General Assembly from Newcastle, although he had resided in Philadelphia for six years, but at his urgent request he was permitted to relinquish his seat. A committee was appointed to call upon him and request him to nominate seven men for representatives; he finally acceded to their desires, and they were elected by large majorities. In 1765 he became a member of the Pennsylvania Assembly, to which he was annually elected for the next seventeen years. In 1765 he was a delegate to the General Congress of the colonies assembled at New York, and was placed upon the committee who prepared an address to the British House of Commons. In the same year he was also appointed sole notary public for the "lower counties on the Delaware," and afterwards, in quick succession, justice of the peace, judge of the Court of Common Pleas and Quarter Sessions, also of the Orphan Court.

In 1766 he was admitted by the governor of New Jersey to practise in any of its courts. In 1771 he was appointed collector of the customs for the port of Newcastle, and elected speaker of the Assembly of Delaware the next year. In September, 1774, he attended the first Continental Congress, being delegate from the lower counties in Delaware, and continued a delegate until the ratification of the treaty of peace in 1783, being the only member who served during the whole revolutionary period uninterruptedly. He ardently supported the measure which led finally to the Declaration of Independence, and voted for and signed that instrument.

In September, 1776, he was appointed a member of the convention to form a state constitution, although he then commanded a regiment under Washington. This instrument, which was adopted by a unanimous vote, was the production of his pen. McKean, claimed as citizen by both Delaware and Pennsylvania, served both, filling offices in each state, officiating as president of the former and chief justice of the latter in 1777. In 1781 he was appointed president of Congress in place of Mr. Huntington of Connecticut, resigning that position in November, receiving the thanks of Congress for his able services. McKean retained the office of chief justice of Pennsylvania until 1799, when, being chosen governor, he retired from the bench. His administration continued until 1808, when he withdrew from public life, and died on the 24th of June, 1817, when eighty-four years of age.

SAMUEL CHASE.

MARYLAND.

SAMUEL CHASE was born in Somerset county, Maryland, April 17, 1741. His early education was directed by his father, an Episcopal clergyman, of English birth, who sent him to Annapolis, where he applied himself to the study of the law, and was admitted to the bar at twenty years of age, soon becoming noted as a skilful and eloquent advocate and learned lawyer. He strongly opposed the royal governor and his adherents in the colonial legislature, and was one of the most vehement in resisting the Stamp Act, becoming the leader of the friends of liberty in his state.

Mr. Chase was one of the five delegates sent by the Maryland convention to the Continental Congress in 1774, of which he continued a member during all the sessions until the end of the year 1788. He it was who denounced Rev. Dr. Zubley of Georgia as a traitor, compelling him to flee from Congress, the secrets of which body he was revealing to the enemy. In 1776 Chase accompanied Charles and John Carroll on a mission to Canada, all the more readily because the Maryland convention was inclined to half-way measures, and refused to instruct its delegates to vote for the Declaration of Independence. Upon his return he canvassed the state, brought public opinion to bear on the convention, and thus having caused the passage of the desired resolution, returned to Philadelphia in time to vote for independence. He was placed on the greater part of the important committees in Congress, where his industry was unwearied. During the last three years of the war he remained at home practising law, to the study of which he had devoted all his spare time while in Congress.

In 1783 he went to England as commissioner from Maryland, to recover funds invested in the Bank of England before the war. After remaining there a year, he succeeded so far in adjusting the claim that six hundred and fifty thousand dollars were afterwards paid to the state. Removing to Baltimore in 1788, he was appointed chief justice in a newly-established criminal court there, and in 1791 chief justice of the General Court of Maryland; between these two dates being a member of the Maryland convention for the consideration of the Federal Constitution, which instrument he did not think sufficiently democratic. In 1796 he was appointed associate justice of the Supreme Court by Washington, with whom he had long been on terms of intimacy. In 1804, at the instance of John Randolph, he was impeached by the House of Representatives for misdemeanor in the conduct of several political trials, particularly those of Fries and Callender, convicted of seditious libels five years previously. He was discharged, however, by the Senate, March 5, 1805, a majority being in his favor in five out of eight charges, and against him on the remainder. After his discharge, Judge Chase resumed his seat on the bench, which he occupied until his death, June 19, 1811. He was a pure patriot, a learned and able, though sometimes an overbearing judge, and a brave but rather irritable man.

THOMAS STONE.

MARYLAND.

THOMAS STONE was born in Maryland in the year 1743. After having received a fair classical education he studied law and commenced practice at Fredericton.

He attached himself to the colonial cause early in the Revolution from motives of pure patriotism and a love of justice, and was elected a delegate to the first session of the Continental Congress, but retired to private life upon its completion. He was returned in 1775, with the injunction, however, not to vote for independence. Thus fettered, Mr. Stone could not do justice to himself, but the restriction having been removed, he willingly subscribed his name to the document.

His unassuming disposition prevented him from being conspicuous as a public character, but he rendered an important service in being one of the committee who drew up the Articles of Confederation, adopted November, 1777.

He refused a reëlection to Congress, but took a seat in the Maryland Legislature. In 1783 he was again sent to Congress, and was present when Washington resigned his commission. In 1784 he was appointed president, pro tempore, of that body, and had it not been for his modesty he would doubtless have been elected to that important situation. He died at his residence, Port Tobacco, on the 5th of October, 1787, as he was on the point of embarking for Europe.

WILLIAM PACA.

MARYLAND.

WILLIAM PACA was the second son of a wealthy planter of Maryland, where he was born on the 31st of October, 1740. He was carefully educated when young, and graduated at Philadelphia College in 1759. He then commenced studying law, and after having been admitted to the bar settled at Annapolis.

He was made a member of the Provincial Assembly, and when the Stamp Act aroused the people, in 1765, to the danger of their situation, he warmly opposed it. This conduct, as well as many subsequent acts of his, endeared him to the people, although it rendered him unpopular to the royal party. He was made a member of the first Continental Congress, with full instructions to accede to all measures necessary to redress the grievances of the colonies. He was successively reëlected until 1778, when he was appointed chief justice of the Supreme Court of his state.

While serving in Congress he was much trammelled by the opposition of his constituents to independence, who, as late as the early part of 1776, passed a resolution forbidding the delegates to vote for it, but finally withdrew their restrictions. Thus freed, he continued his previous efforts in behalf of the colonies, and joyfully signed his name on the 2d of August, 1776.

Near the commencement of 1778 he received the appointment of chief justice of his state, and two years afterwards was made by Congress chief judge of Appeals in Prize and Admiralty Cases. In 1782 he was chosen governor of Maryland, after holding which office he retired to private life, but again filled the position in 1786, as well as serving a short time in Congress. In 1788 he was a member of the Convention called together to ratify the Federal Constitution, and after it had gone into effect Washington nominated him judge of the Maryland district. He held this office till his death in 1799.

CHARLES CARROLL.

MARYLAND.

CHARLES CARROLL of Carrollton was born at Annapolis, Maryland, September 20, 1737. His parents being of the Roman Catholic faith, his father took him to France, where he placed him at the college of English Jesuits, at St. Omer, when he was eight years of age, where he remained six years, afterwards going to a Jesuit college at Rheims. Remaining here a year, he entered the college of Louis le Grand, where he graduated at the age of seventeen, then beginning the study of law at Bourges. He remained here one year, thence proceeding to Paris, where he continued two years, and then repaired to London, and took apartments in the Temple. He remained here until 1765, when he returned to Maryland a finished scholar and gentleman, and in 1768 married Mary Darnell. He was heir to a vast estate, the last of the manorial grants of Maryland, and was considered the wealthiest man in the colonies at the time the revolutionary war broke out.

After his return, the passage of the Stamp Act first drew his particular attention towards political affairs, of which for some time he had been an interested spectator. He immediately espoused the American cause, and took an active part in the various patriotic movements of the times. Carroll became particularly distinguished as a political writer; and in 1771-72 his name became well known as such in the other colonies. In 1772 he wrote a series of essays against the right of the British government to tax the colonies without their consent; which was ably written, and emphatically triumphed over the papers written in opposition by the secretary of the colony. The name of the author was at first unknown, but the people were so grateful for the able defence of their cause, that they instructed the members of the Legislative Assembly of Maryland to return their sincere thanks to the unknown writer through the public prints. When it became known that Charles Carroll was the author, large numbers expressed their thanks personally, and he immediately stood high in popular confidence and esteem. His clear judgment and decided character made him umpire in several momentous cases, and he rose higher and higher in popular favor.

Carroll was appointed a member of the first committee of safety of Maryland, and in 1775 a member of the Provincial Assembly. Carroll early foresaw that the colonists would be obliged to resort to arms to defend their rights; and his sentiments, well known to be in favor of independence, were probably the cause of his not being sooner sent to the General Congress, as the Maryland convention were opposed to extreme measures. Anxious to witness the proceedings of the Continental Congress, he visited Philadelphia in 1776, and was so favorably known there that he, with Dr.

Franklin and Judge Chase, were chosen to visit Canada, to induce the Canadians to unite with the colonists. On his return from this mission in June, 1776, Carroll found the Declaration of Independence under discussion, and hastened to resume his seat at Annapolis, to use his influence to remove the instructions with which the delegates of Maryland were shackled. Together with Judge Chase he worked with persevering and untiring industry, and finally succeeded; when, having been elected a member of the Continental Congress, he returned to Philadelphia, with instructions to the delegates to vote according to their judgment. He arrived on the 8th of July, in season to affix his signature to the parchment, to which he added his place of residence, in order that he might be the sufferer in case punishment fell upon the heads of the patriots, as he had a cousin of the same name.

Ten days after taking his seat in Congress Carroll was placed upon the Board of War, of which he remained a member during his continuance in that body. In the latter part of 1776 he was appointed a member of the convention that framed a constitution for the state of Maryland, and in December after its adoption, was elected a member of the state senate. Carroll continued a member of Congress until 1788, when he relinquished his seat, and devoted himself to the affairs of his native state. In 1781 and 1786 he was reelected to the Maryland senate, and in December, 1788, he was chosen a member of the first United States Senate from Maryland. He was again elected to the Maryland senate in 1797, and in 1799 was appointed one of the commissioners to settle the boundary between Virginia and Maryland.

In 1810 Carroll retired to private life, devoting himself to the management of his estate, where his society was eagerly sought, being a man of cultivated mind, pleasing manners, proverbial hospitality, and liberal in all his views. When Carroll had passed the advanced age of ninety, on the 4th of July, 1828, he laid the corner stone of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, in the presence of an immense number of spectators, and attended by one of the most imposing civic processions ever seen in the United States. Carroll was spared for several years after, and died at Baltimore on the 14th day of November, 1832, in the ninety-sixth year of his age, and the last survivor of the signers of the Declaration of Independence.

GEORGE WYTHE.

VIRGINIA.

THIS earnest patriot was born in 1726, in Virginia. His parents being wealthy, he had every opportunity for acquiring a superior education. Both of them dying before he was of age, he was left to his own guidance, and the property left him was much more than sufficient for all his wants. He commenced a career of dissipation, from which he aroused himself at the age of thirty, to find ten of the most valuable years of his life wasted. Determined to retrieve his past misconduct, he applied himself earnestly to the study of law. He was admitted to the bar in 1757, and became distinguished for his talents and sense of right, as he would never knowingly undertake an unjust cause.

For several years previous to the Revolution he was a member of the Virginia House of Burgesses, and when the oppressive Stamp Act roused the ire of the people he showed himself a warm lover of liberty. In 1764 he drew up a remonstrance to the House of Commons, but in a strain too indignant to suit the colonists, who greatly modified it before it was sent.

In 1775 he was constituted a delegate to the Continental Congress at Philadelphia, and in connection with Thomas Jefferson and Edward Pendleton, revised the laws of Virginia; a duty which he performed with great success. In 1777 he was appointed speaker of the House of Delegates, and also a judge in the High Court of Chancery. When this was fully organized he was chosen sole judge, and occupied the bench for more than twenty years. For a while he was professor of law in the College of William and Mary, but was obliged to resign, as he found it conflicted with his other duties.

In 1787 Mr. Wythe was chosen to assist in the Convention which framed the Federal Constitution, and acted as chairman in most of the debates on the subject. He was also in the Assembly of Virginia, which met to consider its adoption, and was twice chosen United States Senator under its provisions. Notwithstanding the numerous draughts on his time, he taught a private school, for those who chose to attend it, free. His death, which was supposed to have been caused by poisoning, occurred on the 8th of June, 1800.

RICHARD HENRY LEE.

VIRGINIA.

RICHARD HENRY LEE, a descendant of one of the noblest families of Virginia, was born at Stratford, Westmoreland county, on the 20th day of January, 1732, within a short time, and only a few miles distant from the place, of the birth of Washington. After a course of private tuition at home, he was sent to England to be educated, according to the custom at that time. He was placed at Wakefield Academy, in Yorkshire, England, where he became a thoughtful and industrious student. Through ancient history, of which he was very fond, and of which he read eagerly all that came in his way, he became imbued with republican ideas and attached to those principles of liberty which he afterwards upheld and contended for. He also became an excellent Latin and Greek scholar, laying the basis of his knowledge of the classics which afterwards so improved his oratory.

He returned to Virginia in his twentieth year, where he came into possession of a considerable estate. He immediately applied himself to literary pursuits; and, fond of athletic exercises, he was led to form a military corps, of which he was chosen commander. He first appeared in public life in 1755, on the arrival of Braddock from England on his expedition against Fort Du Quesne, when, upon offering his services as captain of a company of volunteers, they were haughtily refused by that general, and Lee was obliged to return home deeply mortified.

In 1757, when in the twenty-fifth year of his age, Lee was appointed justice of the peace by the royal governor, which at that time was an important and responsible office. This was a strong evidence of the public respect, and he did not forfeit the good opinion held of his talents, as his brother magistrates requested the governor to so date his commission that he might have legal precedence, and be able to act as president of the court. Lee was soon after elected a member of the House of Burgesses, and retained his seat there during two or three sessions, but was too diffident to take part in the debates.

Unfortunately for Lee, at the advice of a friend he was thoughtlessly induced to apply to England for the office of collector under the proposed Stamp Act. He soon discovered his mistake, however, and determinedly exerted all his influence in opposition to the government; and being accused by the Tories of trying to revenge himself on account of his disappointment, he soon found an opportunity to defend himself, and succeeded in exculpating himself in the eyes of all but his enemies. He was placed upon a committee, by the House of Burgesses, to draw up an address to the King, a memorial to the Lords, and a remonstrance against taxation to the House of Commons, and selected to prepare two of the papers.

From this time Lee was ever on the alert for the cause of liberty, never failing to do every service in his power. In 1773 Lee was appointed on the first committee of correspondence, the plans of which committee he is said to have first suggested. He was cognizant of the secret movements and opinions of the British government, through his brother Arthur, who was a distinguished literary character in London, associating with the leading men. This was a great aid to him, as it furnished him with the earliest political intelligence, and generally so capable of being relied upon, that other committees of correspondence always credited information coming from the Virginia committee. He soon saw that no reconciliation could ever be effected, that nothing short of independence could arrest British oppression, and was therefore ready to propose it at a favorable opportunity.

In 1774 Lee was one of the delegates from Virginia to the first General Congress, which met at Philadelphia on the 5th of September, and where he made the second speech ever made in that assembly. He immediately took a leading position, and by his convincing eloquence, induced them to stand up boldly for their rights. He was placed upon all the most important committees, and as chairman of the committee to prepare addresses to the king, people of England, and the colonies, he reported the papers so highly praised. The address to the people of British America, which was one of the most masterly papers of the age, was written by Lee. Upon his return home at the close of the session, he was immediately elected to the House of Burgesses, and reelected to the General Congress in 1775. Here he was again placed upon the most important committees, drawing up the commission and instructions of General Washington as commander in chief of the American army. He also prepared the second address of Congress to the people of Great Britain, which takes a front rank among American state papers.

Lee was also a member of Congress in 1776, when the House of Burgesses in Virginia having desired her delegates to propose to declare the colonies independent, he was requested to make the proposition, which was warmly seconded by John Adams. His speech upon introducing the resolution was one of the finest he ever delivered. The consideration of the resolution was made the special order of the day for the first Monday in July, and a committee appointed to draw up a Declaration of Independence, of which Lee would have been chosen chairman but for the severe sickness of his wife, in consequence of which the glory of the authorship was transferred to Thomas Jefferson, who was appointed chairman in his stead.

Lee continued an active and untiring member of Congress until 1779. From the time he entered Congress till the middle of 1777, he had served on nearly a hundred important committees, and in most cases acted as chairman, and performed the greater part of the necessary labor. In 1778 he served upon thirty-seven committees, although laboring under serious ill-health. He was occasionally absent from Congress in consequence of sickness, and once because he was charged with toryism, as he received his rents in produce instead of continental currency. He explained satisfactorily, however, that it was for the benefit of his tenants that such an arrangement was made, in an able defence before the Virginia Assembly, which resulted in a resolution of thanks "to Richard Henry Lee for the faithful services he has rendered his country in the discharge of his duty as one of the delegates of this state in General Congress."

After leaving Congress in 1779, he remained in Virginia, where he sat in the Assembly, and during the next four years, as lieutenant of the county of Westmoreland, actively exerted himself to repel the enemy, who made incursions into the state. Lee was again elected to Congress in 1784, and by a unanimous vote was chosen president of that body. In 1786 and 1787 he was chosen to the Assembly of Virginia, and was again elected to Congress, and took a seat in that body in the latter year, and upon the adoption of the Federal Constitution was appointed one of the two first senators from Virginia, an office he retained until too infirm to take part longer in public life.

Lee was a man who, in every relation of life, maintained a character above reproach. He was twice married, and was a kind and affectionate husband and father. He was a sincere Christian, and was twice thanked by Episcopal conventions for the interest he manifested in their affairs, and his doors were ever open to the poor and destitute. He enjoyed through life the respect and gratitude of a nation, who truly mourned when, on the 19th of June, 1794, and in the sixty-fourth year of his age, he went to his last rest.

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

VIRGINIA.

THIS person, distinguished for the complete ascendancy which he acquired over the minds of men in every station of life, was born at Shadwell, in Virginia, on the 13th of April, 1743. His ancestors were among the earliest British emigrants to Virginia, coming from among the mountains of Wales, and his mother was of Scottish descent.

His father's death occurred when he was fourteen, and as he was the eldest of a family of eight, the fine estate of Monticello became his, where he always after that resided when not engaged in public duties, and where he died.

He entered a grammar school at the age of five, and commenced the study of the classics at the age of nine, under the care of the Rev. Mr. Douglas. Early in the year of 1760 he entered William and Mary College, where he studied for two years. He owed the direction which his mind received at that time towards mathematics and philosophy, to Dr. William Small, and the foundation of his future attainments in those sciences was then and there laid.

He then studied law in the office of George Wythe, another of the signers of the Declaration. During the prosecution of his studies in this office, in 1765, he heard the celebrated Patrick Henry deliver his famous denunciation against the Stamp Act, and at once became aware of the danger to which his country was exposed, and, animated by patriotic emotions, took his stand boldly for the colonists.

In 1769, in consequence of his sentiments, he was elected to the Virginia Legislature, and soon became popular there on account of his urgent though unsuccessful endeavors to procure the emancipation of slaves.

When, in 1773, the plan of correspondence between the colonies was carried out, he was very active, as one of the committee, with his pen, and in the next year his very able pamphlet, entitled "A Summary View of the Rights of British America," appeared. This production gave great offence to Lord Dunmore, the royal governor of Virginia, who threatened to arrest him for high treason, and attempted to dissolve the General Assembly because it sustained Jefferson, but failing in these efforts, he desisted from further action.

In 1775 Jefferson was elected a delegate to the Continental Congress, and served in this body with his wonted fidelity. Such was the confidence felt in his talents and ability, that although he was one of the youngest members, yet he was appointed chairman of the committee to draw up the Declaration of Independence. This instrument remains an imperishable monument to his memory, and furnishes us with a good idea of his talents and patriotism.

During the summer of 1776 he left Congress to take a seat in the Virginia Legislature, feeling that his services were needed more immediately at home. He was soon after appointed, with Dr. Franklin and Silas Deane, to go to France and negotiate terms of alliance, but was obliged to decline the honor, and remained in his own state till the close of the Revolution, rendering it important services.

From 1777 into 1779 he was engaged with George Wythe, and Edmund Pendleton in revising the laws of the state, and to him belongs the honor of proposing the laws forbidding the importation of slaves, annulling the rights of primogeniture, establishing schools for general education, and confirming freedom in religious opinion.

When the prisoners captured at Saratoga were sent to the different states to be provided for until the treaty between Gates and Burgoyne should be ratified, some were quartered near Jefferson's residence, and his sympathies being deeply enlisted in their behalf, he did all in his power to alleviate their sufferings. But provisions being scarce they were ordered out of the state, though Jefferson and his friends did all they could to have them retained.

In June, 1779, he succeeded Patrick Henry as governor of Virginia, and the latter portion of his administration was a period of both difficulty and danger. The state was threatened with raids from Arnold and his lawless bands of followers. Richmond was partially destroyed, and the governor and his council barely escaped capture. He endeavored, but in vain, to obtain possession of the traitor.

He had another narrow escape when Tarleton attempted to seize the legislators who were in session at Charlottesville. He was arranging some matters at his own house, when he saw the cavalry ascending a hill towards his residence. Hastily mounting a swift horse, he dashed through the woods and escaped.

In 1782 he was appointed minister plenipotentiary to assist in negotiating a treaty with Great Britain, but the preliminaries having been arranged before he could make ready to take his departure, he did not go. He was not long after elected a delegate to Congress, and was the chairman of the committee who recommended the ratification of the treaty with Great Britain in 1783.

In 1784 he wrote an essay on coinage and currency, and introduced the convenient system of decimals. During the May of this year he was appointed, with Adams and Franklin, to negotiate treaties of commerce with foreign nations. The latter having obtained permission to return home from the French court, Jefferson succeeded him as minister in 1785, and remained there four years, where he acquired an enviable reputation among the learned men, and his society was much sought after.

During his absence Washington had been inaugurated President under the new Constitution; and upon his return home he was offered his choice of going back to France or accepting a seat in the presidential cabinet as secretary of state. This latter office he accepted, and rendered the President important services during the trying period of his first administration. He felt called upon to differ with Washington in regard to the rising revolution in France, but acquiesced with him on the subject of the neutrality of the United States.

But his bold avowal of democratic sentiments, and undisguised sympathy with the French in their struggles for liberty, caused him to become the head of the party opposed to the administration of Washington, and in 1793 he resigned his position in the cabinet.

In 1796 he became the republican candidate for the presidency in opposition to John Adams. The latter was chosen; and in accordance with one of the provisions of the Constitution as it then stood, that the candidate receiving the next highest number of votes should be Vice-President, Mr. Jefferson filled that office.

In 1800 he was again, with Mr. Adams, before the people as an aspirant for the presidential chair, and this time was successful. Aaron Burr was on the same ticket with him, and received an equal number of votes, whereupon a new balloting ensued, and on the thirty-sixth time two of Mr. Burr's friends withdrew, and Jefferson was elected.

His administration continued eight years, he being reelected for a second term. The most important events which transpired during this period were the purchase of Louisiana from France, by the payment of fifteen million dollars; the passage of the embargo act, which prohibited all American vessels from sailing for foreign ports, all foreign vessels from taking out cargoes, and requiring all coasting vessels to give bonds to land their cargoes in the United States; the non-intercourse and non-importation systems; the experiment of constructing gunboats to protect American harbors; the suppression of Burr's attempt to dissolve the Union; and the sending of an exploring company to the Rocky Mountain region, and then westward to the Pacific. He also introduced the custom of communicating with Congress by message instead of personally addressing it, a custom which has been handed down to the present day. The foreign relations of the United States were in a very perplexed condition, but he brought them safely through all their troubles.

He retired to private life at the close of his presidential career, and spent the remainder of his days in the more quiet pursuits of agriculture and philosophy. Through his exertions a university was founded in 1818 at Charlottesville, near his residence, which he liberally endowed, and of which he was the rector.

Towards the end of his life his pecuniary affairs became so embarrassed that he was forced to sell his valuable private library to Congress for the sum of thirty thousand dollars, and this body also granted him the privilege of disposing of his fine estate by lottery, to prevent it from being seized by his creditors and sacrificed.

Early in the year 1826 his bodily health became so poor that he was obliged to cease exertion, and in the summer was confined to his bed. On the morning of the 4th of July he awoke, apparently no worse than on the preceding day, but he soon rapidly sunk, and at about noon his spirit passed away. It is a most singular coincidence that John Adams, who was associated with him in drawing up and signing the glorious Declaration just fifty years before, departed this life on the same day and hour with Jefferson. He endeared himself to the masses by his democratic sentiments, and in private life, to all who knew him, by his social virtues. In religion he was a freethinker, but his morality was unimpeachable.

BENJAMIN HARRISON.

VIRGINIA.

BENJAMIN HARRISON was born in Berkley, Charles City county, Virginia, about 1740. He was placed at the College of William and Mary, in order that he might obtain a thorough classical education, but disputing with one of the professors, he left college before the close of his term, never returning to receive his degree. His father having died while he was at college, the management of the estate fell to him, although a minor, being the oldest of six sons, and he performed his duties with great fidelity and skill.

At an early age, in 1764, Harrison entered public life, becoming an influential member of the Virginia House of Burgesses, where he was soon elected speaker, and a seat in which body he held during the greater part of his life. When the agitation caused by the Stamp Act took place, the royal governor, desirous of keeping him on the side of the government, by reason of his wealth and distinguished connections, as well as personal worth, offered him a seat in the executive council. He rejected the offer, however, announcing his attachment to the cause of the colonists in opposition to British tyranny.

Harrison was one of the seven delegates first elected by Virginia to the Continental Congress in 1774. He was reelected in 1775, during the autumn of which year he was appointed on the committee to visit Washington at Cambridge, Massachusetts, and united with him in forming plans for the future. Towards the close of 1775 he was appointed chairman of a committee to carry on foreign correspondence, in which position he faithfully labored until the spring of 1777, when such a committee became no longer necessary. He warmly favored independence, voting for and signing the Declaration of Independence in 1776. He resigned his seat in Congress in 1777, to return to public affairs in his own state, as well as private affairs which demanded his attention. He was immediately chosen a member of the House of Burgesses, and occupied the speaker's chair in that assembly until 1782.

Having been appointed lieutenant of his native county, which appointment made him not only commander of all the militia, with the title of colonel, but also presiding judge in all the civil courts in the county, he made himself active and useful in bringing the Virginia militia into some efficiency. In 1782 Harrison was chosen governor, managing affairs with great ability, and in 1785, having twice been reëlected, retired to private life. He almost immediately, however, resumed his seat as speaker in the House of Burgesses. In 1790 he was again nominated for governor, but declined. In April of the following year, having been elected to the gubernatorial chair, he invited a party of friends to dine. While dining he was seized with gout in the stomach, and died the following day. The lamented and respected William Henry Harrison, President of the United States, was a son of Benjamin Harrison.

THOMAS NELSON.

VIRGINIA.

THOMAS NELSON was born in Virginia, at Yorktown, December 26, 1738. His father was a wealthy merchant, and occupied a high position in society. In accordance with the custom among the opulent, he sent his son to England at the age of fourteen, to be educated. After completing his preparatory studies, he entered Trinity College, Cambridge, where he remained until 1761. He watched, with great anxiety, the struggle between England and America, and favored the latter.

In 1774 we find him a member of the Virginia House of Burgesses. It was during a session of that body that the resolutions passed on the "Boston Port Bill" so aroused the wrath of the royal governor that he dissolved the assembly, but many of the members met the next day at a tavern, and worked more effectively than before. He was also a member of the convention which met at Williamsburg to nominate delegates to the Continental Congress.

In 1775 he took a part in another convention, and there proposed the bold plan of putting Virginia in a state of defence, which was accordingly done. In August, 1774, he was elected a delegate to the General Congress, in which he was very active, although he did not mingle much in the debates. He retained his position there during the year 1776, but in May, 1777, was obliged to withdraw, on account of a serious trouble in his head. When he recovered sufficiently to be of service to his country, he was appointed brigadier-general and commander in chief of the military forces of his state.

About this time the finances of the country were in such an embarrassed condition that Congress called for volunteers. Mr. Nelson raised a body of them, and proceeded at their head to assist Washington at Philadelphia. The out-door life consequent on the duties of the last few months so far restored his health as to enable him to resume his seat in Congress in 1779; but a recurrence of his old complaint compelled him to again relinquish his connection with that body. In May of that year the operations of the enemy on the coast called General Nelson again into the field.

In 1781 he succeeded Thomas Jefferson as governor of the state. The state of things was then most disheartening, and called for active and vigilant measures; but as the distracted condition of affairs prevented many of the members of the council from meeting, he determined to take matters into his own hands, and by a liberal use of his time and money, succeeded in keeping the forces together until the surrender of Cornwallis. For this he received the merited thanks of Washington, although he was greatly blamed by many as having gone beyond his power as governor, but was fully and honorably acquitted by the legislature of Virginia. His health gradually declined from this time, and he died January 4, 1789.

FRANCIS LIGHTFOOT LEE.

VIRGINIA.

FRANCIS LIGHTFOOT LEE, a younger brother of Richard Henry, was born at Stratford, Westmoreland county, Virginia, October 14, 1734. His father dying before he was old enough to be sent abroad for an education, he received every advantage possible in the colonies, being placed at an early age in the charge of Rev. Dr. Craig, a pious and learned Scotch clergyman, who proved an excellent tutor, educating his heart as well as his head. Under his instruction he acquired a good knowledge of the classics, and developed a decided taste for reading and study, which he was able to gratify in his father's large and valuable library.

On the return of his brother Richard Henry from England, he was much impressed with his acquirements and polished manners, and immediately took him for a model. Having had an independent property left him by his father, and being without cares, he soon entered upon the pleasures and occupations of country life in Virginia, becoming a favorite by his gentleness and modesty; though these same qualities, which he always retained, proved disadvantageous in public life, as he never overcame a diffidence which appears to have been a family trait. He was aroused to the danger impending over his country by the contest in the House of Burgesses against Parliament, and took a seat in that body as a member from Loudon county, while his brother was at the same time a member from Westmoreland county.

He continued a useful member of this assembly until 1772, when he married and moved to Richmond. Here he was immediately chosen a member from Richmond, taking part in those measures of resistance against Great Britain in which Virginia was engaged at that time. He remained the representative of that county until August, 1775, when he was chosen in place of Colonel Bland, who resigned, to a seat in the General Congress. He was reëlected successively in 1776, 1777, and 1778, acting upon several important committees, and frequently sitting as chairman, and upon the adoption of the Declaration of Independence, signed that instrument with great delight. His chief service in Congress was the assistance he rendered while a member of the committee which framed the Articles of Confederation. He took the stand in favor of securing to the colonies the right to the northern fisheries and the navigation of the Mississippi in concluding the treaty with England, by which he gained the gratitude of the inhabitants of New England.

In the spring of 1779 he retired from Congress and returned home, intending never again to engage in politics. He was soon called, however, to represent his county in the Virginia senate, but he remained here only a short time, when he again gave up public service. A love of ease and social enjoyment rendered private life much more agreeable to him, and he kept his resolution, and never again could be induced to leave his domestic pleasures. He passed the remainder of his life in agricultural pursuits, reading, study, and pleasant intercourse with friends, and dispensed his wealth for the benefit of his country and fellowmen. In April, 1797, he was seized by severe pleurisy, and died in a few days, when sixty-three years of age. He left no children, and was survived by his wife only a few days.

SIGNERS OF THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

CARTER BRAXTON.

VIRGINIA.

CARTER BRAXTON was born at Newington, King and Queen's county, Virginia, September 10, 1736. He was educated at the College of William and Mary, where he graduated at the age of nineteen, and on leaving that institution married the daughter of a wealthy planter, by which union his fortune, already large, was considerably increased. He spent the early part of his life in the enjoyment of his fortune, going to England in 1757, where he remained until 1760.

In 1765 he took an active part in the session of the House of Burgesses of Virginia, of which he was a member, when the resolutions of Patrick Henry were introduced and adopted. Braxton took a conspicuous part in the convention met on the abdication of Governor Dunmore, for the purpose of forming a provincial government, and was chosen representative in the new assembly. In December, 1775, he was elected a delegate to the Continental Congress, as successor of Peyton Randolph, deceased. He remained in Congress only one session, and then resumed his seat in the state legislature, where he served, with but little interruption, until 1786, when he became a member of the executive council, and held that station until 1791. He was reelected to the same office in 1794, and held it until within four days of his death, which occurred October 10, 1797.

WILLIAM HOOPER.

NORTH CAROLINA.

WILLIAM HOOPER was born in Boston, Massachusetts, June 17, 1742, and was the son of a Scotch clergyman. He received a good preparation for a college course, and graduated at Harvard College in 1760. He was designed for the ministry, but evinced a preference for the law. Having been admitted to the bar, he removed to North Carolina, where he soon had extensive practice, and became a favorite in society.

In 1770-71 a party sprang up under the name of "Regulators," whose actions were viewed in different lights. Mr. Hooper considered them as low malecontents, and assisted Governor Tryon in suppressing them. For this he was condemned as a loyalist, and when he came out boldly on the colonial side he found many who distrusted him.

His legislative labors were commenced in 1773, in the Provincial Assembly in North Carolina, and he signalized himself by his opposition to the British. In 1774 he was elected a delegate to the Continental Congress, and although younger than a majority of the members, was placed upon two of the most important committees. He was again elected to Congress in 1775, and was chairman of the committee which drew up an address to the inhabitants of Jamaica.

He was again returned in 1776, but after signing the Declaration, was obliged to leave for home, as his private affairs were in a very disordered condition. When the Revolution ceased, and prosperity once more smiled upon the land, he resumed the practice of his profession, and did not appear in public life until 1786, when he was appointed a judge of the Federal Court established to settle the question of disputed territory between Massachusetts and New York. He died at Hillsborough, in October, 1790.

JOSEPH HEWES.

NORTH CAROLINA.

JOSEPH HEWES was born in Kingston, New Jersey, in 1730. He received his education at Princeton College, and after completing his studies in that institution, he was apprenticed to a merchant in Philadelphia, to fit him for commercial pursuits. His apprenticeship being ended, he commenced business with a small capital which his father furnished him, and a good reputation, and in a few years gained quite a fortune.

In 1760, when thirty years of age, he removed to Edenton, North Carolina, where he ever afterwards resided. Gaining the esteem of the people here by his honesty and uprightness, he was elected a member of the North Carolina legislature in 1763, where he discharged his duties faithfully, and was reëlected for several years. He early showed himself a decided patriot, using his influence to bring about a convention to second the call of Massachusetts for a General Congress.

He was elected a delegate to the Continental Congress by the convention that met in the summer of 1774. He took his seat on the 14th of the following September, and was appointed on a committee to "state the rights of the colonies in general, the several instances in which those rights are violated or infringed, and the means most proper to be pursued for obtaining a restoration of them." During this session he was active in maturing a plan for a non-importation agreement throughout the colonies. By this act he exhibited his disinterested patriotism, as, if carried into effect, the agreement would ruin the business in which he was engaged.

Hewes was again elected a member of Congress in 1775, also in 1776, serving on many important committees, and was in effect the first secretary of the navy of the United States. His views of independence being supported by his instructions, he voted for and signed the Declaration. Returning home on account of the troubles, he remained until 1779, declining a reëlection in 1777. In 1779, however, he was elected again, but having a weak constitution, his health failed rapidly, and he resigned his seat. He only lived eleven days after, dying in Philadelphia on the 10th of November, 1779, in the fiftieth year of his age. His remains were followed to the grave by Congress in a body, and large numbers of the citizens of Philadelphia.

JOHN PENN.

NORTH CAROLINA.

JOHN PENN was born in Virginia, on the 17th of May, 1741. His father, although possessed of the means for giving him a good English education, utterly neglected his intellectual culture, and his two or three years' attendance at a common country school were his only opportunities for improvement. His father dying when he was only eighteen, left him in the full possession of a competent fortune. Happily for him, the retirement of his previous life had been without the inducements to dissipation which too many situations afford, and the natural vigor and bent of his mind prevented him, when he came into the enjoyment of his estate, from leading an idle and vicious life.

Instead of making for himself companions of the gay and dissipated, he sought the society of the celebrated Edward Pendleton, a near relative, who allowed him the free use of his extensive library. This privilege was turned to advantage by young Penn, who applied himself assiduously to the study of the law. In this he succeeded far beyond his expectations, and although he was his own instructor, was admitted to the bar at the age of twenty-one. His new profession rapidly developed talents which hitherto had lain dormant, and his earnest, persuasive eloquence stirred the tenderest emotions of all who heard it.

In 1774 he moved to North Carolina, where his talents soon won him renown, and in 1775 he was sent as delegate to the Continental Congress. He retained his connection with this body three years, during which time he discharged his duties faithfully and well.

When, in 1780, Cornwallis commenced his victorious march, the western part of North Carolina was in a wholly defenceless condition, and the legislature conferred almost absolute authority upon Mr. Penn to take measures for the preservation of it, which he accomplished in a creditable manner. In 1781 he resumed the practice of his profession, but he was again called into public life in 1784, when he was appointed a receiver of taxes by Robert Morris for his state. This situation, although one of trust and honor, was such as to render him unpopular in the extreme, and finding that his exertions in it were of little benefit to his country, he soon resigned it.

He died in September, 1788. His life furnishes a bright example of success attending well-directed efforts in spite of discouragements in early life.

EDWARD RUTLEDGE.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

EDWARD RUTLEDGE was born in South Carolina, in November, 1749. His father emigrated from Ireland, and settled at Charleston, in 1735. After receiving a good English and classical education, he was placed in the office of his elder brother to prepare for the law, and by way of finishing his studies, he went to England, where he entered the Inner Temple, and had an opportunity of listening to the eloquence of the master minds of the day. He returned home in 1772, and was admitted to the bar, where he soon rapidly rose into eminence.

Although young, he had taken a great interest in the political questions of the day, and took a decisive stand on the side of the colonies. This, together with his growing reputation as a lawyer, brought him before the public, and the convention of South Carolina sent him as a delegate to the first Continental Congress. He there displayed great activity and fearlessness in his efforts for the Declaration of Independence, although many of the citizens of his state were opposed to it. He, with Richard Lee and John Adams, prepared the preamble.

When, during the darkest days of the Revolution, the British sent Lord Howe to endeavor to procure a reconciliation, Dr. Franklin, John Adams, and Mr. Rutledge were commissioned to negotiate with him. This proved, as was expected, a failure, as the terms offered, namely, the representation of the colonies as free states, were such as England would not accept. On account of ill health he relinquished his seat in Congress in 1777, but returned in 1779, having in the mean time been actively engaged at home in repelling invasion. He commanded a battalion of artillery, and succeeded in dislodging the British from their position at Port Royal. During the siege of Charleston, in 1780, he was actively engaged in affording succor to General Lincoln, but in an attempt to throw troops into the city, was captured, and sent to St. Augustine, Florida, where he remained a prisoner for nearly a year. He afterwards resided some time in Philadelphia, but soon removed south, and resumed the practice of his profession, serving ably at the same time in the state legislature, where he rendered himself conspicuous by his strenuous opposition to the extension of slavery, and his advocacy of the Federal Constitution.

He was chosen to fill the vacancy in the Senate of the United States caused by the resignation of Charles C. Pinckney, but did not hold the office after 1798, when he was elected governor of South Carolina. In this office he died, January 23, 1800.

THOMAS HAYWARD.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

THOMAS HAYWARD was born in South Carolina, in the year 1746. His father was a wealthy planter, and placed his son in the best classical school in that region, where he so readily mastered the Latin that he read with ease the best works in that language. As soon as he finished his studies he entered a law office, where he studied for a while, and then went to England to finish his legal education. He entered one of the courts of the Temple, and prosecuted his studies with much zeal.

While he was in England he was much displeased with the idea, every where prevalent, that a colonist was inferior to an inhabitant of the mother country, and he combated it, but unsuccessfully. Before returning home he visited several of the states of Europe, but instead of being impressed with the splendor of the courts, he only became more deeply imbued with democratic principles. He was among the first in his state to resist tyranny and oppression in every form, and constantly scoffed at the idea of unconditional submission. This boldness caused him to be elected a member of the General Assembly, and also of the first "Committee of Safety."

In 1775 he was elected a member of the General Congress, but only accepted after he had been waited upon by a special delegation. He remained here until 1778, when he became a judge of the criminal and civil courts for his state.

His patriotism rendered him particularly odious to the tories, who made several ineffectual attempts to obtain his person. He received a military commission in 1780, and having been wounded, was taken prisoner and sent to St. Augustine, Florida, where he remained a year. On his return he resumed his seat upon the bench, and was engaged in its duties until 1798. He then retired to private life, and died March, 1809.

THOMAS LYNCH, JR.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

THOMAS LYNCH was born in Prince George's parish, South Carolina, on the 5th of August, 1749. Having received a good academical education at Georgetown, South Carolina, he was placed at Eton, England, and after completing his preparatory studies entered Cambridge University, where he took his degree, and won the respect and esteem of the tutors on account of his studious habits. Upon leaving Cambridge, Lynch began the study of the law in the Temple, London. Here he applied himself faithfully, and became a finished lawyer, and being acquainted with some of the leading politicians, gained a pretty thorough knowledge of the movements of the government, and became desirous to return home, where he arrived in 1772. He soon after married, relinquished the profession of the law, and settled upon a plantation given him by his father.

Lynch made his first appearance in public life in 1773, at a town meeting in Charleston, called for the consideration of British imposition. Here he immediately won the hearts of the people by his patriotism and eloquence, and from that time he was looked upon as one who would materially aid in obtaining freedom for his country. He was chosen to many offices of trust, and in 1775 he accepted a captain's commission in the army.

He was called from this service to the Continental Congress, to fill the seat vacated by his father in consequence of ill health, and took his seat in that body in 1776, supporting the proposition for independence and signing his name to the Declaration, which was one of his last public acts. He did not remain long in Congress, but was obliged to resign his seat, as his health became impaired, and returned home with his father, who died at Annapolis. As the only means of saving his life he sailed for the

SIGNERS OF THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

West Indies, accompanied by his wife, towards the latter part of the year 1779, intending to take passage on a neutral vessel thence to Europe. The vessel is supposed to have foundered at sea, as it never reached its destined port, and was never heard of afterwards. He was one of the youngest and most promising statesmen of the Revolution, being only thirty years of age when he perished.

ARTHUR MIDDLETON.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

ARTHUR MIDDLETON was born in South Carolina, in 1743. His father, Henry Middleton, was a wealthy planter, of English descent. The son enjoyed such opportunities as the province afforded for obtaining an education, until he reached a suitable age, when he was sent to England to receive a thorough education. At fifteen he was sent to Harrow school, from thence to Westminster, where he remained four years, then entering Cambridge University. Here he was very studious, and after remaining four years, graduated with distinguished honors at the age of twenty-two.

After remaining some time in England, for the purpose of improvement and the cultivation of the acquaintance of a branch of his family, he travelled on the continent for two years, passing some time at Rome, where he became well acquainted with the fine arts, and quite proficient as a painter. He again visited Europe after his marriage, and returning, took up his residence in the family mansion and engaged in planting. He soon, however, left this for a more active life, and became a leader of the revolutionary party. He was one of the most useful and decided members of the first council of safety.

This colony, having been particularly favored by the English government, it required all the eloquence of the leaders to rouse the people to take part in the Revolution, and to this task Middleton zealously devoted himself. In 1776 he was placed upon the committee to form a state government, and in the spring he was elected by the Provincial Legislature a delegate to the Continental Congress, and having been active in promoting measures leading to the severing of the colonies from Great Britain, affixed his name to the Declaration of Independence.

Middleton returned to South Carolina at the close of 1777, when his membership terminated, and in 1778 was elected governor, but declined accepting the appointment. In 1779, South Carolina being invaded by the British, his property was ravaged, but unmindful of it he joined Governor Rutledge in his defence of the state. In 1780, after the fall of Charleston, he was taken prisoner, and being one of those kept as hostages, he was sent to St. Augustine, Florida, and thence to the Jersey prison ship. The latter part of 1780 he was sent to Philadelphia an exchanged prisoner, and was at once elected a Representative to Congress, where he served till the close of the war.

Middleton was an excellent stenographer, then an uncommon accomplishment, taking down many debates; he also wrote useful political essays under the signature of "Andrew Marvell." He was a representative to the state legislature until the close of the year 1787, when, having contracted an intermittent fever, he died on the 1st of January, 1788.

BUTTON GWINNETT.

GEORGIA.

BUTTON GWINNETT was born in England, in 1732. He received a good common education only, as the means of his parents were somewhat limited. After finishing an apprenticeship to a merchant in Bristol, he married and began business for himself. Attracted by prospects of wealth and distinction, he embarked for America, and arrived at Charleston, South Carolina, in the year 1770. He remained here two years engaged in mercantile business, when he removed to Georgia, purchasing large tracts of land on St. Catharine's Island, and devoted himself to agricultural pursuits.

He favored, in a measure, the opposition of the colonists to British oppression, but was one of those who were somewhat doubtful of success in an open rupture with the mother country; consequently he looked upon the proposition of a General Congress with unfavorable eyes, as dangerous and full of evils. Meeting with Dr. Lyman Hall, and other true patriots, however, he changed his views, and became one of the warmest supporters of American independence, and an advocate of unyielding resistance to oppression.

Gwinnett became very popular as soon as he espoused the cause of the people, and being talented and possessing a cultivated mind, every honor in their power they quickly bestowed upon him. Openly supporting the cause of the patriots, he was elected to the Continental Congress by the parish of St. John, in 1775. He was reelected the following year, and according to instruction and his own inclination, he voted for and signed the Declaration of Independence. He remained in Congress until 1777, when he was chosen a member of the state convention to form a constitution, and its grand outlines are attributed to Gwinnett.

Receiving so many civil honors, Gwinnett became ambitious, and desirous of obtaining military honors also. He became a candidate for the office of brigadier-general, but was defeated by his opponent, Colonel McIntosh, whom he ever afterwards looked upon as a personal enemy. He planned a military expedition against East Florida, which he refused to trust to General McIntosh, who was entitled to command it, and which ended disastrously. This, together with other irritations, led to a duel, in which both were wounded, Gwinnett mortally, and at the early age of forty-five he died, on the 27th of May, 1777.

LYMAN HALL.

GEORGIA.

LYMAN HALL was born in Connecticut, in 1727. His father possessing some fortune, he received a good education, entering Yale College at the age of sixteen, and graduating in 1747. He selected the practice of medicine as a profession, and after completing his professional studies, he married, and removed to South Carolina in 1752, and soon afterwards to Sunbury, Georgia. Here he was very successful in his profession, and won the unlimited confidence and esteem of his fellow-citizens by his intelligence, uprightness, and consistency.

Dr. Hall was among the first of the patriots at the south to resist British oppression. The community in which he lived was thoroughly impressed with the same feeling as many of the people were from New England, and brought hither their principles. The parish of St. John, in which Dr. Hall resided, appeared in fact to have all the patriotism of the province concentrated there, as many of the settlers were direct from Europe, in whom the principles of freedom were much less strong. In 1774, with the assistance of a few others, he endeavored to arouse a little spirit by calling meetings, but his efforts seemed almost useless. Finally, at a general meeting called at Savannah, in July, 1774, despairing of inducing Georgia to send delegates to Congress at Philadelphia, he returned home. Having the deepest sympathy with the New England patriots, the people of the parish of St. John determined to act independently of the rest of the colony, and elected Dr. Hall delegate to the General Congress, where he took a seat by a unanimous vote of Congress, notwithstanding he was not a delegate countenanced by the whole province.

Afterwards Georgia was induced to send five delegates, of whom Hall was one. He offered his new credentials in May, 1776, taking part in the debates which followed Mr. Lee's motion for independence, warmly supporting it, and voting for it on the 4th of July. After signing the Declaration, on the 2d of August he returned home for a time. He continued to be annually reëlected to Congress until 1780, at the close of which year he retired from the Continental Congress to attend to the safety of his family, as the state was invaded by the British. He was able to remove them, but being obliged to leave his property it was confiscated. Returning to Georgia in 1782, he was elected governor the following year, which office he held one term, and then retired to private life. He died in February, 1791, in the sixty-third year of his age, greatly lamented.

GEORGE WALTON.

GEORGIA.

GEORGE WALTON was born in Virginia, in 1740. His early education was exceedingly limited, and at the age of fourteen he was apprenticed to a carpenter. His desire for information prompted him to spend all his spare moments at night poring over books by the aid of a pine torch. In this way his mind became well stored, and he laid the foundation of his future greatness. He afterwards moved into Georgia and commenced the study of law, the practice of which he began in 1777, at a period when the colonies were in a ferment respecting British oppression.

Georgia was at first very backward in taking a stand on the side of right and justice, and was the only colony not represented in the General Congress. Walton, with a few other ardent patriots, endeavored to persuade the people to adopt sentiments like his own. His efforts were crowned with success, and he had the pleasure of seeing Georgia finally yield to the tide of public opinion.

In 1776 the Colonial Assembly sent five delegates to the Continental Congress, of whom Mr. Walton was one. This body was convened at Baltimore at the time he took his seat, having removed from Philadelphia because of the expected attack upon that city by Cornwallis.

He retired from his congressional duties in 1778, to accept the position of colonel of a regiment in his state, when it was threatened with an invasion from the sea. He was present at the siege of Savannah, and received a severe wound in his thigh, and while in this disabled condition was taken prisoner, but was finally exchanged.

In October, 1779, he was appointed governor of Georgia by the legislature, but did not hold this office long, as he was again sent to Congress, but in the next October he returned home to retake the position of governor.

He became also chief justice of the state, and held this post of honor till his death. In 1798 he was constituted a member of the United States Senate, which position he retained a year. He died in Augusta, Georgia, February 2, 1804.

BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED

HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES,

AND

BIOGRAPHIES OF THE SIGNERS OF THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

THE American people have always received with favor works on the History of their country, and none perhaps has had a wider circulation, or been more generally approved, than this of which the publisher now offers a new and improved edition, brought down to the administration of President Buchanan.

A testimonial to a former edition, signed by DANIEL WEBSTER, GEORGE P. MARSH, MOSES H. GRINNELL, and others, thus speaks of the author and his work: "His spirited and impartial narrative, exhibiting an unusual degree of industry, candor, and carefulness; his manly and philosophical views of the physical, social, and political aspects of our Republic; and the completeness of the sketch he presents of American society, in its widely various features,—all combine to invest it with a standard character." And it recommends the History "as a standard work, remarkable for the clearness with which it is written, and for the impartiality with which many vexed questions, so interesting to us as Americans, are treated."

The present edition will offer to the reader a complete record of our national annals, and will show the progress and condition of the country as exhibited by the census of 1860.

The Biographies of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence are a valuable addition to the History, which it is believed must prove highly acceptable to all who reverence that great instrument and the patriots who pledged "their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honors" to its support.

The work will be beautifully illustrated with fine steel engravings and wood cuts, executed expressly for it, from pictures by eminent artists; and original designs by Hammatt Billings. It will also contain a map of the United States, engraved expressly for the work; and the publisher can safely say that no serial publication of equal value and beauty, has ever before been offered to the American public at so low a price.

CONDITIONS OF PUBLICATION.

THE work will be published in parts, each containing two fine steel engravings, engraved expressly for this work, also numerous highly finished wood cuts will be given in the course of publication.

Each part will be furnished to subscribers at twenty-five cents, payable on delivery.

The work is expected to be completed in thirty parts; but should the number exceed thirty-two, all over that number will be furnished to subscribers gratis.

 No subscription will be taken for less than one entire copy.

 The Southern Rebellion has given a new interest to the History of the United States, by calling attention to the origin and progress of the Union, and especially to those past events and acts which serve to explain, in some degree, the present state of affairs. The publisher is therefore induced to continue the History through this most important era of the nation's existence, and thus to make a complete History of the country, from the earliest period down to the close of Rebellion. With this object, a new volume will be issued, commencing with Mr. Buchanan's Administration, illustrated with the finest engravings, and giving a narrative of events, compiled from official documents and other authentic sources. Specimen parts are now ready.
